Some New York managers have been criticizing the New Theatre as an institution doomed to failure because it is rather an enterprise built upon the artificial sentiment of some rich people than a growth from a popular demand. Such criticism, however, might be directed against the Metropolitan Museum of Art or any other endowed institution. Art has often found its succor in endowment, and its development has in a great measure been fostered by rich and appreciative benefactors. In continental Europe the theatre for generations has been a state endowed institution and flourished accordingly. There is no reason why an endowed theatre should not reap as abundant a success in America. That wealthy patrons in this country have recognized the validity of such an institution is a telling fact in its favor and shows not an artificial ephemeral sentiment, but a substantial appreciation of its influence and mission.

One of the handsomest and best equipped of the newer theatres in New York has been turned into a vaudeville and moving-picture house. It is only one of half a dozen finely equipped playhouses which have recently been forced to abandon legitimate drama for the 10-cent picture show. Two years ago, when the speculative fever in the building of theatres in New York was at its height, Daniel Frohman prophesied the existing chaotic condition, and now he confesses he knows no avenue of immediate relief. "This disastrous year has already been a severe lesson to many producers," he says. "Beautiful theatres have sprung up everywhere, but they do not draw audiences unless they produce good plays. The public understands the situation thoroughly, and it has become exceedingly discriminative. This discrimination will have the effect of creating a greater sense of caution in the future. Managers will learn by bitter experience that not quantity but quality is the thing required. . . . Plays no longer succeed because they are merely good. They must be unique in the quality of their excellence"—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

The "Report of the Select Joint Committee of the House of Lords and the House of Commons on Stage Plays (censorship)" is published. The main question which the committee had to pass upon was whether censorship was to be continued or not. The answer given is an ingenious compromise. According to the report the censorship is to remain, and yet, on the other hand, it may be dispensed with. In this case, supposing the recommendations are turned into law, the author of an objectionable play and manager of the theatrical performance may be indicted, if the public prosecutor so desires.

OBITUARY

Jacob Jung died on December 6, at his residence, 1923 East Lombard Street, Baltimore, Md., aged 73 years. He was one of the leading members of St. Michael's parish since its establishment, and at his requiem in that church on December 10, his three sons, Fathers Henry, Frederick, who are Redemptorists, and Lawrence Jung, of Toronto, Canada, officiated as ministers of the Mass. Four years ago, on the occasion of his golden wedding, the Superior General of the Redemptorists made Mr. Jung an oblate of that congregation, and he therefore participated in all its spiritual benefits. On that occasion the three sons sang the Mass of thanksgiving.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

Enquirer, Savannah, Ga.—In the "Christmas Issue" of Collier's Weekly, under the caption of "The First Christmas," is published an extract purporting to be from the Holy Scriptures, Luke ii, 1-40. The text is not verbatim with the original in the Douay (Catholic) Bible. Is Collier's reproduction the Catholic or non-Catholic version? Again, the owners of Collier's are, I believe, Catholics, therefore is it the proper thing for them as Catholics to draw on the Protestant Bible for their extracts?

Answer.—The version used in the quotation you refer to is the Protestant. Perhaps the person who had the making up of the page on which it occurs is not a Catholic. After all, Collier's, like all other such periodicals, no matter who own them, belongs to the kingdom of this world. We know who the prince of this kingdom is, and which version he prefers. It would have been in better taste not to have used any version of the Gospel for the front page of a weekly illustrated; but then, perhaps, it would not have been better business. And if the Gospel is to be used as a business asset, we would prefer the version to be—well, King James'.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have received the first bound volume of AMERICA which you so kindly sent me. It has been a pleasure to review the work and progress of AMERICA since its establishment in the pages of its first bound volume. The Catholics of America have long been waiting for a paper of this calibre, and it is now with a distinct sense of relief that we feel that real Catholic journalism has begun in America.

The dignity of AMERICA's character and the sureness of its tone are an added recommendation. It does not bother itself about trifles, but reaches out to topics worth while. I have always considered it a mistake in a Catholic journal of any kind to take up its valuable space with joke-columns and recipes for cooking. The great need now is to train our Catholic public to serious reading: about Catholic matters of interest. AMERICA has already taken the initial steps towards the accomplishment of this end.

With my constant best wishes and my blessing upon your work

WILLIAM H. O'CONNELL,
Archbishop of Boston.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In forwarding you my subscription for the coming year, allow me to say that I have curtailed my reading of current magazine literature to the clear-cut pages of AMERICA, because it is the one most suited to my temperament and tastes. I have known more than one instance where the loan of it has quickened not only the reader's intelligence but, what is better, revived his faith.

REV. P. F. O'BRIEN, M.A., T.C.D.
St. Thomas College, St. Paul, Minn.

I should be very sorry indeed to miss any number of AMERICA. It is with the greatest delight I receive each successive number and read it from cover to cover. No priest should be without it. I have recommended it from the pulpit as an excellent Catholic weekly that should be in the home of every family. I have "The Catholic Encyclopedia" on my desk for reference. Its publication certainly marks an epoch in the annals of Catholic literature. But the publication of AMERICA is even a grander achievement. The first volume already issued should convince the most sceptical that AMERICA has passed the stage of experiment—is a success.—Rev. James P. McGowan, Jr., Fort Covington, N. Y.

AMERICA is warmly welcomed at St. Bernard's and we have noted with pleasure its similarity to the German review Allg. Rundschau, so ably edited by Dr. Kanes. Both seem to have the same object in view, namely, to give Catholics the truth concerning current affairs, both lay and ecclesiastical, and to awaken them to a realization of their importance in every field. That AMERICA may soon attain the circulation it deserves is the earnest wish of Rev. P. Benedict, O.S.B., St. Bernard's College, St. Bernard, Ala.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA324

CHRONICLE OF 1909

At Home.—The President in his message to the sixty-first Congress, reviewing the harmonious relations of the country with other nations, reminded Congress of our interests in several quarters of the globe and commended the Pan-American policy of the Government and its practical results in Mexico, Venezuela and Panama, Cuba, San Domingo and Chile, and he indorsed the action of Secretary Knox in regard to Zelaya, the President of Nicaragua. The message outlined our policy in the Far East, standing for the integrity of China and the continuance of amicable relations with Japan. The various Departments of the Government were next considered. A reform of the diplomatic service was strongly urged as well as substantial changes in the organization of the army. The President suggested the strengthening of our coast defences, particularly at the entrance of Chesapeake Bay, and the establishing of a naval base at Pearl Harbor, near Honolulu. The chief improvements for the navy are those lately adopted by Secretary Meyer, and the appointment of an astronomer rather than a naval officer at the head of the naval observatory. The program for the Department of Justice was a more expeditious legal procedure, and for the Post Office Department an increase of postage on magazines and periodicals to reduce the deficit which this year was $63,000,000. A subsidy was proposed for various lines on the Atlantic and the Pacific. Recommendations affecting the Department of the Interior were the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as States, and the conservation of national resources. The message closed with the discussion of several unclassified topics, chief among them being the suppression of the white slave traffic; the establishment of a Bureau of Health; the payment of depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and the celebration of the semi-centennial of Negro Freedom in such a way as to show the progress of the race during the past half-century.—The chief political item of interest in connection with the home government during the year was the passage of the Tariff bill, which was signed by the President on August 6. The measure was not a perfect tariff bill nor a complete compliance with the promises made, strictly interpreted, but as Mr. Taft declared, "a fulfilment free from criticism in respect to a subject matter involving many schedules and thousands of articles could not be expected." The prolonged discussion of the measure made little change in the viewpoint of the two political parties regarding protection.—President Taft made clear his determination that the Thirteenth United States Census is to be supervised by efficient men and not by politicians. In a letter addressed to Secretary Nagel he ordered the discharge of any census supervisors or enumerators who might be found taking part in politics during his term of office. According to the census bulletin on the subject, there were in the United States in 1906, the period of the fifth United States Census of the Religious Bodies in this country, 186 religious denominations and 32,936,445 church members. The figures show that in 29 states a majority of members belonged to Protestant bodies; in 16 states to the Catholic Church; and in one state, Utah, to the Latter-day Saints. It is understood that Archbishop Glennon's census is not to be published before the state census figures of 1910.—In September the President started on an extended tour through the country, beginning in Boston and visiting the principal cities in the West and South. Every where he was received with enthusiasm which seemed to increase as he advanced. His speeches were an outline of the policy of his administration. His reception in the South, was particularly cordial and enthusiastic, and nowhere more so than in New Orleans and in the capital of the late Confederacy. An incident of the trip was his meeting with President Diaz of Mexico at El Paso, Texas, on October 16. Later on the same day Mr. Taft returned the call of President Diaz. The meeting was at Juarez, where a banquet was given by the Mexican President in honor of his guest. The President returned to Washington on November 17, after his remarkable tour of more than 14,000 miles, deeply impressed with the industry and loyalty he witnessed in all parts of the Union.

The day of the discovery of America, October 12, was observed as a legal holiday in York State for the first time. Seven States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Colorado, California, Montana and Illinois, pay this yearly tribute to the memory of the great discoverer. A bill was introduced into Congress to make Columbus Day a national holiday.

Notable among the great strikes of the year that of the Lake Seamen's Union last spring involved more than 12,000 seamen of all classes in Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo and other shipping centres on the Great Lakes. A sort of compromise was effected, the men getting better hours, but failing to get an increase of wages.—The strike of the white firemen on the Georgia Railroad in May was accompanied by much disorder and commercial loss. Dr. Charles P. Neill, Federal Commissioner of Labor, conferred with representatives of both sides and effected a settlement.—After a turbulent week in June the strike of the Philadelphia traction men was settled, the agreement being 22 cents an hour and 10 hours for a day's work.—During the summer the street railway strike in Pittsburg was adjusted after forty-eight hours of rioting. The Mayor's threat to operate the lines under an old law brought both parties to reason.—During August and September violence and bloodshed attended the strike of the Pressed Steel Car Company at McKee's Rocks, near Pittsburg. The Federal Government took a hand in the investigation of the troubles which, after fifty-three days were happily terminated. Practically all the demands of the 5,000 workmen were granted.—The last notable strike of the year was of the girls employed in the shirtwaist industry in New York. The strike has now been going on for several weeks. Some firms promptly acceded to the demands of the striking operators, but in the last week of the year 7,000 girls were still out of work. According to the latest report the strike would soon be ended by the adoption of a plan said to be satisfactory.

The Week witnessed a notable gathering of scholars in New York. All the learned associations in social and political science held meetings in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the American Historical and American Economic associations. More than 1,000 delegates from colleges and learned societies at home and abroad were present at the various meetings. Governor Hughes, Mayor McClellan and Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, President of Columbia, took part in the citizens' meeting and the official welcome at which Joseph H. Choate presided. President Taft cancelled his engagement to be present on account of the crippled condition of the railway service. In addition to the two societies whose anniversary was celebrated, the bodies actively represented in the proceedings were the American Political Science Association, the American Statistical Association, the American Sociological Society, the American Association for Labor Legislation, the American Social Science Association, the Bibliographical Society of America, the American Society of Church History and the New York State Teachers' Association.—United States Senator Anselm Joseph McLaurin, of Mississippi, died on December 22. He was born in 1848 and entered the Confederate Army at the age of sixteen. For four years he was Governor of the State and was thrice elected to the United States Senate. Col. James Gordon, of Oklahoma has been appointed by Governor Noell to succeed the late Senator.—General Stewart L. Woodford, on behalf of the Hudson-Fulton Commission, presented a commemorative gold medal to Queen Wilhelmina of Holland at the Hague.—The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of William E. Gladstone was held at Carnegie Hall, New York, on December 28. The chief address on the occasion was delivered by the British Ambassador, the Hon. James Bryce, who had been a close friend of Mr. Gladstone and a member of his Home Rule Cabinet in 1886.

The Storm.—According to reports of the United States Weather Bureau, the Christmas snow storm was the heaviest for December in nearly twenty years. Beginning at 11 o'clock Saturday morning, snow fell continuously for twenty-four hours, to a depth of more than ten inches. At one time the wind velocity was fifty-eight miles an hour. The storm covered all the country east of the Mississippi Valley and increased in intensity as it moved from the interior toward the Atlantic coast. In New York the wind blew harder and the snow fell heavier than anywhere else.

A northeast gale rolled a tidal wave on the New England coast, the water reaching the greatest height since 1851, and causing several deaths and heavy damage in and around Boston. The Boston harbor master estimates the loss along the docks at more than $1,000,000. Many vessels were driven ashore and it is feared that many on board perished.

Great Britain.—In politics two things have filled all minds during the greater part of the year, the Budget and National Defence. The former has divided the country into two camps, one of its enthusiastic supporters, the other of its bitter opponents. It increased income tax and inheritance and succession duties for larger incomes and estates and made them very heavy indeed for the largest. It distinguished between earned and unearned income, putting an additional tax on the latter. It raised the taxes in urban and suburban land and put an additional tax on any unearned increment of value. It imposed a tax on undeveloped mineral lands, the value of which was to be estimated according to the materials they are supposed to contain; and when this was shown to be impracticable, a tax upon mining royalties was substituted. The reversion of leases was heavily taxed, and the spirit-duties were greatly increased. The Unionist minority fought it step by step during its passage through the House of Commons; the Government accepted not a few amendments that left the principle of the Bill untouched. It reached the Lords at the end of November, where on December 3 Lord Lansdowne's motion, that they could not agree to a finance bill founded upon such novel principles until the nation had been consulted, was carried by an immense majority. Thereupon the Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, moved in the Commons that the Lords had been guilty of a breach of the constitution in refusing to agree to the Budget. This was carried by the usual Government majority of two to one. The Lords, moreover, found the Budget unconstitutional because, under guise of taxation, it would enforce measures already rejected by them. Parliament will be dissolved early in January and the election will be fought out on the Budget and the relations of the two Houses. Several Liberals have refused to follow the Government. Chief amongst these are Lord Rosebery, who denounced the Budget as a revolution carried on in Parliament without the consent of the people, and Sir George Perks, the Nonconformist. With regard to the National Defence, the First Lord of the Admiralty introducing the Naval Estimates into Parliament in the beginning of March, startled the country by hinting at the German programme, asserting, nevertheless, that Great Britain could maintain its superiority. Mr. Balfour analyzed the German and the British programme and concluded that within a few years the advantage in first-class ships would be with the former. This the Prime Minister denied, but said at the same time that the two-power standard would have to be abandoned. The nation took alarm. Notwithstanding German assurance to the contrary, the conviction that its naval activity is against England is fixed in the British mind. There was a cry for more Dreadnoughts, i. e., the latest type of battleship. For a moment it seemed that the larger colonies would contribute four or five of these. But on reflection they, with the exception of New Zealand, resolved to build their own navies, a resolution that may have far-reaching consequences. Admiral Lord Charles Beresford quarreled with the Admiralty and publicly asserted that the navy is inefficient. A commission gave a somewhat noncommittal report. Lord Charles continued his campaign, making new charges that the personnel of the navy was corrupted by politics, favoritism, intimidation and espionage. A correspondence between himself and the Prime Minister resulted like the commission in showing that there was something to be said on both sides. Lord Charles determined to get into Parliament to carry on the war. A vacancy occurred in Portsmouth, and he and his supporters attempted to win this seat from the Government. His triumph in the first naval port in the Kingdom would have been disastrous to the administration. The election, however, never took place, as the prorogation of Parliament preparatory to dissolution took place before the writs were issued. Mr. Haldane's scheme of Army Reform was carried through by the compromise of the substitution of a homogeneous territorial army, a sort of national guard, for the volunteers and militia. Enrollment was very slow until it was made the fashion by the fear of Germany, which Major Burnand's play, The Englishman's Home, heightened, and special concessions by the larger employers, which made it advantageous. The Colonies are expected to organize their forces on Mr. Haldane's plan; their General Staffs are to be represented in the Imperial General Staff, but the disposition of their forces remains in their own power. Lord Roberts and his party disapprove of the scheme and desire compulsory service. A Bill for the Disestablishment of the Church of England in Wales was introduced into Parliament, but was dropped with the promise that it should be one of the first of the next session.—In April, Lord Crewe, representing the Government, acknowledged to the Duke of Norfolk that the Royal Accession Declaration is a real grievance, but stated that the Government was not prepared to undertake legislation on the matter. The Duke expressed his discontent, saying, that Catholics thought there had been an understanding on the matter equivalent to a promise. Thereupon Mr. Redmond introduced in the Commons a general Catholic Disabilities Bill dealing with the Declaration and opening to Catholics the Chancellorship of England and the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland. The Government gave it unofficial support. In May it came to a second reading, which was carried by a majority of only ten. This being virtually a defeat it was dropped.—The Labor Party introduced an Unemployed Workmen's Bill, called from its principle, the Right to Work Bill. It was lost on its second reading by 113 votes. In March Mr. Balfour definitely committed himself to Tariff Reform as the first plank in the Unionist platform. Some of the more important members of the party are disinclined to follow him, which will affect the party in the coming elections. Delegates of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire met in Australia in August and passed a strong resolution in favor of imperial differential tariffs, calling upon the governments of the Empire to take effective means to introduce it. A Royal Commission has been appointed to consider the propriety of putting divorce within the reach of all by giving County Courts jurisdiction in the matter. The Female Suffrage agitation has caused much annoyance to the Government. The women engaged in it began by demonstrating in the streets. They proceeded to petitioning Parliament and the Ministry. A woman pushed her way into the House of Commons for this purpose; another managed to reach ministers at the chief table of a public dinner. The next step was to force upon the Prime Minister the petitions he refused to receive. For this purpose his house was "picketed," the women chaining themselves to the area-railings so as to be unable to obey the order of the police to move on. For this they were arrested and committed to prison as disturbers of the peace. They then had resort to violence, breaking windows in ministers' houses, in railway and other carriages in which ministers were traveling, in halls where they were lecturing, and doing them personal injury. When imprisoned they began what they called the "hunger strike," refusing to eat the food given them, and filling the air with their clamors when the prison authorities administered food by force. Many professed to sympathize with them and the Government seemed to weaken in the matter. Lady Constance Lytton and another were discharged without being fed after they had fasted for some time; their companions were retained and fed. This difference of treatment was generally accounted for by the rank of the former. In Scotland, shortly afterwards, all who had been guilty of disturbance during Mr. Churchill's visit to Dundee, were discharged without any attempt being made to feed them. A Mrs. Leigh brought action against the Home Secretary and the prison authorities for damages on account of forcible feeding. The jury decided against her without leaving the box.—The King and Queen visited Berlin in February. In March it was announced that Lieut. Shackleton had on January 9 reached a point within 111 miles of the South Pole. Immediately after his installation in November the Lord Mayor of London, Sir John Knill, expressed his intention of trying to revive the old apprentice system in the London trades. The Lady Mayoress began a fund bearing the Christian title, "For God's Poor."—Throughout the year an agitation led by Liverpool merchants has been kept up against Belgian rule in the Congo. Wholesale charges of diabolical cruelty are made but by no means substantiated. They are so mixed up with complaints of monopolies which exclude British trade that impartial people judge that the real grievance is in these. This opinion is strengthened by facts that came out in a suit for libel brought by the Cadburys, manufacturers of cocoa, against the Standard. It seems that real atrocities have been going on for years in the Portugese Islands of St. Thomé. The English merchants have the cocoa trade of those islands in their hands; the atrocities could have been stopped without any difficulty as the islands are very small; while the fact is that they were hushed up.

Canadian Events.—On January 11, in Washington, Secretary of State Root and Ambassador James Bryce, of Great Britain, signed an agreement which has been generally spoken of as the "Waterways Treaty." It provides for a joint high commission to be made permanent with a view to settling the difficulties which have arisen at different times in connection with the water boundaries along our northern border, such as the use of the waters of the Great Lakes, and their diversion, especially at Niagara Falls, for power purposes, the navigation of the St. Johns River between Maine and New Brunswick, and the use of the Milk River in the Northwest.—The tercentenary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain was opened on July 4 with religious services in all the churches of Plattsburg, N. Y. A strong Canadian representation, headed by the Right Rev. Z. Racicot, Auxiliary Bishop of Montreal, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, joined with Cardinal Gibbons, President Taft and many other American notables to honor the great French empire-builder, Samuel de Champlain, who was above all a consistent Catholic, zealous for the propagation of the faith. Never before in the history of the Champlain valley has there been such an impressive ceremony as the pontifical High Mass celebrated in the open air at Cliff Haven, the home of the Catholic Summer School of America.—On Sunday, August 15, at Grosse Isle, near the city of Quebec, His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate for Canada, Archbishop Sbarretti, unveiled and blessed a large Celtic cross erected under the auspices of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in memory of the fever victims, who, after being taken from the plague-stricken immigrant vessels, perished there during the famine years of 1847-'48. The Most Rev. Archbishop of Quebec gave the solemn absolution of the dead and spoke of the day as marking a sad and memorable though edifying page of Irish history. Among the most notable lay speakers who addressed the seven thousand pilgrims at Grosse Isle was the Hon. Charles Murphy, Canadian Secretary of State. The keynote of his address was that this Celtic cross stood as a monument of an enduring bond between the Irish and the French as well as of the faith of the martyrs whose graves it marked.—One of the most striking of the great celebrations for which Montreal is famous occurred on October 17 last, when all the temperance societies of the metropolis, Catholic and non-Catholic, met at the great Cathedral of St. James and listened to the luminous eloquence of His Grace Archbishop Bruchési, a practical apostle of total abstinence. The demonstration, organized at St. Jatricks Church, the parent church of the Irish Catholics of Montreal, included all the Irish and French Canadian temperance societies, as well as the non-Catholics of the anti-alcoholic League and kindred associations. The whole assemblage marched in procession to the Catholic Cathedral, thus giving public and united testimony in favor of the noble cause to which they are devoted.—The seventh centenary of the foundation of the Franciscan Order was celebrated early in October in Montreal, Quebec and Ottawa. The celebration was conducted on an imposing scale, with every feature that could tend to impress upon the minds of the faithful that far-off event when Francis, that flower of Catholic asceticism, astonished his world of the thirteenth century by founding upon poverty his threefold institute for friars, nuns and people living the common life in the world.—The First Plenary Council of Canada, which began on September 19, closed on November 1, the Feast of All Saints. Quebec city, the ancient capital, has never witnessed so impressive an event as that first solemn, hierarchical assembly, and its deliberations were conducted in so business-like a fashion as to excite general admiration. All the pomp of the Church was there displayed, as well as the age-long wisdom of her chiefs. Solidly learned, eloquent and edifying sermons were delivered on special public occasions, while legislation upon the most important topics touching the welfare of the Church was debated by prelates and their theologians, whose collective decisions will be submitted for approval to the Holy Father.

Before the last echoes of the Plenary Council had died away came the official announcement from His Grace Archbishop Bruchési of the Eucharistic Congress, which is to be held in Montreal from the 7th to the 11th of September, 1910. Extensive preparations are already being made, committees are hard at work, and the organizers, continually stimulated by the Archbishop of Montreal, will leave no detail overlooked.

In Toronto the work of Catholic Church Extension has waxed more vigorous than ever under the presidency of the Very Rev. Dr. Burke, and under the warm and sympathetic encouragement of the zealous and progressive churchman who now bears the crozier in Toronto. Especially have the crusade in favor of the Ruthenians of the west, and the exposure of the shameless methods of certain proselytizers, excited interest throughout Catholic Canada, which is daily waking up more and more to its duties and responsibilities in that direction.

Montreal Church Insurance.—On December 22 the Mutual Insurance Society of the ecclesiastical province of Montreal held its quinquennial meeting at the Archbishop's house under the presidency of His Grace Mgr. Bruchési. Rev. Canon Martin, secretary-treasurer of the society, read his report on the transactions of the past five years. During that period the society has paid $113,403.96 for churches or priests' residences completely or partially destroyed by fire. Three hundred and two fabriques (vestries) are members of the society, which, since its foundation in 1854, has always prospered. The maximum policy is fixed at $25,000. The premiums are lower than those of any other insurance company, because the administration, which in ordinary insurance companies absorbs 33 per cent. of the revenues, costs in this case hardly anything. Rev. Canon Martin was re-elected secretary-treasurer. The newly elected board is composed of the Rev. Canons Lesage, Le Pailleur and Charland, and of the Rev. Pastors Payette, Moreau, Neveu and Dufresne.

Ireland.—The past year has witnessed important and mostly beneficial changes, industrial, educational and political. The ownership of their holdings by half the occupiers and the division of untenanted grass-lands among the people, has stimulated thrift and neatness and increased production, while the Irish trade-mark has protected home industries. Mr. Birrell's Bill, designed to accelerate land purchase and complete the transfer of all the land to the tenants, was stripped by the Lords of its useful features except its provision for relief of congestion in certain areas. After a century of effort, 1909 saw established a University to which Irish Catholics might send their sons. The National University, replacing the Royal, which was only an examining board, consists of three institutions, Dublin, Cork and Galway. A large majority of the Governing Board as well as of the professors are Catholics, but it is supposed to be otherwise "unsectarian." The present board has been nominated by the government but later it will be elected by the graduates, and the finances will largely depend on the County Councils, elective bodies. Queen's College, Belfast, was made a separate university and such changes were made in its curriculum and government as to permit the attendance of Catholics. In primary education the position of the Gaelic language continues to improve, being now taught in more than half the schools. This partly accounts for the continued growth of the Gaelic movement. Another movement that has assumed large proportions during the year is the Temperance Crusade, particularly in the West, resulting in considerably diminishing the liquor revenue. The Irish Parliamentary Party have to their credit not only the University and Land Bills, but measures for improvement in the conditions of town tenants, agricultural laborers and the Old Age Pensions Act. They have retained the undivided confidence of the people, as the political Sein Fein party, advocating withdrawal from Parliament, is practically dead, and Mr. William O'Brien, finding no support in his opposition policy, withdrew from politics. Mr. Asquith's recent pronouncement in favor of Home Rule has strengthened the position of Mr. Redmond and vindicated his parliamentary action. The prospects for Home Rule, whether from the tariff-reform Conservatives or from the free-trade Liberals, are now brighter than at any time since 1886.

India.—The year was one of disturbance. A continued agitation was kept up especially in the North against British rule. The Government was not consistently vigorous, and its following English formalities in trying offenders injured it in the eyes of Orientals who look for substantial justice to be swift and effective. Assassinations have been frequent. Not only native police have been attacked, but English officials also. Attempts were made on the lives of Lord Kitchener, Sir Andrew Fraser, Lient.-Governor of Bengal, and Lord Minto, the Governor-General.—On July 1 Sir William Wyllie of the India Office, and Dr. Lalcaca, a native in his company, were assassinated in London by an Indian revolutionist, and on December 22 Arthur Jackson, a magistrate, met a like fate at Nasik in the Bombay Presidency. What is most disconcerting is that European Anarchistic methods are established in India. Bombs are thrown and secret factories of high explosions have been discovered. The Indian Princes, as a rule, have stood by the Government, whether through loyalty or fear of sedition in their own states, remains to be seen. One or two expressions suggest that at least some have ambitions of their own.—In the meantime Lord Morley, Secretary of State for India, pushed his reforms through Parliament, increasing the elected members of the viceregal and provincial councils. The new order was proclaimed in India, November 25. The elections are in progress, and the landed proprietors seem anxious to return members favorable to the Government. This has made certain classes among the agitators ineligible who consequently are more discontented than ever.

South Africa.—The Federation of the colonies was accomplished during the year. Much annoyance was caused to doctrinaires in England by the refusal of the Transvaal and other colonies to admit the colored races to the franchise. The Government yielded to African sentiment as a necessary condition of carrying the measure. Mr. Balfour supported it with all his authority. The Indians, especially in Natal, are much dissatisfied with their condition and it seems they have been hardly treated. They sent a deputation to England which accomplished nothing, although the failure of the Imperial Government to right their wrongs is to the Indians a revelation of its weakness and encourages the discontent in India. The Chinese contract-laborers brought in to work the Transvaal mines have nearly all been returned to their country.

In Spanish America.—Distrust of Brazil's pacific intentions in increasing her fleet has prompted Argentina to make large naval appropriations. Elaborate preparations are being made to celebrate in 1910 the centenary of independence.—Owing to the influx of undesirable citizens, steps have been taken to revise the immigration and residence laws. Anarchistic outbreaks, including the assassination of the chief of police of Buenos Aires and his secretary on November 13, have moved the Government to action. Charges of securing fraudulent naturalization for voting purposes have been made against political leaders.

The death of President Affonso Penna of Brazil on June 14 deprived the republic of a scholarly, enlightened and patriotic statesman. A treaty with Uruguay recognizing condominium in the Yaguaron River and Lake Merin, both of trifling commercial importance, is viewed as countenancing Uruguay's oft repeated demand of Argentina for equal rights in the great Plata River, with an eye to Brazil's future advantage.

An arbitration treaty between Bolivia and the United States has been ratified. A boundary dispute with Peru was submitted to President Alcora of Argentina, whose decision in favor of Peru caused rioting and bloodshed at La Paz, and threatened war. President Montes resigned and the war scare disappeared.

President Montt of Chile has announced that he will pay an official visit to Argentina during the coming year. The claim of the Alsop Company of New York against Chile for losses arising from the annexation of Bolivian territory, has been referred by action of the two governments to King Edward VII for arbitration. The matter has caused much ill feeling between the United States and Chile.

The Congress of Colombia refused a concession for a canal across the isthmus of Darien for fear of the action of this Government and Panama and of some states of the republic.

Repeated outbreaks of the bubonic plague have been reported from Guayaquil, the chief seaport of Ecuador. The Salesian missionaries have greatly extended their civilizing labors among the Indians in the interior and will establish more mission centres during the coming year.—Quito, the capital, has obtained celebrity as a health resort for sufferers from tuberculosis. The disease is said not to occur among the native residents of the city.

President Cabrera of Guatemala has been accused in the public press of countenancing outrages upon the persons and property of Europeans, and of relying upon the Monroe Doctrine to save himself from just reprisals. German coffee growers have suffered some hardships which have been duly reported to Berlin.

A successful revolution in Nicaragua, headed by General Estrada, resulted in the defeat and resignation of President Zelaya and the overthrow of his government. Owing to the execution of two Americans by Zelaya's orders, his minister to Washington received his passports, and warships and marines were sent to Nicaraguan ports.

The estimated cost of the Panama canal is now $375,201,000 instead of the original $200,000,000. A petition of Catholic ladies to the President against the offensively irreligious utterances of a professor of the university produced no effect.

During President Castro's absence from Venezuela on a European trip, the High Federal Court found him guilty of complicity in a plot to murder acting President Gomez, and removed him from office.

In Mexico, after thirty-five years of hostilities, the Yaquis of Sonora agreed to a treaty on January 4. The determination of the Government seems to be to remove them all to Yucatan. Summer floods in Nuevo Leon and Tabasco swept away villages, growing crops and livestock. Early frosts injured or destroyed the beans, corn and chile from the capital to the northern frontier. Great suffering among the poor resulted. The Government imported grain and retailed it at cost.—The campaign for the vice-presidential nomination began early with great vigor. Vice-president Corral of Sonora is the administration candidate. General Reyes of Nuevo Leon, the popular candidate, withdrew from the race and went to Europe on a government errand. The Government now holds a controlling interest in about 7,000 miles of railway. Foreigners are being replaced by Mexicans in operating the lines. A knowledge of Spanish has been made obligatory for conductors and porters.

In Cuba President J. G. Gomez was inaugurated on January 28. The United States troops for the pacification of the island remained till April. The cost to Cuba of this second intervention was $6,000,000, to be paid to the United States when the financial condition should warrant it. President Gomez signed a general amnesty bill on March 6. Dr. Rodríguez of the University of Havana, warned Cuba that a stable government, able and willing to protect life, liberty and property is all that will prevent annexation to the United States.

Germany.—No question since the proclaiming of the Empire in 1871 has aroused such excitement as that of Imperial Finance Reform which occupied the Reichstag for months in the earlier part of the year. It led finally to the downfall of Chancellor von Bülow, whose resignation was accepted by Emperor William on July 14. The Chancellor had won the elections held nearly three years before on the cry of "Down with the Centre," the heterogeneous groups called the bloc supporting him in his attack on the Centre, being returned with a considerable majority. For a time von Bülow fought shy of measures needed for finance reform, but it was impossible to postpone the question indefinitely. When at last he offered his scheme he had to tax the properties of his most earnest supporters. The Conservatives, the most numerous element of the bloc, refused to consent to the inheritance tax, and after long and tempestuous fighting they united with their ancient enemies, the Centrists, and defeated their former leader. Parliament was prorogued and Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg was named Chancellor. Under his premiership the Reichstag reconvened on November 30. The new Chancellor made no announcements concerning the party or parties upon whose support he expects to rely, but affirmed that he hoped to follow such continuous and steady policies both at home and abroad as to satisfy the people, in order that the nation's progress, either material or intellectual, may be undisturbed by disorder or experiments.—That the present session of the Reichstag will have to face an added difficulty in working out the Finance Reform appears from the detailed statement of estimates prepared for its consideration. The budget calls for a sum totaling 152 million marks over the estimated assured income of the year.—The Centre party, besides having to meet the bitter opposition of the late Chancellor's supporters, was threatened in the early summer with a serious feud among its own friends over the question whether the Centre should become an exclusively Catholic or religious party, as our German correspondents reported at the time. Happily wise counsels prevailed and the misgivings as to its future conceived in many circles were quieted. Baron George von Hertling, who has a record of thirty years' service in the Reichstag and is favorably known as a university professor and author of several important works, was chosen President of the Centre in succession to Count Hompesch deceased. The new President's popularity with his party is evidenced by his unanimous election, and there is, according to Germania, a general conviction "that under Hertling's leadership the party will continue the great traditions of its great past."—The usual crop of fabrications and false charges concerning Catholic activity has been scattered during the year. AMERICA was able in its first issue to meet the uncalled-for resentment expressed in the Outlook because of the action of the Holy See in censuring Professor Schnitzer of the University of Munich. Through direct information it showed that the Professor merited little sympathy, being disbarred from teaching in a Catholic school because he had traitorously abandoned Catholic teachings.—Professor Commer of Vienna, whose published review of Schell's teachings had won great praise, in a reply to his critics seems to have finally settled the Schell question. The Vienna Vaterland thus summed up the situation: "The Schell question had become the Schell struggle and this changed into the opposition to Papal decision under the pretext of shielding the personality of Schell. It is only part of the ever young struggle of ill-conceived freedom against divine revelation and authority. It is the merit of Professor Commer that wider circles are enabled to distinguish clearly between the inspiring personality of Schell and the leader of a school which is estranged from, nay, dangerous to, the Church.—The Volksverein, a formidable army of about a million men, founded at the suggestion of Windhorst in 1890, for the purpose of safeguarding the Catholic population against the dangers of socialism, heresy and unbelief, is yearly growing in strength and efficient influence. Cardinal Fisher, Archbishop of Cologne, in a visit to one of its centres, took occasion to congratulate the Verein on its loyal service to the Church, and made clear his desire for the fullest possible spread of its efficiency not merely in his own diocese but throughout the Empire.—The usual impressive gatherings of German Catholics were not lacking in 1909. The International Eucharistic Congress was held in Cologne in August and its celebration marked a splendid, and, even for Germany, accustomed as it is to success in such assemblies, an unprecedented triumph. The Catholic Congress held at Breslau lasted four days and attracted the attention of the whole land. Between 7,000 and 8,000 persons were at each of the public sessions, and 25,000 workmen took part in the great procession. The Third Catechetical Conference held in Munich was a success in every respect. Fourteen lectures and three model lessons for catechism teaching were given by twelve lecturers, all admirable selections for the task. The practical result will be the further improvement of religious instruction and a new plan of instruction for several dioceses.—The rugged thousands from the Rhenish country districts who attended the pilgrimage to Aix-la-Chapelle last July proclaimed eloquently that the Catholic heart of Germany is loyal to the pious traditions and practices established in the ages of faith. The occasion was the exposition of the "Four Great Relics" for public veneration, an opportunity enjoyed but once every seven years.—An interesting phase of the retreat movement has manifested itself in Germany. In 1905, for the first time, opportunity was given to the recruits of the German army to make a retreat just before they enter upon their period of military service. The movement spread rapidly. Last year retreats were held in twelve different places during August and September; in one place fifteen different retreats were given. Results show once more the enormous power for good in the Spiritual Exercises.—A review in a recent number of the Allgemeine Rundschau offers splendid evidence of the development of social and charitable activities among the Catholics of the Empire.

Austria.—The political situation in the Austro-Hungarian monarchy during the year presented an interesting picture to an outsider, while it was viewed with concern, and even alarm, by those whom it directly concerns. In the Austrian part of the dual kingdom great things had been hoped for from the Reichsrath which met early in 1909, the first Parliament elected through universal suffrage. Vital problems were pressing for solution, and after weeks of obstructive tactics on the part of the Slavs sitting in the Reichsrath, the ministry had been obliged to close the preceding session without effective legislative action in their regard. During April and May the way seemed clear to harmonious action on the part of the groups making up the new house, but conflicting views regarding the agrarian bank of Bosnia led to a renewal of the troubles of the former sessions. The Czechs, who form the strongest and most aggressive section of the "Slavische Union," as the group of Slav parties is called in current nomenclature, have become much embittered against the German-Bohemian representatives, whose protests against what they considered an unfair representation in the State government led to the closing last year of the Bohemian legislative assembly. In consequence the Slavische Union is at war with the present ministry of the Kingdom and its representatives in the Reichsrath began anew obstructive tactics which rendered all attempts at legislative action fruitless. A deadlock resulted and Parliament was prorogued after weeks of bitter struggle. Frequent conferences led to no favorable results; the Czechs insisted upon a reconstruction of the Bienenrath cabinet before they should agree to the budget provisions demanded by the Government—the German members of the Reichsrath took a united stand against this position, their program calling for immediate settlement of the budget, before any consideration shall be given to the mooted question of ministerial changes. Obstruction on the part of the Slavs marked the reopening of the Reichsrath and none of the needed legislation had been carried through by mid-December.—In Hungary, too, disturbing influences have been at play. Certain demands have been made by the ministers in line with the growing claim for independence on the part of the Magyars. These referred to financial and military concessions which the Austrian leaders were loath to concede. Many conferences with the Emperor failed here as well to effect a settlement, and in mid-December it was evident that the Wekerle Ministry was doomed.—The annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by the Empire for a time threatened bloody war; but backed by Germany Austria succeeded in rendering futile the claims of Servia, and on March 31 the ambassadors from England, Germany, Italy and France presented the collective note of the powers to the Servian Minister of Foreign Affairs, whose acceptance of it assured the continuance of peace. Servia had protested that through the annexation of these provinces by Austria, Article 25 of the Berlin treaty had been violated. A "Red-Book" is soon to be issued regarding the whole incident. It will contain certain important disclosures concerning this latest and for a time dangerous phase of the Balkan question.—The diplomatic activity necessitated during the Bosnia-Herzegovina agitation has led to a public declaration that Austria means to take her place as one of the "world-powers." As a step in this direction, preparations have been made for the building of a powerful fleet and four Dreadnoughts will be ready for service in 1912.—As a natural result Austria has had her own budget troubles during the year. The Minister of Finance proposed a new tax-law that gives little or no satisfaction to the Austrian "ultimate consumer," on whom the burden it proposes to lay upon the country will press most heavily. The proposal included a personal income tax, a tax on profits, one on journeymen and an increase on the existing tax on dividends. The apportionment of the personal income tax is a ground of contention. The bill is attacked not because it imposes a graduated tax, but because the increase is not made uniformly and on a scale favoring the rich, in consequence of which as small incomes are immeasurably more numerous than the larger ones, the poorer classes must pay proportionately much more than their share of the burden.—Through the growth and spread of the Catholic Press Association in the dual kingdom, the almost inconceivable apathy with which Austrian and Hungarian Catholics bore with attacks upon Christianity made by Jewish organs is fast disappearing.—During the last week of August the people of Tyrol held a notable series of celebrations marking the centennial of Andreas Hofer's heroic stand against Napoleon in 1809. The Emperor Francis Joseph was present in person to preside over the jubilee festivities of his most loyal subjects.—The Seventh Catholic Congress of Austria was held September 5-8 in Vienna and proved to be as equally strong evidence of the reawakening of Catholic life in Austria as any which had preceded it in the past decade. During its sessions the "General Sodalists' Day of all the German Nations" was celebrated. In its resolutions it declared the care of spiritual life to be the first and main duty of all Sodalists, recommended its members to carry out the Pontifical decree of frequent and daily Communion, urged all to take energetic part in the work of Catholic organizations, and called upon all, finally, to support the Catholic Press.—Documents published by his colleagues of the Prague University branded Professor Wahrmond as a contemptibly selfish seeker after spoils instead of a man devoted to the interests of freedom in scholarship. He had been proclaimed "the hero of freedom of teaching" by the anti-Catholic press at home and by American imitators, following his offensive anti-Christian lectures in the Catholic University of Innsbruck.

France.—A cablegram from Paris on December 24 says that the agitation among journeymen bakers, fomented by the anarchists of the General Federation of Labor, is daily assuming more alarming proportions. At a meeting held on December 23 the journeymen bakers voted for suppression of night work. Serious trouble is feared.—On December 24 the French Senate ratified the agreement, already approved by the Chamber of Deputies, between France and Switzerland with regard to railway approaches to the Simplon tunnel.—The Midnight Mass in all Paris churches, especially at La Madeleine, Notre Dame and Saint-Eustache, was very largely attended. A stranger witnessing the devotion of these pious crowds would hardly realize the struggle going on in all parts of France between political factions and the clergy.—The law permitting the infliction of capital punishment had for a number of years been practically a dead letter, but the increasing prevalence of crime in France and the contemptuous attitude of the criminals towards the whole criminal system has practically necessitated the renewal of capital punishment. The French Cabinet decided early in January to reject appeals for commutation of the death sentence. Accordingly, on January 11, four murderers were beheaded by the guillotine at Béthune.

Father V. Schell, the learned Dominican Assyriologist, was elected last January a member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. Father Schell, who is fifty years old, was born at Koenigsmaker in Lorraine and made his studies at Sierk. In 1888 he devoted himself to the study of Assyriology under Professors Oppert and Amiau. In 1889 he published a monograph on the inscriptions of Sanssi Ramman (800 B. C.). De Morgan chose him as companion when he undertook his excavations in Persia. Five of the seven volumes published by the French legation are by Father Schell. In 1895 he was chosen Professor of Assyriology at the École des Hautes Études, and in 1906, after the death of M. Oppert, the professors of the Collège de France unanimously recommended him for the chair of Assyriology, but the Government would not appoint a Dominican. His discovery and translation of the Code of Hammurabi have given him a world-wide reputation.

The action of the Church last April in beatifying Joan of Arc found perhaps a warmer sanction than was ever accorded a similar pronouncement. Writers of all schools have been prodigal of praise, notably Mark Twain here and Andrew Lang abroad. The tribute of the London Times, representative of English Protestant tradition, deserves to be quoted: "Even those who deride or deny the claims of Rome to pronounce on such matters, will allow that few more noble figures have ever been held up to the veneration of their fellows. In the whole history of the Middle Ages there is no story more simple or more splendid, no tragedy more mournful than that of the 'poor little shepherdess' who, by her passionate faith, raised her country from the depths of degradation and dejection, to die the cruelest and most shameful of all deaths at the hands of her enemies. The elevation and the moral beauty of Joan's character have won the hearts of all men."

When M. Briand wished Catholics to accept the Separation Law, he presented it to them as a liberal and straightforward measure that guaranteed to Catholics all the funds of the Church. Many Catholics believed him, although he was an enemy. In his book, "La Séparation," published last April, he told his secret motive and confessed his trickery. Having secret designs which he could not reveal, he hoped to bring about the spoliation of the Church with the assistance of the Catholics themselves. He is proud of his trick, and calls it strategy. His confession is a singular homage to the foresight of those who detected the snare and were not caught. The far-seeing firmness of Pious X frustrated the infamous scheme of Briand and his Bloc. The law was condemned and the odium of persecution with all its brutality has fallen upon the lawmaker.

The postal strike last May demoralized the entire postal service. The peculiarity of this situation in France was that the Government is propped up by bureaucracy, and that the civil servants knew their power as well as the pretorian guard did in ancient Rome. At one time it was thought the Government would be defeated, but the strike ended before the beginning of June. It failed because of lack of union among the strikers themselves, for while some of them, chiefly the leaders, were pushing on to Socialism, others, and these were in the majority, had no mind to turn to Socialism or revolution, but merely desired to indicate their rights against the encroachments and vexations of Clemenceau's government. The press was unanimous in placing the responsibility for the strike on the Government, and all seem agreed, too, that the difficulty has passed but for the moment.

An article in Le Temps, of June 1, laments the Government's mistake in holding aloof from the Blessed Jeanne d'Arc celebrations. "Because of a few sectarians at Orleans," it says, "the Government took up a position which allowed the adversaries of the Republic unduly to appropriate the recognition of La Pucelle. What ought to have been a national rejoicing, was left to become a party affair."

By decree of the French courts early in July, the archives and MSS. belonging to the archbishoprics, bishoprics, seminaries, chapters, etc., of Verdun, Clermont-Ferrand, Orleans, Meaux, and in fact all the other French dioceses, are confiscate to the state. During the first six months of this year six bishops have been prosecuted under the Separation Law.

At the beginning of July the Cardinal Secretary of State sent Colonel Keller, President of the "Federated Education Association of France," a letter expressing the Pope's warm approval of that work, which aims at uniting Catholic France under the banner of religion. Hitherto the motto has been, "Rally to the Republic in the interests of religion"; but the new ideal ignores all political parties and wounds no political feelings. Even the Royalist press is in its favor, and there is every hope that it will do much good.

The little village of Coupvray, near Meaux, where Louis Braille, the inventor of alphabetical raised or relief points for use in reading by the blind, was born, celebrated the centenary of his birth on July 5. The village was en fête, and complimentary telegrams were received from the Vienna National Institute, the London Royal College, the Institutions for the Blind at Edinburgh, Copenhagen, etc.

On July 20 the committee of the French Chamber of Deputies, appointed on motion of M. Cambes, with M. Delcassé for president, to investigate the condition of the French Navy, reported a scandalous state of affairs and condemned the administration on every count. M. Clemenceau, the Premier, was forced to admit an order of the day requiring a vote of confidence in his ministry. After vainly attempting to impeach the motives of the committee, and particularly of M. Delcassé, the premier lost his temper and very indiscreetly disclosed State secrets about the condition of the Navy before the Algeiras affair. The vote was 212 to 176 against him, and he resigned. M. Briand was then called upon to form a ministry and announced his new cabinet on July 24.

The "aviation" week at the end of August on Betheny field at Rheims was marked by the breaking of all previous records for distance covered in an aeroplane of either the biplane or the monoplane type, as well as the breaking of the record for length of time in the air in a monoplane. The United States won the honors. The meeting also proved an enormous financial success.

In the second half of September the French Episcopate issued a collective letter laying down the rights and duties of parents with regard to the education of their children. The Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops of France solemnly warn parents to make sure that the neutrality required by the law of 1882 is faithfully observed in the school to which they send their children. Neutrality is at best a lesser evil, but if even that is not observed, then parents must withdraw their children under pain of refusal of the sacraments. When it was announced that M. Briand, the new Premier, would speak at Périgueux on education for the first time since he was placed at the head of French affairs, Catholics expected that he would either insist on strict neutrality, or advise the teachers not to pay any attention to the collective letter of the Hierarchy. But, with characteristic craftiness, he did neither. He simply exhorted the teachers not to be polemical in their teaching, not to be aggressive, not to transform the school into a public meeting.

At the end of October, M. Doumergue, Minister of Education, issued a circular to school teachers instructing them to disregard the demand of the clergy and Catholic parents for the withdrawal of the text-books condemned by the Episcopate. About the same time the Teachers' Association, comprising one hundred thousand members, instituted a damage suit against all the bishops who signed the collective letter of last September. The suit is based on the alleged defamation contained in the letter. The plaintiffs claim five thousand francs from each of the bishops. The conflict between the Education Department and the Catholic body has already resulted in no small demoralization of the State schools.

Addressing the French pilgrims in Rome, November 18, Pius X said that the French Government, in the expulsion of religious orders, the trials and condemnations of Cardinal Andrieu and other bishops and the threatened laws extending official protection to irreligious teachers, and effecting a state monopoly of schools, had but one aim, to undermine the basis of Christianity. Hence all Catholics should unite against the denial of legal acknowledgment of the Hierarchy and Catholic schools. Following the Pope's pronouncement Catholic children have been withdrawn from the government schools in many parts of France, and in some places a bonfire was made of the interdicted text-books. Even

Le Temps, the great Protestant organ, admitted that the manuals, 'prohibited by the bishops, are not neutral, and that they are utterly unfit for children from ten to twelve years of age. Extracts from twelve of these manuals, published by a Catholic committee, fully confirm this opinion. On December 1 the General Council of the Seine adopted a petition requesting the Superior Council of Public Instruction to exercise more effectual control on the school manuals, and "to exclude whatever may offend the religious beliefs of the children or weaken in them the feeling of patriotism."

Italy.—Political differences common to all countries are intensified in Italy by the remnants of the historic antagonism existing among the petty independent states which were hammered together into the happy family called United Italy. The rural population remains patient, plodding, and attached to old customs, while the dwellers in cities have taken on the airs and graces of the most violent and lawless radicalism. The spring elections left the Constitutional Monarchists a safe majority in Parliament, though it was lowered by twenty-one defeated candidates. The militant Left is the corral of various fire-eating opponents of the established order or of any order. Republicans, Socialists, Radicals, or whatever they may call themselves, find themselves bunched together, cheek by jowl, and constitute an unfraternal fraternity of the wild-eyed type. The returns added twenty-eight members to the truculent group, raising their combined voting strength to one hundred and ten. There is no distinctively Catholic group nor more than a handful of known practical Catholics among the five hundred members. For weighty reasons known to those upon whom the responsibility rests, the formation of a thoroughgoing Catholic party in the kingdom has not been deemed advisable.

From their conduct in social congresses, Catholics in Italy seem to be radically divided into two opposing factions which might be correctly styled the Big-Endians and the Little-Endians. While they squabble, scratch, and spit fire, the anti-clerical elements step in and take control of everything. In the interests of peace and religion, His Holiness was compelled to dissolve a social union which started out with a great blare of trumpets to renew and regenerate the whole peninsula.—The Government is openly if not violently anti-clerical. Premier Giolitti countenanced among the other ministers measures which were clearly against the Church, but so cleverly framed as to be free from the charge of open persecution.—The country, poor and worn out in many respects, has endeavored by dint of enormous taxes for military and naval expenditures to rise above its station and pose as a Great Power. The result has been the flight of an army of peasants and laborers to the attractive coasts of the United States and Argentina.—By ostentatiously taking under its protection the Italian missionaries in the Turkish Empire, the Government signed the political program of France, namely, anti-clericalism is for domestic use in unlimited quantities, but not for exportation.—The administration of affairs after the Messina earthquake gave rise to charges of neglect and malfeasance, but such charges might well stand on similar occasions anywhere. Profiting by that disaster, certain agents secured the possession of some fifty Catholic orphans who were to be reared in heterodoxy, but through the personal exertions of Queen Helena, they were restored to Catholic institutions.—Clamorous outcries for the seizure of the Vatican and the abrogation of the Law of Guarantees indicate the direction of the wind.

Rome.—"Churches for the churchless" is the last cry that one should expect to hear from the Eternal City in favor of its citizens, but though churches abound many Romans are churchless. The very poor had established themselves in such numbers out far beyond the great basilica of St. Paul that Belgian Catholics built them a spacious church dedicated to Our Lady Immaculate and St. John Berchmans. The edifice was consecrated on March 13 by Cardinal Mercier, Primate of Belgium, who was at the time in Rome at the head of the Belgian pilgrimage.—The second national congress of the Catholic university students was held during the first week of May. In reply to the professions of filial respect, His Holiness urged them to study and copy the works of the great reformers whom the Church had always aided and honored, but to beware of so-called Catholics who, under the mask of loyalty and love for the Church, do their utmost to undermine authority, reject all guidance and foment rebellion. At the same time a convention of the Catholic youth of Venice met at Treviso. The Pope sent a message of encouragement and blessing to the 5,000 delegates.—The golden jubilee of the North American College was celebrated with all solemnity on June 9-16. Alumni of the college, including the Most Rev. W. A. Seton, Titular Archbishop of Heliopolis, one of the original thirteen students, and Archbishops Farley, O'Connell and Blenk, gathered to do honor to the occasion.—The beatification of the gentle Maid of Orleans called forth encomiums from more numerous and more varied sources than any similar event before. Her heroism, her sincerity and her tragic fate were dwelt upon by writers of every school of religious or political thought.

The perennial fruitfulness of Holy Church in bringing forth high types of sanctity, even in times of trial and social upheaval, was seen in the canonization of St. Clement Maria Hofbauer, C.S.S.R., who shone with the beauty of holiness when Austria was the plaything of Joseph the Sacristan.—The eminently practical mind of Pius X has been seen in the inauguration of the Biblical Institute, for research and investigation along scriptural lines as well as in certain disciplinary enactments of wide application. Religious orders and congregations have been forbidden to admit one who has been dismissed from a similar organization or a college for grave misconduct. Religious superiors have been limited in their powers to contract debts, and former religious have been disqualified for teaching in seminaries and for being members of episcopal courts.—The regulations governing the emigration of Italian priests to America have been made more strict. As some evaded them by coming on a "visit" which proved to be of indefinite duration, the length of such visits has been limited to six months. The gentle and affable Pius has apostolic firmness where the welfare of any part of his flock was concerned, and has bent every endeavor to "restore all things in Christ."

Spain.—The murder of some Spanish workingmen by the hill tribes of northern Morocco led to a punitive expedition of 50,000 troops under General Marina. The calling out of the reserves occasioned a week of rioting and bloodshed in Barcelona which led to the overthrow of the Conservative Maura ministry. The Liberals under the leadership of Señor Moret y Prendergast came into power in October.

The Adana Massacres.—There were two series of massacres at Adana, according to private advices from Catholic missionaries, which threw additional light on this sombre page of contemporary history. The first series lasted from April 14 to 16, a pitched battle between Turks and Armenians. The Armenians, who had armed themselves after the Turkish Constitution was passed over a year ago, put up a brave fight. After a respite, the shooting was resumed on April 25, and the Armenian quarter was destroyed by fire. A French naval officer, who had witnessed the horrors of the Boxer uprising in China, declares that the atrocities perpetrated at Adana were worse than anything he had seen among the Boxers. The number of slain was estimated at 10,000 in Adana alone.

From Near and Far.—The Swiss Parliament elected Robert Comtesse President of the Confederation for 1910 to succeed Adolph Dencher. Marc E. Ruchet was chosen Vice-President in succession to Comtesse, who held that office during the present year.—Grand Duke Michael Nicholaievitch, granduncle of Emperor Nicholas of Russia, died at Cannes, France, on December 18. He was the fourth son of Emperor Nicholas I, and the oldest representative of the imperial house.—President Simon settled the strife of political factions in the north of Hayti and was warmly welcomed on his return to Port-au-Prince.—Secretary of State Knox, receiving Enrique Creel, special envoy to Washington from Mexico to present memoranda of a plan to prevent threatened hostilities between the United States and Nicaragua, informed him that while the United States welcomed the friendship of Mexico, the question with Nicaragua was one that would permit of no interference.

QUESTIONS OF THE YEAR

A Retrospect of 1909

One year is like another in some respects. History repeats itself from week to week as truly as from century to century. No two historical events, however, are ever precisely the same. Site and scene and forces conspiring or contending to bring them about may appear to be identical, so much so that the economist of to-day is constantly marvelling that things somehow baffle his calculations and persist in happening contrary to his theory or formula; and still the variable factor in the problem is forever asserting itself. Wars, and strikes, and budgets, and tax or tariff systems, differ little in substance to-day from what they were centuries ago; even the men who make them are much the same as the first to try them; and yet they work out differently every time they are tried, because the chief determining factor is not only variable but also incalculable. The human will is beyond the constraint of any political or economic law. It is the one free and spiritual factor in the chain of forces that make history. It acts according to knowledge, though the knowledge may be limited or misleading. It acts as often, unfortunately, by impulse or caprice. Rare enough are the human agents who can account clearly to themselves for the motives which direct, or for the influences which control their conduct in any single act. If it be so difficult to determine what has actuated one's doings for to-day, who shall predict what may actuate them to-morrow? We may enumerate the dates for which certain transactions are set; we may know how we should like to close them; but we cannot divine what others may wish, or even predict with assurance that others or ourselves will retain our present intentions when the day of settlement arrives. Let history repeat itself all it may, we still know that we cannot forecast the future by the past.

The year of 1909 was a year of economic struggle everywhere. There was scarcely a nation of importance without its agitation over financial problems, over budgets, and taxes, and tariffs, and trade treaties. In some of them the problems are wholly unsolved; none of them arrived at more than a partial experimental solution, just enough for the time being to stave off widespread, if not universal, strikes or industrial stagnation. Strikes there have been in abundance, especially in our own country, demoralizing as well as impoverishing millions of men, women and children, and embittering them against owners of wealth and employers of labor and political systems which seem to make them the easy victims of both. With governments everywhere absorbed in the study of fiscal questions, the year has little comfort for the political theorist who would attribute to the State the responsibility for moral as well as for money reforms.

The churches with few exceptions have given up attempting real moral reform. During the year, the Protestant churches have proclaimed that they cannot induce suitable men to enter their ministry in sufficient number to satisfy the needs of their congregations, though with apparent inconsistency they deplore their depleted churches and a general apathy in religious matters among their members. Some have resorted to sensational methods of propaganda, to the bill-poster and johnny-wagon mode of advertisement; others have adopted the trick of Christian science, and tried faith cure, mind cure, and other psychic devices to bring purblind mortals under their influence. Practically all have given up doctrine as a basis of morality, even Presbyterian examiners admitting to the ministry candidates who openly deny the fundamental tenets of any form of Christianity. Naturally, with the doctrines the moral obligations or practices based on them are also gradually lost sight of, especially that of conjugal fidelity. No longer now does any Protestant body take a Christian stand against divorce; and gradually the preachers begin to plead for civic more than for moral righteousness. No sooner is some Christian dogma abandoned or moral canon relaxed than some prominent divine hastens to abjure it in public and show how superior is private judgment or self-assertion to common Christian teaching or tradition. Very significant of this tendency during the past year is the vogue of many of Chesterton's essays, in which almost as fixed principle he assumes the very adoption of some startling or advanced view by the pulpiteer as ample reason for saying and believing the contrary; and that contrary usually makes him conform to a Catholic point of view. The university which was founded to be the bulwark of Protestantism in this country is now a propaganda of unbelief.

While denominationalism has been on the wane, humanitarianism has been making distinct advances, especially during the past half year. This advance has been shown by the many large bequests or donations made for the purpose of medical research by men who either have suffered or who have had relatives afflicted by disease. Money and all it can command are now arrayed in battle against tuberculosis, hook-worm, cancer, and other forms of disease, which so far have baffled the study of physicians. Mrs. Eddy was shrewd to observe what men and women of a material age value most when she entitled her medley Science and Health.

Notable for the many scientific achievements which have marked its progress, the year has been notable also for the exposure of impostors and shams in the name of science. Early in the year Professor Haeckel was forced in public controversy to admit that he had been guilty of forging diagrams by which he sought to prove the similarity of the embryo of man and ape. As a consequence, his retirement soon after from the professorship of Theology at the University of Jena was attended with scant honor. The exploit or perpetration of Mr. Cook is already a proverbial instance of scientific imposture which was made possible on such a colossal scale only by the eagerness of a gullible press to get and give all the news. It is hoped that journalists will at least profit by the experience to cultivate a prudent skepticism.

AMERICA happily came into existence with the Beatification of Jeanne d'Arc, and the first numbers had much to say about the new Blessed. The action of the Church was received with generous acclaim not only in France and Catholic countries but throughout the world. Writers of all schools, disentangling the mass of evidence, completely refuted the unfounded statements of some partisan historians of the past and agreed with the verdict of the Church that her virtues were heroic and her title of "Maid" was justly won by the purity of her life. They further admit that her marvelous achievement—an unlettered girl's skill in war and strategy and statecraft at seventeen and her correct predictions of contingent events—could not be naturally accounted for and that there is no alternative to her own explanation that God had sent her and that His Voices, St. Michael, St. Margaret and St. Catharine, had told her what to say and do. The secular and Protestant press of England and the United States were, as a rule, sympathetic and appreciative, but the French infidel group held aloof from the general rejoicings that swept over France. The reception of Anatole France's book and of other attempts to depreciate the Maid did not encourage continued opposition. The palpable contradictions, misstatements and unwarranted inferences and hypotheses, which M. France found necessary to explain away the supernatural, drew so much ridicule upon him that he issued a corrected edition, but Andrew Lang was able to show that this was no improvement, that the book was fundamentally erroneous. Canon Dunand's "Life of Blessed Jeanne" (AMERICA, No. 19), written in exquisite French, completed the discomfiture of the infidel school. His exposure of their methods and his authentic presentment of the facts, have left Blessed Jeanne in possession as saint, martyr and national heroine of France. Father Thurston, S.J., has shown in AMERICA (Nos. 3 and 4) that, in the opinion of competent scholars, the unworthy presentation of "La Pucelle" in Henry VI, is not attributable to Shakespeare.

The glorification of John Calvin by Presbyterian orators on the occasion of his fourth centenary last July, made it advisable to examine their claim that he stood for the Sovereignty of God and human liberty. We were able to show (Vol. I, Nos. 13, 14) that Calvin's characteristic doctrines of Predestination Absolute and Total Depravity make God a tyrant and man a hopeless slave. But Calvinists were not content with election to eternal life; they would also control this, and proceed as long as their founder's spirit lasted, to determine things in their own favor as if predetermination never existed. They persecuted ruthlessly like Calvin to impose their views and gloom on others; this did not make for freedom of conscience or of government, but it supposed and developed a certain sturdiness and pertinacity which later became serviceable when their interests required the right use of it. The Irish Presbyterians turned against the government that had persecuted them and in doing so contributed to American liberty. Whatever was the influence of their elective church system, it was not derived from Calvin, who appointed his synod and ruled it despotically. We also showed that predestination, the Bible as the sole rule of Faith, and often Faith itself, have been abandoned by Presbyterianism till little remains but a Calvinistic shell, and only the Catholic Church is left to maintain as before the Sovereignty of God and human liberty.

Rev. Dr. Ganss, in an extended critique (AMERICA, Nos. 3 and 4) of Denifle's "Luther and Lutheranism, Vol II," proves that the traditional Luther is even more a myth than the traditional Calvin. Father Denifle and the editor of his posthumous volume, Dr. Weiss, O.P., have convinced German historians and scholars that the Luther legend has no historical foundation, that Luther's acquaintance with the mystics, scholastics and Fathers was of the slightest; that he had no scholarship of any kind, nor originality of doctrine; that Lutheranism existed before him, and that the reform movement made him, not he the reform movement.

Dr. Ganss notices the remarkable similarity between the causes and conditions, racial, national and personal rather than theological, that brought about the Reformation in Germany and England. This is further developed in our review (No. 10) of Dr. James Gairdner's "Lollardy and the Reformation in England, which shows by original documents that English Protestantism "sprang from brute passion and was nourished by selfish policy"; that Henry VIII's passions produced schism, and Cranmer, who "changed his religious creed as the King changed his," excised whatever was Catholic when Henry died and gave the Church of England true Protestant stamp. The three independent studies of Luther, Calvin and Henry VIII lead to the same conclusion: "One article after another of the great Protestant tradition has gone, as the actual facts, long buried under a mass of misconception and fable, have been brought to light."

The Champlain Tercentary in July was an object lesson in Protestant decadence and Catholic continuity (AMERICA, No. 14). The celebrations were largely attended from New York, New England and Canada. The impressive Catholic ceremonies that opened and closed the exercises made it clear that Catholicism, the same in doctrine and practice as Champlain knew, is flourishing to-day in the lands where he introduced it, while it is painfully evident that Puritanism, Calvinism and all the other isms that were brought to the same territory later, are dead or moribund, retaining the name while renouncing the reality. Several interesting contributions by Rev. Dr. Brann point to the same result.

In the Field of Controversy

The first number of AMERICA announced editorially that it would strictly avoid "all unnecessary controversy," while at the same time, as part of its mission, it would provide "a defence of sound doctrine," "a refutation of erroneous views and a correction of misstatements about beliefs and practices which millions hold dearer than life." In fulfilment, then, of its promise, when during the year matters of controversy arose which it would be criminal to ignore, it became a duty to answer false statements whose dissemination would prove a stumbling block to the children of the faith as well as to the many who are enveloped in the mists of fallacies and fictions.

The first polemical discussion in America was with the Bishop of Fond du Lac, Wis., who was riding triumphantly an old hobby of his, Anglican Orders, and complacently assuming that he was firm in the saddle. The Anglo-American Bishop was but riding to a fall. Five pamphlets dealing with the relative merits of Roman Catholic and Protestant Episcopal churches were examined and their fallacies exposed and refuted in a series of articles entitled "Bishop Grafton's Divided House." An open letter to the Editor of AMERICA in which the Bishop restated his position on Anglican ordinations drew forth a reply which treated exhaustively the claims of some Anglicans or Episcopalians to a real priesthood, calling attention to the important and decisive fact never controverted that for over one hundred years the ministers of the Anglican church had been ordained by a formula so vague and defective that it would have availed equally for the conferring of any Sacrament. Recognizing this fact, the representatives of the Anglican Communion patched up after the lapse of more than a century a new formula which, even were it sufficiently explicit, would have failed to obviate the difficulties, seeing that the mischief done in that period was irreparable.

A feeble rejoinder to the article in AMERICA appeared in pamphlet form of which no notice was taken. It contained a formidable list of Roman Catholic worthies of the past who it was asserted had favored the validity of the Anglican claims. In the list were Bossuet, Bishop Milner and the Very Rev. (sic) Francis Le Courayer. How weak must be the cause that will support itself by these props. For Bossuet in his "History of Protestant Variations" calls the Anglican divines of King Edward VI's time "weak bishops," "wretched clergy," "who founded the validity of their consecration and the orders of their priests and deacons on a decree of Parliament." Milner, in his "End of Religious Controversy," has written one of the ablest refutations in English of Anglican Orders. The Very Rev. Francis Le-Courayer was an apostate priest and an excommunicate. Let the dead bury the dead.

When the Right Rev. William Doane, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Albany, commented in the August Century on Cardinal Gibbons' paper on divorce which had appeared in the May number, it was felt that the interests of truth called for a prompt and effective reply. Accordingly the strictures of the Bishop on the divorce legislation of the Church were submitted to a careful analysis in our issue of August 14; the scriptural question was separated from the canonical and the historical and the loose and inaccurate statements in his article pointed out. An able refutation of the same misstatements, it was mentioned, had been written years ago for the North American by the Rt. Rev. Chancellor of the New York Archdiocese, Mgr. Hayes, but as Cardinal Newman remarks, "Men do not wish to be disabused and are loath that error should be torn from them."

"Controversy," he says further, "is good in its place." You will not be able to silence your opponents; do not be surprised at it. When they have made assertions, they cannot withdraw them, the shame is so great; so they go on blustering, and wishing themselves out of the awkward position in which they stand. Truth is great; a blow is struck within them; they are unnerved by the secret consciousness of failure. They speak less confidently henceforth; public opinion does not respond to them and a calumny, which was at first formidable, falls on closed hearts and unwilling ears, and takes no root in the community at large." What Newman says of the fate of an exploded calumny is equally true of every falsehood on which truth casts the illumination of its rays.

Catholic Congresses in the United States

The year 1909 was marked by important sessions of Catholic Congresses and Catholic Associations in many parts of the world. At home the Catholic Educational Association which met in Boston in July gave evidence of the vitality and force of Catholic educational work. This Association with renewed endeavor sought by arousing interest in the work of Catholic education to impress still more deeply upon the people of the United States the absolute necessity of religious instruction and training as the basis of morality and sound education. The feature of the convention which gave most satisfaction to the Catholic heart was the manifestation of unity and harmony and co-operation in the great body of Catholic educators of the country. The Apostolic Mission Union completed its three days' conference at the Catholic University on June 11, which resulted in steps being taken to secure practical unity among all the forces now at work for the conservation, extension and upbuilding of the Catholic Church in America. The mission work among the Indians and the Negroes of the South, the needs of the Italian immigrant and the Chinese, as well as the claims of the little children, all received due and practical consideration. The second annual convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies held at Pittsburg last August was a notable one. The work of the convention is admirably summed up in the resolutions which after a full and free discussion by the members were passed unanimously. The Catholic stand in reference to Socialism, Divorce and Education in all its grades, was reaffirmed; civic morality was urged in resolutions calling for a clean press, for wholesome correction in theatrical shows, and the reestablishment of old-time respect for, and obedience to, authority. The spread of the Holy Name Societies in order to curb the viciousness of profanity and blasphemy was advocated; generous support of works of charity in favor of the Indians and Colored people recommended; and loyalty to Church and Government was proclaimed as the true spirit of the Federation since it was organized and conducted solely under Catholic auspices. The thirty-fifth annual convention of the Young Men's National Union, likewise held in Boston, in September, gave promise of a renewal of former activity. Membership had increased fifty per cent. during the twelve-month, and the organization was in a prosperous condition financially. Steps were taken to combine the organization with the Young Men's Catholic Institute, the kindred organization in the West. The Staatsverband (State Federation) of German Catholic Societies closed its annual convention on June 1 at Schenectady. Three hundred delegates, representing eighteen thousand members, were present. An excellent practical resolution of the Staatsverband was the recommendation that at least one Catholic paper should be received in every home. "Let us gladly support our schools without asking help from the State," was one of the resolutions, "and God will bless us in our children." In the latter part of September Indianapolis gave a cordial welcome to the delegates of the Central Verein assembled there for their annual meeting. The opening parade of 10,000 included in its ranks divisions of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and Councils of the Knights of Columbus as well as the German Catholic Societies of the Verein. It was reviewed by Archbishop Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, several bishops and the state and city officials. The convention recommended the appointment of a committee to devise ways and means to encourage the printing of school books from a central bureau with uniformity in text books; the introduction of Catholic books into the public libraries; the distribution of Catholic papers and books among the poor, among lukewarm Catholics, and fair-minded Protestants; and active co-operation among local societies in the dissemination of Catholic literature and in the election of good municipal officers.

A survey of the intelligent activity of our several Catholic Societies in the United States makes instructive reading, but apart from that it suggests vast possibilities for the achievement of great results in many departments in which Catholics should combine for their mutual interests for the good of their fellow citizens, the welfare of the State and the progress of the Faith.

A Happy New Year

To every reader of AMERICA its editors wish a Happy New Year. The wish implies life, health, work in abundance, with leisure enough to think of the better lot for which the best here is but a preparation, and the good sense as well as the good will to find happiness in whatever happens. All the riches in the world cannot make a man happy unless he knows how to find enjoyment in them. Even life is a burden to the mind that contemplates self-destruction. The man who is master of himself will never permit excess of the world's goods to exalt him, nor their loss to depress him. This is AMERICA's greeting, and it is given in the most optimistic spirit. If the survey of the year just past contains many regrettable occurrences, it is not without its consoling and inspiring events. During the year to come, no doubt, we shall have to record facts that militate against religion and morality, against the welfare of the nation, the home, the individual. We shall have to deplore ignorance, prejudice and hostility to the Church on many sides; but always it will be with the reminder that if we do our duty there will be nothing on our part to deplore, and less also on the part of those who come under our influence. This is no day for pessimism. It is absurd to be wringing hands over the evil tendencies of the age and the opposition everywhere to the Church, when by rivalling the activity and organization of her reputed enemies we could check them and even enlighten them to appreciate and respect her cause. It was for this object AMERICA was founded, for this it expects its readers to co-operate with it, and in the very enjoyment of this work to find their greatest happiness.

The United States and Latin America

A million-dollar building at Washington for housing the Bureau of American Republics is a solid proof of our interest in Latin America. Whether that interest is purely altruistic might be another story. The ever-growing importance of our commercial relations with the other republics and the value of the mining and agricultural enterprises financed and managed by Americans in them have quite naturally drawn our attention to them and may have given to the Monroe Doctrine a hue somewhat unlike that which it had when it was first formulated by John Quincy Adams. Rich in land, rich in metals, rich in raw materials, Latin America lacks manufacturers, lacks skilled labor, lacks immense aggregations of capital. While the official classes have commonly hailed with delight the coming of Americans with their money, their machinery and their practical business methods, there have not been wanting mutterings of discontent over the "invasion" which promised to leave for the natives only a choice assortment of tree stumps, worked-out mines, and waterless deserts, with a few mountain trails and some burros to use on them. A project to prevent foreigners from acquiring more mineral land has already been brought before the Mexican Congress.

During our war with Spain, Latin America was not excessively demonstrative in displaying sympathy for us. The Porto Ricans have not petitioned the throne for more American officers, more American ways. The Cubans have learned the path to the woodshed, but have they learned to love the music of the shingle? If Panama shook its fists and made wry faces at Colombia, United States marines were at hand to see fair play. Secretary Root was cordially received at every stop on his tour, for it is good to have a good-natured big brother to champion one's rights. But if the big brother aforesaid kicks your toys about and scuttles your little boats and makes off with your favorite taw, he ceases to be so wholly and altogether desirable and welcome.

Our Latin American friends are fond of restful repose in the shadow of the outstretched wings of the American Eagle, but they do not wish to be hovered or cosseted. Of common tongue and common ancestry, republics are so jealous of their national independence that any effective alliance among them seems to be almost visionary. It will require, therefore, clever statesmanship to impress upon them in their present uneasiness that in redressing their wrongs their rights will be respected and guarded.

Spain Must Be in the Wrong

Such seems to be the verdict that the generality of our people have pronounced. Legal practitioners use various terms to describe a judicial decision made without hearing both sides in a controversy, or without fair warning to one of the parties. Snap judgments and ex-parte decisions have more than once besmirched the ermine.

During the last five hundred years, Spain has been dosed with all kinds of political nostrums. Noisy kinglets, now allied, now squabbling with one another, absolutism, to be described only in capital letters, a few imitations of a limited monarchy, and even a vaudeville republic, have come in quick succession to distract the people and exhaust the country.

Geographically, Spain is in one piece. Ethnographically, the Basque, the Castilian and the Catalonian differ in language, temperament and ideals as if trackless oceans and unscaled mountains instead of creeks and hummocks separated each from the others. The younger provinces have social customs and political theories and practices which were not new a thousand years ago. We Americans, who have "arrived" so recently, seem to be bent on hiding our abbreviated pedigree by despising and denouncing a political monument which does not smell of fresh plaster and calcimine. With all our modern methods we have to lament so often the defeat of justice that we have no grounds to claim for ourselves exclusively the possession of the blindfolded goddess with her scales and sword.

In 1863, when rioters burnt and sacked the Colored Orphan Asylum in New York City, murdered people and performed other feats equally patriotic and chivalrous, the Empire State was helpless. The Army of the Potomac was called upon for troops to restore order and protect life and property. May we say that all citizens who kept closely behind barred doors during that time of incendiarism and bloodshed were really in sympathy with the perpetrators of those lawless acts? Our brief history contains many records of mob violence which overrode the local militia and gave way only before the Federal troops.

The full report of the Ferrer trial has been published in a pamphlet of some seventy pages. Although our synopsis in AMERICA of October 30, 1909, was exact and sufficiently comprehensive, it is well to repeat that witnesses testified to Ferrer's activity in stirring up the people to riot in two suburbs of Barcelona and to his personal participation in leading a crowd of rioters in the city itself. Extracts from the military code under which he was tried show that the names of the judges were made known to him, that he had the right to reject any or all of them for cause, that he could choose his own counsel, that he could testify as often as he wished, that on his request his previous declarations should be read to him, that during twenty-eight days he had the right to summon witnesses, that in case of a tie vote the decision should be in his favor, and that the decision of the court required review and confirmation by the highest military officer.

When the revolt broke out the few available troops guarded the government property. Hence, the churches and convents which had to be left unguarded, were the first to suffer. Zorilla had failed at revolution through want of men. His friend, Ferrer, opened a school of revolution which was ignored until one of his aides hurled a bomb at the king and his consort in their bridal procession. The Barcelona riots were only a practice game or at most a field day for the students of anarchy in the Escuela Moderna. They applied the principles that they had learned.

Italy's New Ministry

It thundered so much that it rained, and the Giolitti ministry fell. Whether this will result in favor of the Church or against it only time can tell. The reasons for the collapse are not altogether understood. Some are persuaded that the premier wished to throw upon the Opposition the solution of certain grave economic questions, for he still commands so many votes that he could at any time carry a vote of want of confidence in his successor and thus resume his former position at the head of the cabinet. Sonnino, the new President of the Council, is a Protestant of Jewish ancestry. All his predecessors have been at least nominally Catholics. Sonnino announces his program as "neither clericalism nor anti-clericalism," under which delightfully vague phrase anything and everything may lurk. The new ministry consists of men of the most conflicting political views who are united only in their opposition to Giolitti, who controlled the State for over three years. As the new ministry is dependent upon some of Giolitti's followers for a working majority, it will not be a great change from what the country has already experienced.

The beneficent effects of the reforms instituted by the Holy Father have extended to the religious orders. In a letter to the three Ministers General of the Franciscans, he has intimated his wish that a complete fusion be effected among them, thus bringing under one superior upwards of 25,000 friars. Other important reforms are now under consideration.

Whether work undertaken in the Catholic movement in Italy should be simply and avowedly Catholic, has been determined in the affirmative by an autograph decision of the Holy Father. His action does not imply any adverse criticism of the German Centre of the French union of all honest people for the defense of liberty in France, for circumstances warrant in one country what they do not warrant in another.

The Bishops of Salford, Newport and Middlesbrough have called the attention of their flock to the Prime Minister's promise to settle the Education question according to the wishes of the Nonconformists in case he is returned to power. They point out that, while the Church is indifferent to purely secular politics, it can not be indifferent to its schools and the children educated in them.

LITERATURE

REFLECTIONS ON THE LITERARY YEAR

It was Charles Lamb, if we rightly remember, who said that every time a new book appeared, he read an old one. He would be hard put to it in these days. We doubt whether the supply of old books would be adequate even if the feat Lamb proposed to himself were physically feasible. Sometime in the course of the next few weeks the plodding statistician will undertake to startle us by computing the number of new books published in 1909. We doubt of his success in stirring even our interest. We are sure his figures will run into the tens of thousands.

It is easy to condemn sweepingly and off-hand the entire literary portion of the enormous mass of contemporary publications. One occupies a safe position in doing so; he is intrenched behind great authorities, and, since final verdicts upon present-day writers lie only with posterity, a deliberate and unswerving preference for the old writers in every comparison with the new is an attitude maintainable without much effort during an ordinary life-time.

Still, as one goes back over the year's achievement and recalls pleasant and profitable hours with living authors, he is in all honesty bound to admit the existence of an amazing amount of literary talent among our writers of books in English. This fact will be borne in upon us with greater force if we refer to the state of literature in this country fifty years ago. About that time the popular novel of the day—one of the first, if not the very first, of best sellers—was "The Lamplighter," by Maria Susanna Cummins. Contrast its stiff, formal and artificial style and handling of plot with the easy assurance of one of any dozen novels that have enriched publisher and author during the past year. There can be no doubt that we have advanced prodigiously in literary art.

But we have no Hawthorne, nor Lowell, no Thackeray, nor Macaulay, nor Tennyson, nor Longfellow! How can we claim advancement? There is a fallacy lurking here, if we can only discover it. There can be no question that the chasm between a popular writer like the author of "The Lamplighter" and the best of her contemporaries, yawned deeper and wider than that which severs our best writers at present from the class known merely as the suppliers of best-sellers. Mrs. Edith Wharton and Mrs. Thurston do not lag far behind Henry James, Thomas Hardy and Rudyard Kipling—not so far behind certainly as Miss Cummins relatively to Thackeray, Hawthorne and Dickens. The same observation may be made of the essay-writers and poets. It seems fair, therefore, to draw the deduction that, if our best falls below the mid-Victorian best our next best is far superior to the bulk of writing of fifty years ago, after excluding the acknowledged masters. Our average has risen at the expense of individual greatness. Literature has been discovered by the masses; and democracy, not without valuable compensations in other respects, seems to be the cause of mediocrity in letters.

The democratic occupation of literature, however, has by no means destroyed the respect in which aristocratic traditions have always been held. We hear a great deal of cheap pessimism expressed concerning the neglect of the classic English writers. On the other hand, a glance through the publishers' catalogues will reveal a wide interest in them. Thackeray, Scott, Dickens, Austen, Eliot, Stevenson, Trollope, Lytton, Reade, not to mention standard poets, historians, essayists and biographers, come out in new editions nearly every year. The publishers apparently find these reprints rich sources of revenue. The doubt always remains, of course, that such sets of the classics may be purchased for the decoration of a library rather than for practical use. But if only half the sales were taken as an indication of a vital interest in the best work of the past, we might almost be justified in concluding that the classic English writers find a wider audience among us than among their own contemporaries.

Another sign of the veneration in which the present generation views the literary past is the interest manifested during the past year in literary centenaries. A large literature—some of it of permanent value—was occasioned by anniversary celebrations in honor of Tennyson, Dr. Johnson, Poe and Holmes. The tone of most of the writers of this memorial literature, while critical and deliberate, was humble and keyed to a note of homage. Our weekly literary reviewers are more humane and less reluctant to recognize living merit than the truculent "Quarterlies" that flourished in the days of Keats; and even they have sighed with disappointment on turning their gaze back from the older men to the crowded fields of the living.

Kipling's "Actions and Reactions" does not measure up to heroic standards. Its tales are clever and ingenious, wonderfully and uniquely ingenious; but they do not stand so far apart from the work of contemporaries as his earlier stories. Hence, the disappointment of his critics; and as for the ingenuity, that is a quality which is not the most striking feature of assured classics. The convolutions of Henry James have become more intricate than ever; one is tempted to think of him in the distant future, if he ever attains it, as a curiosity of literature analogous to Lilly, the "Euphuist." It is well for an author to have the quality of intellectual appeal, but a writer is apt to overshoot the mark when his appeal strains itself in order to be urgently discriminating and over-subtle. It is a commentary on the amount of leisure at the disposal of the world that such a writer is popular. Every year sees one or more new volumes from his pen. During the year just closed he has given us a novel, "Julia Bride," and descriptive impressions of Italy, "Italian Hours." His admirers profess satisfaction. They are exclusive enough to be known as Jamesites. No one ever was a Scottite or a Thackerayite; and the difference contains a world of suggestive criticism.

Howells has given us another book of English impressions under the title, "Seven English Cities." The studies are strictly impressionistic and do not make much of mere information. William de Morgan, who tells us that he is seventy years old and that he began writing fiction at sixty-five, has sustained the astonishment of the public at this extrinsic circumstance of authorship by his new novel, "It Never Can Happen Again." The author is praiseworthy for seeking a hearing by the most legitimate literary avenues. He does not distort language like James, nor cultivate a brilliant eccentricity like Bernard Shaw, nor study the unusual and the fantastic like the later Kipling. He is ready to succeed or fail with the ordinary tools used by his great predecessors. Such stout honesty of purpose has a freshness in a time of weakly extravagance and wins our approval. The unsound spot in De Morgan's art is his cynicism on the subject of religion, a defect which has always proved to be essential and a mortal flaw in the case of literary artists of the past. This cynicism is becoming more and more frequent in English literary productions. Sometimes it is bitter, sometimes haughtily contemptuous, and sometimes ostentatiously indulgent, as if belief in Christianity were a weakness of the intellect more or less inevitable in certain cases and to be deplored and tolerated rather than blamed. It used to be a boast with us that our literature, unlike that of Germany and the Latin countries, was not atheistic. The past year has shaken our confidence in the permanence much longer of the religious tone in English letters. Compare in this respect the men, whose anniversaries were celebrated during the year, with the distinguished writers whom the year saw pass away. Dr. Johnson, Tennyson, Poe and Holmes were not Christian apologists to any marked degree: but Christianity was taken for granted by them; it supplied the atmosphere in which they thought and worked, colorless, perhaps, and indefinable, but nevertheless convenient and undeniable. And place alongside of them the unabashed paganism of Swinburne and Meredith. Nor were Swinburne and Meredith erratic luminaries of these later days, like Shelley to the public of Scott and Wordsworth—adored by a daring and reckless coterie, but shunned by the decent. No, their deaths were the signals for universal panegyrics; they occupied the highest eminences in literature; their frank abhorrence of Christian law and morality, which fifty years ago would have kept them in obscurity, has in these days stimulated rather than checked popular applause. The other events of the year, looked at from this point of view, hardly modify the startling contrast thus disclosed. The much-bewailed poet, Davidson, who is thought to have committed suicide after a sudden and complete disappearance from among his family and friends, was a public blasphemer of anarchistic virulence.

Thomas Hardy, whose latest volume of poems, "Time's Laughing Stocks," appeared in the fall, is the successor, if not the equal of Meredith in prose and verse; and Hardy's idea of the world, its origin, its Providence and its destiny, would not reflect credit on its possessor even if he were a savage. Life, according to Hardy, is a blend of comedy and tragedy: the comedy belongs to Fate, which enjoys kicking us about; the tragedy is all ours. The only voice raised against this usurpation of the seats of Wordsworth, Scott, Browning, Tennyson, by the Shelleys of recent history is that of Chesterton. But, although Chesterton's flair and ingenuity have won him a large audience for an unpopular cause, the impression of sincerity, which successful pleading demands, is necessarily weakened by his efforts—brilliant indeed but, nevertheless, somewhat theatrical effects—to keep the attention of an audience whose reluctance is always before his eyes and uppermost in his mind.

Another small item, corroborative of our dispirited view of the trend of our literature, is the prolonged popularity of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. During the autumn five new illustrated editions of Fitzgerald's version appeared. In Fitzgerald's own life-time the original edition was for years a drug on the market. This may indicate a keener sense of esthetic values now than formerly. But the sense has been developed at the expense of Christian belief, practice and ideals. It is noteworthy that the sacrifice has not been productive of expected results. With all our artistic growth in literary receptivity, we all have to confess a falling off in the grade of achievement. A revived and artificial paganism can never be a source of genuine inspiration. William Butler Yeats and John M. Synge—the latter died in the spring—have used considerable intelligence and effort in blowing life into pagan mummies; but the result, from an artistic point of view, is meagre and disappointing. One historical expression during the year of the new spirit in our literature was the dedication of the Keats-Shelley House in Rome, on April 3, in the presence of the Italian king.

It is a hackneyed and uninteresting theme—this of finding fault with the ethical and religious shortcomings of literature. It is a subject on which one can easily become a disagreeable alarmist. But, if our vision is not extremely distorted, there has never been any period in our history when the consciences of writers, publishers and readers have been so hardened to religious instincts and to the suggestions of virtue and personal honor. The Gallicisation of our literature is growing from year to year. The commanding figures in the literary world in the present period of our history are men who, as authors, at least, toy with dishonor, as with a comrade, and treat religious truth and feeling as so much crude provincialism. The consequence is that most of the second-rate scribblers have aligned themselves with the leaders and discovered that the surest road to a fat purse and newspaper fame consists in dispensing "New Thought" to a thoughtless public. "New Thought," so far as one can observe, is the same thing as "new animal sensations and liberties"; the newer the thought, the less of the thinking faculty and the more of the "tiger and ape." The Spectator, with a rather apologetic preface feels forced to protest against the present drift of letters among us. In one of its November numbers its reviewer takes occasion to denounce in the most absolute and forcible terms the latest novel of H. G. Wells. "We do not wish," he says, "to make appeal solely to the principles of Christian morality or to the sanctions of religion, though to our mind that appeal is the strongest and greatest of all. What we want to do on this present occasion is to ask even those whose ears are deaf to such an appeal whether they think that it is possible to build up a self-sustained and a permanent State upon the basis which underlies not only Mr. Wells's latest novel, but so considerable a section of the thinking and writing which are described as modern."

Literary essay-writing, at least in America, still continues to maintain a high excellence. Mr. Brownell gave us during the year a volume of careful criticism and appreciation; Paul Elmer More published his sixth series of Shellburne essays and succeeds in being illuminating except where he essays to pose as an arbiter in ecclesiastical quarrels; and Harry Thurston Peck who is our Admirable Crichton, has enriched criticism with his "Studies in Several Literatures." In England Arthur Symonds, a frankly sensualistic poet, has not won enthusiastic praise for his prose criticism, "The Romantic Movement in English Poetry." Professor Bradley's "Oxford Lectures on Poetry" may be harder to read; but it is a far superior book.

Perhaps no field of literature has been more productive during the past year than that cultivated by travelers. Books of travel and exploration, well-written and enticing, have apparently a large demand, and the fact is one of the few healthy signs of the times. President Roosevelt, Lieutenant Shackleton, Commander Peary and Doctor Cook, helped to stimulate the interest. Two of the most notable books dealing with travel that appeared during the year are Sven Anders Hedin's "Trans-Himalaya" and the "Autobiography of Henry M. Stanley," edited by his wife. China and Japan supplied material for a large number of the year's books.

Catholic authorship has been fairly conspicuous. Father Tabb will be missed; we doubt whether we can say the same thing of Crawford. We have no successor now to Henry Harland, if it is not "John Ayscough," who gave the public two admirable books during the last twelve months, nor to Francis Thompson, the publication of whose "Selected Poems" was one of the literary events of the spring. René Bazin crept into English notice and favor through translation; Maurice Francis Egan exposed "The Wiles of Sexton Maginnis," and Canon Sheehan finished the year strong for Catholic fiction in his splendid story about "Dr. Gray." Other Catholic names that have appeared on last year's books are those of Mrs. Katherine Tynan Hinckson, Mrs. Wilfrid Ward and Mrs. Meynell. We miss, however, such names as Gasquet, Repplier and Guiney. The versatile Mr. Belloc gave us an entertaining book about Marie Antoinette, and Mgr. Bernard Ward's two volumes on the English Catholics is a work of historical and literary interest.

If there ever were need for distinguished Catholic authorship it is now. As in the fields of education and social evolution the only hope of keen observers is the firm and steadfast bearing of Catholic truth amid the upheavals of socialism and the doctrinal disintegration of the universities, so in the field of literature—which is merely an upper stratum towards which socialistic libertinism and the "New Thought" of the schools inevitably find their way—our hope for literature and national character favors the desire that Catholic authorship will grow and Catholic truth and standards of morality will seek the outlets of a cultivated art to charm the popular ear and win it from the Pied Piper of treacherous music.

JESU DULCIS MEMORIA

(From St. Bernard's Hymn in the office of the Feast of the Holy Name.)

Fond memories Jesus' Name recall
That hold the vibrant heart in thrall,
But honey and earth's sweetness all
Before sweet Jesus' Presence pall.

No notes from lips more soothing sing,
No sounds on ear more joyous ring,
No thoughts to mind more winsome cling
Than Jesus, Son of God, our King.

O Jesus, Hope art Thou, designed
To light and melt the sinful mind;
To all who ask or seek Thee, kind,
But, oh, what joy to those who find!

Nor tongue nor voice avails to tell,
Nor sign nor script hath power to spell—
They only in Thy Heart that dwell
Can know what means to love Thee well.

Be Thou, dear Lord, our joy to-day,
Who art to be our joy for aye!
Jesus in Thee our glory be
Through time and through eternity!

EDUCATION

The most striking feature of educational work during the year just closed has been the pronounced stand taken by educators in regard to thoroughness and the need of insistence upon the religious element in school training. For years complaints have been emphatic concerning the low standards that obtain in many of our most respectable schools and general disposition has developed to trace the evil to its source. The defenders of conservatism in school methods cannot but feel self-complacent as they observe the reaction against the policy of the late president of Harvard, which was largely responsible for the lowering of our educational standards.

The change of sentiment confirms the substance of conclusions reached ten years ago by Father Brosnahan, in his keen critique of President Eliot's program. The unfavorable criticism, practically universal to-day, will lead to a reforming of course programs in the schools of the country.

Mr. Bradley Gilman, Harvard, '80, speaking of a needed feature in the life of his own university voices well the growing chorus of belief among non-Catholic educators that religious training must become a feature of the education offered in all centres of learning. "Harvard undergraduates," he writes, "like all youths, need education of heart and will, in devotional and ethical directions, as truly as in observation, or analysis, or other intellectual processes. Harvard College—and every college—is under obligation to educate its youth morally and religiously as well as intellectually; and this must be done in the only way in which moral and religious education is possible, by the presence and direct appeals of men who feel and live the robust, manly principles of Christian life which they advocate." To Catholics, who have been making sacrifices for this cause, the evident return of their long-time opponents to sounder view in this vital question is a source of unbounded satisfaction. The challenge of Bishop McFaul, which created so decided a stir last July, has not been wholly ineffective. Despite the flippant casting aside of his words by prominent leaders in secular schools, the bishop's charges have not been disproved and they, whose schools are affected by the indictment are beginning to see that they must do something to appease the parents, who however negligent themselves, do not care to hurl their boys into an atmosphere of sheer infidelity.

The year was distinguished by the unusually strong utterances of Catholic bishops in the United States on the position of the Church in educational matters and on the duties and responsibilities of Catholic parents regarding the training of their children. Archbishop O'Connell's address at the opening of the Catholic Educational Association in Boston in July was particularly noteworthy and won a word of praise from the Holy Father himself for its thoroughly Catholic tone. Bishop Colton, of Buffalo, in a circular to his people early in September, urged that energetic effort, such as has already made our parochial school system so notably successful, be now given to the development of secondary and high schools as need requires. A pastoral letter of Bishop Grace, of Sacramento, California, on Catholic schools was a valuable contribution to the literature on that subject. In dedicating Loyola Academy, the first of the buildings of the new Jesuit University in Chicago, Archbishop Quigley of Chicago pleaded for Catholic education as the one safeguard against the growing strength of socialism and infidelity. Bishop McFaul's indictment of the rationalistic and free-thinking teaching marked in many secular institutions needs but be referred to.

The annual reports issued by the Reverend Superintendents of Schools in many dioceses mark gratifying progress in the systematic organization of the parochial schools of the country, and their straightforward presentation of results achieved offers a comforting assurance that Catholic sacrifice for principle's sake has not been without excellent returns. The reports of Reverend Philip R. McDevitt, of Philadelphia, and of Reverends Thomas Thornton and Joseph Smith of New York might serve as models of these important documents.

Anniversary celebrations of more than ordinary interest to Catholic educators were held in several places during the year just ended. On September 9, 10 and 11 the Catholic University of Louvain, justly dear to many American Alumni, attracted representatives from practically all Europe and America to the splendid series of festivities marking its seventy-fifth year of active educational effort. In June the Golden College in Rome celebrated its golden jubilee, on which occasion Pius X sent to Mgr. Kennedy, its rector, an apostolic letter in which he expressed his extreme gratification "at the splendid harvest of sound knowledge and wholesome discipline that the college has yielded." Over five hundred priests have been sent out from the North American College, since that institution was opened in 1859. The alumni now ministering in the United States are nearly three hundred. A band numbering fifty of these, headed by Archbishop Farley of New York, assisted at the jubilee services in Rome.

The Sisters of Charity, commonly known as Mother Seton's Community, whose devoted labors in the East and Middle West have made parochial schools possible in those sections, met with splendid success in their efforts to celebrate worthily their foundress, Mother Seton's centenary. In Emmitsburg, the birth-place of the community the anniversary was kept in June; Cincinnati, the home of one of its branches, honored the occasion in July, and New York made splendid public acknowledgment of its debt to Mother Seton's daughters on December 1 and 2. As we go to press, Newark, N. J., where a mother-house of the community was established in 1859, is preparing to celebrate the anniversary. A happy feature of this last celebration will be the presence of Mother Xavier, the venerable founder of the house in 1859.

In mid-July the sixth annual convention of the Catholic Educational Association was held in Boston. It proved to be the banner meeting of that body both in its attendance and in the success its directors achieved in impressing the public mind with the strength and harmony of the Catholic system and in confirming the stand Catholics take regarding the birthright of every Catholic to a Catholic education in school, college and university. One purpose was emphasized in its meetings this year, to foster interest in institute work among the Catholic teaching body, religious and lay, and reports that have come in during the course of the present year go to show that this aim of the association is being achieved very generally throughout the land.

The usual Summer School sessions were held at Cliff Haven, New York, and Spring Bank, the new home of the Western Catholic Summer School on Oconomowoc Lake, at Okauchee, Wisconsin. Interesting programs of study and of lectures with attractive arrangements for social entertainment made both meetings gratifyingly successful.

New buildings and additions to already existing college plants were many in the past year. A new college was opened at Grand Coteau, La.; the Walsh Hall, an addition to the dormitory facilities of Notre Dame, was erected; Bishop Garrihan of Sioux City installed members of the Congregation of St. Viator in his new college in Sioux City, Iowa; the Polish Seminary of Detroit was transferred to Orchard Lake, Michigan, opening classes there in the former Michigan College; Bishop Donahue, of Wheeling, W. Va., established a college for boys at Huntington, W. Va.; the Ladies of the Sacred Heart moved to their new academy in San Francisco.

Scarcely a diocese of the country failed to add to its parochial school buildings, the record in this respect in the more populous dioceses like New York and Chicago being singularly good.

Of interest in non-Catholic educational chronicle were the decided expressions of men like Judge Grosscup in favor of the introduction of the religious element into our public school system; the exposure of the rationalistic and infidel tendencies of the teaching of leading professors in State and secular, secondary and higher schools; the criticisms directed against the administration of the Carnegie Foundation for the Improvement of Teaching in the United States, as dangerous to the freedom and independence necessary for the development of educational systems among us; the active propaganda against Greek-letter fraternities and student organizations of similar nature in secondary and high schools and the revival of opposition to football in many minds because of the brutality and danger to life and limb apparently inseparable from its present development.

Probably the two incidents in the educational life of foreign lands during 1909, which arouse most interest among the readers of AMERICA were the definite arrangement concluded for the opening of a National University of Ireland whose classes Catholics might frequent without prejudice to their consciences and the sturdy stand taken by the French Bishops, clergy and people in defense of Catholic schools and Catholic teaching, in opposition to the infidel programs of the ruling powers of their country. Speaking of the Irish University, Cardinal Logue has said: "The commission appointed by the Government to draw up the statutes of the new university certainly succeeded in making the best of their task. They have given us a university, to be sure, of which we can take advantage, not exactly owing to the principles upon which it is established, but owing to our trust in those who are to have charge of it, but it is far, far short of what we Irish Catholics would look upon as an ideal university." His words refer to the fact that while the Irish people are a religious people, as far as legislation, at least, is concerned, religion is ostracized and ostracized pretty effectively from this new university.

The Catholic University of America received a new Rector. Early in spring Dr. Thomas J. Shahan was named to the post ad tempus in succession to Bishop O'Connell who had taken up his new duties in San Francisco. The appointment was later made a permanent one and in appreciation of the worth and merit of the new rector the Holy See recently honored Dr. Shahan by making him a domestic prelate.

IN PICTURE LAND

As we look back over the achievements of the year 1909 it would seem indeed that to pictures and to the making of pictures—and to the showing of pictures—there shall be no end. In New York alone the number of exhibitions has been infinite. Large exhibitions of ancient or modern paintings; small specialized exhibitions; exhibitions of single groups of canvases; again individual exhibitions prepared by the artist. Two stand forth among these various artistic events for a singular and marked importance: they are the Sorolla Exhibition in May and the Hudson-Fulton, just over.

The others merge in recollection and one is obliged to search one's mind for notable features in each. Yet the sum total of production is strong and satisfying. To begin with, the annual Exhibition of the National Academy of Design, last March, did it not inspire us with a certain respect for the breadth and solidity of American workmanship? The ideal is not much cultivated among us; neither is symbolism (except the simple, patriotic honoring of the flag); and the historic subject is a thing almost unknown; but the workers are stout of heart and hand and their sincerity is great. They have gone out to the mountains and fields, to the ocean coast-lines, to roof-top and factory, to city squares in rain and snow; and everywhere is the same steady eye and steady pulse to observe and note truthfully what they see.

In portraiture they excel. Sargent's "Miss Vanderbilt," a simple girl in white, with a blue ribbon, standing against a foliage, will haunt you; you scarcely know why. And you will have as much pleasure out of Miss Lydia Emmet's painted children as if they could come, bright looks and charming faces, breathing, out of their frames. A little later, we had the Ten American Painters, one roomful of pictures, but making up in quality for their necessarily limited number. The wonderful, freshly painted "Blue Cup," such a robust study and such a radiant, rosy depiction of young womanhood, vied with the more effaced "Honeysuckle Girl," in her subtle harmonies of white and pale golds. Childe Hassam showed his "Neptune's Cove," which has won more laurels since, and there were quiet views of fen and meadow, and flower-bordered ditches, peaceful scenes for poets and dreamers, by Alden Weir.

At the MacDowell Club, La Farge's water colors and one or two portraits in oils were paramount. Rather severely criticised, yet interesting so many, was Mrs. Stillman's display early in the year. Mrs. Stillman is one of the genuine pre-Raphaelites, of the original London group. Rossetti and Burne-Jones had the honor of her friendship, and Ruskin was of the number of her admirers. It is curious to note how her great beauty and grace, unfaded still, are cast quite in the Pre-Raphaelite lines. The paintings, mostly landscapes done in England and Italy, were shown by a Fifth Avenue dealer under the artist's own supervision. Mme. Stillman has to her credit some very charming subjects drawn from the "Fioretti di S. Francesco," those quaint and inimitable pages.

In May Sorolla came and took us all by storm. No exhibition for years has been so crowded, so talked about, so written upon. And Sorolla deserves the whole bulk of his fame and commendation.

Following after Sorolla came the Basque Parisian, Tulaoga. Another modern Spaniard, eminently modern, interesting, very strong, gloomy in color, learned in the harmonizing of crushed and faded tints like dead flowers; seeing, occasionally, with a power of irony and sarcasm that makes his figures caricatures; drawing with a scalpel. His subjects are not always pleasant.

We must not omit in our retrospect the exhibition of Animals in Black and White at the Lenox Library, drawings and etchings by famous masters of line and point; and the exhibition of French art at the Colonial Club, painters and sculptors of the eighteenth century being too well represented there, for the display to be considered merely one of a decorative value.

It would be idle to speak again of the Hudson-Fulton Loan Collection at the Metropolitan Museum. Not only was it one of the great treats in picture-land this year, but, to many of us it has been a real school for the knowledge and appreciation of Dutch painting of the seventeenth century.

As we close, the nine Van Dyck's at the Knoedler Galleries (belonging to Mr. Widener and Mr. Frick) are being withdrawn from view. These portraits are interesting historically on account of their painter and the persons painted, and those from the Cattaneo Palace in Genoa in particular have been seen by few, as only guests at that aristocratic house were allowed the privilege. Chief among them are the likenesses of Donna Elena Grimaldi, wife of Nicola Cattaneo (the Grimaldi are Genoese and number doges among their ancestors), followed by her African page, who holds a sunshade over her head; and the Prince of St. Angelo, Commander of the fleet and Genoese ambassador to the court of Philip IV of Spain. These strange, proud personages of long ago look oddly enough in our modern-day gallery and are surely fallen from their high estate.

One of the most attractive as to personality is the auburn daughter of the Marchese Cattaneo, Giovanna by name, future wife no doubt of admiral or princely merchant. Later she may grow arrogant, hard of mouth, but at present she is supple and seeks to please. As she stands in her white brocade and looks at you with frank, open, brown eyes, you feel almost sorry that she must needs grow to the haughtiness of rank and fortune which her kin appear to attain. For purely human interest, the face of Franz Snyder's, the painter, is supreme above them all: so pensive, so sensitive, so delicately sad. There are genuine depths of thought in the earnest eyes: the countenance is marked by those writings that time and life put upon any man who reflects and who feels. It is no casual glance you get: the expression is of soul seeking soul in offering of and in prayer for sympathy. In him Van Dyck had no quality of birth to remember, no elegance of form or raiment to depict; the Antwerp painter was of modest extraction; his friend of many years' standing, a thinker, perhaps something of a poet at heart; as it stands, it is one of the most masterly portraits the painter of courts and courtiers ever did.

One cannot but deplore the American mania for removing all traces of the old varnish from canvases that should be handled only with consummate reverence. There is more to a picture than the price it costs you and you gain nothing, and lose much, by laying the surfaces bare and raw. Besides, the tone does suffer through this drastic renovation. And the crude, glassy surface of new varnish, detestable in its hardness and shininess, is the last desecration. Even some of the Rembrandts at the Hudson-Fulton exhibition showed marks of this altogether hideous and barbarous mode of treatment. Donna Elena Grimaldi and Gian Vincenzo, Prince of St. Angelo, had not known all their wrongs when their own kin parted from them.

We spoke last summer of Mr. Mosler's "Fourth of July" among the notable pictures of the year. We must mention Mr. Blashfield's decorations, now in progress, for the Law Courts in Cleveland. Abroad, one of the chief features has been Boutet de Mouvel's frescoes of Joan of Arc for the basilica at Domremy. And let it not be forgotten that, in the spring of the year, the Vatican Pinacoteca, formed of the old collection, enriched by many valuable additions, and placed in its fine new galleries, was thrown open to the public under the auspices of Pius X.

G. F. P.

THE DRAMA IN 1909

With the opening of the year 1909 the theatres of New York City offered but one play of note and edification; that is, one from which the spectator could take away with him a lesson conducive to a nobler view of life. Outside of "What Every Woman Knows," the one significant drama, there were some amusing plays, some nondescript, some decadent and some unspeakably indecent. The theatrical world was in a valley of depression, a great deal of which was simply fetid morass. Amongst intelligent theatre-goers there was universal complaint. This began to swell into a public protest. His Grace, the Archbishop of New York, in the early spring, voiced the outraged sense of public decency in an emphatic denunciation of the moral character of some of the theatrical productions then on the stage, and solemnly warned Catholics against patronizing them. His Grace's public utterances aroused others in public positions to voice a like indignant protest. The theatrical syndicate became alarmed and through one of its prominent managers offered a lame apology under the plea that the theatrical managers were simply supplying a public demand, just as merchants offered such goods as the public would buy.

This was, of course, a confession that the drama in America had simply descended to the level of commercialism. The simple fact was that the public was not patronizing the theatres and that, with rare exceptions, the plays presented were proving disastrous failures. This has since been recently acknowledged by two of the foremost managers, Mr. Frohman and Mr. Belasco, who have declared that the prevailing system (devised and violently fostered by the theatrical syndicate) needs radical revision and emendation. Too many stars, too many theatres, and too many inferior plays is their way of putting the conditions. We may add to these admissions, too little consideration of the common decencies of life, and as the underlying cause a degenerate standard, viz., commercialism as the guiding policy of the syndicate.

In keeping with all this the past year has revealed concomitant conditions in the critical world, namely the tyrannical dominance of the theatrical syndicate over the sources of criticism in the daily press of New York City. This was brought startlingly to public attention in February last, in the boycotting of The New York Press by the syndicate. An attempt was made by a prominent manager to throttle honest criticism of his productions by that paper. The Press refused to submit to the dictation: the syndicate immediately withdrew its advertising patronage from its columns. To its credit and honor, The New York Press refused to yield under the pressure and has since staunchly maintained its independence, a striking and the only exception amongst the daily papers of New York City. A second incident, which occurred last summer, was the enforced resignation of Mr. William Winter as dramatic editor of The Tribune, a position which he had filled with singular integrity and ability for forty years. The syndicate resented Mr. Winter's fearless, honest and intelligent criticism, for he ever refused to prostitute the honor and dignity of his profession to commercial considerations. The only daily paper which published a true account of Mr. Winter's resignation was The New York Press, already at war with the syndicate. There was and still is an intolerable situation: a degenerate stage and a muzzled press. There is no honest criticism of the theatres of New York City by the daily press, with the exception of The New York Press and The Evening Post, the latter, for some unaccountable reason, not having fallen under the ban of the managerial trust.

A change, however, seems to be impending; the syndicate was split in twain during the past summer by an internal quarrel and there seems to be indications of a further disintegration, a consummation which would do much for the enfranchisement of the histrionic world in all its component elements, actors, managers, and playwrights, all of whom hitherto have had to bow subserviently to the will of the syndicate. The multiplicity of poor plays, poor styles and theatres, is simply due to the contracting of the sources by the syndicate, which has pushed its greed to the breaking point of public and professional endurance.

Another factor contributing to the end, and one in itself of great moment in the theatrical world, was the establishment and opening of The New Theatre last autumn. The avowed aim of this institution, sufficiently endowed by rich patrons, is to place the drama in America on an artistic basis, independent of mere commercialism, to encourage native talent by the production of new plays, to review the classical dramas and to establish a school of acting under the old stock company plan, which has disappeared under pressure of the crude star methods of the syndicate. Its effect has already been felt, as we witness in the alarm of managers, who are farsighted enough to see the revulsion in public sentiment against the prevailing system.

As a rule, the character of the plays presented to the public since the reopening of the dramatic season last September has improved, or rather, the flagrant shamelessness which outraged public sentiment during the first half of 1909 is not so much in evidence. This is a gain which it is to be hoped will not be lost. There is an improvement, though there are still plays running with the brand of Sodom on them. The old and flimsy excuses of certain managers that they give only what the public wants, and that the public demands the indecent, is overwhelmingly answered by the striking success of plays of a highly elevated and even didactic moral type. "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" has been the most successful play of the season; it is in fact of the "morality type," teaching an obvious and distinct ethical lesson in a very direct way. It has no element of sensation and is not even dramatic, being simply a series of incidents around a single and simple idea. Yet it has drawn crowded houses for the last four months and bids fair to hold the stage throughout the entire season. "What Every Woman Knows," a play without a single element of the sensational and entirely removed from the type which the managers have been declaring the public demands, has achieved a wonderful success and demonstrates beyond cavil that the much maligned public will eagerly patronize good plays with a normal and respectable theme.

It is true, however, that the public has patronized plays of a degenerate type, but it by no means follows that this is the kind of play in public demand. It only goes to show that amongst the public may be found many of a prurient and morbid curiosity in a large population like New York City. That there does exist a debased taste amongst a certain per cent. of the population furnishes no ground in reason nor extenuation in morals to pander to it. Any procurer of vice in whatsoever form might just as well plead justification for his nefarious trade; and when managers, in defense of the decadent drama, say that they are only selling the kind of wares that the public wish to buy, they are simply placing themselves on the level of the common panderer, with the difference that the latter is always under the vigilant eye of the police, whereas the former would seem to enjoy a constant immunity.

On the whole, judging from the improvement which the latter half of 1909 has brought to the theatre, there seems to be promise of better things for the future. It is certain that the public conscience has been aroused to the flagrant abuses which were flaunted in its face the first half of the past year. The public knowledge of the deplorable conditions which have been existing under the theatrical trust will contribute not a little towards a better result, provided the public conscience does not go to sleep again. Hence it is peremptory that the critic should play an honest part and lash the public conscience to a proper pitch of indignation when need be; the public leaders have also a duty in this regard to call by timely warning, such as His Grace of New York uttered last spring, public attention to public abuses. Another and potent factor towards the elevation of the drama has been the advent of The New Theatre, in a proper sense a rival, and a stimulant to better things amongst theatrical managers; a bright spot amidst much darkness, and a just rebuke to the selfishness of the degrading commercialism which has proved the blight of dramatic art in America.

CHARLES McDUGAL.

On May 10 Mgr. Bruchési, Archbishop of Montreal, forbade the Catholics of his diocese to attend any performances in the Theatre Royal. This prohibition was the outcome of repeated complaints made by heads of families to His Grace of the scandalous scenes enacted in that Montreal theatre. On November 11 the Archbishop issued another pastoral letter condemning the plays presented at the Académie de Musique in that city. Feeling that the great mass of the people are with him in this condemnation, His Grace exhorted Catholic mothers to strengthen his hand by banding themselves against this pestilential drama. The Montreal Gazette, a non-Catholic paper, of November 20, said that efforts were then being made by the management of the Académie de Musique to induce Mgr. Bruchési to withdraw the condemnation. In answer to a letter from the management of the theatre acknowledging "the just remonstrances" addressed to them, and promising that they "will in future keep a strict watch to see that the plays presented shall be in perfect accord with what you have a perfect right to demand," the Archbishop pointed out that "similar promises have been made before and have not been kept," and insisted upon a reliable censorship of competent and honorable men before he would remove his strictures upon that theatre. The firmness of His Grace's stand has been favorably commented on by the local secular press of Canada and by the Protestant religious press of the United States.

SOME NOTABLE DATES IN 1910

There will be an early Lent this year, Ash Wednesday falling on February 9, and Easter Sunday on March 27.

Montreal will be the place of the most notable ecclesiastical gathering of the year. The Twenty-first general Eucharistic Congress will be held there, September 7-11. Cardinal Vincent Vannutelli it is expected will again be the Pope's legate, an office he has filled at the last five Congresses.

The year is specially notable in its centenary relations to the hierarchy of the United States.

The first Bishop of New York, Richard Luke Concannon, O.P., died at Naples, June 19, 1810, en route to the see he never saw. The Bulls appointing his three associates in the hierarchy, which were dated April 8, 1808, only reached Baltimore in September, 1810, owing to the disturbed state of Europe. Bishop Michael Egan, of Philadelphia was subsequently consecrated on October 28; Bishop John Cheverus, of Boston, on November 1; and Bishop Benedict Joseph Flaget of Bardstown on November 4, 1810. These prelates, the founders of their respective sees, are the pioneers of the hierarchy of the United States.

In 1810 the plan to enlarge St. Mary's Church, Philadelphia, began the dispute between the trustees of that parish and Bishop Egan, which resulted later in the schism that makes so lamentable a chapter in the history of Philadelphia.

Martin John Spalding, Archbishop of Baltimore, born at Lebanon, Kentucky, May 23, 1810; and Michael O'Connor, S.J., first Bishop of Pittsburg, born in Cork, Ireland, September 27, 1810, are centenary dates commemorative of two of the most illustrious bishops of the American church.

The centenary of the birth of America's first cardinal, John McCloskey, second Archbishop of New York, will occur on March 10, 1910.

The seventh annual meeting of the Catholic Educational Association will be held in Detroit, Mich., the first week in July.

The New York Literary Institution, New York's first classical college, was opened in March, 1810, on the Middle Road, opposite the Botanic Gardens, in the village of Elgin, four miles from the city (the present location of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Fifth avenue). The first commencement exercises of a New York Catholic college were held here, on the afternoon of August 11, 1810. James A. Neill, the first native born New Yorker to be ordained a priest was one of the students of this institution, the directors of which were the Rev. Anthony Kohlmann, S.J.; the Rev. B. J. Fenwick, S.J., and Mr. James Wallace, S.J.

Fanny Allen, a convert and Ethan Allen's daughter, made her profession as a nun in Montreal, 1810. Her former non-Catholic pastor, Daniel Barber, was present and the impression the ceremony made on him resulted in his own conversion and that of the many others among the members of his family that had such an influence on public opinion during the first quarter of the last century.

Thomas O'Connor began the publication on December 10, 1810, of The Shamrock, the first newspaper devoted to Catholic interests in New York and the second in the United States. There are now in round numbers 550 of such papers and periodicals. In 1810 we had no such mediums of publicity. Bernard Dornin, the first distinctively Catholic publisher, whose store used to be at 136 Pearl street, New York, had recently removed to Baltimore, where he had established his "Roman Catholic Library" at 30 Baltimore street. His enterprise is indicated by the printing in 1810 of a small pamphlet of 48 pages with the title "Instruction on the Erection of Four New Catholic Episcopal Sees in the United States and the Consecration of their First Bishops." The explanation of the ceremony, prayers, etc., is given in English and French—in the latter tongue because of the large number of Acadians and Refugees from the French West Indies then resident in Baltimore.

In 1860 there were twenty-three Catholic papers and periodicals published in the United States. Of these only eight survive to-day. They are the Catholic Telegraph, Cincinnati; The Catholic, Pittsburg; The Pilot, Boston; Freeman's Journal, New York; Irish American, New York; Monitor, San Francisco; Aurora, Buffalo, N. Y.; Der Herold Des Glaubens, St. Louis. AMERICA is the Benjamin of the present day newspaper family.

The fifty-fourth annual national convention of the great German Central Verein will begin in Newark, N. J., September 18, 1910.

The centenary of the birth of Jaime Luciano Balmes, the Spanish philosopher and publicist, whose "European Civilization; Protestantism and Catholicity Compared," is a monument of erudition, will be commemorated on August 10, 1910.

A national monument to General Thaddeus Kosciuszko will be unveiled in Washington, D. C., in May, 1910.

This year the decennial census will be taken in the United States. Public opinion ought to be organized to insist that the Commissioner in his tables gives the exact figures of the Catholic population as collected by the enumerators without any fantastic rebates to please the whims of doctrinaire sociologists. In 1810 these were the Catholic statistics: 1 archbishop, 4 bishops, 70 priests; 80 churches, 2 colleges, 3 female academies; Catholic population (estimated) 150,000. In 1860 these were the figures: 7 archbishops, 42 bishops, 2,235 priests, 2,385 churches, 1,128 stations, 30 ecclesiastical institutions, 34 colleges, 212 female academies; Catholic population, 4,500,000.

Halley's comet will reappear on April 19.

SCIENCE

In many ways the year 1909 will go down into history as one of notable scientific achievement. To such a degree of development have the brothers, Wilbur and Orville Wright, brought their heavier-than-air machine that man may be said to have at last mastered the secret of aerial navigation. The incidents of the Rheims meet in August, the successful experiments at Fort Meyer in this country and the many exhibitions of experts during the past year have demonstrated that the aeroplane has passed from the realm of scientific trial to that of commercial exploitation. The dirigible balloon has excelled the record of the heavier-than-air machine in one respect at least—for distance alone, Count Zeppelin made the most marvelous flight. He traveled 860 miles in his machine in thirty-seven hours, with greatest ease, eating and sleeping aloft with his crew of eleven men—What would have been proclaimed a marvel two decades since is an ordinary fact to-day—in 1909 we have succeeded in crossing the Atlantic in less than five days. The Cunarder Mauretania won the record on September 30, 1909, finishing her trip across in four days, ten hours and fifty-one minutes.—The noiseless gun was added to the military equipment of the nations by the inventive genius of Percy Maxim. It is claimed that it is an implement of such destructive nature that its use in modern warfare will scarcely be recognized by the law of nations. Another scientific improvement in a similar line of activity is the new Cabet torpedo, accepted by the French navy after satisfactory experiment. It is a death-dealing device twice the size of the old Whitehead torpedo and charged with 2,000 pounds of high explosive. Directed by a pilot safe on shore, with not a thread to connect it with his guiding influence, it moves with almost human intelligence to the point of attack controlled by Hertzian waves.—The gyroscope monorail has come to be an accomplishment and is no longer the inventor's dream. In November at the War Office grounds near Chatham, England, Louis Brennan, an Irishman, the inventor, operated a twenty-two-ton car, 40 feet long, 13 feet high and 10 feet wide on a monorail. Two gyroscopes, weighing three-quarters of a ton each, and making 3,000 revolutions a minute in a vacuum, were used in the experiment. Many scitists claim that this successful application of the gyroscope principle in practical work is the greatest single achievement of science in 1909.—Wireless telegraphy has so proved its usefulness as well as its practicability that it has almost ceased to be considered one of the new exploits of science. The wireless telephone, in the use of which great steps forward have been made, has taken its place as an achievement approaching the marvelous. The best records in wireless telephone service have been made in the warships of the United States fleet, instruments having been installed on them early in the year for wireless communication. It is reported that in March last the spoken words of a wireless message flashed through the air from the Eiffel Tower in Paris to Marseilles, a distance of 550 miles.—The submarine service was improved in marked degree during the year and in consequence new records have been won. The Lake, an American submarine succeeded in overcoming the lead of the French for depth, by sinking to the remarkable depth of 135 feet below the surface. The Octopus, another American boat of the same type excelled all previous records by diving and doing eleven knots an hour. Two German submarines completed without any convoying ships the remarkable run of 540 miles, from Cuxhaven to Kiel around Jütland, in forty-seven hours.—Radiathor made of pitchblende, is a substitute for radium perfected by Dr. E. S. Bailey of New Orleans. It is cheaper and it is claimed to be better than the rare element it replaces, while it is entirely lacking all of radium's baleful effects.—The experiments in surgical work in which the new anaesthetic, stovaine, was used are of too recent occurrence to need more than mention.—Thus runs the partial chronicle of the year's great deeds in science.

The science of astronomy has had several noteworthy events to chronicle during the year 1909. In regard to instrumental construction, an extremely novel form of reflecting telescope was experimented upon by R. W. Wood, of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, who obtained the perfect paraboloidal shape so essential to a mirror by rotating mercury in a shallow dish. His results so far obtained showed that unless some means can be found either to eliminate absolutely all tremors from the mercury, or to solidify this optically perfect but liquid surface, it is not likely that this form of telescope will ever be found practical.

Lowell is erecting at his observatory at Flagstaff, Arizona, a 40-inch reflector of the usual modern type in order to photograph the planets.

Harvard College has finished the mounting of the 60-inch mirror it obtained from

Mr. Common of England. The novel features of this instrument are, first, that the images of all celestial objects in whatever part of the sky they may be, are reflected to the same point in a small room where the observer may sit at his ease in all weathers. Secondly, the weight of the massive mirror is eliminated by an iron box buoyed up by immersion in water. And, thirdly, the heavy driving clock is replaced by self-controlled electric motor.

The chief instrument of the year is, however the 60-inch reflector on Mt. Wilson, California. One of the Harvard features is made use of in this, that 95 per cent. of the weight of its twenty-three tons is taken off the bearings by a large hollow iron disk floating in mercury. The mirror itself may be said to be the acme of the optical art. The house and dome in which it is mounted, are of light steel construction and are double, and every precaution is used to ensure an even temperature. Its position on a mountain top in California, and the skill of G. W. Ritchey, its designer and constructor and operator, are such as to hold out the best promises of future efficiency.

Much work has also been done during the year just closed in the use of instruments and in the development of theories. The principal event in this line was the meeting of the International Permanent Committee of the Astrographic Congress, at Paris, April 19-24. This was its fifth meeting, the preceding ones having been held in 1889, 1891, 1896 and 1900. Its object is to photograph the entire heavens according to one systematic method and type of instrument. Seventeen observatories are taking part in the work, the Vatican being one of the number. It was represented by Father Lais, the Oratorian. As the work done at this meeting, as well as the bulk of astronomical investigations generally, is of such a character as not to appeal to the interest of the non-professional, we can only point to some novel or exceptional achievements.

One of these was the systematic search for a planet beyond Neptune, our outermost planet. Several parties engaged in the exploration in pursuance of different theories, but no new planet has yet been found.

Another investigation and test of a theory was concerning the absorption of light in space. Here also conclusions were negatived, but not for want of theorizing or observing or computing.

A third and very interesting subject was concerning the existence of water vapor in the atmosphere of the planet Mars. Lowell maintained that he had more than sufficient spectroscopic evidence of its presence, but Campbell, of the Lick Observatory, could not find any whatever.

The discovery of Halley's comet on September 11, by Dr. Wolf of Heidelberg, Germany, was a prize much coveted by astronomers. It redounds not a little to the glory of the present generation that the comet was found within a distance of only one-fourth of a solar diameter from the computed places assigned to it by Cowell and Crommelin of England. It must be remembered that the only data that could be used in the computation of its position, were those secured at its last appearance seventy-five years ago. Photography has enabled us at this return to discover it about four months or more earlier than the visual telescopes of 1835 made it possible for astronomers to do, when the Jesuit Father Dumouchel, of Rome, was the first to find it.

But the most brilliant discovery of the year is probably that made by G. E. Hale, of the Mt. Wilson Observatory, California, of the existence of magnetic fields in sun spots. His own lecture on that subject, delivered at the Royal Institution in London, on May 14, is printed in Nature of November 4 and 11, and is well worth an attentive perusal. He concludes that terrestrial magnetic storms can, however, by no means be due to the combined magnetic effect of even many spots.

Death has taken away some great men during the year. The first to go was G. W. Hough, of Evanston, near Chicago, on January 1, noted for his systematic study during thirty years of the planet Jupiter, his discovery of more double stars than any astronomer of his time, and his instrumental inventions.

Another, on August 29, was Jean Auguste Fraissinet, secretary, librarian, treasurer and business manager of the Observatory of Paris, helper and counsellor of five successive directors, and generally esteemed as the soul of French astronomy and of the International Astrographic Congresses.

But the greatest loss of the year occurred on July 11 in the person of Simon Newcomb, the foremost astronomer of our time. His chief work was the revision and improvement of the theories of planetary motions. In this he showed such genius that he is universally regarded not only as the greatest mathematical astronomer of his own age, but also the peer of any of his predecessors in the history of the science.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

A new brick, the so-called "moler" brick of Denmark, has been introduced into the trade. It is made of a foliated diatomaceous deposit found in Jutland. The brick is light, tough, and of high heat-insulating capacity. Being very porous it is not used for inside work, but its low heat conductivity makes it very suitable for furnace and oven walls.

TO MOTHER M. XAVIER

Who fifty years ago founded the Sisters of Charity of New Jersey; who still lives to guide her community and to celebrate its Golden Jubilee by the dedication of St. Elizabeth's College Chapel.

Bless with the splendor white of God's new shrine

Your golden yield of half a century;

And, Mother, for past days and days to be

Let love fulfilled and promised love entwine

In praise and pledges, while the vested line

Of blessing priests and cloistered charity

Fill with the grateful voice of jubilee

The hallowed arches and the spires divine.

Hark! echoes answer from an ampler dome
Where healed and fed and taught and child-hearts cry

Their joyous thanks for all your toil and tears:

Temple of charity, God's earth-wide home,
Whose base is everywhere, whose roof
the sky,

Whose sacrifice you are these fifty years.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Bishop O'Connor, of Newark, on December 30, blessed the chapel of the new wing of the College of St. Elizabeth, at Convent Station, N. J., called Seton Hall, and sang a solemn pontifical Mass in honor of the golden jubilee of the Sisters of Charity of the Newark diocese and of the venerable Mother Mary Xavier Mehegan, the only surviving member of the original community. This remarkable woman, who has built up the present great community of 1,100 Sisters, who are at work in the Archdioceses of Boston and New York, and the Dioceses of Newark, Trenton and Hartford, was born in Cork, Ireland, and came to New York as a child. When in 1846, under the advice of Bishop Hughes, the Sisters of Charity belonging to the Emmitsburg Community were released from that jurisdiction and were organized into a separate foundation, they established their novitiate at St. Joseph's Convent, No. 35 East Broadway. One of the first these novices received there was Catharine Mehegan, the present Mother Mary Xavier. In 1858 Bishop Bayley, of Newark, who was Mother Seton's nephew, determined to follow the example of New York and Cincinnati and establish an independent diocesan community of the Sisters of Charity, those up to that time working in his diocese belonging to the New York branch. Five postulants who offered themselves were sent to the convent at Cincinnati to be trained under Mother Margaret, who had been at Emmitsburg during Mother Seton's administration. The following year these five novices, with these of the New York Sisters, Sister Mary Xavier, Sister Mary Vincent and Sister Mary Joseph, opened the first convent in the old Ward mansion, Washington and Bleecker Streets, Newark. Here they began a school and a little later the first Catholic hospital in New Jersey. On July 2, 1860, the Sisters left this site and occupied the mansion near Madison, once owned by Madame Chegary, a famous New York school teacher of the early part of the last century, and from 1856 to 1860 used as the first residence for Seton Hall College. This property has since been largely added to, owing to the foresight of Mother Xavier, and is now one of the most valuable in the state. It is the mother-house of the community and adjoining is St. Elizabeth's, founded in 1899, the first Catholic college for women in the United States. In addition to this these Sisters have charge of six academies; a preparatory school for boys; sixty-seven parochial schools with 41,000 pupils; five orphanages; five hospitals; a home for incurables; a home for the aged; a foundling asylum and two day nurseries. As stated above, the community now numbers 1,100 Sisters, and all this immense result has grown up under the direction of Mother Mary Xavier.

Archbishop Glennon of St. Louis celebrated the silver jubilee of his ordination on December 20. Although he refused to have any elaborate public demonstration addresses of congratulation were presented to him on behalf of the priests and laity and a reception was held at which Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, and Bishops Hennessy, Cunningham, Lillis and Burke were present. In addition to their address the priests of St. Louis gave the Archbishop an elaborate silver service. From the White House President Taft sent the Archbishop this letter:

"I am told that you will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of your ordination to the priesthood on the 20th of this month. Nothing but the good character and veracity of the people who tell me this could convince me of its truth. But for the gleam of purple of your office I should have thought you were beginning your priesthood. Just what secret of eternal youth you have discovered I do not know, but I think you ought to give the rest of us, who must be about your age and who are evidently in the sere and yellow leaf of life, the opportunity to know it and perhaps retrace our steps to that deceitful appearance which so well becomes you.

"Jesting aside, permit me, my dear Archbishop, to convey to you my heartiest congratulations on this most interesting anniversary of yours; and I hope that we may both live so that I can send you a similar message twenty-five years hence."

On Sunday morning, December 18, Archbishop Farley said Mass for the Cloistered Order of Marie Reparatrice in their new quarters at St. Leo's in East Twenty-eighth street, of which church the late Rev. Thos. Ducey was formerly pastor. Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament will begin immediately before the seven o'clock Mass every morning and continue all day until a quarter past five in the evening when Benediction will be given. The guard of honor will be the Sisters of Marie Reparatrice whose life work is Reparation. The church will be open all day for the use of the faithful. In May, 1907, four choir religious and two outdoor Sisters were established in Charlton street, this city, by Miss Leary who secured their services from the Mother House in Rome. They soon outgrew their cramped quarters where they were unable to accommodate postulants who applied for admission, or ladies of the world who wished to make retreats, and the archbishop offered them St. Leo's Church for their daily Exposition and reparation. The former parish house, 16 East Twenty-ninth street, has been converted into a convent where a dozen Sisters are always ready to teach religious truths to children or adults and to prepare souls for the worthy reception of the Sacraments.

Archbishop Farley, with the cooperation of the American Numismatic Society, has had struck a beautiful medal commemorative of the centenary celebration in 1908 of the establishment of the Diocese of New York. On the obverse side are portraits of the seven prelates who have ruled the see, and on the reverse are reproductions of St. Peter's Church, Barclay street, and the old and the new St. Patrick's Cathedral. Copies in gold, silver and bronze will be distributed to the ecclesiastical authorities, the participants in the jubilee ceremonies and to the leading numismatic collections of the world. The inscription in a laurel wreath encircling the reproduction of the Cathedral is "Centenary of the Establishment of the Diocese of New York, 1808-1908." The arms of Popes Pius VII and Pius X and of the Archdiocese of New York and of Archbishop Farley are used also in this design. The archbishop's profile is the centre of the group of portraits on the obverse and pendant under it is a replica of the pectoral cross given him by Pope Leo XIII.

SOCILOGY

Strong measures to root out tuberculosis were taken during the year. An educational campaign to be carried on through the winter was begun in Western New York toward the close of the year. Lecturers go from town to town and, in cooperation with local committees and boards of health, teach the people how to avoid disease. They are well supplied with literature by the New York society, which is also sending through the State a practical exhibit. A law has been passed at Albany whereby the supervisors of any county may establish a tuberculosis hospital on grounds apart from those of the county charitable institutions. All of the county must be admitted and those who can pay must pay. Should any private parties wish to erect a sanatorium, if the local authorities object, an appeal lies to a committee consisting of the Lieutenant Governor, the speaker of the Assembly and the State Health Commissioner. The first sanatorium to be built under these conditions is at Liberty, N. Y. The supervisors of Monroe County have voted $75,000 for a tuberculosis hospital. The unreasonable fear of contagion leads to the treating of tuberculosis patients as if they were plague-stricken. Henry Phipps of Philadelphia undertook to pay every hospital in Pennsylvania one dollar per day for every such patient admitted for treatment. Not a single hospital has demanded the fulfilment of this promise. People should know that tuberculosis under proper safeguards is not a highly infectious disease. Its danger is in the crowded workshop and tenement. Nathan Straus has given a cottage, eight acres of pine land and an endowment of $500,000 for a sanatorium for tenement children in the first stages of the disease. Miss Dorothy Whitney has added $100,000, and other gifts have increased the endowment to $700,000. The institution will be able to treat 1,200 children every year. The life insurance companies are taking up the work as a matter of practical business. The Provident and the Metropolitan have established bureaus of information. The latter wishes to erect a sanatorium for its policy holders, but a legal question stands in the way. George Crocker whose wife and physician died of cancer and who himself fell a victim to the same disease, has left an endowment that it is expected will reach $1,500,000 to Columbia University for researches into the means of curing it. Mr. Rockefeller has given a fund of $1,000,000 to examine into the hook-worm parasite which is said to be the cause of much anemic disease.

In June President Butler, of Columbia, addressed the National Educational Association in Denver on Socialism. He calls it the greatest enemy of the Republic, and said that "Liberty under the law," should be the maxim kept before the American child as the most important principle of citizenship. Justice Brewer, in an interview, spoke of the injustice of the Socialistic agitation against wealth even when honestly acquired. He asserted the right of its possessors to combine for self-protection provided they did not violate the common good; and pointed out that Socialistic principles so agreeable to a young workingman, will react against him when he has acquired some wealth. Mr. J. G. Phelps Stokes attempted to organize a branch of the Intercollegiate Socialistic Society in Yale. Only some twenty students attended his meeting. A few days afterwards Dr. Lyman Abbott addressed a large meeting in the same place against Socialism. The Anarchists of New York held meetings and made demonstration against the Spanish Government in the Ferrer matter. Neither the meetings nor the demonstration amounted to much. The extreme Socialists of the American Federation of Labor are in revolt against the authorities of the Association on account of disciplinary measures these took against the Brotherhood of Electrical workers.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society has done its quiet work this year. In some places it has gone beyond the original scope of its institute to undertake works that a developing sociology makes necessary. In New York it has the Spring Valley Fresh-air Farm, where 2,200 children enjoyed a fortnight's country life during the summer; St. Elizabeth's Convalescent Home in the same place, where 525 women were received for the same period, and three boys' clubs. Its yearly expenditure in New York for its ordinary and extraordinary works is about $150,000.

The Catholic colonization scheme for the settling of natives of Holland and Belgium in colonies that shall be self-supporting colonies is taking shape under the presidency of the Bishop of Ogdensburg, the patronage of the Archbishop of Milwaukee and the Bishop of Green Bay, and the directorship of the Reverend Julius De Vos. An Italian colony undertaken as a business speculation, has been placed successfully on unreclaimed lands near Wilmington, N. C.

Immigration into the United States for the year ended June 30, was 751,786, less than any year since 1902. Italians and Poles predominated; there were a considerable number of English. Hebrews fell off considerably. Chinese and Japanese were very few.

ECONOMICS.

For the first time in twenty-five years wheat sold in England at over forty shillings a quarter. The Argentina crop seems to have suffered some injury. As things go now, consumption continually increasing in excess of the increase of production, the wheat question promises to be in a few years an important one, commercially and politically. Much of the meat for the English market comes from Argentina. The rumor that the American Meat Trust was gaining control of that supply caused some disquiet. Wages in England have doubled since 1850. Drinking among the working classes is declining steadily. In 1877 the invested funds of the trades unions were not five hundred thousand pounds; now they are about six million. Those of the Workmen's Friendly Societies were a little over fourteen million pounds; now they are nearly fifty-four millions.

As the year advanced there was a general revival of trade. The Bulletins of the Department of Commerce show that for the last quarter of the year it was about normal. Nevertheless, in comparing the trade of different years by values, allowance must be made for a general advance in prices. The harvest of 1909 was satisfactory. Corn amounted to 3,000 million bushels; wheat, 663 million; rice, 600 million pounds. The cotton crop was short, hence there were large sales for abroad at advanced prices so that the exports for the year surpass in value those of any other year.

The Joint Committee on Conservation is preparing for its work. It calls for the co-operation of State Governments and Committees, and asks for an inventory of resources under the heads of water, forest, lands, minerals, showing what we have, where it is, what we save or waste, and what we ought to do. Secretary Ballinger, in submitting his report on water, recommends that power sites should be only leased, and this under strict conditions of actual use, the violation of which should cause the forfeiture of the lease.

The Commissioners taken from the Engineer Corps of the army have reported unfavorably on the proposed fourteen-foot channel from the Lakes to the Gulf, estimating the cost at 159 millions and the time required at 18 years. They hold that a nine-foot channel will be quite sufficient for many years to come.

OBITUARY OF THE WEEK

Rev. Richard Kinahan, rector emeritus of St. Matthew's Church, Conshohocken, Penn., in which parish he has worked for the last forty-six years, died on December 19, aged 78 years. He was born in Ireland and ordained priest in Philadelphia, January 23, 1855. He was remarkable for his devotion to the cause of Catholic education, and his parish school always enjoyed a very high reputation. One of its graduates is Bishop Kennedy, the present rector of the American College, Rome.

The Rev. Aloysius M. Folchi, S.J., died at Spokane, Washington, on December 11. He was born in Rome, November 25, 1834, and had been a priest more than forty years. For more than a quarter of a century he was engaged in missionary work in Washington, Montana, and Idaho and previous to this after the Civil War he was in Charleston, where he labored zealously among the negroes for several years. He was one of the best-known men of the pioneers of the new great Northwest.

Rev. Michael F. Rigney, pastor of St. Augustine's Church, Seymour, Conn., died on December 18, aged 52 years, from the effects of a fall the day before. He was born in South Norwalk, and was ordained in 1883. For the past twenty-six years he had been active and successful in parochial work in the Hartford diocese.

Rt. Rev. Matthew Gaffney, late Bishop of Meath, Ireland, died December 18, after a protracted illness. Succeeding Bishop Nulty in 1899, he resigned his bishopric in 1906 through failing health and since lived in retirement. As pastor of Clara and as bishop he was noted for his eloquence, zeal and patriotism and was popular with all classes and denominations.

Right Rev. Hilary Pfraengle, O.S.B., Abbot of St. Mary's Abbey, Newark, N. J., died on December 22. He was born at Butler, Penn., in 1843, and took his vows in the Benedictine Order in 1862. He was elected Abbot in 1886.

NECROLOGY OF THE YEAR

Among the list of the dead for 1909 are to be found many names of distinguished men. The hierarchy of the United States lost its dean, the venerable Bishop McCloskey, of Louisville, Ky., and with him have passed away Bishops McQuaid, of Rochester; Cotter, of Winona; Shanley, of North Dakota, and Hendrick of Cebu. Archbishop Duhamel, of Ottawa, was also called away during this year.

Other prominent ecclesiastics who died during the year were the Rt. Rev. Abbot Boniface Krug, O.S.B., long associated with St. Vincent's, Beatty, Pa., and Abbot Hilary Pfraengle, of Newark, N. J., the Revs. Aug. Langcake, S.J.; Wm. O'B. Pardow, S.J.; Charles Judge, S.S.; Henry M. Chapins, S.S.; Edward F. X. McSweeney, Thomas J. Ducey, of New York; Thomas H. Miles, S.J., of St. Louis; James H. O'Donnell of Newark, Thomas M. Sheerin, S.J.; Canon P. M. L. Massardier, of New Orleans; Adrian F. Van Hulst, S.J., of Chicago; Henry Drees, Provincial of the Fathers of the Precious Blood; William F. Fox, S.J.; Leopold Bushart, S.J.; Mgr. M. G. Proulx, of Quebec; Mgr. R. A. McAndrew, of Wilkesbarre; Louis M. Miller and Francis M. Neubauer, a former Provincial of the Franciscans; Father John B. Tabb, the poet; Rev. Dr. M. A. McManus, of Newark; Henry Dumbach, S.J.; Victorinus Scheppach, S.J.; Lawrence Heiland, of Cleveland, and Rev. Dr. Wm. Maher, of South Norwalk, Conn.

The religious communities lost Brother Joseph, Provincial of the Christian Brothers; Mother T. Austin Carroll, of the Sisters of Mary; Mother M. Emily Power, O.S.D.; Mother Mary of the Desert, of the New Orleans Marianites; Mother Cecilia Lawrence, of the Ursulines; Mother Henrica, O.S.F., and Mother Mary Celine of the Notre Dame Sisters.

From the ranks of the laity there will be missed F. Marion Crawford, the novelist; Gen. M. C. Butler, Miss Emily V. Mason, Isaac A. Henderson, Charles Warren Stoddard, Judge Denis O'Brien, Francis O'Connor, Gen. John B. Frisbie, Seth W. Cobb, P. F. Collier, Col. John G. Healy, Z. J. Pequignot, Theodore Barth, Judge M. P. O'Connor, T. E. Tarsney, Miss Charlotte Grace O'Brien, Mme. Helena Modjeska, Gen. John S. Kountz, Col. Thomas O'Brien, Dr. Sarah H. Stevenson, Judge Gilbert Harmon, Judge M. F. Morris, Judge Walter J. Gibbons, Charles Kloebe, Gen. John J. Coppinger, James McGovern, John J. Johnson, George Daniel and Gen. T. M. Vincent.

PERSONAL

Dr. Maurice Francis Egan, the American Minister to Denmark, and his daughter arrived here, December 23, on the Scandinavian-American steamship Oscar II. News of the adverse decision of the University of Copenhagen on Dr. Cook's data was received on board the steamship by wireless. Dr. Egan still professed a personal belief in the explorer's honesty in his asserted discovery, and declared that he, as American Minister, had acted properly by the nation he represented in receiving Dr. Cook hospitably on the latter's arrival at Copenhagen.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

I appreciate very much the kindness of the editors in sending me a bound copy of Volume I of AMERICA, completing the first half-year of its existence. I have been much interested from the first in your noble venture, and I have watched with deep satisfaction the success that has crowned your efforts. Thanking you most cordially and wishing you every blessing.—Donatus, Archbishop of Ephesus, Apostolic Delegate, Canada.

I return hearty thanks to the publishers of AMERICA, both for the weekly paper, which has been a constant delight during the year, and for the splendid volume just received, containing the half year's issue. May Divine Providence prosper the work, and make it a source of great good both to Catholics and to those who are groping homeward.—John J. Keane, Archbishop of Dubuque.

The Administrator sede vacante of the Ottawa Archdiocese directs me to express to you his sincere thanks for the first volume of your excellent review, which you had the kindness to address to him. This neatly bound volume contains very precious information and will prove exceedingly useful to us. The Administrator wishes all success to AMERICA and to its editors an overflowing measure of the blessings of this holy season.—F. X. Brunet, Secretary, Ottawa.

I am requested by His Grace the Archbishop of Toronto to acknowledge the receipt of Volume I of AMERICA and to thank you very sincerely for the same. His Grace desires me to say that the reading of AMERICA since the first publication of it has afforded him much pleasure, and your greatest success is his sincere wish.—John T. Kidd, Secretary, Toronto.

Great men, dignitaries of all ranks, have spoken in praise of your Twentieth Century Luminary; and every word is true. Now let us hope, that we Catholics faithfully support the undertaking as the years roll by.—Rev. Innocent Ferstler, O.M., Cap., New York.

The weakest department of American newspapers and magazines is apt to be their treatment of foreign affairs, both editorially and as news. For that reason we wish to call attention to the unusually full and intelligent discussion of foreign news in the Catholic weekly, AMERICA.—The Independent, New York.

CHRONICLE

At Home—the Railway Strike.—The hope, expressed before the holidays, that a modus vivendi might be agreed upon between railway managers and men has not been realized, and a general strike on the railroads of the West and Northwest is feared. A vote was taken by the members of the unions of freight handlers, clerks, machinists and maintenance of way employees and it is stated that it was practically unanimous to go out on recommendation of the Federation Council of Labor. President Hawley of the Switchmen's Union, which was the occasion of the original trouble, though granting that a general strike seems certain, believes it will not be declared before the end of this week. President H. B. Perham of the Railway Department of the American Federation of Labor, has been in conference with Chairman Knapp of the Inter-State Commerce Commission and Charles Neill, Commissioner of Labor. He purposes to use every means to bring about a peaceful ending of the present switchmen's strike, which, he claims, has so tied up the thirteen great transportation concerns of the Northwest that less than two-thirds of the normal volume of freight is being handled. He declares that the switchmen are ready to have their claims adjudicated by the two Commissioners under the Erdman act provided that an agreement be signed in advance by both sides to abide by the decision. In the East, too, conditions seem ripe for a widespread strike. Requests for a general increase in the wage schedule of 200,000 employees of the railroads east of the Mississippi have not been heeded, and shortly after the holidays the powerful labor unions will present a demand for the increase and press for an early and definite decision. The railway officials have taken the stand that the increase is impossible in the present condition of the railway industry.

The Secretary of War, Hon. Jacob M. Dickinson, who was accompanied by Brigadier-General Clarence R. Edwards and Governor Colton, made a tour through the Porto Rican towns of Rio Piedras, Caguas, Cayey and Guayama on December 31. At all of them the Secretary of War received petitions for citizenship for Porto Ricans and an elective Senate.—Robert Bacon, former Secretary of State, who succeeds Henry White as United States Ambassador to France, presented his credentials to President Fallières at the Elysée Palace on December 31. The formalities connected with the presentation of a newly appointed foreign ambassador were duly observed.—New Year's Day was observed for the first time as a legal holiday in New Hampshire.—Judge Charles M. Hough, of the United States District Court, refused a new trial to Charles W. Morse. The decision was adverse on every one of the six counts presented by the convicted banker's counsel. The convicted banker has a fifteen-year sentence to serve in the Federal jail at Atlanta, Ga.—The first issue of El Herald Americano, a semi-monthly newspaper for Spanish-speaking people throughout the world, was published in New York on January 1.—Judge Horace H. Lurton took oath as justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.—Mr. Spencer Trask, the banker, was killed in a railroad collision on the New York Central.

He was prominent as a financier, a philanthropist and a patron of art. For over twenty years he was president of the New York Edison Company and to his assistance Thomas A. Edison owes much of his financial success.

—Matthew J. Whittall, the largest individual carpet manufacturer in the United States, employing over fifteen hundred mill hands in Worcester and Palmer, Mass., announced that his mills would go on a fifty-six instead of a fifty-eight hour schedule. Those at piece-work get an increase of 5 per cent. to compensate for the advantage given the rest of the help in shorter hours.—E. Dana Durand, Director of the Census, has issued instructions relative to the employment of negroes as census enumerators. In those districts in which two-fifths or more of the population consists of negroes, persons of their own race will be appointed as enumerators so far as competent agents are available. Mr. Durand does not regard it as desirable that negroes should be appointed to take the census of white families in the South, and he has instructed the supervisors that in all cases white enumerators should be appointed for the white population.—The United States will send five warships to take part in the celebration of the independence of the Argentine Republic next May. The squadron will consist of the armored cruisers Tennessee and Washington, of the North Pacific station, and the Montana and the North Carolina, of the Atlantic fleet, with the Tennessee as flagship. The scout cruiser Chester will accompany the squadron for the use of the admiral in command, as it can ascend the La Plata River. The commander of the squadron has not yet been appointed.

Benefactions of the Year 1909.—The year 1909 has been marked by extraordinary beneficence. According to statistics compiled by the Chicago Tribune the donations and bequests amount to more than $150,000,000. Of this sum $72,600,000 represents gifts, and $77,600,000 bequests. The whole amount has been distributed as follows: To charity, $67,446,421; to educational institutions, $46,122,241; to religious institutes, $22,443,885; to art museums, galleries and public improvements, $8,616,410; to libraries, $3,012,293. The largest individual benefactors of the year have been as follows: Andrew Carnegie, $4,652,500. The total gifts for a number of years made by Mr. Carnegie amount to $162,000,000 in round numbers. J. D. Rockefeller, $12,130,500. Mrs. Russell Sage, New York, $1,851,761. The total of Mrs. Sage's gifts amounts to about $26,000,000. Charles E. Ellis, Philadelphia, $2,500,000. Elizabeth Bingham, Boston, $2,500,000. Caroline Phelps Stokes, New York, $3,050,000. John S. Kennedy, New York, $7,025,000. John M. Baker, New York, $4,000,000. Amherst H. Wilder, St. Paul, $2,200,000. Charles N. Crittenden, New York, $3,000,000. Contributions made by women in gifts and bequests amount to $13,293,990. The largest amount of gifts heretofore was made in 1907, with a total slightly in excess of $149,000,000.

Great Britain.—The Christmas letter and parcel mail to the colonies showed an increase over last year amounting to 11 per cent. in Australian mail and nearly 7 per cent. in that of New Zealand. The South African was unchanged. The Christmas mail to Western Canada from England and Eastern Canada filled a special train of eight cars. It consisted of over 2,000,000 letters, thousands of packages, and plum puddings by the ton.

—Political meetings are being held everywhere. Some addressed by peers are very disorderly, and in some cases had to be broken off.—Several secessions of importance from the Liberal party are announced; among them are Lord Portsmouth, Under-Secretary of War in the Campbell-Bannerman ministry; Lord Durham, Sir Joseph Jonas, President of the Liberal Association of the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield; Sir Edward Johnson-Ferguson, Chairman of the Dumfriesshire Liberal Association, and A. J. Hobson, President of the Sheffield Board of Trade.—Mr. J. K. Caird, a jute manufacturer of Dundee, has sent £10,000 to Mr. Churchill for the defence of the Budget.—An insurance at Lloyds against the success of the combined Liberal, Irish, Labor and Socialist parties has been effected at 65 per cent. The law-lords sitting as a court of appeal have dismissed the appeal from the Court of Appeals' decision that it is unlawful for Trades Unions to use their funds to pay members of Parliament. Three held that it is outside their corporate powers; two, that it includes a vicious contract, since it obliges members so paid to obey the dictates of the Unions. These propose to raise voluntary contributions until they can have the law amended in Parliament. Sir Robert B. Finlay, K.C., Attorney-General in the last Unionist administration, presented the case for the Trades-Unions.—Mr. Herbert J. Gladstone, the Home Secretary, has been gazetted Governor-General of the South African Confederation, and Lord Methuen, Lieutenant-Governor of Natal.—The Board of Trade Returns show 6.5 per cent. unemployed at the end of November against 7.1 per cent. for October and 8.7 per cent. for November last year.

Ireland.—The political situation hinges on contests of independent Nationalists in the South and independent Unionists in the North. It is certain that the three southern provinces and more than half of Ulster will return Home Rulers pledged "to sit, act and vote with the Irish Party," but the Party declines to accept the pledges in some half-dozen instances. Mr. T. M. Healy is opposed in North Louth because of his independent action on the Budget and Land Bills, but the most intelligent portion of his constituents support him because of his ability, technical knowledge of legislation, and his valuable services. Some friends of William O'Brien, and Maurice Healy, M.P., for Cork, are also opposed for similar reasons. Mr. O'Brien's return to Cork, January 4, and the announcement of his candidature complicates the situation. The contention of the Party is that absolute unity is requisite to make parliamentary action effective, while the recalcitrants maintain that legitimate criticism and the rights of constituencies are equally important. There is some hope of reaching a compromise before election. The fact that four Liberal members, one of them Mr. Fuller, official parliamentary whip, have declared against Home Rule, lends some color to the contention of Mr. O'Brien and his friends that Mr. Asquith's declaration was not sufficiently explicit. Meanwhile there is considerable activity outside the political field.—The technical schools, which have been financed by most of the county councils and assisted by the local government Board, have all reported an increase of students. Ninety per cent. of these are engaged in professions and trades during the day and attend the technical schools at night. Tralee, a small town, had an attendance of 12,000 hours for 220 such students, and 434 in Derry had 36,000 hours. Of the new universities, Cork and Belfast have the largest number of students in course. More than a hundred students in Belfast have been enrolled in the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin and hold their meetings in the University buildings. More than two hundred Catholic students attend Trinity College, Dublin, which has offered them special inducements on religious and educational grounds. The St. Cecilia School of Medicine is the most flourishing department of the National University, Dublin.—The Prisons Reports show that in 10,000 persons, Scotland has 12.64 criminals, England and Wales 6.03, Ireland 5.7, that Irish "crimes" were not of a serious nature, and in Ireland alone there is no increase of crime.

India.—Dr. Ghose, Surendranath Banerjee and their followers showed their dissatisfaction with the government regulations of the conditions of candidature at the elections under the new laws, by abstaining from the polls. Some officials think that as Surendranath Banerjee was exempted by name from the regulations, he showed great ingratitude by his course of action. The immediate result is that the more turbulent element has not entered the councils; a more remote result will probably be that the agitation and violence which Lord Morley's reforms were to allay, will continue.

Germany.—The Prussian budget has been prepared in view of the reassembling of the Landtag. Because of increased demands made upon the Kingdom's purse it will not be accepted with favor. It shows a probable deficit of 80,000,000 marks.—The elaborate official reports upon which statisticians have been working for some years back, because of the growing demand for electoral reform, are ready for publication.—The year-book of the association of tradespeople, the oldest of Berlin's commercial bodies, has just been published. Its review of the business of the year 1909 is an optimistic one, and its analysis of the new year's outlook is even more gratifying. To assure the prosperity that is in prospect, the year-book pronounces strongly in favor of a general lowering of the tariff tax. From another source comes a demand that the American tariff policy be copied. The Central Union of Manufacturers has caused a circular of inquiry to be sent to the Chambers of Commerce and other industrial bodies of the Empire, to learn whether it were not well to introduce into German law a section similar to No. 7 of the new American Tariff Bill regarding a "certificate of origin" for all manufactured articles exposed for sale in German markets.—A plan considered in the second peace conference at the Hague, and which then aroused keen interest, was recently touched upon anew in the Berliner Tageblatt. It is a proposition to organize a bureau of the European powers similar to the Washington Bureau of American Republics, whose comprehensive program is sketched in the Tageblatt's article. The advantages of such a bureau in the politico-commercial relations of the powers, are described and the author specially insists upon the strength which would result from the harmonious action of the powers in their dealings with foreign governments.—As was announced in AMERICA at the time, Pius X was much gratified to receive a cordial personal letter of congratulation from Emperor William on the occasion of the recent jubilee of his nomination to the episcopate. The Germania, the leading Catholic organ of the Empire, in a recent issue publishes the text of a personal letter of the Pontiff to Emperor William. In heartfelt words the Holy Father repeats his expression of sincere thanks made to the German Ambassador to the Vatican, when the latter in person delivered the Emperor's letter on the day of the jubilee.

Austria.—The often reported attempt to bring about an ending of the obstruction policy of the Slav members of the Reichsrath was finally successful, and a few days before Christmas the new "order of the day" was agreed to in the lower house. This order, which after approval by the upper house and by the Emperor, is to hold for a year, gives the president of the Reichsrath power to suspend for a period of from one to three days any member who fails to abide by the rules of the assembly. The upper house was called together by telegraph and speedily accepted the proposed change and the Emperor at once signed the order. The obstruction which has rendered futile all attempted legislative action in the Reichsrath will thus give way to business methods in the session which will follow the holidays. The agreement is by no means satisfactory to the German groups, whose stand against the "Slavic Union" endures. The Slavs are jubilant over an outcome in full accord with their desires.—The announcement of the reconstruction of the Austrian Cabinet which followed close upon the approval of the new "order of the day" was not unexpected. Premier von Bienerth had made known his purpose to resign so soon as the end of the obstruction tactics permitted the consideration of the budget and other necessary legislative business. In the reconstructed cabinet, to be announced early in January, the German groups will hold the portfolios of commerce, railroads, instruction and justice; the Czechs that of agriculture and a provincial minister post; the South Slavs will receive the portfolio of public works.—The disturbed condition of affairs in the Kingdom of Hungary, too, seems to be quieting. Dr. Wekerle, tired of his long continued fruitless endeavor to secure harmonious relations with Austria, has resigned his post as Prime-Minister, and he is to be succeeded by Dr. Ladislaus von Lukacs, Minister of Finance in Dr. Wekerle's cabinet. The latter's nomination by the Emperor is already announced, and he has returned to Budapesth, after a long conference with His Majesty, clothed with full power to form a cabinet satisfactory to the party-groups of the Hungarian Parliament. The new Premier was born in 1850 in Zalutna. After completing his law studies he traveled extensively in Germany, France and Belgium, and on his return to Hungary was for a time Professor in the Law School at Raab. In 1878 he entered Parliament, and has ever since been a distinguished member of the lower house, being called upon to fill important posts in the finance department under several ministers. His ability as a financier has enabled him to introduce successfully many advantageous changes in the financial policy of the Kingdom.—Following the announcement of the new Premier, the lower house of the Hungarian Parliament passed a resolution which may have serious results. By a vote of 133 to 98 it was agreed to present an address to the Emperor-King in favor of the erection of an independent Bank of Hungary in 1911. The Kossuth group refrained from voting.

France.—On the first day of the year, according to custom, President Fallières received the members of the diplomatic corps at the Élysée. M. del Muni, Spanish Ambassador, Dean of the Diplomatic Corps, delivered the usual discourse, in which he rendered homage to the practically pacific policy of France. President Fallières struck the same note in his reply, saying that "France has no other enemies than the enemies of peace." Besides the great reception at the Élysée there were the usual receptions in the various ministerial departments, at the Prefecture of the Seine, etc. The weather was particularly fine.—On the previous day Mr. Robert Bacon, the new United States Ambassador to France, was received officially by President Fallières. Mr. Bacon said it was the desire of his Government to tighten the bonds of friendship which bind the United States to France. The President of the French Republic replied that he would do all in his power to help the United States Ambassador to maintain the amicable political and economic relations of the two countries.

In the French Chamber, during the debate on the budget for foreign affairs, M. Allemane, a Paris socialist deputy, moved that the subsidy granted by the French Government to the Medical Faculty of Beirut, Syria, be reduced, "considering that this faculty is directed by the Jesuits, who are the enemies of the Republic." M. Pichon, Minister of Foreign Affairs, spoke against this motion. "The Beirut faculty," he said, "renders great services to France. It contributes to maintain French influence in the Levant. I beg to remind the Chamber that Gambetta, Jules Ferry and Goblet defended the Beirut faculty, at the risk of being called clericals, against attacks similar to those which have inspired M. Allemane. I demand that the Chamber maintain intact the subsidy to the Faculty of Beirut." And the Chamber, brushing aside M. Allemane's motion, adopted the budget article in question.

Russia.—A semi-official communiqué denies absolutely the rumors of complications with Japan and inevitable war. It states that the Government has used the four years since the late war to conclude international agreements designed to wipe out all traces of enmity.—MM. Matthiessen and Voltschoek, officers of the Russian army, have purchased two dirigible balloons in Paris, with which they will undertake an expedition to the South Pole. The explorers will convey the balloons by ship as far as the ice will permit, and then proceed in the balloons southward. They will keep in touch with their ship, their base of supplies, by means of a wireless outfit.

Belgium.—The new King, Albert, took the oath to the Constitution the day after the late King's funeral.—M. Renkin, Minister for the Colonies, in delivering his Budget statement for the Congo, denied solemnly with regard to his own administration the assertions of irresponsible persons made for the purpose of misleading English public opinion. Herr Doerpinghaus accused one company; the Government has ordered a judicial investigation. The American missionary, Morrison, charges M. Kervyn de Merendré, an agent of the colony, with burning villages and carrying off women and children. M. Renkin asks: "Why did he not report this to me at Boma?"

Italy.—The Syndic of Rome, Nathan, says that the alterations on the Capitol and in the Piazza Colonna shall be carried out in spite of the Higher Council of Fine Arts. He justified his presence at the Royal banquet at Racconigi on the occasion of the Czar's visit, by a proverb: he had to take the soup or jump out of the window. Both utterances are almost universally condemned.

Switzerland.—The postal authorities have forbidden the circulation through the mails of post cards bearing the statement that Ferrer was "assassinated by Catholics."

New Bishop.—The Rev. J. J. Rice, D.D., of Northbridge, Mass., has been appointed Bishop of Burlington, Vt. He is a graduate of Holy Cross College, Worcester.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The United States and Cuba*

Lying only one hundred and twenty-five miles off the Florida coast, the island of Cuba has often been food for thought among our statesmen and the subject of discussion in the councils of the nation. In the early days of the republic the patriots were too well satisfied with the outcome of the Revolution and too much concerned about domestic affairs to busy themselves with territorial expansion; but the farseeing and unprincipled Count of Aranda, favorite minister of Carlos III saw in Great Britain's recognition of our independence the birth of a nation "whose first step when it was strong enough would be to take possession of the Floridas and thus to dominate the Gulf of Mexico. It will then aspire to the conquest of Spain's vast continental possessions which we shall not be able to defend against a formidable power established near them."

It is hard to say how far the realization of Aranda's prophecy was contemplated in the schemes of Aaron Burr, who either varied his tale to suit the listener or changed his plans through mere fickleness, but in comparison with the mainland Cuba was too insignificant to be considered. Thomas Jefferson seems to have been the first to suggest explicitly the acquisition of Cuba. Writing in 1809 from his retreat at Monticello to his successor in the presidential chair, he judges "that the Emperor Napoleon wishes to have our good will, that he would undoubtedly yield us the Floridas and, although with some difficulty, would also consent that Cuba should be added to the republic, provided we give no help to Mexico and the other provinces." This letter, however, was simply a communication from a private individual to a friend and disciple. It remained for John Quincy Adams, Monroe's secretary of State, to use for the first time the word "annexation" in an official document. Communicating in 1823 with our representative at the court of Spain, he says: "So strong are the bonds which unite Cuba with the United States, geographical, commercial and political, that when a glance is cast towards the course which events will probably take in the next fifty years, it is almost impossible to resist the conviction that the annexation of Cuba to our Federal republic will be indispensable for the Union and for the maintenance of its integrity. . . . As an apple detached from the tree by the force of the wind cannot, even if so disposed, keep from falling to the ground, so Cuba, once separated from Spain, the artificial bond which joins them being broken, is unable to maintain itself alone, will necessarily gravitate towards the North American Union and towards it exclusively, while the Union will be bound to receive it into its bosom."

During his years of retirement, Jefferson, far from finding any reason to retreat from the position that he had assumed in 1809, addressed President Monroe, another disciple of his, a couple of letters in 1823: "The truth is that the addition of Cuba to our Union is exactly what is needed to make our power as a nation reach the highest degree of development." I frankly confess that I always looked upon Cuba as the most attractive addition that could be made to our system of States."

The Congress of Panama in 1826 was viewed with distrust by many of our statesmen because they feared that it might have something to say about slavery. It was well understood, too, that there was under way a scheme to make an armed invasion of Cuba, end the Spanish rule and annex the island to Mexico or Colombia. Our Government, therefore, took pains to have it understood that no meddling with Cuba's political status could be tolerated. None was attempted. President Van Buren stated our position much more strongly when our chargé at Madrid in 1840 was informed that this Government stood ready to assist Spain with military and naval forces "against any hostile attempt coming from any source to deprive Spain of her sovereignty over the island."

The vast augmentation of territory which followed the Mexican War gave dispatches to Spain in Polk's administration a slightly different tone. Secretary of State, James Buchanan, while expressing our complete satisfaction that Cuba should continue to belong to the Spanish crown, intimated that possibly a fair price might induce his Catholic Majesty to sell it to us. The tentative price was one hundred million dollars. Cuba recognized negro slavery, as did Brazil. But the empire established a general emancipation policy in 1871, while Cuba, the last stronghold of slavery recognized as such in America, remained slave territory until 1880. We are forced to admit, therefore, that the least attractive feature in the proposed purchase or forcible seizure of the island was not the extension of the slave territory of the Union. Although this motive has ceased to exist, there are others of sufficient weight, thinks Dr. Rodriguez, to make the annexation of the island at some future date more than an idle dream.

Though Cuba is independent and sovereign, it is under the protection and influence of the United States. The Platt Amendment, in fact, places the island republic under the control of this Government. Should independent Cuba fail to maintain a stable government able to protect life and property, or to fulfil the obligations that it has incurred, the United States has the right to intervene, a right that it has already exercised. To prevent absorption, which must needs follow frequent intervention, the learned professor of history impresses upon his fellow citizens the vital importance of a united patriotic effort to free Cuba from all danger of losing independence.

*Los Estados Unidos, Cuba y el Canal Panamá, por el Doctor E. Rodríguez Lendián de la Universidad de la Habana.

Nearly forty-six thousand square miles of foreign territory are at our door; Cuba looks westward towards the Canal zone. The island is vastly more important to us to-day than ever before.

Catholic Issues in the British Elections

"If it's a crisis, why do not we crise?" asks Mr. Punch flippantly. So far, except the professional politicians no one is "crising." There is a tacit agreement amongst the great mass of the electors that it is no use allowing a political wrangle to interfere with the preparations for the Christmas holidays.

There is, of course, a certain amount of speech-making—but speech-making is a normal development after Parliament rises for the winter. Among notable utterances this week there is a fighting speech by Mr. Lloyd George addressed to a great Nonconformist gathering. It is ominous that he particularly insisted on the intention of his party to force through an undenominational education law, if they are victorious in the general election. He spoke of his fellow Nonconformists as if they were the very salt of the earth, and described them as the historic champions of freedom. He quite overlooked the fact that at more than one period of England's history they were fierce persecutors of their Catholic fellow subjects, and does not realize that their present attitude towards Catholic education is distinctly intolerant.

The best speakers among the peers have also been addressing audiences in various parts of the country. Once the elections begin they have to be silent, but until the writs are out they are free to do their part in educating the electors. Lord Curzon has been boldly championing the hereditary principle. He asks his audience if there is not a very notable hereditary element in the House of Commons? There is Mr. Herbert Gladstone, elected as a young man because he is the son of the great Gladstone, and Mr. Austin Chamberlain welcomed to the House and commanding suffrages of the electors for the sake of his father Joseph. It would be easy to multiply such instances. And there is a sound reason for such family succession in politics—for the son of a statesman, a diplomatist or even a politician is educated for the work in which his father has distinguished himself, and so a young man learning the practical side of public life as a political secretary, an attaché to an embassy and the like. By the way a large number of the peers serve a political apprenticeship as elected members of the House of Commons in their father's life time.

Nearly a score of Catholics have already been selected as candidates for English constituencies. Notwithstanding the growth of tolerance a Catholic is still handicapped when he asks for votes in England. The Protestant Alliance and similar bodies at once raise the "No Popery" cry, and for many years to come the Catholic vote in the House of Commons will be chiefly represented in the ranks of the Irish members. The Protestant Alliance bigots and Mr. Kensit's crowd of "Wycliffe preachers" are organizing a special election campaign, making the two planks of their platform the maintenance of the Royal declaration against transubstantiation and the advocacy of a bill for the inspection of convents. In connection with this latter point they are marching poor Miss Moulton (late of East Bergholt convent), as a lecturer round the South of England. She appears on the platform every day in the week.

Mr. Ley, the Protestant vicar of Manningtree, the parish in which the convent is situated, has done us good service by his manly protests against her attacks on the East Bergholt nuns. He visited the convent accompanied by two other Protestant gentlemen and the report he sent to the newspapers absolutely vindicated the nuns. Lord Garioch, eldest son of the Earl of Mar, of whom no one ever heard till now, has tried to diminish the effect of Mr. Ley's testimony by writing to the papers to ask if the Protestant visitors to the convent saw anything of the "instruments of correction" in use there, or what he described as "instruments of torture." Mr. Ley replies in a letter to the Times from which the essential passages are worth quoting as the answer of a fair-minded man (though no friend of converts) to such attacks. After testifying that he found the nuns "apparently sound in mind and body and perfectly happy laughter and merriment so natural and spontaneous that it seems idle to suggest it was all assumed for the occasion," he goes on to say:

"But, sir, is it quite reasonable on Lord Garioch's part to saddle us with the responsibility for not inspecting the instruments of discipline which the nuns use in voluntary penance? We did not go to the convent for the purpose of investigating the Roman Catholic religion either in dogma, ritual or practice. We made it abundantly plain in written statement that we did not approve the convent system of religious life and would prefer to have nothing to do with it. It was this very fact that made the Lady Abbess anxious to secure our impartial testimony.

"Moreover we only undertook to vouch for what we actually saw and heard. We made it clear that nothing else was to be expected of us. We are prepared to stand by every word of our report, but we do not intend to be made responsible for extraneous matters. But, sir, I would submit that the spirit that finds expression in Lord Garioch's letter, however creditable to him, is precisely that which makes the Government inspection of convents impossible. I have consistently supported inspection; but if it means State interference in religious faith and practice, it is, in my humble opinion, out of the question.

"I am not, sir, an ascetic, but one cannot hide from oneself the fact that asceticism has always been a feature of the Christian religion, which is of Eastern not of Western origin. The Founder practised it, and it is a moot point how far we have departed from His example in forsaking the practice. It is entirely a question of faith and conscience, in regard to which the State can have no say within the wide limits of the law under which we live. The issue can only be, in view of Lord Garioch's letter, between the complete abolition of convents and the present tolerance of them in our midst. Inspection that deals with the minutiae of religious life is impossible. But with these questions of high policy, so to speak, the inspection of the East Bergholt convent had nothing to do. It was undertaken for a different purpose altogether—namely, to observe and report on the state of the convent and the general condition of its inmates, in order to prove or disprove the grave allegations that were being made. We are convinced that grave injustice was being meted out to neighbors who have as much right to justice as any other law-abiding citizens of this realm.”

The Protestant Alliance took Miss Moulton to Manningtree to lecture and invited the vicar to meet her on the platform and justify his report. He replied that he would do so on one condition—that the chairman should be a local clergyman of the Church of England, lately President of the District Government Board, who would be absolutely impartial. They would not allow this, insisting the chairman should be Mr. Sloan, M. P., an Orangeman and a member of the Alliance. Mr. Ley replied that with such a chairman discussion would be futile, as he was “incapable of impartiality.” Mr. Ley is quite right.

Confiscation of Church Property in Paris

The iniquitous confiscation of the property belonging to the religious orders in France has had far-reaching effects. Besides the actual injustice of the deed, the injury done to religion and the barbarous casting adrift of old and helpless women, the act of the French Government has, in many cases, offended lovers of history and of art, who, although not keenly sensitive on the subject of religion, are indignant at the wholesale destruction of many ancient land marks. In Paris, an animated discussion is being carried on regarding the large property of the nuns of the Sacred Heart, an order founded, as our readers know, by Blessed Madeleine Sophie Barat, which has been, like the rest, expelled by the Government. The “Hotel Biron,” where the schools directed by the nuns were located, is a splendid specimen of seventeenth century architecture. It was built, under Louis XV, by a rich financier, Peyrene de Moras, the elopement of whose daughter, Anne Marie, was one of the social events of the day. The hotel afterward belonged to a royal princess, the Duchesse du Maine, who married one of Louis XIV’s illegitimate sons; then it became the property of Armand de Biron, duc de Lauzun, who was beheaded during the Reign of Terror and whose heirs sold it, at the beginning of the last century, to the nuns of the Sacred Heart.

The idea of this magnificent dwelling house being pulled down and its spacious park sold in lots, aroused the general indignation, and a campaign has been set on foot with the object of saving the Hotel Biron from destruction. Another convent, less imposing in appearance, but full of interesting memories has been ruthlessly swept away. The Abbaye-aux-bois, as its name tells us, was formerly surrounded by fields and woods, of which no trace remains. Indeed, even the large gardens attached to the convent in the eighteenth century, had woefully diminished when the nuns were driven out of their home by the present French Government. Before the Revolution of 1789, the Abbaye-aux-bois was one of the Paris convents where girls of noble birth were educated; its abbesses were women of the world, always of high rank, who ruled their pupils with an indulgent hand. The memoirs of the time give us curious glimpses of the inner life of these schools, the girls received a fair education, especially as far as the lighter branches of learning were concerned, they were taught their catechism and were trained to practise their religion, but it must be owned that, taken as a whole, their education was superficial rather than solid, and the continual intercourse that took place between these fashionable convents and the outer world contributed to develop a mundane spirit among the girls. Some of these were, strange as it may seem, married women, thus among the pupils of the Abbaye-aux-bois, at the end of the eighteenth century, was the little duchesse de Choiseul. Child marriages were frequent at the time and, after the ceremony, the little brides were sent back to their homes or to their convent to finish their education; they only returned to live with their husbands some years later. It may be supposed that the pomp and display attending these ceremonies were hardly conducive to quiet resumption of studies afterwards.

The great upheaval of 1789 scattered the religious and pupils of the Abbaye-aux-bois far and wide: many fair heads fell under the knife of the guillotine, and tiny feet, eager in the pursuit of pleasure, grew weary of treading the high-ways of exile. The nineteenth century nuns, who came to live in the old building, were of a different stamp; they possessed only a small portion of their predecessors’ extensive parks and gardens; the conditions of life, too, were different, the pupils were no longer, like the eighteenth century young girls, future grandes dames, who even as children were taught to live before the world; they were simple in their habits and their training was probably more practical, if less brilliant. A portion of the convent buildings was occupied by lady boarders. Here the famous beauty, Madame Récamier, lived for some years during which her modest salon was frequented by poets, historians, men of science, who sought her sympathy and approbation. Here, the famous writer Chateaubriand read the manuscript of his Memoirs to an admiring audience and here, in 1848, Madame Récamier, old and blind, breathed her last. Now, nothing remains of the Abbaye-aux-bois; a block of tall, staring, white houses, that are let in flats, rises where the venerable buildings once stood. In a few years, the very existence of the Abbaye will be forgotten and the spot so full of picturesque memories, so fraught with an old world charm, will be only dimly remembered by a few lovers of ancient landmarks.

The last bit of religious property seized and put up for sale by the "liquidateur" has a less ancient, but more tragic history. It is the enclosure of the rue Haxo, known, within the last few years, as "la villa des otages," where, in 1871, fifty priests, religious and soldiers were murdered by the partisans of the Commune. When the massacre took place, on May 26, 1871, the spot was merely a piece of waste land, situated in the quarter of Belleville, one of the most ill-famed parts of Paris. Our readers know the tale: Early in the month of April, 1871, the revolutionary government that reigned supreme caused the Archbishop of Paris, Mgr. Darboy, many well-known priests and religious, and several laymen to be arrested. When towards the end of May, the approach of the regular troops from Versailles heralded the final downfall of the Commune, the revolutionary leaders ordered six of the prisoners, among them the Archbishop, to be shot within the precincts of the prison of la Roquette. Two days later, on May 26, fifty more victims, among whom were three Jesuits, several secular priests and a number of soldiers, were taken on foot from the prison of la Roquette to the heights of Belleville. The troops from Versailles had by that time forced an entrance into Paris, but the suburb of Belleville was still in the hands of the revolutionists, who determined to revenge their final defeat by a wholesale massacre of their hostages.

The scene was one of hideous cruelty, even in those days of strife and bloodshed; the prisoners were made to stand against a high wall and were deliberately shot down. A girl of nineteen gave the signal, other women joined in the massacre, which lasted over a quarter of an hour. Two days later, Belleville was occupied by the regular army and the mutilated bodies of the victims were reverently rescued from the sewer, into which they had been cast by their murderers. Since then, the aspect of the place has greatly altered; a band of religious women, wearing secular dress, settled there and devoted themselves to evangelizing the descendants of the Belleville Communards. Some Jesuit Fathers also founded a house near the spot, where three of their brethren were done to death; a marble slab, with an appropriate inscription was placed against the wall, where the victims stood; another inscription close by told how here a mere girl gave the signal of the massacre by firing on an old priest who, true to the instincts of Christian charity, was endeavoring to protect one of the soldiers; a few steps further stood a small chapel, where, every year, on May 26, prayers were offered for the victims. The writer remembers being present on one occasion when in the afternoon, after Benediction, a procession was formed and the pilgrims went to kneel at the foot of the high wall, where nearly forty years ago, so many souls winged their flight to heaven. The house, the chapel, the nuns' convent, all have been seized by order of Government, as being Jesuit property and, on December 9, the spot hallowed by sacred memories, where good work was being done for God and for souls, was sold by auction.

These are but a few of the instances, where the Government has laid sacrilegious hands upon the property belonging to religious orders; the Jesuit Church in the rue de Sèvres, where the victims of the Commune are buried, the Dominican Church and Convent built only forty years ago in the Faubourg St. Honoré, the three Carmelite Convents, the large convents of the Sisters of Notre Dame, the monastery of the discalced Carmelite friars at Passy, all these have been ruthlessly taken from their lawful owners. Some have actually disappeared; thus the convents of the Sisters of Notre Dame no longer exist, streets have been opened and houses have been built on the ground where they once stood; the others are waiting until they meet with a similar fate and their closed doors tell a story of violence and iniquity that is hardly realized by the passing stranger. In most cases the religious have made an effort to retain what is their lawful property and have asserted their rights before the law courts of the country, but when religious orders are concerned justice is put aside and violence wins the day in twentieth century France.

A Sample of Haeckel's Controversial Method

On the evenings of October 14, 16 and 18, 1908, the well-known Jesuit entomologist, Father Erich Wasmann, delivered a series of three discourses in Innsbruck on the theory of Evolution and Monism. The lectures were a great success and were largely attended, the last one by an audience of over two thousand. Their content was much the same as that of the well-known series delivered by Father Wasmann in Berlin in February, 1907 (see AMERICA, Vol. I, Sept. 4, 1909). Of course, Professor Haeckel and his Monistic school of evolutionists came in for a large share of attention. Father Wasmann's criticism was severe, but not any more so than that of any other of Haeckel's critics, or than the tactics of the scientists in question called for. The attitude of the reverend speaker was dignified throughout, and the impression made in Innsbruck was most favorable, in fact, was a distinct triumph for the Christian view of evolution as against the atheistic. Naturally the upholders of the latter view were not at all satisfied with this result. So in order to neutralize if possible the effect of the talks of Father Wasmann, the editor of the Tiroler Sonntagsblatt, a weekly published in Innsbruck, wrote personally to Haeckel asking for an article in refutation. Haeckel sent in reply an essay which he had published in December, 1908, in the Berliner Volkszeitung, and the following letter, dated Jena, 24 October, 1909:

"Honored Sir:

"The battle against Brass, Wasmann and their colleagues ("Keplerbund") is an altogether useless expenditure of energy, because these devout gentlemen (the Jesuits) are not seeking to attain the truth, but are merely endeavoring to strengthen their clerical domination by means of their traditional superstitions. See my work on the "Struggle for the Theory of Evolution" (Berlin, 1905. G. Steiner, pp. 32 to 37).

"Sincerely,

"Ernest Haeckel."

The article mentioned purported to be a refutation of the charge of the German professor, Brass, that Haeckel, in order to bolster up an hypothesis in a recent work, had falsified the drawings of a number of embryos so as to make them look more alike. As a matter of fact, it was merely a philippic against Brass and the "Keplerbund." Haeckel confessed that he had altered the figures of embryos, but defended the procedure by saying that they were simply "schematic figures," and that hundreds of the most noted German investigators were guilty of similar alterations, a charge which was indignantly denied, especially by a body of forty-six German zoologists. Schematic figures, it is true, are commonly used for many purposes of research, but their schematic character is always noted and explained, and the student is not led to imagine that they represent a reality. This was not the case with Professor Haeckel's schematic figures. It was a very remarkable proceeding to publish this article in refutation of Father Wasmann, who had in his last lecture called attention to its worthlessness, as evidenced by the zoologists already mentioned, as well as by other leading scientists, such as Koelsch, Kiebel and Brass, and almost the entire German press, the exceptions being the Social Democratic and Radical sheets.

But the letter, given above in translation, is a still more remarkable production. The "Keplerbund," it will be recalled, is an association under Protestant auspices, formed some two years ago in Germany in opposition to Haeckel's "Monistenbund." Its membership includes many of the foremost scientists of the German Empire, and it is under the leadership of Dr. Dennert of Godesberg. It is not an enemy of the evolutionary theory; quite the contrary. But it brands as a prostitution of science the attempt to use the evolutionary or any other scientific theory, in order to undermine anyone's religious belief. Science, it holds, is not necessarily atheistic; it cannot, in fact, do without God, since it must demand a first cause, if it demands any cause at all. With these foundation principles the "Keplerbund" is naturally not in favor with Professor Haeckel. Hence the animus displayed in the above-cited letter. What are we to think, however, of the exactness of an investigator, hailed in certain circles as a prophet of Evolution, who knows so little of his opponents that he classes them as Jesuits when there is not only not a single Jesuit in the association in question, but, at most, only a very few Catholics?

There is no quarrel with Haeckel, the exact investigator, whom everyone admits to have made many solid contributions to paleontology and other biological sciences. But there is very determined opposition to Haeckel the prophet and leader of the cult of Monism. Nor is the opposition all on the side of theologians, or even of Catholics. With the exception of Father Wasmann, his most determined opponents are natural scientists, like Reinke, the eminent botanist of Kiel, and the Protestant theologian, Loofs of Halle. The present writer once heard the following remark from a well-known American geologist, a non-Catholic, in reference to Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe": "I tried to read it but gave it up. It made me tired! Pretty weak stuff!" Another gentleman, a paleontologist of note, said that after he had read it, the opinions opposite to Haeckel's seemed the more probable. This book and other similar writings of Haeckel and the "Monistenbund" have had a large circulation among the people, in England and America as well as in Germany, in which last-named country especially their vogue has been much increased by glowing press notices and by the advertising agents of various publishing houses. As Professor Reinke wrote, in a work published in 1907 (Naturwissenschaftliche Vorträge für die Gebildeten aller Stände, Heilbronn, 1907, page 71): "Unfortunately Haeckel's propaganda, a propaganda that is resulting in the stultification and demoralization of the masses, is helped along by a certain section of the daily press." Carl Jentsch gave utterance to the same thought recently in the Grenzboten in the following words: "Looked at from a purely scientific standpoint, it is a condition of affairs absolutely beyond endurance, that a small group of biologists should, with the aid of a large number of newspapers, have so prejudiced public opinion as to cause it to be commonly believed that the theories of Haeckel, which were in most of their parts long since exploded, are theories in comparison with which none other deserve to be called scientific."

The Truth About Ferrer

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 23, 1909.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On returning from Spain I find that many of the facts regarding the outbreak in Barcelona last July and the trial and punishment of the ringleaders in that event seem never to have been published here. In fact, it seems to have been regarded chiefly as a revolt against the Church and Church authorities, instead of plain rebellion, looting and plunder as it really was. But two churches in the heart of Barcelona were destroyed; it was the unguarded church buildings, the convents of defenceless nuns and aged monks away from the central portion which were destroyed. The revolutionists started out to cut the telegraph, telephone and electric light wires, to sever the gas and water mains, to capture and plunder the banks, public offices and buildings. They succeeded in paralyzing the electric service and gas, stopped all street cars and railway service, and terrorized the peaceful inhabitants, but the public buildings, banks, storehouses and principal business places were too well guarded by the police and soldiers for them to seize and plunder.

It was a difficult task to guard and patrol the city at all, for the majority of the garrison and the reservists had been sent to the front in Africa, leaving but 1,400 troops of all kinds in that vicinity, and Barcelona is a factory city of 700,000 population. These with the police could do little more than guard the places above named and afford protection to the largest civil and mercantile interests. No one thought of guarding the churches, convents, schools and asylums, for no one imagined that they would ever be attacked by the fury of the revolutionary mob.

The whole tragic series of events shows the incredible baseness and cowardice of the rioters and revolutionists. They made a series of attempts to capture or even approach several of the buildings of the city where valuables were stored or dealt in, and made attempts to approach and burn public buildings, but in every instance were repulsed by the police and soldiers on duty there. Then some young lads got kerosene from a neighboring shop and managed to set fire to a church in one of the outlying districts, and in the confusion and under cover of the smoke looted the altar and sacristy of its valuables.

This was the very thing the riotous mob wanted; it supplied the new idea to them. The churches and convents! Why, it was said that they were filled with gold and silver and precious stones which pious donors and benefactors had bestowed, and better than all they were away from the business portion of the city and were wholly defenseless and unguarded. Thus the revolutionists got their first taste of arson and plunder, and they wanted more. They built barricades across the streets where they thought the police and soldiers might pursue or hem them in. Schools for little boys and girls, convents of nuns and nursing sisters were their especial quarry, and they took good care to loot the entire building before they destroyed it. They were a cowardly lot, and dared not meet men in conflict.

For instance, they undertook twice to assault and burn the Jesuit college and church upon the Calle de Caspé; the first time the whole mob took to its heels when three shots were fired at them by some of the parishioners who stood guard, and the next day they again ran when a few shots cracked simultaneously, and spread the news that the Jesuits had mounted a mitrailleuse. But they gave the Jesuits a wide berth thereafter, and confined themselves to carrying murder, rapine and devastation to convents filled with defenseless nuns and young girls. Even here they were frightened off by a bold show. A few policemen made them leave the convent of the Holy Angels, and the gardener and two soldiers made them drop everything and run from the convent of the Black Ladies in San Gervasio, while they gave up the burning of the church of San Pedro de las Puellas because of the arrival of some determined parishioners. Their courage oozed out the moment they were likely to get the same dose themselves. But the unprotected churches and convents were their easiest prey, and presented the most available plunder. One young ruffian who was shot running away from the soldiers was found to have 6,000 pesetas in money and valuables on his person, taken from the various schools, churches and convents.

It was difficult for the police and the soldiers to grapple with the disorder. Telegraph and telephone wires were cut, there were no conveyances, and even the mails had to be sent by sea. The gas and electric lights were gone and the streets were in darkness, while paving stones were ripped up and made into barricades, and delivery wagons and street cars were also utilized for the same purpose. Artillery had to be brought in to capture some of the barricades, but finally the revolutionary mob got a taste of what real war was like and they faded away like mist before the rising sun when the troops got fairly at work. For five days the reign of terror lasted, but at its end there were some 1,400 persons, who, caught in various acts of murder, arson and assault, were lodged in the grim prison of Montjuich.

It was the trial of these and their various sentences that I have heard of since I returned. In Barcelona the people are ashamed of the riots and destructions and feel that it has set back their city a quarter of a century. Yet the authorities on the whole dealt leniently with the prisoners. Some 1,300 were released within a week to two weeks; others were tried and sentenced to terms of one to six months, while a few received terms of one to ten years according to the gravity of their crimes. Of the ringleaders seven were executed, and of these several were Frenchmen who had left France for their country's good and to escape the courts of their native land. That is why the interpellation in the French Parliament failed to interest the French ministry in their fate. One only has produced a world-wide and vociferous criticism of the Spanish authorities. That was Francisco Ferrer y Guardia, who was executed on October 13th last.

It has been said in this country and elsewhere that he was executed by the order of the Spanish autocratic government, and at the behest of the Church authorities, and that such a thing could not happen in the United States. Well, we had the Haymarket riots in Chicago in 1886—the analogue, except in immensity, of Barcelona—and seven persons were executed. Chicago has had peace ever since, and the Barcelonese think they, too, will have things quiet for a time. It has been said, too, that Ferrer's trial was secret and that he was railroaded to execution. Neither fact is correct, for several of the illustrated papers (and there are many in Spain, finely printed, too), sold in Barcelona at the time, gave a large double-page illustration to his trial, at which it could easily be seen that there were from one hundred to one hundred and fifty persons present in the large court room, among them several newspaper men. The photographer was there on at least two occasions. It must be remembered that Ferrer's trial was by a military tribunal, which is usually in all countries unhampered by technical objections or by repeated adjournments. Yet Ferrer was captured about August 20, his trial commenced early in September and was not concluded until October 8, when he was condemned. Royal clemency was asked on October 9, but the king was advised by his ministers after an examination of the record that sentence should not be interfered with. It cannot therefore be said that he was hurried through his trial, although it is a bit faster than some of our celebrated criminal trials in America.

Whether the Spanish Government was right, as a matter of policy, in executing Ferrer I cannot say; but judging his case by that of lesser men and by examples in America of the Haymarket rioters and others, it seems to have been perfectly justified in stamping out rebellion and anarchy by the execution of those chiefly concerned in the production of those disorders. All the criticisms of the Ferrer trial and execution seem to rest the fact of his innocence upon the circumstance that he was not caught red-handed as the others were. Yet even here two important circumstances are overlooked. One is that prior to the "Bloody Week," as it is called in Barcelona, Ferrer wore a full beard; when he was captured three weeks later outside the city in the country districts he was clean shaven. Why the necessity of the disguise? When he was taken by the Civil Guard he told the truth upon the instant, and then tried to cover it up by a lie. He said he had been in Barcelona, but perceiving where that admission would land him, he added that he was a delegate to the Esperanto Congress held there in July, and was now making a walking tour of the province of Cataluña. He was not recognized at first as Ferrer and it was some days before he was identified. All the delegates to the Esperanto Congress were known; they were all photographed at their dinner on the summit of Tibidabo, and Ferrer does not appear among them. Three witnesses testified that they saw him urging on the rioters, identifying him among several prisoners.

The police found his papers, telegrams and points of advice, which showed how completely he was concerned in the rebellion and rioting. A fine little circular which set forth the following programme would not be nice reading even in the United States: "Abolition of all existing laws; expulsion or extermination of religious communities; dissolution of the civil authorities, army and navy; demolition of the churches; confiscation of the Bank of Spain and of the property of such persons, civil or military, who have held office in Spain or its lost colonies; immediate imprisonment of each of them until they prove innocence or are executed; confiscation of railroads and all banks of credit; absolute prevention of escape from Spain of all persons who have held public office, even without their property." And then a circular which called business men, officials and clergy thieves and pariahs, and called upon the workingmen to take positive action, concluding with the formula: "Annexed hereto is a recipe for manufacturing dynamite (plancastita)."

There was also another circular which wound up with, "Death is a thousand times more honorable than to live under the shameful oppression of a band of thieves sustained by the clergy and exploiters. Up, then, noble and valiant hearts, sons of the Cid! Do not forget that Spanish blood runs in your veins! Viva la revolución! Viva la dinamita!"

In addition to this the police found correspondence and telegrams which showed that Ferrer was in touch with every one of the ringleaders, and in which he gave them advice how to foment and carry on the revolution. Several witnesses testified to his being in various parts of the city during the rioting and to his meeting with the other revolutionists. His own admission that he was in Barcelona immediately before the outbreak, and his own admission during the trial that he attended a meeting on the second day after the riots, the fact of his disguise and his presence only a few miles away from the city, as well as the fact that not a solitary witness was ever found in or out of Spain, whether likely to be brought before the court or not, who could say that Ferrer expressed any disapproval of the dreadful doings of that week, or ever sought to dissuade or to prevent others from those atrocities, seemed to clinch and corroborate all the testimony against him.

Although the case against Ferrer was closed some ten days before the trial was ended, not a witness came forward for him. I was told in Barcelona that some of those who protested that he had no hand in the riots would not volunteer as witnesses lest the police and authorities had documentary evidence of their participation, and so kept away. In fact, the authorities very much desired to get their hands on some of them who were over the border in France.

Even when the bitterest attacks were made in the French, Italian and English papers (those were the ones which I saw, for there were no American ones there) on the Spanish Government for the death of Ferrer, not one word was ever said against the integrity of the military tribunal which condemned him. It was conceded that they were upright, straightforward soldiers, who did their duty as they saw it. Many condemned the procedure; but I am informed by a Spanish judge, now on the bench, that the procedure is almost identical with that in the Spanish criminal courts, and that it was followed in every particular. The chief defense made by the press was that Ferrer was an eminent and a learned man and the founder of the "Escuela Moderna," and therefore the authorities wanted him out of the way. They did not even contend that he was a good man; for he turned his wife and three children out of doors, left his fortune to his mistress, who is younger than his eldest daughter, and obtained the very money to found "Las Escuelas Modernas" by fraud in pretending to his benefactress that they were to be Catholic schools and that the Catholic Faith was to be taught in them.

If we may judge a man's character by his domestic and official actions, and find it untrustworthy, then too much confidence cannot be put in any declarations of his innocence. As to the "Escuelas Modernas," I may speak of them later, but a striking commentary may be found in the fact that the revolutionary mob in those July riots destroyed schools which gave education to 3,100 young men and women and children, most of them absolutely free and many especially for working men and working women—and thereby deprived of education more than twice as many pupils as all the "Escuelas Modernas" combined had within their walls.

If the people of the United States will recall the circumstances of the Haymarket riots in Chicago, or go back to the excesses of the Commune in Paris in 1870, they will better appreciate the state of things in Barcelona last July, and thereby be enabled to better judge, or at least appreciate, the trial of Ferrer and the punishment he received.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

Don Severino Aznar, writing in El Noticiero of Saragossa, Spain, on the Barcelona riots, strikes a note that should arouse any somnolent shepherd. "The events of July," he says, "have shown that there are in Spain thousands of men who have passed through childhood, boyhood and youth without having hardly heard of Jesus and His gospel. Why so? Are they the only ones responsible? Are we to recognize our powerlessness to do in our own country what our missionaries do in foreign lands? Can it be that our methods, once effective, are so no longer? We have the churches, the sermons, the missions, the special devotions, the sacraments. The children have not wished to come because they saw no good in coming. But who undertook to show them the good of coming? Christ did not wait in his workshop of Nazareth for the poor and ignorant to come to Him. He went out and looked for them on the shore of Tiberias, on the banks of the Jordan, on the roads of Samaria. The first useful lesson for us from the Barcelona riots is a revision of our methods of propaganda, the resolution to win over the masses who are as lost to the faith and to peace as are the savage tribes of Africa."

These words are so plain that comment would tend to obscure their meaning. We cannot love our holy faith without first knowing it, as we cannot know it without loving it. A Catholic child with no knowledge of the catechism is an object worthy of deep commiseration.

It would seem that some of our friends across the sea have been satisfied with inviting all to the feast, but have not taken the trouble to go out into the highways and hedges to seek the timid or the careless.

CORRESPONDENCE

A Tilt in Mid-Ocean

We were in mid-ocean and the ship was frequently and peacefully bowing her head towards Rome, nearly two thousand miles away. Seated on a steamer chair reading a book, suddenly I noticed a clergyman who took a seat next to me. I had noticed him before and had taken his measure. He was tall and slender, well dressed and well groomed, and wore an extraordinarily large-sized imitation of a Roman collar, at the top of what I have heard Anglican clergymen call "a Catholic vest." He addressed me, made some inquiries, and I showed him that I was reading in Scartazzini's edition of Dante's "Paradise," the account of the poet's confession of faith to St. Peter.

"By the way," said he, with a smile, "I, too, have been often tempted to make my confession to St. Peter." "Well," said I, "let us imitate the ship. See how she dips her head first in adoration of the Lord of the sea, and next in homage to His Vicar far away in Rome. I feel like bowing in worship every time she dips her head." "But," said he, "there are difficulties." "Of course," I said, "there always will be difficulties. Pray what are yours?" "Well, I think I belong to a 'brawnch' of the Catholic Church." He pronounced "branch" as I have written it. "Well, my friend," I replied, "I am not going to argue with you on a subject that has been exhausted by discussion. Your branch was lopped off the tree long ago, and has been decaying ever since, so that now there is hardly a bit of verdure or of sap left in it. You know the inner history of it, and consequently know that its clergy are fast losing their belief not only in the thirty-nine articles but in the Bible, in Christ and in God."

"Well," he replied, "my real difficulty against your Church is its cruelty in days gone by, in the time of the Spanish Inquisition, for instance." "Again, my friend, I am not going to argue with you. You have probably been reading Lea's history. Have you taken the trouble to verify his statements? Have you examined the original documents? No judge in a court of justice would accept the testimony of an unsworn witness, or receive a document unless its authenticity was verified. Why, then, are some of us so credulous as to accept the testimony of witnesses against the Catholic Church, who usually have no proof of their charges but their own assertion, unauthenticated documents, or the forgeries of enemies. It is almost impossible to find a fair or an honest historian among the enemies of the Church."

"But the Church is too severe with her suspensions, excommunications, interdicts and degradations," replied my "brawnch" friend.

"Well," said I, "the Church is a true mother; and while she loves she also punishes the erring child, but always through love for him. Discipline in the household requires the rod as well as the candy; God is just as well as good, and he punishes as well as rewards; so does the Church."

"But have you ever thought of the intense love of the Church for the human race? Do you know the limit to which she stretches her laws when there is question of saving souls? Do you know that when there is question of saving a soul she frequently abolishes her excommunications and interdicts? Here in this old breviary," and I showed it to him, "I have two extracts translated from two of the greatest theologians of the thirteenth century. Listen: 'If any one brought up in the woods should follow the lead of natural reason in the desire of Good and in the avoidance of evil, it is to be held as most certain, that God would reveal to him by internal inspiration, the things necessary to salvation, or would send to him some preacher of the Faith, or an angel perhaps.' It is St. Thomas Aquinas who thus writes in one of his smaller works (De veritate quaest. XIV). Here is another text, taken from the writings of Hugo of St. Chers, the first Dominican Cardinal (who died A. D. 1262) and for a time papal legate in Germany. He was a profound student of the Bible: 'If any one should be brought up in the woods by a wild beast and remain there so long that he could know nothing of Christ,' what would happen to him? As such a one 'had natural reason, if he do that which he should God will give him the necessary grace' to be saved. You say our Church is cruel; yet is not this theology kinder than anything you can find in the theologies of the sects? Luther and Calvin would have spurned this doctrine of St. Thomas and of Hugo de St. Chers because it is the teaching of the Catholic Church; will the 'branch' accept it? Will any of the Presbyterian theologians accept it even now after they have thrown away so much of Calvin's rubbish?

"Do you know that in the extreme peril of a human soul, the Church removes all censures from a degraded priest and restores his faculties so that he may give sacramental help to her dying child? Do you know that although the Church has excommunicated in her long career thousands of wicked and rebellious sons, she has never pronounced on the fate of one of them. She has never answered the question: 'Is he damned?' She is the mother; she punishes the rebel; but she never interferes with the right and the power of the Eternal Father who alone knows the heart, and has heard the last sigh, perhaps of repentance of His wayward son.

"Why, my dear sir, so great and broad is the love of this old mother of mine, that if this ship were sinking now and you just nodded your head in assent, I would baptize you conditionally and give you the sacraments in her treasury of grace. Come, can you show love of that kind in the 'branch,' or in any of the brambles of Protestantism?"

"But you would not go to the Protestant service this morning. Your Church would not let you," he said. "No," I replied, "because to do that would be compromising with error and with what my faith teaches me to be false. There can be no compromise between truth and error. I cannot sanction false worship whether it be Mahometanism or Protestantism. Hence I would not go to your service. But I would do more than any one at it to save your soul; and do it under the guidance of the only Church of Jesus Christ."

He said many more things, but I stopped the tilt by saying to him: "Let me tell you a story. A former United States Senator of one of the Southern States said to a clerical friend of mine some years ago: 'Father Mac, do you know I would join the Catholic Church to-morrow only she is too d—d strict.' In his case the difficulty was the usual one—dux femina facti. So, my dear friend, there are many reasons why people do not join the Church. In your case it's the Spanish Inquisition and her severe disciplinary laws; in another case it's a woman, a whiskey bottle or somebody else's pocket book. Come see me to-morrow. Drop the 'branch' and climb the evergreen tree."

From Australia

MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA, NOVEMBER 8, 1909.

Mr. Deakin and his cabinet have been defeated. How that result was obtained last Thursday night is curious and interesting. The Financial Agreement by which the Federal Government was to pay the States 25s. per capita was being considered in committee when an animated debate ensued. Singularly enough, all parties in the House of Representatives favored the payment of the sum in question. It was universally admitted that 25s. per capita was a fair return to make to the States in present circumstances. But the ministerialists and the opposition were divided on the proposal to embody the agreement in the Constitution Act without any limit as to time. The Labor party objected to be bound by an unconditional undertaking to make the sum specified a part of the States' inheritance for ever; to do so, they said, would take from the Commonwealth its fundamental right of control and deprive the National Parliament of its liberty. When the division took place thirty-three members voted for the Ministry and thirty-three for the opposition. The chairman of committees said that he wished to give time for further consideration and accordingly would give his casting vote against the Government. As soon as he had done so the leader (Mr. Fisher) of the opposition inquired if the Prime Minister had any statement to make in connection with the defeat of the government; but Mr. Deakin did not respond. He simply moved the adjournment of the House, and gave no subsequent statement for publication. It is understood that the ministry will recommit the disputed clause and hope to snatch a victory by a single vote with the help of one of their supporters, who was unavoidably absent from the late division. The Sydney Freeman's Journal says:

"To embody in the Constitution a system of fixed payments to the States of necessity means that the Federal Parliament ceases to be sovereign, resigns its supreme control over national affairs, and becomes a mere executive body which may act only after consultation with the States' Premiers and Treasurers. . . . The most peculiar circumstance about the whole discussion is that those who would deny the Federal Parliament the right to impose direct taxation are precisely those who are now endeavoring to drive it into a cul de sac from which direct taxation may eventually afford the only outlet. . . . As for the constitutional aspect of the question, let us repeat that this proposal to amend the Constitution so as to make fixed payments permanent and obligatory is contrary to the spirit of the Act of Union, and is an attempt to nullify, to abrogate, by a side wind, the supremacy in all matters of national import conferred by the Commonwealth Constitution on the Federal Parliament. The proposal is financially, politically, and constitutionally immoral."

Two excellent seismographs, one horizontal, the other vertical, have been installed at Riverview College, conducted by the Jesuits in Sydney. The Rev. Father Pigot, S.J., visited Samoa in July, 1908, and studied the working of the seismograph which has been there set up under the charge of Dr. Angenheister. On his return to Australia he obtained from Germany two Wiechert seismographs or seismometers, and built a suitable observatory for their reception. Father Pigot has already obtained excellent results in tracing recent earth tremors and his work in this department will doubtless be welcomed by scientists in America, Europe, and other parts of the earth.

When replying to jubilee congratulations at the late Catholic Congress, Cardinal Moran said: "Having reached the eightieth stage in my path of pilgrimage, only a few more stages can remain till the allotted journey of life here below shall be accomplished. With the full confidence that divine hope inspires, I day by day repeat the loving disciple's words, 'Veni, Domine, Jesu, veni!'—Come, O Divine Master, come! . . . Your pleading of charity on my behalf will not fail to obtain for me that my shortcomings shall be forgotten, and thus through the 'abounding mercy of the Most High, the Blessed Virgin shall take me by the hand and lead me to her Divine Son to hear the blessed words which are the eternal heritage, 'Faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord,'"

A serious coal strike has just been entered upon by the Newcastle miners, N. S. Wales. All the northern mines are closed and the strikers number 12,000 men. The southern mines are still working, but it is supposed that they also will be closed after a time. If the strike continue long it will have a disastrous effect on commerce and every class in the community will suffer severely.

The latest returns issued by the Commissioner of pensions declare that there are now 58,390 persons in the commonwealth receiving old age pensions, and the amount disbursed is £1,459,750 yearly. The particulars of the new claims for each State are as follows:

Opening the Parliamentary Campaign

LONDON, DECEMBER 11, 1909.

Though Parliament will not be dissolved till Christmas week, the General Election campaign was formally opened last night, when the leaders of the two great parties issued their manifestoes. Mr. Asquith's took the form of a speech to a meeting of some ten thousand Liberals at the Albert Hall. Mr. Balfour, who is recovering from a sharp attack of illness and still unfit for the platform, sent out his manifesto as his election address to the voters of London City.

Mr. Asquith protests that the question at issue is the right of the people of England to govern themselves and declares that all pretence of the House of Peers to interfere with finance must be barred for ever. Mr. Balfour denies that the Peers claim either to initiate or to amend financial legislation and points out that all they have done is to insist on the people being consulted before consenting to a financial revolution. He makes a striking point when he reminds the British public that no such sweeping change could be carried through in the United States without the consent of two houses possessing full revising power. He does not ask, he continues, to have the property of Englishmen as fully safeguarded as that of the American citizens actually is, but he does insist that it shall not be at the mercy of a chance vote of a single chamber. He does not object to reform in the constitution of the House of Lords, but he will not have it reduced to a mere cipher. A revising body, a check on headlong legislative change, there must be.

On the constructive side of his program he speaks of Tariff Reform as a means of strengthening the financial position and increasing the amount of employment among the workers and he refers to plans for facilitating the acquisition of their freeholds by tenant farmers, incidentally contrasting the lot of the small proprietor who is his own master with that of the state-tenant who figures in socialistic systems of land reform.

Mr. Asquith goes more fully into questions of general policy. He is naturally anxious to conciliate as many as possible of the groups that went to make up his majority in the late Parliament. The Irish Catholics are promised some form of Home Rule for Ireland; the English Non-conformists are told that the Education Act of 1902 will not be allowed to stand and that the Government if it continues in power will embark on fresh attempts at legislation in the Nonconformist sense; the Welsh Liberals are promised disestablishment of the Church in Wales.

The pronouncement on education is decidedly menacing to Catholic interests, and forecasts a renewal of the struggle for our schools. Mr. Asquith says:

"Take first of all the cause of national education in England and Wales. We stand there where we stood four years ago. The anomalies and injustice created by the Education Act of 1902 have still to be set right. We have to secure by statute the access of every child to a school which is under the complete control of a popularly elected authority, and in which the teacher is not fenced about by any sectarian tests. Provided that right is established, and, mark my words, made universally available, we shall be ready, as we have shown ourselves ready before, to deal liberally in the case of minorities in populous areas."

Mr. Asquith's ideas of liberal treatment for the Catholic minority in the large towns as shown in the Education Bills of his cabinet, was so narrow that it was impossible to accept it, and yet he still seems to be under the delusion that he acted generously to us. The crisis is so far causing little excitement or disturbance of the normal course of business at the year end. The scaremongers who declared that rejection of the Budget by the Lords would be followed by financial chaos, panic and widespread dislocation and loss of trade, have seen their jeremiads falsified by the event. Consols have actually risen in value. The rate for money remains as it was. The customs dues are being regularly paid under an arrangement by which in case of the duties being lowered by the new House of Commons the excess already paid will be returned to the payers. The professional politicians are busy. Printers and bill-posters are preparing ammunition for the campaign but the average British citizen has made up his mind not to worry much about politics till the other side of Christmas. A. H. A.

Belgium and the Holy See

ROME, DECEMBER 17, 1909.

The death of the king of Belgium brings up again a chapter of diplomatic history, now forty years old which portrays that spirit of moderation which was one of the chief characteristics of the deceased sovereign. At the fall of Rome in 1870 the Belgian Liberals thought the time propitious to attempt a modification of the government's relations with the Holy See. Their mouthpiece was Frère-Orban who averred that with the loss of the temporal power the Pope had become simply the head of a religious society and therefore entitled to no special notice. The Catholics naturally rejected this quintessence of Liberalism, and nothing beyond an annual protest resulted from Frère-Orban's followers. Affairs took on a different aspect, however, when the Liberals came into power in 1875 and Frère-Orban became President of the Council.

In the circular announcing a new ministry there was a vague hint of prospective changes in the diplomatic relations between the Holy See and Belgium, and all was expectation to see what the intensely anti-clerical President would essay. His first blow was aimed at the schools which, under a law of 1842, were public and Catholic as well. But his attempt to secularize education in a country where practical Catholicity was so strong and widespread raised such a storm that the wily sectarian was constrained to invoke the good offices of the Pope to ward off what threatened to be an attempt to overthrow the Constitution. The premier promised to mitigate the odious law. The Pope intervened for the sake of peace; but, when public quiet was restored the promise was broken and the law was left as it stood. The Pope then wrote Cardinal Deschamps and his suffragans a letter encouraging them to stand out against the godless schools. The first result was that the papal nuncio received his passports from the government; the second was that clergy and laity began at once and with all energy to open Catholic schools. The government schools had everything except pupils. Thus things went on for twenty-five years, that is, until the Catholics returned to power, when diplomatic relations with the Vatican were renewed and the schools were brought back to their religious form.

During all that time of trouble and agitation, if affairs did not reach a more violent stage it was due to the moderating influence of Leopold II, who personally showed unvarying respect towards the nuncio and the hierarchy. This is the testimony of the nuncio, who has since become Cardinal Serafino Vannutelli, sub-dean of the Sacred College and Prefect of the Sacred Penitentiary.

The Church is also mindful of the valuable help which the deceased king gave to religion both in Belgium and in the Congo. Thanks chiefly to Leopold's generosity, Brussels will soon see completed the basilica of the Sacred Heart, as Paris has Montmartre. To that same generosity, the Congo missionaries owe not a little in their work of evangelization, in which the king took a lively and practical interest. There will soon be a solemn memorial service in the Sistine Chapel for the repose of the soul of the late king, at which the Pope, the cardinals of the papal court, and ambassadors to the Holy See will be present.

The Spanish Bishops and the Lay Schools

ROQUETAS, SPAIN, DECEMBER 9, 1909.

The Cardinal Primate has addressed to the President of the Ministry a letter, signed by the archbishops and bishops of Spain, protesting against the proposed reopening of the lay or neutral schools. These schools, it will be recalled, were closed by the former Conservative ministry because they were considered by Sr. Maura as being one of the principal causes of the terrible crimes of July. The letter of protest states that these schools existed for the purpose of opposing the national faith of Spain; that they were a menace to the morals of children; that they engendered in innocent minds a spirit of irreligion and anarchy hostile to the interests of the nation; that their toleration was a violation of article eleven of the Constitution, of article two of the Concordat and of articles 295 and 296 of the Law of Public Instruction. That the readers of AMERICA may clearly understand the nature of these schools it may be well to give a brief history of their existence.

According to Bartolomé Torres, in La Vanguardia, the lay or neutral schools date back to about the year 1880, when there was established in Barcelona an association for the founding and propagation of this type of school. The propaganda was active in factory and working centres, especially in the provinces of Barcelona and Gerona. From the very start it was evident from the principles taught, that the movement was to educate a class of workmen hostile to the existing state of Society. In 1890 the schools passed through a serious crisis due to the open rebellion of local directors who declared themselves individually independent of the centre in Barcelona in order to gain the income from tuitions which were enriching the founder. From then on the lay schools entered upon a new period. They became affiliated in many instances with radical workingmen's centres and in general were supported by members of radical political clubs. Later on municipal, provincial and even state financial aid was secured. Their increase in number was rapid up to the time of their suppression in August of the present year.

An inspection of the text-books will make clear the nature of the teaching in these schools. A work fresh from the press, entitled "La Revolución de Julio en Barcelona" (J. Gili, Barcelona), by Modesto H. Villaescusa, a well-known and careful writer, gives us interesting and accurate information on this point. The books in use in La Escuela Moderna (The Modern School) of Barcelona will be our guide, as they may be taken as the standard of the books in use in the other schools. On page 7 of "Evolución super-orgánica (la Naturaleza y el Problema Social)," by Enrique Lloria, the child is told "that which the catechism calls creation" will be explained scientifically as "uncreated existence."

On page 37 of "Compendio de Historia Universal," by Clemencia Jacquinot, the pupil is instructed, "that it can be believed (se puede creer) that Jesus Christ was a Buddhist monk who, coming from Mount Carmel, devoted himself to preaching the religion of Buddha to the Jews." Pages 40 and 41 contain open blasphemies against "god" (sic). Page 46 tells the child that Christianity has always opposed the course of progress; that it has oppressed humanity by a false morality; that it is a vampire, thirsting for blood, to which millions of victims have been sacrificed. The child's love of country is taught in "Patriotismo y Colonización." On page 24 of this book, which is classed as a Third Reader, the right of the State to legislate and to punish is denied, while on page 84 love of country is called "a brutal lie." Page 80 informs the pupil that country, flag and family are but meaningless sounds. On page 71 military officers, ministers of state, and judges, are termed "men destitute of every human sentiment" and then to place the intellectual cap-stone upon the child's education, "Cuaderno manuscrito," page 182, informs the advanced pupil that assassination has ever been esteemed by human society. Education and Religion in Japan

Some time ago we ventured to call in question an assertion of President Hall of Clarke University, that education in Japan is unreligious. We are confirmed in our judgment by a new Japanese magazine, Yamato-damashii, The Spirit of Japan, of which the first number has come out. It is published under the auspices of the Military Education Society, and of the Shiyudan, devoted to the development of Bushido, of which Admiral-of-the-Fleet, Count Ito, General Viscount Terauchi, Minister of War, and General Count Nogi are leading members. Its object is to lead humanity to true happiness, and the first means it prescribes is the duty of improving one's condition of life by forming good habits, acquiring refined customs, and carrying out the divine will with unswerving faith. It gives an Imperial rescript which, enumerating the virtues on which the Empire is founded, exhorts all to practise them in imitation of their ancestors, thus to guard and maintain the prosperity of the imperial throne coeval with heaven and earth. We therefore ask again: "Is education in Japan unreligious?"

Subsidizing George Washington University

It is with pleasure that one notes the brave stand taken by Dr. James in regard to subsidizing the George Washington University as reported in our educational comments of this number. Identical bills introduced in the Senate and House providing for an appropriation to this private institution of the District of Columbia are sharply criticized by the President of the University of Illinois and their defeat is urged for a reason that will appeal to every lover of equal rights for all. As Dr. James argues, the bills, whilst apparently providing for the need of education in agriculture and the mechanical arts in the District of Columbia are practically an attempt to subsidize a private institution contrary to the policy of a century. Their passage, as he well says, would be a precedent on the part of the Federal Government favoring a division of the public funds among the private and sectarian institutions of the country. There are three other institutions of private character in Washington, each one of which is just as well entitled to such a Federal grant as George Washington University, the Catholic University of America, the Georgetown University conducted by the Jesuits, and the American University under the patronage of the Methodist Church. Will Congress be willing to deal justly with all these and, meting out equal rights to all, will its members be ready to vote a similar subsidy to these three institutions in case the grant be made to the George Washington?

Bishop Greer and the Rev. Henry R. Sargent

The Rev. Henry R. Sargent, recently a member of the Protestant Order of the Holy Cross, formally announced to Bishop Greer, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, his renunciation of the Protestant ministry. Bishop Greer officially deposed the ex-minister and sent the formal notice of the deposition to every bishop of his church. Thus the farce of Protestant Episcopal pretensions still holds the stage. Only the actors seem to be blind to the colossal eccentricity of the performance. To depose implies authority, and the possession of authority argues its derivation from some higher source. The mayor of a city, when newly installed, deposes and appoints, but he does so according to a municipal constitution which gives him the right. No recalcitrant body of citizens can elect another chief magistrate of a city and set up an independent government without becoming amenable to the law and its consequences. The Church has no less a corporate existence than the city or the state. The Church, if its right is challenged, should point to a constitution which as the matter deals with religion should come from Christ who alone has the right to set up a church and impose religious obligations. Where does Bishop Greer get the right to depose? Not from the Pope; because the Episcopal Church is clearly heretical and schismatical. Not from the Anglican Church, for the Anglican Church has long since disowned its headstrong daughter. If, however, Bishop Greer asserts that he gets his authority from the body over which he rules, then we have the anomalous situation of a religious body constituting itself and giving authority to itself without any warrant from Christ, one of whose chief motives in coming to redeem was to establish also a church with a visible head, his own representative and vice-regent upon earth.

When the Rev. Henry R. Sargent reads of his formal deposition by Bishop Greer, he may well exclaim: "Jesus I know and Paul I know, but who are ye?"

Stopping the Leaks.

There are still many districts in the South and West where Catholics have no priests. Georgia and the two Carolinas have in a population approaching six millions only 30,000 Catholics. These are mostly in the cities, and as priests are few and distances great, adequate visitation and supervision of the Catholic families that are sprinkled through town and hamlet is impossible. From twenty to thirty mission stations are often attached to one church, and the pastor and his assistant, if there is one, attend to them as best they can. The fewer the Catholics the more bigoted the people, whose ignorance of our religion and inherited prejudices remain undisturbed through lack of contact with the Church. The Catholic children have to attend their schools and grow up with such people, and the occasional visit of a priest is the only antidote. Hence it also becomes a portion of the priest's duty to enlighten non-Catholics by lectures or otherwise and thus imbue them with more kindly feelings towards the Church. For this men, time and money are needed, and so far all have been lacking.

The Georgia Knights of Columbus are helping to remedy the deficiency. On the motion of the State Deputy, Mr. P. H. Rice, of Augusta, they have agreed to maintain and defray the expenses of one missionary priest whose sole duty it will be to visit all neglected portions of the State. They have also assessed themselves to send "as a New Year's gift to our Right Reverend Bishop," a handsome contribution to the Missionary Fund, in charge of the Diocesan Chancellor, Rev. W. A. Mitchell of Savannah, and have agreed to forward through the Secretary of Councils such Catholic literature as they can spare to Father Mitchell for transmission to isolated districts with such information concerning scattered Catholics as they can ascertain.

A Chilean View of the Alsop Claim

Not excessively flattering to our national sense of self-respect is the best that can be said of the comments of the Chilean press on the action of the United States towards Chile in the affair of the Alsop Claim.

In the treaty of peace which followed the one-sided war between Chile and Bolivia, the victorious government bound itself to pay the debts of Bolivia to certain companies, and set aside $2,000,000 for the purpose. An offer of $500,000 to extinguish the Alsop claim was rejected by the company, which laid the matter before the arbitration court at Washington. The court decided that as the Alsop company was organized under Chilean laws and had its place of business in Chile, recourse should be had to the Chilean courts, but such action would not bar the plaintiffs from prosecuting their claim further through diplomatic means should they see fit.

The Alsop company, which was merely the assignee of the original claimant, one Lopez Gama, brought the matter before the Chilean courts. At the same time the heir of Lopez Gama brought suit to set aside the Alsop title on the ground that the transfer had been null and that the claim still formed a part of the Lopez Gama estate.

Before the judges had passed upon the merits of either case, Secretary Knox, who, the Chileans assert, has a pecuniary interest in the matter, directed U. S. Minister Dawson to exact from Chile a speedy settlement and indemnity fixed by Mr. Knox at $1,000,000.

Chile then urged the submission of the question to the Tribunal of the Hague. When the protocol was signed, Minister Dawson insisted in the name of the United States that Chile should explicitly renounce all right to plead res judicata at The Hague by bringing forward the decision of the Washington tribunal. To this the Chilean authorities refused to accede. Mr. Dawson then delivered an ultimatum giving Chile ten days within which to pay the million dollars, and betook himself to Buenos Aires.

Chile at once sent to all civilized nations an official note detailing the conduct of the United States. Thanks to the representatives of Great Britain and Brazil, the United States withdrew its ultimatum and suggested as arbitrator King Edward VII who was at once accepted by Chile. "Insatiable voracity of the colossus of the North," "strange imposition," and "contempt for the other countries of America," are some of the compliments showered upon us by the indignant Chileans. And thus disappear the favorable impressions produced by Secretary Elihu Root's memorable trip!

An Impasse

About two years ago the Royal Assent to an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland made honest what had before been abominable, the contracting of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, within the boundaries of the three Kingdoms. For some three hundred and fifty years these marriages had been in the eyes of English law abominable wherever contracted, but since 1906 there had been a change. The colonies, less scrupulous than the mother country, allowed them; and so, by the Colonial Marriage Act, those became honorable within the United Kingdom that had been contracted in the colonies provided the parties had a colonial domicile, while those attempted in any other way under the union-jack remained abominable. In August, 1907, a certain Mr. Banister, desirous of honorable wedlock, carried his late wife's sister to Canada, and on August 12 they were married in Montreal. Unfortunately they had not acquired the necessary domicile; and consequently their union was abominable. But on August 28 the King gave his assent to the new Act, which had retroactive force, and Mr. and Mrs. Banister found themselves on their return to England an honest couple.

The passage of this Act was for the ministers of the Establishment the occasion of much talk and writing to the papers. They argued, with what appeared excellent logic, that the Church of England could not be expected to change its teaching merely because the State had changed the law. Were the Church of England a teaching Church, this position would be unassailable. But they forgot that it reached its view in the matter not of itself by means of tradition, or the old canon-law, or the Church at large, or Pontifical decrees, but through the Civil Power. What this had imposed this could take away; and so their whole contention fell to the ground. Canon Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Banister's clergyman, thought, nevertheless, that he might act according to his principles. He was the readier to do so because the Act provided that no minister should be liable to any penalties for anything done or omitted in the performance of his office, to which he would not have been liable had the Act not been passed. Hence, when Mr. Banister, restored by the Act to sanctifying grace after sixteen days spent in abominable sin, presented himself in the parish church to receive communion, Canon Thompson rejected him as one included in the prayer-book's category of "an open and notorious evil liver."

To this Mr. Banister naturally demurred. Canon Thompson was welcome to his own private opinion in the matter. His Ordinary, the Bishop of Norwich, might back him up in it. But how could one be an evil liver when King, Lords and Commons had taken away his sin? And how could one be a notorious evil liver amongst those for whom the ecclesiastical conscience, or any other conscience for the matter of that, must be silent in presence of an Act of Parliament? Mr. Banister therefore took his grievance to the Court of the Arches, supposed to be the ecclesiastical court of the Province of Canterbury, and won his case. Canon Thompson was admonished to behave himself in future. Instead of doing so, he applied to the Court of the King's Bench for an order restraining the Dean of the Arches from proceeding farther in the case, and was refused. Against this refusal he turned to the Court of Appeal. Three judges heard the case. They rejected the appeal unanimously, condemning Canon Thompson to pay the costs. Each gave a carefully prepared judgment, and the three make profitable reading.

The Master of the Rolls, the presiding judge, laid down unblushingly that before the Act of 1907 the courts of England were bound to hold marriage with a deceased wife's sister to be forbidden by God's law. Nevertheless, he added, this designation was merely parliamentary. It expressed the view of parliament since the days of Henry VIII. As to whether it was really against God's law, no court in England had power to determine. For similar reasons the courts have been obliged to hold since 1907 that such a marriage is not forbidden by God's law since parliament can not be supposed to legislate in opposition to this law. Consequently a man and his deceased wife's sister are not held by English law to be violating the divine law by living together in matrimony since the Act of 1907. On the contrary, they would probably be considered as violating God's law, if, being legally married, they should through any scruple of conscience refuse to live together. Moreover, as a parishioner has a statutory right to receive communion, upon which he could base an action at common law, it is clear in this judge's mind that unless his evil living be such in the eye of the law, it can give no ground to his clergyman to repel him. Lord Justice Moulton, deriving the legal foundation of the relations between clergyman and parishioner from the legislature, said that these must be in conformity with actual facts, not with mere hypotheses, and Lord Justice Farwell expressed the same views.

All three judges swept aside contemptuously Canon Thompson's plea founded on the proviso in the Act, which by the laws of legal interpretation must be limited to the enacting clause. It allows a scrupulous clergyman to refuse to marry a man to his deceased wife's sister, but it does not allow him to treat the pair when married before the law, as not married, or as scandalous in their relations. Otherwise, under this proviso the clergyman would be able to marry the man to somebody else or treat the woman as a spinster, an absurdity no law could tolerate. Poor Canon Thompson, who deserves all our sympathy and all our prayers, writes a brief line to the London Church Times: "We now understand the Act of 1907. The State gives the law to the Church." It is something to understand. God grant that he and others like him may act according to their understanding.

Peace in Africa now seems to be secure. It is stated that as soon as prudence will permit the withdrawal of troops from Melilla those regiments composed mainly of reserves will be ordered to return to Spain. It is expected that about 20,000 men will remain in the Riff country to garrison the strong fortifications which are to be built in places of strategic importance to provide against future attacks by the Moors.

It is well known that the late Prince Charles-Theodore of Bavaria was the father of the wife of the new King Albert of Belgium, and also a physician of the highest order. What is perhaps not so well known is that his daughter was his most enthusiastic and intelligent pupil. This was strikingly confirmed by an incident that happened last summer. One of the soldiers on guard in the courtyard was overcome by the heat and fainted. In the confusion following nothing was done for the poor soldier until the Queen appeared on the scene. Immediately she took the insensible man in hand, gave the necessary orders, and alone and unaided brought him to, and probably saved his life.

LITERATURE

American Primitive Music. By FREDERICK R. BURTON. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co. 1909.

To the scientific musician this should prove a deeply interesting book; but it has an attraction for anyone acquainted with only the rudiments of the art. Mr. Burton, a well-known member of the first-class has devoted his attention chiefly to the music of the Ojibways as others have studied especially that of the tribes of the West and of the Pacific Coast. His discussion of the question of the quarter tones and of conflicting rhythms, seems to us eminently sane. That Indians continually use the quarter tones is unquestionable. The researches of Mr. Benjamin Ives Gilman in Hopi songs establish it. Moreover, if it be allowed to mingle little things with great, the reviewer spent his boyhood and youth on the Northwest Coast, and often tried to imitate the Indian songs. He had a good ear both for melody and tones, the phantasm of the songs was in his imagination, they were apparently simplicity itself; yet, try as he would, he could not reproduce them. The reason was the quarter tone. Can one conclude from the fact that the Indians have an adiatonic scale of their own, or in other words, that they produce these quarter tones and even smaller intervals regularly and of set purpose? Some think so. But this opinion assumes them to have an ear more delicate than we can conceive, and there is another explanation. Mr. Burton holds the phenomenon to be a sign not of a more perfect but of a less perfect ear and intonation, and supports his judgment with experimental arguments which seem to us to demonstrate it almost to a certainty. Again, those who would give to Indian music an excellent art, appeal to the conflict between the rhythm of the drum and of the song. For example, an Indian will sing in common time and beat a drum accompaniment in six-four time, omitting the first beat of every three; and in the Pawnee song, "The Boy Turned Into an Eagle," as recorded in the phonograph, it is impossible to express any numerical relation between the two. Here, Mr. Burton points out, the voice part has 48 beats; the drum only 35, and only once, on the nineteenth of the voice and the thirteenth of the drum are the beats coincident. Those who support the high art theory, must hold the Indian to be capable of appreciating rhythms imperceptible to us. The Indian's song is very short; he repeats it indefinitely. They assume that he will repeat it without change and maintain for any length of time the extraordinary disproportion between the two parts. Mr. Burton shows that the assumption is unfounded, that in trying to sing in a different rhythm to his drums the Indian is doing violence to himself and continually modifies the rhythm of his song. We who have our own idea of accompaniment, naturally ask why he does not change the drum rhythm. Mr. Burton answers most satisfactorily by pointing out that for the Indian the drum is no mere accompaniment. It gives the rhythm of the dance which is more to the Indian than his song. The song is for him the accompaniment to the dance; and when in his tribal dances that may not be changed he begins to sing, it is not superlative art, but a deficiency in art that allows him to attempt say a four-four song to a six-four step. Even when not dancing, he connects in his mind the drum with the dance and not with the song, and therefore gives the traditional beats.

From these examples one may judge how interesting are the discussions in Mr. Burton's book. He has added to its interest by including twenty-eight Ojibway songs for simple voice with pianoforte accompaniment and English words, and four others arranged for mixed quartette.

The Principles of Eloquence, Together with Examples Selected from the Works of the Most Famous Orators of Ancient and Modern Times. By NIKOLAUS SCHLEINIGER, S.J.

Translated from the sixth German Edition by JOSEPH SKELLON, formerly Master at Beaumont College. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co.; St. Louis: B. Herder.

Father Schleiniger is the author of several very good textbooks. Keeping to the classic divisions of his subject which Cicero and Quintillian knew, the Inventio, Dispositio and Elocutio; he has worked out upon this framework with much historical and literary illustration, a clear, practical and interesting treatise upon the general rules of rhetoric: "so that it may be of service to all students, and act as a foundation to such as intend to specialize in the art of oratory."

There are certain features of the book which will be welcome to professors and students of rhetoric among us. The brief and well-considered statements of principles, are supplemented by an abundance of apt example from orators of various tongues and times. The much abused "Topics," so useful, and so often neglected nowadays, receive a detailed and helpful treatment; and the sections dealing with the arrangement of the speech, and the arousing of the emotions are especially adequate. The use and distinction of figures, too, are given a quite lengthy treatment. The volume closes with one hundred and twenty pages of selections, in which the student may study more at large the principles of the text. The topography and make-up of the book are very good, but there are a few typographical errors. The definitions of contrary and contradictory propositions on page 34 are open to improvement, and the "Persecution of Verres" on page 51, and "Petitio principii," on page 366, are variations on the translator's manuscript. The work has been well translated, and its classic plan and breadth of treatment should make it useful to English and American as it has been for years to German students of eloquence.

Religiosi Juris Capita Selecta adumbravit RAPHAEL MOLITOR, O.S.B., Abbas S. Joseph in Guestfalia. Ratisbonae, Rome, New York and Cincinnati: Frederic Pustet.

This work, as its title indicates, is not a general treatise on the canon law of regulars, but rather a discussion of various important questions connected with that department of ecclesiastical jurisprudence. It is consequently, not a text book for seminaries, nor even a general reference book.

The author tells us in his preface that the questions he has chosen for discussion are, on the one hand, of the greatest importance and on the other, such as recent writers do not treat at all, or if they do so, only touch upon them rather than discuss them, and if they discuss them, do so with inaccuracy. When we discover that the main questions he treats are the elements of the religious profession, the constitutions of religious orders, and the diverse families of religious, we are rather surprised at the boldness of this statement in the preface. We think, on the contrary, that scarcely any canonical treatise on the Law of Regulars can be found which does not discuss these questions, though not all of them as exhaustively as does Dr. Molitor. As to the correctness or incorrectness of their treatment, that will remain a matter of controversy, as the questions at issue are not dogmas of the Church.

We do not wish to be understood as passing an unfavorable judgment upon this work. It has plainly been a labor of love to the author, and displays great erudition. The matters discussed are gone into in great detail, and this perhaps accounts for the impression of heaviness made upon the reader. Its most excellent quality is that on all controverted points the views of opponents are fairly stated, and whether or not the reader agrees with the conclusions of the Westphalian Abbot, he has before him a full statement of the controversy. The author is too chivalrous to attack straw men.

The reviewer could not discover plainly what the mind of the writer is on the question, whether Christ is the formal founder of the religious state? The impression is that he holds the affirmative view. He is on more common ground when he declares that the Church will never cease exhorting the faithful to practise the three evangelical counsels, nor will souls ever be wanting who will respond to her exhortation. (p. 2.)

Another interesting question discussed by him is whether the implicit contract between a regular and his Order is unilateral or bilateral? The authority of even a Suarez does not deter him from declaring that it is not a bilateral contract. (p. 80.)

In the much disputed question as to what constitutes the formal essence of solemn vows, the author declares that this solemnity is a certain privileged form of profession, approved by canon law, such that its observance gives the vows validity in the eyes of the Church and at the same time produces certain effects in the person making these vows. (p. 109.) This opinion is closer to that of Vasquez, Sanchez and Laymann than to that of Suarez and Wernz, or to the opinion of Valentia and the more recent Thomists. It is, of course, well to clothe all these opinions in technical language, but when all is said and done, the fact remains that those vows are solemn which the Church receives as such and to which she attaches certain effects, mostly of an incapacitating character.

On the question whether those members of strictly-called regular orders, who make only simple vows, are true religious, the author replies that while the answer must certainly be in the affirmative for the Jesuits, owing to the declaration of Gregory XIII (p. 171), yet, in his opinion, the same is not certain for the other regular orders, though he thinks it probably true for them also. (p. 175). We must say that his arguments have not shaken us in the opinion that it is as certain for the Benedictines and all other regulars as for the Jesuits.

His final treatise on Abbacies and Abbots is the most exhaustive in the book; indeed, it is the most complete we remember to have seen. It occupies some forty pages of the volume (pp. 389-527). The chronological list of papal constitutions he adds to his text is both interesting and illuminating. The bibliography appended to the work, while by no means exhaustive, is sufficiently full. But we have said enough to show that this book of the Benedictine abbot can be commended to all who are interested in the finer points of the Laws of Regulars.

The work is strongly bound and the printing is done with fine large type. If heavy black lettering were used, however, for marginal headings, it would not only improve the appearance of the pages, but also make it easier to find references in the volume.

The Christ of Promise in Homer, Hesiod, Vergil, Ovid, etc.
By VINCENT A. FITZ SIMON, M. D. New York: G. W. Dillingham Co.

This is an elaborate attempt to prove that the pagan poets of Greece and Rome were "Christians," belonged to a "Christian" cult, taught the truths and wrote the names of Christ everywhere in their verses and predicted His coming rather more definitely and extensively than the Scriptures. The immoralities of Ovid, Catullus, etc., were fullest in Christian meaning, being only a cloak to conceal the true import from the vulgar. So well did they hide their secret that it remained undiscovered for 2000 years till Mr. Fitz Simon pried out the magic cipher that unlocked it. By means of transmutation, transposition, transformation, alloyage and metaphor he finds the name or truth he wants whenever his purpose requires it. His system is far more effective than Ignatius Donnelly's, and could easily demonstrate that Bacon wrote Shakespeare—or vice versa.

The author is thoroughly acquainted with the Greek and Latin classics. His translations, though often strained to work out his point, are always elegant; and fanciful theory and illogical inference are buttressed by wide and varied knowledge. It is a pity that so much erudition is wasted in the fatuous attempt to prove the distorted remnants of the primal revelation, found in pagan tradition, more perfect than revelation itself.

Die Geschichte der scholastischen methode, Vol. I, by DR. MARTIN GRABMANN. St. Louis: Herder. $1.95.

This book is the first part of a history in three volumes of the Scholastic method. The first part discusses the various modern and frequently discordant views on Scholasticism, defines the true nature of the Scholastic method, and points out the sources and literature of its history. In the second part the author examines in detail the first germs and early growth of accurate technical terminology and systematic arrangement in the works of the Greek and Latin Fathers, and clears them from the charge of Platonism by pointing out the sober and eclectic use they made of philosophy to elucidate without changing the truths of revelation. Special attention is given to the use of dialectics, the relation between faith and reason, the systematic treatment of subjects, and the technicalities of terms and arrangement in the writings of St. Augustine, who had so preponderating an influence on Scholasticism. The third part treats of Boethius, "the last Roman and first Scholastic," his methods, his increased use of Aristotelian philosophy, and his influence on the medieval schools. The fourth part follows out the transmission and further development of Scholasticism from Boethius to St. Anselm. The last part, comprising eighty pages, is a detailed analysis of the thorough development of the Scholastic method by St. Anselm, as worked out in harmony with his basic principle, "Credo ut intelligam."

The volume before us is, we believe, the first history of its kind that attempts to take into consideration every thing bearing on the subject, published works as well as unpublished manuscripts. Besides an index of authors, and a second of topics, there is a third index giving a list of eighty-seven unpublished manuscripts used and cited. This extensive use of manuscripts not only casts a clearer light on the genesis of the Scholastic method, but has also led to a number of corrections and additions in the presentation of the subject. Hence, although much of its subject-matter lies within the field of the histories of dogma and of philosophy, nevertheless the book is a valuable contribution to apologetic literature. For surely, a consideration of the ideals and methods that led up to Scholasticism and ruled its progress, cannot fail to give a deeper insight into its nature and a higher appreciation of its rich mines of thought. Moreover, a history of the Scholastic method is a peculiar need of our time.

The first weapon against Modernism mentioned in the encyclical "Pascendi" is Scholastic theology. For it is a postulate of this error that the truths of Christianity lie beyond the field of intellectual thought and are to be dealt with solely according to man's subjective experience of union with God. Hence its violent opposition to Scholasticism. Nor are the accusations limited to any one phase or age of its progress: not even St. Paul escapes censure. The Fathers and Scholastics are charged with having corrupted Christ's doctrine by casting it into the mold of Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy, thus essentially transforming the religious truths of revelation into philosophic and historic truth.

A Memoir of W. E. H. Lecky. By His Wife. New York, London: Longmans, Green & Co.

This story of Mr. Lecky's life, character and works is compiled, mostly from the author's letters, with admirable taste and judgment. There was material at the biographer's disposal for an immense tome, but she has been able in 420 pages to give the reader a clear and comprehensive idea of Lecky as a man, historian, philosopher and statesman. This is a considerable achievement, for the contradictory religious and political views, apparent or real, contained in his books and speeches, were a puzzle to many of his time.

Brought up a rigid Protestant, his writings made him out a rationalist to some, a Catholic to others. An Irishman of anti-Irish family traditions and surroundings, he was a strong Home Ruler in his books and a violent Unionist in his speeches. An ardent admirer of Smith O'Brien and the '48 revolutionists, he abominated Parnell, the constitutionalist; and having triumphantly refuted Froude's slanders on Ireland, he denounced latter-day Nationalists after the manner of Froude, and with just as violent an animus. This was in his later years, but even then he would never retract a word of the more generous expressions of his youth, however embarrassing it was to have them quoted against him and to be refuted by himself.

Of a sympathetic as well as an independent nature, he was largely a man of books, and while he read or wrote he could "im-bue himself with the spirit" of the system he was studying, and "realize the feelings of those who believe in it." In 1860 he wrote from France: "The evidences of Christianity are irresistible, . . . it is a duty to seek for truth reverently, praying for the guidance of the Enlightening Spirit;" but his sympathy with his rationalistic studies made him seem to renounce Christianity. He could not realize the present as keenly as the past and with advancing years his views, religious and political, seem a reversion to the traditional prejudices of his class. But the book is well put together, and if it leaves the student in doubt as to Lecky's views on religion, politics and morals, it will be because the Memoir is a faithful picture of the subject. It reveals in just proportion the honesty, ability, erudition, literary power and marvelous industry, side by side with the variableness, inconsistency and dogmatism of William Hartpole Lecky.

"The Catholic Church and Science." London; by the Catholic Truth Society.

Under this title the Catholic Truth Society of London publishes a collection of eleven papers by Catholic writers of authority on topics of timely interest and importance. The first place in the collection is given to Father John Gerard, S. J., his subjects being: "Agnosticism," "Modern Science and Ancient Faith," "Science and Its Counterfeit" and "Some Scientific Inexactitudes." These are followed by a dissertation on "Pantheism," by William Matthews. "Reason and Instinct," "The Powers and Origin of the Soul" and "The Use of Reason" are treated by the Rev. P. M. Northcote. "Scientific Facts and Scientific Hypotheses" and "Some Debts Which Science Owes to Catholics" are the subjects of two lectures delivered by B. C. A. Windle, M. D., F.R.S., President of Queen's College, Cork—one to the Catholic Conference at Preston in 1907, and the other to the Catholic Young Men's Society in Cork. The closing article is "The Decline of Darwinism," by Walter Sweetman. To the general reader who is interested in the scientific controversies of the day, and who has not familiarized himself with the more technical works, this little volume will not only give pleasure, but will also be of practical service. In it he will find a ready answer to many of the difficulties which come up in his daily readings and conversations. As an offset to the numerous publications of the materialistic press which are rendering the maze of illogical speculation ever more bewildering, we heartily welcome every new effort on the part of those who know the truth and teach it.

The Sixth Reader in the De La Salle series by the Brothers of the Christian Schools (La Salle Bureau of Supplies, New York), is one of the best and most up-to-date collections we have seen, whether regarded from a literary or Catholic standpoint. The choicest of the old examples in prose and verse are included, but along with them are placed selections from Veuillot, Thurston, Canon Sheehan, Cardinals Moran and Gibbons, Archbishops Ryan, Ireland and Spalding, Bishop Doyle, Lord O'Hagan, Coppée, Pasteur, Horgan and others who look quite at home in classical company. There are two selections—among the finest in the set—from Sienkiewicz, an author who affords boundless opportunities to collectors of choice literary extracts. The Catholic tone that pervades this excellent collection enhances its literary value. It has a useful biographical appendix.

Famous Irishwomen, by KATHARINE C'MAHONEY (Lawrence Pub. Co., Lawrence, Mass.), and Some Famous Women, by LOUISE CREIGHTON (Longmans, Green & Co.), are two highly interesting sets of biographies. Each supplements the other, but neither exhausts the subject—what volume could? Mrs. Creighton's twelve heroines, in 200 pages, are all English with the exception of Bl. Jeanne d'Arc, whom, as well as St. Hilda, she treats with fairness and sympathy. That the author is a Protestant appears rather in the selection of the remaining characters than in her treatment of them. She completes the set with Queen Victoria and writes of her as a good Englishwoman should.

Miss O'Mahoney in an equal space covers a wider and more varied field. The daughters of Erin, in pagan and Christian days and in many lands, who were renowned for religious zeal, patriotism, art, beauty, literary achievement or social accomplishment, are spread before us in fascinating array. Their deeds are told succinctly and accurately, and of the hundred or more there are only a few who were not as good as they were famous. Both books are handsomely illustrated and well worth reading.

Ensayo para reducir la era Gregoriana a la Azteca por CAMILO CRIVELLI, S. J. Mexico: Museo Nacional d Arqueologia, Historia y Etnologia.

This monograph on the ancient Aztec calendar is a monument to the industry and vast erudition of the distinguished author, who brings to his work the energy of youth and the judiciousness of mature age. The Aztec cycle counted fifty-two years, divided into eighteen months of twenty days each; at the end of the year, corresponding to our February 23, five intercalary days were introduced, which number was increased from time to time as in our leap years. Each one of the twenty days had its distinct name and hieroglyphic. For example, the fifth of each month was the snake day, the eighth was the rabbit day, the eleventh was the monkey day, and so on to the twentieth, which was the flower day. The day of twenty-four hours was divided into sixteen parts, eight of darkness and eight of light, and these were further subdivided into what roughly correspond to our hours and minutes.

Following the rules for reducing the Gregorian calendar to the Aztec are elaborate tables illustrating their application.

The Sacred Ceremonies of Low Mass. By FELIX ZUALDI, C.M. Edited with additions by M. O'CALLAGHAN, C.M. Seventh edition. New York: Benziger Bros.

This is a very careful little manual, and is evidently popular, despite a somewhat excessive price. Perhaps chapter VII. might have been given the title, "Inclinations" instead of "Bows," with the division, the profound inclination, the moderate inclination, and the simple inclination, or bow. The reason is, that some writers again divide the bow into three classes, with this practical consequence, that many of the clergy, getting rusty with regard to rubrics, seem to confound the two classifications, and so never make a profound inclination. They are more likely to correct their error if they see the more striking word, inclination, which, after all, is that of the rubrics. The book is so small that it may lie on one's table, and so clear that it can be read with pleasure. It has a highly practical index.

Revue Hispanique dirigé par R. FOULCHÉ-DELBOSC. Tome XIX. New York: The Hispanic Society of America.

Among the articles which claim special notice is one by Juan Menendez Pidal on a visit to the ruined monastery of San Pedro de Cardena. Ten fine plates bring out the fruit of his researches. Rafael Salillas gives the description and history of the "garrote," the ordinary means of inflicting the death penalty in Spain. A series of snap-shots shows its use in executing Angiolillo, the murderer of Cánovas del Castillo in 1897.

Bibliographie Hispanique, 1906, par R. FOULCHÉ-DELBOSC. New York: The Hispanic Society of America. $1.30 postpaid.

Nearly three thousand titles with a supplement of five hundred others bring together in convenient arrangement one year's output of books and articles on Spanish and Spanish-American subjects. The widespread interest in these topics is proof of the important position that they hold with the reading and thinking public. Spanish-American persons and places are particularly well represented.

Catalogue of Publications. New York: The Hispanic Society of America.

Over seventy numbers, chiefly of old, rare and almost unknown editions reproduced in facsimile, are placed within the reach of the lover of early Spanish and Portuguese literature. A Spanish primer of 1606 has an honored place. The Society also offers a work in English on recent discovery and exploratory labors in the Titicaca region of Bolivia.

Stundenbilder der philosophischen Propädeutik, I. Psychologie, by PETER VOET, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder, price $2.15.

These sixty "stundenbilder" on psychology are not intended to serve as model lectures for the class-room, but they present in methodical arrangement and with great clearness a copious amount of matter on the subject. Without omitting any of the essential features of the works on Scholastic Psychology, the author is comparatively brief in the metaphysical discussions of Rational Psychology and devotes the greater part of his book to Empirical Psychology. In this part especially are the features that recommend the book. With great care the author drew from the natural sciences, in particular from Physics, Physiology and Psychophysics, whatever seemed best adapted to throw more light on the problems of Empirical Psychology. The book will be welcomed by teachers who wish to explain more fully or supplement to the matter of their text book; nor will it be uninteresting for the educated reader to see how the recent developments of natural science are set in accord with Scholastic Psychology. The "Life of St. Ignatius," by Francis Thompson, appeared in England on December 10. The Benzigers will issue it during the week on this side of the Atlantic. The English notices of the new biography are enthusiastic. The Catholic World for January contains a long appreciation by Wilfrid Wilberforce. The concluding lines of what the Liverpool Catholic Times designates "the most attractive story of a most attractive, stimulating, thought-compelling and love-beguiling character and career," are furnished us by that paper. The biographer has been referring to the legacy of St. Ignatius to his Order, namely that all men might speak ill of it. "Most singular bequest that Founder ever transmitted, it has singularly been fulfilled," he says. "The union of energy and patience, sagacity and a self-devotion which held nothing impossible that was bidden it, were the leading qualities of St. Ignatius; and, in so far as his Order has prospered, it has been because it incarnated the qualities of its Founder. The administrative genius which, among the princes of Europe or the 'untutored mind' of Paraguay, is perhaps its most striking secular feature, comes to it direct from the man who might have ruled provinces in the greatest empire of the sixteenth century, but chose rather to rule from the altars of the Church an army which has outlasted the armies of Spain, and made conquests more perdurable than the vast empire which drifted to its fall in the wake of the broken galleons of the Armada."

We have received from Messrs. Doubleday, Page & Co., New York, two of their holiday publications that came too late for inclusion in our list of Christmas books. Since both are short stories that will be interesting at all times, no notice of them can properly be belated. Grace S. Richmond's delightful little tale, "On Christmas Day in the Morning," presented in decorated celluloid covers, with illustrations and ornamental borders for the pages, would make a pleasant gift at any Christmas-tide. It is a story of parental love and filial affection, very convincing in its realism and yet as light and happy as a fairy-tale. The other short story, similarly got up, is "Putting on the Screws," by Gouverneur Morris. It, too, is a fairy-tale, mixed with realism, of an eccentric aunt, who first tested the generosity of her nephew and then rewarded him in the nick of time with money and lands.

The Catholic World in its current number contains a long and valuable article, by Thomas F. Meehan, on the American branch of the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul. The centenary of the founding of this useful and self-sacrificing sisterhood in 1809, by Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton, makes Mr. Meehan's essay timely, and his rapid sketch of the foundress's life, the beginnings of the Institute, and its swift growth and success forms a story of lively interest.

At the meeting of the American Historical Association held in New York on December 28, Professor Camille Enlart, of Paris, spoke of the extensive and painstaking work of his native country in historical research. Part of his address dealt with the elaborate productions of the Capuchins and the Benedictines in earlier times.

EDUCATION

That Catholics do not stand alone in their criticism of the trend toward rationalism and infidelity in many of the universities of our country is becoming daily more evident. AMERICA quoted recently the strong protest occurring in the report of the board of Home Missions to the Evangelical Lutheran Association, convened in Minneapolis. From Chicago there comes a similar earnest protest. The Rev. Johnston Myers, a preacher of repute among the Baptists of that city, and pastor of the principal church of that sect, has written a pamphlet attacking the Chicago University, originally financed to be the Baptist university of the Northwest. In the pamphlet the minister claims to show how the university is posing as something it is not, and how it has done this since it was founded. He finds the university harboring atheistic professors, and proves his contention by extracts from lectures and writings of members of the university faculty, "which, after all," he affirms, "are my strongest weapons." Certain well-known men are mentioned by name and charged with the taint of unchristian teaching, and the whole divinity school of the university is held to be open to sharp rebuke, "for all its members have broken away from the orthodox Baptist beliefs to the attitude of freedom of religious conviction."

The change foreshadowed in the recent address of President Lowell, of Harvard, has already been introduced, and henceforth in Harvard "the specialist will be required to broaden out and the student in pursuit of 'snap' courses will be required to concentrate his work." The rule of extreme electivism in studies is to yield to the principle of modified prescribed studies with the incoming of the Freshman class of 1910. Following recommendations made by a committee of which President Lowell is chairman, the branches of study in the arts and sciences department are divided into four groups, the first including languages, literature, fine arts and music; the second, natural sciences; the third, history, political and social sciences, and the fourth group, philosophy and mathematics. Beginning with 1910, each student matriculating in the department shall take at least six courses in some one group, and shall distribute at least six of his courses among the three groups in which his chief work does not lie. The principle of "vocational" direction is recognized in the new scheme by the appointment of a committee to advise and counsel the students in the preparation of the plan of study which they may wish to follow during their college course.

The Intercollegiate Athletic Association of the United States met at the Murray Hill Hotel, in New York City, during the Christmas holidays. More than one hundred delegates, representing the principal colleges of the country, were in attendance. College professors, football coaches, former players and athletic directors made up the number, and as one of the speakers expressed it, "no more representative meeting has ever been held in the interest of clean intercollegiate sports." It was this association which, four years ago, took a decided stand for reform in football, and from the vigorous protest of the delegates in this fourth annual meeting of the association when American college football was put on the grill, it was apparent that many of them were strongly opposed to the continuance of football in its present form. The dangers of the game as played to-day were pointed out, and the sentiment was common that the revision of the rules must be thorough or the game must cease. Even one life was too much to pay for football, is the way in which the Chancellor of Syracuse worded his protest.

One notes with approval an excellent article in The Dial, in which a bit of meddlesome legislation, such as is common enough in this day of paternalistic tendency, is very properly scored. It appears that the Illinois legislature at its last session imposed on all the teachers in the state the obligation to devote half an hour each week to the inculcation of ideas concerning the humane treatment of the lower animals. The Dial article, after a keen showing of the chaos such a law would bring into public school teaching, couched as it is in terms which make it binding upon every teacher engaged in school work in the state from kindergarten grades to the highest State University classess, adds this pungent word: "Its absurdity is so manifest that we cannot believe that it will remain long unrepealed, or at the very least unmodified in its terms. It is, in its existing form, a singularly vicious example of the sort of legislative tinkering with education that works mischief wherever it is attempted."

Senator Gallinger, of New Hampshire, and Representative Boutell, of Illinois, have introduced identical bills in the Senate and House providing for a grant of money to the District of Columbia equal to the annual appropriations made to the various States and Territories for the promotion of agricultural and mechanical arts, and assigning the appropriation to George Washington University. Under cover of providing for the need of education in agriculture and the mechanical arts in the District, the bills really indicate the beginning of a policy to support a private institution in the District by the Federal treasury. Dr. Edmund James, President of the University of Illinois, has forwarded to Washington a spirited and plainly-worded protest against the pending bills, in which he urges those who share his views in opposition to Federal support of private institutions to bestir themselves to defeat the appropriation.

In an address to a gathering of teachers at Teachers' College, Columbia University, last week, President Schurman, of Cornell University, spoke wisely on the topic of manual training in schools. "Educators," he said, "realize the inadvisability of too much specialization and the disadvantage of putting young children into exclusively manual classes. Every system of education exists primarily to develop the mind and character of the child, and industrial training should come after that. The problem of industrial education is here, it is true, and it has come to stay, and we must find a solution. But the solution is not to be found in the effort to make of the boy a finished workman. The schools were not and are not intended to be rivals of the shops."

Reform of existing programs of study, along conservative lines, is a constantly growing sentiment just now. In its convention last week in Syracuse, the New York State Association of Teachers declared that the program of high-school work was too crowded for efficient work, and noted the source of the defect. In the meeting of the Associated Academic Principals one of the speakers protested against requiring in the high schools studies which are of use only to students who are afterwards to enter college, whereas a comparatively few can go beyond the high school.

A diploma and gold medal, the highest award bestowed on educational work at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition was conferred on the schools of the Sisters of the Holy Name, Washington. They made a complete exhibit of every class of school work, from the kindergarten to the advanced program of the normal student.

For education New York paid $14,479,961 in 1907; Chicago, $1,716,901, and Philadelphia, $1,183,341. For recreation New York's bill was $2,384,443; Chicago's, $2,568,905; Philadelphia's, $322,183. New York paid for highways, $19,881,606; Chicago, $4,271,978, and Philadelphia, $3,506,330.

ECONOMICS.

Modern progress, which has revolutionized so much of the world's public and private life, has thus far failed to dislodge the camel from the position which it has held against all competition for a period going back to the twilight of history. When the ungainly beast was first brought into servitude to man nobody can say. Though the elephant has long been domesticated there are still wild elephants, and from those roaming herds the supply on hand is kept up, for the elephant does not breed in captivity. But no writer can indicate even approximately the time when wild camels wandered at will, with no knowledge and no memory of subjection to man. The Spaniards now waging war in Morocco, a country where water and forage are scarce, use camels for transporting supplies, just as has been done for unnumbered centuries. Turkey, Persia and British India have their camel corps for carrying camp equipage and military stores, and even light artillery. General Gordon's camel corps in the Egyptian Soudan showed that the ship of the desert could be profitably utilized not only for freight service but also for mounted troops, explorers and couriers. On one occasion he made eighty miles on camel-back in thirty-six hours without a halt for food, water or rest. The French have a similar corps in Algiers. The camels have been carefully selected and bred for fleetness, and show a notable improvement over their less speedy brethren. The record is held by one which travelled 150 miles in twenty-six hours. In case of need they can travel twenty hours a day for four days in succession at a rate of three miles an hour. In winter they easily pass a week without drinking, but in summer they need water at least every four days. Unlike most ruminants, they have front teeth in the upper jaw, thus being able to bite off branches, even of brambles and thorns, which make no impression on their tough, leathery lips. Sixty years ago the United States Government made an expensive importation of camels for use in the dry Western country, but as nobody understood their management, the venture failed completely. Many of the animals died and the survivors were turned loose to shift for themselves. They must have perished long ago.

The manufacture of veneers is growing fast. In 1904 it was found in only 20 states, of which the most important were Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin. In 1908 34 states had factories, and the leading producers were Florida, Illinois, Indiana and Tennessee. The woods used in 1908 measured 382,542,000 feet log scale, 34,000,000 feet more than in 1907, and their value was $7,891,431. The principal domestic woods used were red gum, yellow pine, cottonwood, maple, yellow poplar, white oak, birch, tupelo, elm and basswood. The veneers manufactured of foreign woods were almost all mahogany and Spanish cedar.

The value of cotton exported during November, 1909, was $79,000,000, against $62,900,000 for November, 1908. The actual quantity exported was 552 million pounds in 1909 against 691 million pounds in 1908. The price of cotton was, in November, 1908, only 9.1 cents a pound; last November it was 14.3 cents a pound. This is an example of how increased prices swell the trade returns. It is, of course, an extreme case. Notwithstanding generally higher prices the value of food stuffs exported is lower for the eleven months ended in November than in the same period of 1908.

Nearly one-half the exports of the United States are to Great Britain and its dependencies, whence comes nearly one-third of its imports. For the ten months of 1909 ended October, the total foreign trade of the United States was about two and one-half billions; the trade with the British Empire was nearly a billion. The trade with Germany during the same time was only 318 millions; with France, 206 millions, and with Holland, 110 millions. The trade with the colonies of each of these nations is included in these figures.

The Secretary of Agriculture has begun an investigation into the increased and increasing cost of food. His object is to discover who is getting the benefit of the higher prices paid by consumers: the farmer, the middleman or the retailer. He looked into the cost of meat lately and found the retailers selling at a price that averaged 38 per cent. more than they paid the wholesale butchers, and in some cases at an advance of 68 per cent.

Some interesting comparisons between the different cities of the United States are contained in the bulletin of the Census Bureau, based on figures for 1907. New York's real and personal property in 1907 was assessed at $7,796,175,039, Chicago's at $477,921,976, and Philadelphia's at $1,287,287,123. New York levied in taxes on all property $106,751,890, Chicago $32,679,091, and Philadelphia $18,855,433.

SOCIOLOGY

Two points were strongly insisted upon at the annual meeting of the National Civic Federation, held in New York lately. One was the necessity of better means for the prevention of accidents to workmen; and the other, an amendment of the present Employers' Liability Laws to provide, in case of such accidents, for compensation. A committee has been appointed to investigate mining accidents. It consists of Mr. John Hays Hammond, Mr. John Mitchell, former President of the United Mine Workers of America; Mr. Samuel Mather, an owner of iron mines; Mr. James Elliott, President of the Southwestern Interstate Coal Operators' Association; Dr. J. A. Holmes, Mining Expert of the U. S. Geological Survey, and Mr. G. W. Brunton, President of the American Institute of Mining Engineers. A committee for considering the two points in general has also been appointed, of which Mr. George W. Perkins is chairman.

Commenting on the recently published report of the United States Immigration Commission, which places France as first among the nations as an exporter of white slaves, the Matin says: "The Government of France must act. This is a question of humanity and national honor. The report disgraces us as a nation and this Government must begin negotiations with the United States immediately to crush the traffic." Whilst sounding this call to action the Matin lauds France as the most decent country on the globe, one where home life and virtue are beautifully exemplified, and it deprecates a scandal which has given her abroad the reputation of being the centre of depravity.

Five years ago co-operative societies were begun in India by the passage of the Cooperative Societies Act. There are now 2,000 such societies, with 185,000 members and a capital of £500,000. The ordinary type is the village bank of fifty to one hundred members who, knowing each other's character, needs and resources, are able to make loans with the minimum of risk. Moreover, the administration of the bank is unpaid, hence the rates of interest are very low. These societies have been very successful in freeing the land from old debts and mortgages.

Messrs. Workman, Clarke & Co., Belfast, launched during the year sixteen steamers of 88,952 aggregate tonnage, and 76,550 indicated h. p. The best previous year was 1892, with 74,497 tonnage, and 46,900 h. p.

SCIENCE

Last summer Dr. T. G. Longstaff, with Dr. Neve and Lieutenant Slingsby, explored the Himalayas in Cashmere. The Royal Geographical Society has published some results of the expedition. They crossed the Saltoro pass in the Karakoram Range, a feat not recorded of any European or native. The pass is about half way between the Karakoram Pass and the Muztagh, explored by Younghusband, at an elevation of 18,200 feet. They discovered that the Siachen or Saichar Glacier, instead of being 20 miles long, is more than 44, and therefore is probably the largest outside Alaska and the Polar regions, the Niytchek of the Tian Shan coming next; that it does not, as was thought, drain northward into the Yarkand, but southward into the Indus; and that the watershed of these rivers must therefore be put twenty miles north of its present place on the map in a chain of mountains hitherto not shown. They report that this chain contains a group of lofty peaks, the chief of which, Teram Kangri (longitude 77 degrees, latitude 35 degrees 30 minutes) is, according to their measurements, 27,610 feet high, which makes it fifth of the Himalayas in order of altitude.

That the violet, and the ultra-violet rays of the spectrum possess germicidal properties, was demonstrated as far back as the eighties by Englemann. By means of a micro-spectral objective of his own invention he focussed a pencil of rays of every color of the spectrum, on a preparation of bacteria, to find that the bacteria which up to that time had been distributed haphazard through the preparation, deserted the violet end, to crowd themselves in the red and infra-red of the spectrum. The explanations of this preference have been various. The most recent theory, however, is that of Kernbaum, who claims that the ultra-violet rays, chemical in constitution, when acting on water forms hydrogen peroxide, a powerful antiseptic agent. His observations have been corroborated by Thiele and Schoene.

The increasing demand for radium has brought into existence the Radium Institute of America. Its scope differs slightly from that of the Society established a few months ago in England. That of the American Institute is to search for ores yielding the precious salts. Pitchblende and carnotite are found in American mines, and it is possible that other minerals may be discovered which contain enough radium to insure profitable separation. It will also examine the waters giving off radio-active radiations, to learn whether they have any special medical properties. The institute will have its headquarters in New York, with Prof. C. F. Chandler as President.

The United States surpasses all Europe in the manufacture of paper, its production amounting to 1,330,000 tons per annum. Germany produces 425,000 tons; England, 260,000 tons; France, 190,000 tons; Austria, 155,000 tons, and Italy 120,000 tons. The large consumption in the United States is attributed to the manifold uses to which paper has been put of late years. It is now employed for roofing, garments, bottles, grain bags and horseshoes. An attempt has been made to reinforce paper with steel wire, which, if successful, will permit of its use in the construction of ships, of automobiles and other vehicles.

A vest-pocket receiver for wireless telegraphy has been invented by an Italian savant, Monsignor Cerebotani. By means of it one can receive a message from points within a radius of from twenty to thirty miles. A bobbin of wire when unrolled and affixed to the highest point within reach is an antenna. The deciphering of the code is not unlike the system of Breguet. It is expected that this instrument will be of great value for military purposes.

Prof. Heinrich Bergesell, selected by the Emperor of Germany to conduct an airship expedition to the North Pole, has made his plans public. The expedition is to be undertaken during the summer of 1911. The trip will be made in a great airship of the Zeppelin type, with such improvements as experience may suggest during the intervening time. The ship will have a complete wireless apparatus. Ten or fifteen men will constitute the crew, and will be, for the most part, men of scientific repute.

Count Zeppelin has received official notice from the German War Office that his airship, Zeppelin III, will not be purchased by the government. The reason given is that the number of technical improvements in the construction of airships, especially the employment of the new lighter-than-aluminum metal, discovered lately in Germany, and already referred to in AMERICA, are such as put the Zeppelin III out of date.

Richard Sherle, a German engineer, has invented a gyrostatic railroad-car which, it is claimed, outrivals the Brennan car. A public demonstration of the new invention will soon be given in this country.

The first aviation meet in America will be held at Los Angeles, Cal., from January 10th to 20th. The prizes offered are as follows: $4,500 for aeroplane contests, $22,500 for long-distance balloon races, and $13,500 for dirigible balloon contests. It is expected that all foreign nations will be represented in this meet.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Penelope," Lyceum Theatre—A comedy remotely akin to "What Every Woman Knows," inasmuch as it shows that a little common sense applied judiciously proves to be an effective way of bringing a foolish husband to his senses. It lacks, however, both the sanity and the forcible moral of Barrie's play, and has the additional defect of depicting the marital state not only with a certain flippancy but with a disregard of its fundamental verity. Though the play has no serious intent, it strikes a discordant note, for a false ethical principle is not tolerable even in the properly superficial character of a comedy. A woman who would connive, even in pretence, at her husband's infidelity, has no justification in the ultimate purpose of winning him back by such means. Here is not only false ethics, but a false situation forced by the playwright with scant regard to the truth of nature or the principle of morality. The fact that "Penelope" is merely a comedy is no extenuation for a violation of the verities.

"The Lily," Belasco-Stuyvesant Theatre—A shameless play, openly advocating the doctrine of free love. It is an adaptation, for which Mr. Belasco stands sponsor, from a French original, "Le Lis," and offensive beyond words to all right-minded people. A specific denunciation of "The Lilly"—the very title is a mockery—by our public leaders would do much towards rousing the conscience of this community to a realization of the insult which has been put upon it.

"The School for Scandal," The New Theatre—The management of The New Theatre is living up to its promises. It has not only produced new plays but old plays of a classical type. Sheridan's "School for Scandal," a comedy of the eighteenth century, still carries sufficient interest for a twentieth century audience, for scandal is a human failing still in vogue, and the shaft of Sheridan's satire finds its bull's-eye in modern society as truly as in that of the days of the Georges. We cannot but applaud this first adventure of The New Theatre Stock Company into a field which puts its histrionic skill to a considerable test. While the ordeal was well borne it was not, however, triumphant. Criticism in such an instance should be tempered with the consideration that a new enterprise necessarily has the limitations of its own novelty and the handicap of a brief experience. Sheridan's "School for Scandal" is a highly artificial satire of a highly artificial society. It is pitched in a falsetto key. The chief defect in The New Theatre Company's interpretation was the failure to appreciate this fact. Sheridan was not only satirizing a social condition, which was all fustian and veneer, but he did it after its own fashion in the affected manner of the times. He himself was as artificial as the scene he describes, and he portrays his types as superficially as they themselves existed, and satirized their follies as lightly as they themselves indulged them. The levity is not in them merely, but in him as well. "The School for Scandal" is all on the surface and that is hard and polished; it has no serious human note, not even in the famous screen scene, the only place where it barely touches the deeper side of humanity. Lady Teazle's dilemma does not in the least affect us, and Sir Peter's outraged manhood is, after all, of little concern either to the audience or to the author. The dominant note of the comedy is a keen and sparkling brilliancy, holding the scandal monger up to ridicule with a jest and a smile. The moral attitude is but a pose, a bit of affectation as stilted and as bare-faced as Joseph Surface's platitudes upon virtue. The failure to realize this no doubt put The New Theatre Company at a disadvantage; for misconceiving the spirit of the dramatist they missed the essential character of his drama. They modernized it by injecting a twentieth century interpretation which did much towards dispiriting it and took not a little of the sparkle out of the champagne.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The dedication, on December 30, of the new Chapel of the Holy Family of St. Elizabeth's College, Convent Station, marked the beginning of the jubilee commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the founding in New Jersey of the Sisters of Charity. The story of the marvelous development of this branch of Mother Seton's Sisters was told in the last issue of AMERICA. The services attending the dedication were very impressive. The celebrant at the Solemn High Mass was Mgr. Isaac P. Whelan, rector of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Newark, assisted by the Rev. John P. Callaghan, deacon, and the Rev. Eugene P. Carroll, subdeacon. The Rt. Rev. John J. O'Connor, D.D., Bishop of Newark, presided in the sanctuary, having as deacons of honor the Rev. J. M. Nardiello and the Rev. M. P. O'Connor. The Rev. Charles Smith, Chancellor of the Newark diocese, was master of ceremonies. Within the sanctuary were the Rt. Rev. James A. McFaul, Bishop of Trenton; the Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Hickey, Bishop of Rochester; the Rt. Rev. Mgr. John A. Sheppard, V.G., Mgr. J. M. Flynn, Mgr. Charles J. Kelly, of the Diocese of Newark; the Rt. Rev. Mgr. John A. O'Grady, Mgr. B. T. O'Connell and Mgr. John F. Brady, of the Diocese of Trenton; Very Rev. Dean McNulty, of Paterson; Very Rev. James F. Mooney, of Seton Hall; the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Francis H. Wall, of New York; Very Rev. Joseph F. Hanselman, S.J., Provincial of the Jesuits, and his Socius, the Rev. Joseph Rockwell, S.J. More than one hundred and fifty members of the clergy, secular and regular, from many dioceses and various religious orders, Dominicans, Passionists, Redemptorists, besides representatives from the other branches of the Sisters of Charity, from New York and Cincinnati, from Emmitsburg and Halifax and Greenburg, in Western Pennsylvania, all came to honor the occasion with their presence. Bishop O'Connor, in his sermon, said there was an appropriateness in the celebration during Christmastide; when the Gloria in Excelsis of the angels was calling men to praise God in the highest it was fitting that a new temple should be dedicated to the worship of the Almighty. A happy coincidence was the golden anniversary of the founding of the Sisters of Charity in the diocese and the jubilee of the Rev. Mother Xavier, whom the Lord had spared during fifty years to watch over the growth and expansion of the Sisterhood. He reviewed with sympathetic detail the early labors in Sussex and Morris counties of the pioneer priest who later became the Bishop of Rochester, the Rt. Rev. Bernard McQuaid, and to his zeal and co-operation in days of struggle and distress he attributed in great part the full development into the immense agency for good which to-day is seen in the manifold religious activities of the Newark Sisters of Charity in their mother diocese and in other parts of the country. He concluded by invoking a fervent blessing on the Sisterhood and on the many educational and charitable institutions under their care.

Five thousand members of the Holy Name Society attended Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, on New Year's Day. The various branches of the Society in the city were all represented. Banners were carried and the Cathedral band led the way. There were so many men that for once the women were practically shut out. The Rev. E. M. Sweeney preached the sermon and His Grace, Archbishop Farley, gave the blessing at the end of the solemn high Mass.

The Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, the only religious congregation native to Louisiana, have removed the mother-house from Labadieville, where it was founded in 1875, to New Orleans. The first religious reception took place in their new home December 27, when Archbishop Blenk, assisted by the principal clergy of New Orleans, received three young ladies of that city into the congregation.

For the first time in a number of years the Catholic societies of Philadelphia were obliged to omit the customary visit to the Cathedral rectory and reception on New Year's day, owing to the illness of Archbishop Ryan.

Bishop McGolrick, of Duluth, was given a reception, in the Cathedral auditorium at Duluth, on December 27, in honor of the twentieth anniversary of his consecration. A purse of $7,000, which was presented to him, he at once gave to the fund for a new orphan asylum. The celebration opened with a Pontifical Mass, at which Bishop Schinner preached.

Bishop O'Reilly, of Baker City, Oregon, has been informed that the Revs. Thomas Dowling and Luke Sheehan, of the Irish Capuchins, will shortly visit the diocese with the view of establishing themselves in a newly opened district where the prospects for Catholic settlers are very advantageous. The Irish Capuchins so far have no house of their Order in the United States.

On Christmas eve the Penobscot Indians of Indian Island, Old Town, Maine, following the old custom, all assembled at Midnight Mass, at which the younger Indians composed the choir, and an Indian orchestra played the music.

Much substantial progress is shown in the record of the past year in the Diocese of Green Bay. Five new churches were blessed, five priests, and twenty-two deacons ordained, six new churches and schools are ready to be opened, and there were 5,232 confirmations, among them several hundred converts.

PERSONAL

No name is better known or more beloved than that of Father Albert Lacombe, whose sixtieth year as a missionary was celebrated last September. He entered the Congregation of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate as a young secular priest and immediately became a missionary in the Canadian Northwest. Though now well over eighty years of age, he is still in full possession of his faculties and is a living and most interesting witness of the passage of that vast region from a wilderness haunted by conflicting Indian tribes to a busy mart of flourishing commerce and still more flourishing agriculture. The story of Father Lacombe's life is more thrilling than any romance, although incidents therein have been utilized by many a writer of more or less historical tales in magazines of comparatively recent issue. How he braved death in battles between savage tribes, winning the confidence and admiration of both the opposing forces, how he saved the Canadian Pacific Railway from the intended destruction by hostile savages of its newly constructed line through the Blackfeet country, how the rising town of Calgary waited up all night, in 1885, to hear and welcome him as he came back from a conference with powerful Indian chiefs, who agreed, at his request, not to attack the then helpless whites; all these and many more great deeds will be told some day as the most important events in the early history of Alberta and Saskatchewan and regions farther north. More than half a century has now elapsed since the now venerable Vicar General accompanied the illustrious Bishop Taché from the Lac Ste. Anne Mission to Fort Edmonton, now the city of Edmonton, the capital of the Province of Alberta. On the way thither Bishop Taché planted a stick in the snow-covered prairie and chose this spot as the site of the present episcopal see of St. Albert, a name which the eminent prelate chose because of the baptismal name of his young priestly companion. Fifty years ago the Grey Nuns arrived there, and the anniversary of their foundation, coinciding with Father Lacombe's sixty years of missionary life, was one of the great events of the year.

The Episcopal jubilee of Rt. Rev. Dr. Brownrigg, Bishop of Ossory, was celebrated at St. Mary's Cathedral, Kilkenny, December 17. Most Rev. Dr. Healy, Archbishop of Tuam, who preached the sermon, said that Bishop Brownrigg had successfully filled the place that was vacated by one of the most illustrious prelates of the Church, the present Primate of Australia, Cardinal Moran. As a church-builder and ardent patron of St. Kieran's College, and other diocesan institutes, Dr. Brownrigg had advanced the cause of religion and education, while his gentle manners, kindness of heart and prudent patriotism had won the affection of his clergy and people. Presentations of addresses and gifts were made at St. Kieran's College, Kilkenny, by all the societies and corporate bodies of the diocese. In reply his lordship said that the County Councils by their intelligent conduct of affairs had proved their fitness for self-government; that he was one with the Gaelic League in working to restore Gaelic as the language of colloquial intercourse, and that his people of Kilkenny were as loyal, generous and religious as at any time in their history.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The free public library of Worcester, Mass., celebrated its semi-centennial anniversary on December 23. Among the speakers at the public gathering in the art rooms were Mayor Logan, Edward J. McMahon, president of the library board of directors, Rev. Thomas E. Murphy, S.J., President of Holy Cross College, and Dr. G. Stanley Hall, President of Clark University. The most noteworthy feature of the addresses was the suggestion of the President of Holy Cross College, urging the appointment of a Catholic assistant librarian. "Might it not be well," he asked, "to consider the wisdom of having on the staff of every public library a Catholic assistant librarian, who would be expected to have the supervision of all the Catholic books, or books bearing on the Catholic religion, and the safeguarding of young Catholic readers against such reading as might be injurious to their faith and morals from the viewpoint of the Catholic Church? Such an assistant, beside the general qualifications demanded, would be expected to possess also a knowledge of Catholic history and literature and of the reliability of historical writers. Such an assistant, moreover, should be imbued with the spirit of Catholic culture and should be able to get instinctively the Catholic view point.

"There was a time, many years ago—may it never return—when such a suggestion as this would not be acceptable here in New England. But to-day, thank God, no decent citizen is willing to admit he wants to read and to circulate calumnies about his neighbor. The American spirit of fair play demands that the truth be known, and leads a man to seek for it at original sources. An instance of this spirit was given here in Worcester when I was invited, a few years ago, to address the Men's Unitarian Club on popular errors about the Catholic Church. Another instance of the same spirit is shown by the presence here in our reference library of the new Catholic Encyclopedia and the new national Catholic weekly, AMERICA. But good will, liberal policy and the best intentions will not supply Catholic instinct to see the Catholic viewpoint as an intelligent, fair-minded and conscientious Catholic assistant librarian could see it.

"I am informed that where this suggestion has been followed, and such an assistant has been introduced in Cleveland for instance, great advantage to the public library has resulted. The plan has been found to supply what could not be provided by having some Catholic members on a library committee or by preparing a catalogue of Catholic books, or even by having Catholic censors who might be consulted on the introduction or exclusion of doubtful books. It furnishes, more than all, these valuable safeguards, namely, a conscientious guide for youthful Catholic readers who are not yet mature enough to possess the critical mind which is needed for reading both sides of controverted questions.

"Only a few days ago I read in the last number of AMERICA the following very apposite statement: 'The average man and woman are willing enough to see the light if it is held up to them. We should not blame them for stumbling over us when we shirk our duty of contributing something to dispel darkness.' It is precisely in this spirit, and lest I might shirk duty, that I suggest as my contribution on this occasion a more systematic co-operation not only of Catholics but of all citizens with public library officials, so that our public libraries may shed all possible light on dark and dangerous places to prevent the stumbling of young or old into the pitfalls of history and literature. Incidentally, we may thus prevent much treading on one another's corns and bumping against one another in the foggy gloom of fruitless controversy."

The sermon at the opening of the church erected in memory of Cardinal Newman, at the Birmingham Oratory, England, was delivered by the Rev. Joseph Rickaby, S.J. The preacher indicated what, on careful study, seemed to be the salient points in Newman's character, as shown in his writings. In conclusion Father Rickaby said:

"I augur that this church and this oratory shall be for generations a school of Newman's thought. In so far as that thought is likewise the thought of the Church and the mind of Christ, and not otherwise—for not otherwise would he ever wish it propagated. I augur that from this church and oratory, as from one of many centres, shall be wrought out, not perhaps the conversion of England, but, what the Cardinal, with his distrust of the many in religion, loved rather to contemplate, the conversion of Englishmen. I augur that Catholics whose faith is sore tried and assailed shall here be confirmed, first, by prayer and Mass and Sacraments, then by what I have long considered the best course of philosophy for a Catholic layman, the teaching of John Henry Newman taken as a whole—I say taken as a whole, the whole spirit and gist of the mind of the man. And thus shall be wrought still further out the fulfilment of the words of my text, words which you may read inscribed on the north wall of Littlemore Church, words which he himself chose for the epitaph of his mother buried there: 'Cast me not off in the time of age, forsake me not when my strength faileth me, until I tell the might of thine arm to all the generation that is for to come.' You, my Fathers of the Oratory, remember how, when the venerable Cardinal's strength failed him in the time of age, he was not cast off nor forsaken; how your affectionate attentions bore him up, how a young generation grew up around him. And to all the generation that is for to come, here in the church, shall be told the might of God's arm revealed in John Henry Cardinal Newman, his wonderful conversion, the power of his preaching and writings, the example of his long, laborious and holy life. And not in vain shall it be told, but as Samson's dying feat was to the destruction of the Philistines, so shall the memory of Newman be to the conversion of Englishmen: dead, he shall bring more souls to life than he converted in the days while he wrought the deeds of a strong man in Israel. Amen."

James Bryce, British Ambassador at Washington, in his recent address on William Ewart Gladstone, revealed the heroic proportions of the latter's services to his country and to the world at large. He said he had known Mr. Gladstone intimately. He had been a friend and a colleague. Gladstone had often said to him that the future of the world, and especially of the English-speaking race, lay in the United States. He held that a nation had a conscience, and should live up to it; should live according to righteousness and should never abuse its own strength. His course in office reflected this belief. Mr. Gladstone, in his later years, often told Mr. Bryce that the chief mistake of his earlier life had been in not having sufficient faith in and love for liberty, in liberty as a force making for good in all human affairs. Mr. Bryce referred to Mr. Gladstone's attitude during the Civil War. He had used language that gave the impression that he had taken sides, but he admitted afterward that he had not properly understood the questions involved. Mr. Bryce said that such ignorance was common among the upper classes in England. The English people as a body were with the Union cause. The British Ambassador said that Mr. Gladstone was helped in all his public life by his deep religious faith and earnest piety. His leadership was marked by his work for peace and good will among the nations. Gladstone's mind was open to the call of any good cause, which is the finest test of leadership and one of his best titles to be remembered by posterity.

At the annual convention of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, held in Cathedral College, New York, during the Christmas holidays, Archbishop Farley spoke of the two growing obstacles to the success of Catholic teachers in their work of keeping Catholics true to the Faith—

Socialism and the Settlement houses—"that work into the sympathies of the poor Catholic by clothing him and giving him food and then rob him of his faith." Of Socialism the Archbishop said: "It is the heresy of the hour—a rampant heresy. It is an organized attempt to establish a religion in which no religion, no faith is taught. And look at the means they have of spreading this doctrine. I am informed that there are thirteen hundred newspapers in the world propagating the principles of Socialism. It is corroding the working classes. In the factories of this and more conservative countries, such as England and Germany, the workingmen are furnished these newspapers free. They devour daily this mental pabulum that poisons their souls." In conclusion His Grace suggested some methods to combat "this common enemy."

OBITUARY

The Rev. Eugene A. Shine died at Pawling, N. Y., on December 29, aged 50 years. Father Shine was a graduate of the class of '79, at St. Francis Xavier's College, and had been pastor of Pawling for seven years. His father, Captain Eugene Shine, was killed at Gettysburg.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

REV. FATHER:—I congratulate you on the Xmas number of AMERICA. For soundness of contents and pleasing timeliness of its articles it excels all previous appearances. Needless to say, that I consider AMERICA the best and most welcome periodical in English. Permit me a suggestion. Kindly give us in your editorial department a concise statement and explanation why all non-Catholic publications use the wording: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men (King James' version, Luke ii, 14), and not the older and (in Europe) more familiar version of: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will." Which approved manuscript of Holy Scriptures favors the King James version? I confess my ignorance in company with some other confreres in my neighborhood.

M. SAVS.

Delano, Minn.

Answer.—Non-Catholics naturally use their own version. There is authority in the manuscripts for it, and there is not much difference between the two readings if rightly understood. Nearly all Catholic interpreters refer "of good will" to God: i. e., peace to men of the Divine good-pleasure whereby they are no longer children of wrath, that is to say, the entire human race restored to Christ. Some few explain it of men who by grace are ready to accept it. But as the grace is given according to the good-pleasure of God, this explanation comes back eventually to the first. If the Protestant version be thus interpreted, it is orthodox. If, on the other hand, the Catholic version be interpreted to restrict the peace to those only who actually made themselves ready for it, or who were foreseen as accepting it, the interpretation would be either semi-Pelagian or Jansenistic. While if Protestants understand, as by their comma after peace they seem to, that two things are given on earth, peace and good will, they give a nonsensical interpretation; if they use their text to convey their doctrine of faith without works, their interpretation is heretical.

No doubt you receive many compliments for AMERICA and take the hints that sometimes are connected with them. I heard a fellow priest remark: "AMERICA is all right only it has too much foreign matter." Now I think that this is just one of its greatest advantages. This remark revealed lack of interest in foreign matters, or rather, narrowness and a certain prevailing provincialism, even among our educated classes. And this remark revealed, on the other hand, that AMERICA had supplied the sore need of broadening and widening the intellectual horizon. It will be the "Literary Digest" for Catholics, having at the same time the advantage of being much more original.—Rev. F. B. Kleinbrecht, La Junta, Colo.

Your semi-annual number is the best yet, where all have been good and growing better all the time. The question is can you keep it at its present high standard? All who have started with the first number must say unhesitatingly, "yes"! If I could, I would not alter a line or word up to the present, and this is the most anyone can say. It is pure spiritual food seasoned to the tastes of all, for each article dealing with the whole world in its various questions of vast import to Catholics of all the nations reflects clear insight of the subjects discussed. May you live long and prosper!—Joseph Maher, St. Charles, Mo.

The publication is certainly up to the high standard maintained wherever the Jesuit Fathers take an active hand. God bless your work.—Rev. Father Agatho, O. S. B., Boulder, Colo.

I like AMERICA very much and enjoy its weekly visit exceedingly. Its tone is distinct, just and rich: those who have it not are missing a great deal.—Henry Chapin Granger, Evanston, Ill.

CHRONICLE

The President's Special Message.—President Taft sent to Congress his special message on proposed amendments to the interstate commerce and anti-trust laws. The President recommends with regard to railroads: A United States Court of Commerce, to have original jurisdiction over classes of cases specified and thus relieve the Interstate Commerce Commission. That traffic agreements be authorized, subject to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That for the protection of the shipper railroads be compelled to quote rates in writing on request. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered on its own initiative, to investigate fairness of rates or practices, and to pass on classification of commodities. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be authorized to suspend a proposed increase of rate for sixty days, pending investigation and to forbid the increase or fix a maximum. That shippers be given the right to designate route of shipments subject to supervision of commission. That railroads be forbidden to acquire stock in a competing line of which they do not already possess control. That all stock or bond issues be made subject to approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That the commission be empowered to compel the uniform adoption of safety appliances. That plaintiffs under the employers' liability act be permitted to bring suit wherever service can be had. The President recommends with regard to trusts: Voluntary Federal incorporation for corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce. That the real and personal property of such Federal corporations be left subject to such State taxation as is imposed on like property of other corporations or individuals. Full publicity for Federal corporations. That Federal corporations be forbidden to act as holding companies. That Federal corporations be made subject to the Sherman anti-trust law. That no amendments be made to the Sherman anti-trust law.

Congress.—Resolutions providing for an investigation of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy were introduced in both houses of Congress. In the Senate, resolutions were offered for an inquiry into the increased cost of living. In the House the Mann bill, providing for a change in the government of the Panama Canal Zone, was passed. The bill makes provisions for the abolition of the Isthmian Canal Commission and the appointment of a director general of the Canal Zone. It also establishes a Supreme Court in the territory, and gives the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.—The Ballinger-Pinchot controversy reached an acute stage by the reading in the Senate of a letter addressed by Mr. Pinchot to Senator Dolliver, in which he warmly commended the course adopted by L. R. Glavis, with the concurrence of Messrs. Price and Shaw of the Bureau of Forestry. In his letter Mr. Pinchot upheld the criticisms passed on Secretary Ballinger and suggested that the President himself in his removal of Mr. Glavis from the public service had acted without a full knowledge of the facts. The President thereupon removed Mr. Pinchot and his two subordinates, O. W. Price and A. C. Shaw, from the public service.—The passage of the Humphrey resolution calling for an investigation of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy brought about an unexpected defeat to the House organization and Speaker Cannon. This defeat was administered by the passing of an amendment depriving the speaker of the authority to appoint the House members of the investigating committee and providing that these members be chosen by the House.—The Ship Subsidy bill which has the approval of the Administration was introduced in the House by Representative William E. Humphrey of Washington. The measure contains three distinct propositions: First, to increase the mail pay to American ships on routes to South America, China, Japan, the Philippines and Australasia to $4 per mile outward voyage, where the voyage is 4,000 miles or more; second, to increase the tonnage taxes on the trans-oceanic trade; and, third, free ships, that is, to admit foreign-built ships to American register for the foreign trade. The first of these propositions is the most important; by it the Postmaster-General would be authorized to pay to second-class ships for carrying the mail the same rate of pay now authorized to be paid to first-class ships. The tonnage taxes would be paid by foreign ships, which are carrying 95 per cent. of the commerce of the United States on the seas. Under the free ship provision of the bill, any American citizen can buy a vessel, built anywhere, put the American flag on it and run it exclusively in the foreign trade. Representative Humphrey declared that the provisions of the measure would build up a transport service absolutely necessary on the Pacific coast.

International Arbitral Tribunal.—Secretary Knox addressed a circular note to the governments signatory of the last Hague convention in which he proposed that the international prize court established by that convention be invested with functions and jurisdiction of an international arbitral tribunal, for the settlement of difficulties between the powers. The State Department is awaiting replies.

Neutralization of Manchurian Railroads.—As a solution of the Manchurian problem the United States Government addressed a memorandum to the Russian Foreign Office proposing the neutralization of the Manchurian railroads by their sale to China and inviting Russia's participation in such a scheme. The powers responsible for the financial arrangements would see that the lines were conducted on a purely business basis and not used for political or strategic purposes.

Message of Governor Hughes.—In his message to the New York State legislature, the Governor recommends the rejection of the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution enlarging the National Government's power to lay direct taxes. He holds that the ratification of the amendment in its present form would infringe on the rights of the States by depriving them of the power which they now have of issuing securities protected from Federal taxation. As Governor Hughes puts it: "To permit such State securities to be the subject of Federal taxation is to place such limitations upon the borrowing power of the State as to make the performance of the functions of the local government a matter of federal grace."

A Great State Park.—Mrs. E. H. Harriman gave 10,000 acres of land in Orange and Rockland Counties for a State park, and $1,000,000 cash to be used in furtherance of the park plan. The proposed State park will connect with the Palisades park project, giving a river parkway from Fort Lee to Newburg, with the State park extending northward from Haverstraw to the Dunderberg Mountain opposite Peekskill and westward from the Hudson to Tuxedo. Other gifts for Palisades Park include $500,000 each from J. Pierpont Morgan and John D. Rockefeller.

The Cold Wave in the West.—The long continued storm conditions have made the past week notable in the records of bitter wintry weather in the West. Throughout Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma the suffering was great. Train schedules were disarranged and many trains were abandoned after they had reported at division points from twelve to fourteen hours late. In case of snow a coal famine was feared. The switchmen's strike in the Northwest is blamed for some of the inconvenience and discomfort in that section. There the added fear of shortages in food-supplies faced the small towns throughout the Dakotas. In Kentucky and as far South as Tennessee and Arkansas blizzards were reported and in Iowa almost all the railroads announced temporary abandonment of freight service. Chicago coal dealers urged the people of that city to conserve their coal supplies, since with the present congestion of the railroads and another month of hard weather in prospect the coal situation might become acute.

Arbitration to Settle a Strike.—A committee of the Switchmen's Union of North America has agreed with the committee representing the railways to refer the settlement of their strike to an arbitration committee. As a condition of accepting arbitration, both the managers' committee and the representatives of the union pledged themselves to accept any decision of the arbitration board as final and to refrain from taking an appeal from the decision. The Erdman act provides for the appointment of arbitrators to represent both sides and an umpire, who shall be appointed by these two. If these two fail to agree upon an umpire it becomes the duty of Commissioners Krapp and Neill to name the third member of the board. The decision has no bearing on the existing strike of switchmen in the Northwest, though the strikers are members of the same organization. The territory concerned in the decision extends from Chicago north to Madison, Wis., east to but not including Buffalo, south to St. Louis and west to Kansas City, and 14,000 workers are affected. The demands of the employees include an advance in the wage scale; a working day of ten continuous hours, with overtime at the rate of time and one-half; no crew to be compelled to work more than twelve hours in any twenty-four; pay at the rate of time and one-half for Sundays and legal holidays.

Montreal's Typhoid Epidemic.—The live question now in Montreal is how to fight the typhoid epidemic. As there are at present some three thousand victims of this disease—many more than the existing hospitals can accommodate—the Star called upon the moribund city council to act. But that body which, by its graft and incompetence (see AMERICA, December 25, p. 272), has brought about the present outbreak of fever, declared that the situation was not serious. Thereupon a small group of influential citizens, moved by the appalling stories of the typhoid epidemic, have undertaken to do the work which properly belongs to the city councils and to open and equip an emergency hospital. Early last week, thanks to the activity and business capacity of Professor and Mrs. Starkey, Lady Drummond, Miss Macdonald, Lieutenant-Colonel Burland, Dr. A. T. Bain, Dr. F. J. Shepherd, and ten other ladies and gentlemen, encouraged by Archbishop Bruchési, an empty factory, rapidly transformed into a hospital, received some fifty patients. On January 5, the day after this emergency hospital had been opened, the Archbishop visited each patient and expressed his admiration of the work already accomplished. Donations of food, clothing, medicines and other requisites are fast pouring in. Meanwhile the members of the city council water committee have awakened to at least one part of their duty and have decided to install without delay a plant for sterilizing the water by means of filtration basins. The Star, of the 5th inst., refers to a report recently issued by the New York State Department of Health, showing that in the last ten years the typhoid death rate in Albany has, by filtration, been reduced 73 per cent. Roused at last from its lethargy by the generous action of private citizens, the Health Committee unanimously resolved, on January 5, to recommend the city council to vote fifteen thousand dollars for the maintenance of poor typhoid patients in the Emergency Hospital and other institutions in the city. The private Epidemic Fund of voluntary contributions had already reached twenty thousand dollars on January 6. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, cabled from London his subscription of one thousand dollars, while Mr. C. R. Hosmer, wintering in the Riviera, sent fifteen hundred. Archbishop Bruchési, when requested to speak at the public conference of the Health Committee, announced that there were 315 beds available in institutions under his care.—Private advices received here last Sunday say that many well-informed Montrealers cannot see the object of the Star and of some doctors in pushing the typhoid scare. The number of typhoid patients does not seem to be larger than usual in winter, and Mgr. Bruchési's offer of more than three hundred beds shows that there is still plenty of room in the ordinary hospitals. Lord Strathcona has subscribed twenty-five thousand dollars for the Typhoid Emergency Hospital.

Great Britain.—Parliament was dissolved and the writs of election were issued on the 10th. The Peers were very active during the interval between the proroguing of Parliament and its dissolution. The general opinion seems to be that with the exception of men of affairs such as Lords Lansdowne, Curzon, Londonderry, their speakers have injured rather than helped their cause. Rear-Admiral Sturdee, on whose behalf Lord Charles Beresford attacked the Admiralty, has been appointed to the First Division of the Home Fleet.—The Archbishop of Westminster and the Bishops of the Province have ordered the following question to be proposed to each candidate at the coming election: Will you, if returned to Parliament, do all in your power to secure just treatment for Catholic schools, so that while preserving their Catholic character and management, they shall receive from public sources the same financial aid as other recognized schools. No other question is to be proposed, e. g., about Catholic disabilities, the Royal Declaration against Transubstantiation, etc., so that the issue may be kept clear. The clergy are to abstain from alluding to the crisis in church otherwise than in urging the faithful to prayer. The "Come Holy Ghost," with versicle, response and prayer is to be recited after every Mass on Sundays and Holy-days to the end of January.

India.—Police investigations following the murder of Mr. Jackson have brought to light deposits of arms at different places in the Deccan that show the Arms Act to be practically ineffective. It is admitted that the murderer was but the instrument of others, and fifteen arrests have been made.—At the Indian National Congress, Surendranath Banerjee spoke highly of Lord Morley's reforms. He denounced the Government regulations as an insult to Hindus, and the preferential treatment of Mohammedans, as a violation of the Queen's proclamation on the taking over of the administration of the country from the East India Company.

Australia.—The Parliament of New South Wales has passed a Bill amending the Industrial Act so as to give power to imprison strikers without the option of a fine. Its object is to break the present coal strike which is causing great injury to trade and much discomfort to the public on account of the interruption of traffic and the supply of gas, the leaders refusing to accept the wages determined by the Compulsory Wages Board. The Western miners are returning to work; the others still hold out. Fifteen leaders are being prosecuted.

Ireland.—Mr. O'Brien's candidature in Cork has imparted some strength to the independent Nationalist candidates. His opposition is grounded on the party's alleged weakness in handling the land question, but the acceptance, however reluctant, of the Budget is the main subject of indictment by the Messrs. Healy and the other contestants. Mr. McMurrough Kavanagh, in declining reelection for Carlow because of disagreement with the party on the Budget question, states that the Bill unjustly and injuriously discriminates against Ireland, first, in spirit duties and second, in tobacco duties, which tend to destroy peculiarly Irish enterprises and their allied industries; third, in estate and stamp duties taxing the transference of farms and real estate, which transference is made frequent in Ireland by land purchase, but is infrequent in England. He further holds that tariff-reform, involving protection, is more useful to an agricultural country like Ireland than Free-trade. Mr. Kavanagh, the son of a former Tory member for Carlow, having become a convert to Nationalism, transferred his large estate to his tenants on easy terms, and having been elected as a member of the Irish Party, proved an able and influential representative. Mr. T. M. Healy insists that in view of the probability of Home Rule, finance is the crucial question, as self-government without control of the purse is impossible. The discussion of the question is enlightening the people on the practical bearings of autonomy. Derry city, which is evenly divided between Nationalists and Unionists, is contested in the Home Rule interest by Mr. Shane Leslie, a scion of a long line of Ulster landlords and a convert to Nationalism and Catholicism. He is a first cousin of Winston Churchill. While the Irish population has decreased since 1901 from 4,443,370 to 4,363,351, the electorate has increased from 687,609 to 698,787, indicating, though not conclusively, that emigration is mainly of the young.

France.—Under the heading "L'Anarchie dans la Police," Le Temps sounds a note of very serious alarm about the syndicates which the French police are trying to organize among themselves. As these syndicates in France are generally affiliated to revolutionary groups, it is feared that the loyalty of the defenders of the peace will be contaminated. "If," says editorially our Paris contemporary, "policemen are allowed to form an association or a syndicate, or to take any part in the syndicate agitation, it would be as well immediately to proclaim the triumph of anarchy. To gain time and to calculate that the social revolution will still grant us a few months of respite is not enough. To-morrow it will be too late to defend one's self. Nor is it enough to say that the police, in the actual state of our laws, may possibly carry out their suspected projects. If the law really permits this disorder the Government need only ask the Chambers to vote a specially urgent law, a short and precise law that will spare us the scandal that threatens us." It appears that, at the recent annual meeting of the police force, M. Briand warned them that they must not make an enemy of him who wanted to be their friend, for he would then remember that he is the chief on whom rests the highest and most precise responsibility. Le Temps points out that if the Government tolerates the first step of the police in the path of anarchic syndication all order and security will be at an end in Paris, and Paris itself will be no more. Never, outside of an exposition year, has there been so large a number of visitors to the French capital as during the last twelve-month. But if the rumor spreads that the police are becoming anarchists farewell to these enormous paying crowds. They will avoid or desert Paris as they did some years ago on occasion of the labor scare of the First of May celebrations.—Meanwhile the police are very active against any Royalist agitation. Having got wind of a proposed visit of the Duke of Orleans to Paris on Christmas Day, M. Mouquin, Superintendent of detectives, posted at every gate of Paris police inspectors instructed to examine carefully all automobiles entering the city and to arrest the Duke of Orleans, if he turned up. But he did not.

Germany.—The year-books of the Chambers of Commerce of the principal cities of the empire, report very favorable conditions for a prosperous year. Those of Bremen and Hamburg devote special chapters to Germany's industrial relations with the United States, affirming the mutual need of friendly understanding on the part of the two nations. Business men in Germany are still in doubt regarding the effects of the Payne Tariff on German trade but the constantly growing demand for German manufactures in the States and for American raw material in Germany will no doubt lead to mutual concessions to foster the favorable conditions which undoubtedly exist. The year-books all show an increase in trade between the two countries during the year past.—The Social-Democrats of Prussia held their annual convention in Berlin. The chief topic of discussion was the reform of the electoral laws of Prussia. All of the speakers sharply criticized the system in vogue as behind the times and unjust.—The government of Baden with the beginning of the new year has put into execution a plan long since agreed upon. All salaried positions are declared open to women under precisely similar conditions with men.—The Marine-Rundschau contains a striking tribute of praise to the war-fleet of the United States for its development and efficiency. The occasion of the tribute is the critical review of the warships' cruise about the world, which the article, prescinding from all political consequences, regards a lesson in seamanship to the world.—The German press is unanimous in expressing gratification that the members of the British Liberal Cabinet have been prompt in their disapproval of "German peril" party-cry recently renewed in the speeches of the Conservative Leader, ex-Premier Balfour.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Neutral School Farce in France

The "Bureau d'Informations Religieuses et Sociales" of Paris has issued a collection of extracts from the school manuals condemned by the French Episcopate ("Les Manuels Scolaires condamnés par l'Épiscopat—Extraits"). The introduction to this valuable booklet candidly admits that among those who, twenty years ago, framed the present French school law, even the most fanatical partisans of the lay idea honestly aimed at a sincere neutrality, and went so far as to declare that man's duty to God would be explicitly stated in the official program of primary schools. Far-seeing advocates of the religious idea immediately denounced the weakness of the new system. They foresaw the tendencies and the subsequent declarations of the now dominant educators of France, who brutally proclaim that neutrality is a chimera. At present the supreme pontiffs of the lay school do not hesitate to say that this phantom neutrality can be nothing but utopia or hypocrisy. Thus they have come round to the Catholic idea that the pretense of neutrality was, from the very outset, a miserable decoy.

And yet that neutrality, solemnly promised, distinctly set forth in the school syllabus, and gradually nullified by treachery, is an integral part of the school law. Jules Ferry insisted on this principle in 1882. M. Briand renewed this affirmation in express terms when replying recently to Abbé Gayraud as follows: "The fathers of families whose children attend the primary schools find in the procedure organized by the law of February 27, 1880, in the ordinance of January 18, 1887, and in the ministerial circular of October 7, 1880, the guarantee that the school books contain nothing that can violate the principle of neutrality which the legislator has made the essential rule of lay teaching." Officially, therefore, neutrality is still obligatory. Consequently, those who oppose this neutrality, those who deliberately violate it, are the real contemners of the law. On the other hand, the true defenders of the law, those who most justly and safely appeal to it, are those same Catholics who formerly pointed out the danger of it, those same bishops who now denounce the broken pledges of the framers of the law. In claiming respect for that neutrality which had been promised, which Jules Ferry had declared to be necessary, and without which his whole system of laicization would have gone to pieces, the bishops have remained faithful to the spirit and the letter of the law.

Of course, the idea of defending the school law never could have found lodgment in their minds, since the principle of neutrality has never been accepted by the Church, the divinely appointed guardian of truth against error. For Belgium in 1880, for France in 1884, the Holy See condemned "those schools without religion, which call themselves mixed or neutral, and which, by their very nature, end by not acknowledging the existence of God." If in certain cases, for the sake of peace, the Church has tolerated some neutral schools, it was always on the express condition that neutrality would be formally respected.

As may be seen from the extracts given in the book under review, the authors of the objectionable school manuals are forever dilating on the blessings of freedom of thought and expression, and on the inalienable rights of reason. But the strange irony of their present attitude must be apparent to all. These grandiloquent talkers, who frighten little children with their pretentious anathemas against the fanatics of past ages incapable of realizing the beauty of tolerance, are now fanatically furious themselves and threaten with the direst legal penalties the bishops, free French citizens like themselves, because, forsooth, these latter dare to criticize their teaching.

"Les Manuels Scolaires condamnés par l'Épiscopat" gives copious and numerous extracts from twelve different manuals now in use in the public schools of France. These passages are full of misrepresentations of history and religion, calculated with perfidious skill to undermine in the hearts of children all love for the past glories of France, all true patriotism and all faith in the Catholic religion.

Albert Bayet in "Leçons de Morale," Cours Moyen, 1909, begins by saying: "The system of morals taught in this manual is lay and positive, i. e., independent of all religious belief and of any metaphysical system on the unknowable"—truly a luminous preface for boys and girls of twelve, the average age for the "Cours Moyen." M. Bayet continues: "We have suppressed the chapters relating to the existence of God and to man's duties toward God. Those chapters, which might wound certain convictions, have been replaced by others in which we enumerate the principal religions and point out the difference between scientific truths, which the ignorant alone can refuse to admit, and the religious and metaphysical beliefs which each of us has the right to accept, reject or modify as he pleases." This bunching together of metaphysical with religious beliefs is on a par with the mental cowardice which suppresses God lest "certain convictions" be wounded. But, in the very next extract M. Bayet becomes decidedly dogmatic and singularly unafraid of the very common contrary experience of good people who, in spite of all modern inventions, suffer from poverty, disease, physical accidents and even premature death, all of which are incompatible with the idea of happiness thus dithyrambically described by him for the benefit of simple French children presumably dwelling in the rural districts: "Those who hearken to what morality says are always happy. Peace reigns in their country. They have not to bear the frightful evils of war. They peacefully celebrate joyous festivals; the earth furnishes them with abundant nourishment; the bees give them honey; the sheep give them wool; they are always rich and free from sorrow. But, when men do not hearken to morality, misfortune smites them."

Here is another bit of conjectural prophecy from M. E. Primaire, apparently his real name, though it looks like a joke or a nom de guerre. In his "Manuel d'Éducation Morale, Civique and Sociale," he has the hardihood to write: "Suppose there were no other moral teaching than that imparted by special churches, then present society could not exist as it does now. There would be in France sects and no nation. The Jew would be brought back to the ghetto, the Protestant shut up in his cities of safety; the Catholic, enraged against both, would labor to make them enter his church. . . . All objections will fall before this fact: no particular church being the soul of France, the teaching which shall spread abroad the soul of that society must be independent of every particular church." It is not easy, even for a grown person skilled in philosophic terminology, to understand what M. Primaire means by "répandre l'âme de cette société," nor to feel the force of his peculiar argument, which, by the way, his befuddled brain mistakes for "a fact"; but it is easy to see that his prophecy has not come to pass in such peaceful regions as the United States and the British Empire, where innumerable sects are, together with the true religion, the chief teachers of morality. If, within the last thirty years, the soul of France has really ceased to be Catholic, that is due to the fact that a whole generation has been fed on such unwholesome mental diet.

M. Jules Payot, who is quite a personage, being "Chevalier de la Légion d'honneur," Rector of the Academy of Aix, and author of "Education of the Will," a work which has been translated into German, Spanish, Russian, Bulgarian and Polish, but apparently not into English, has, in "La Morale à l'École," these sapient remarks: "Between the deserving poor and the beggar there is the same difference as between the purgatory and the hell of old women's tales. People get out of purgatory; those who are there have the hope, nay, more, the certainty, of getting out. What made hell a frightful conception was that the damned had no hope of getting out of it. Destitution is as frightful as hell, for it leaves no hope."

These are mere samples from an immense collection of absurdities. The limitations of space must bring these samples to a close for the present, with one which crowds into fifty words more historical falsehoods than those romancers of history, Froude and Michelet, whom these manuals praise as truth-tellers, could cram into a chapter. MM. A. Aulard and A. Debidour, joint authors of "Récits Familiers de l'Histoire Nationale," write: "Louis Napoleon, who had secured the support of the clergy, sent, in order to please them, French soldiers to help the Pope, whom the Romans no longer wished to have as their sovereign. It was also to please the clergy that he handed over to them the education of youth." Everybody knows that what Louis Napoleon did for the Pope was done under pressure from the entire French nation, and what he granted to Catholics was liberty to set up colleges at their own expense, a liberty which has been greatly curtailed by the Third Republic, because those Catholic colleges were more successful in competitive examinations than the State institutions.

LEWIS DRUMMOND, S.J.

Cradle Days of the Republic

On February 4, 1789, the first Electoral College elected George Washington and John Adams President and Vice-President respectively of that latest venture on the political sea, the United States of America. Almost thirteen years had passed since Lexington and Bunker Hill, years of suffering and contention even if not of unremittent military activity, and the country was at last taking a step more important than even the Declaration of Independence. For it is comparatively easy to pull down, that was the only thing accomplished by the Declaration; but to build up and to make sure of the building are matters of much greater difficulty. When independence had been secured and a Constitution had been adopted, the first presidential electors chosen in accordance with its provisions were by no means of one mind in their opinion of the Organic Law. Of the seventy-three members of the first Electoral College, four dozen at most were its ardent admirers and supporters, yet with striking unanimity each one of the sixty-nine who actually voted placed Washington first. In making their second choice ten candidates were "remembered" with from one to nine votes, but John Adams received thirty-four and was declared elected Vice-President.

Adams had advocated the appointment of Washington to the command of the patriot army; he had served ably on all kinds of committees in the Continental Congress; he had represented the struggling States abroad; and in all respects, he had been consistently energetic and loyal. Very probably the difference in the number of votes polled by the two placed Washington and Adams in so sharp a contrast that the first Vice-President, whose most shining trait was not humility, felt far from being soothed or flattered.

Although, to use his own words, Adams looked upon the vice-presidency as "the most insignificant office that ever the invention of man contrived," he turned it to good account, for, on as many as twenty occasions, his deciding vote saved administration measures in the Senate, so far were the first senators from being in accord with the first President in matters of public policy. It is no new thing, then, for a President to meet with active and energetic antagonism from the Congress.

While Washington was on his way to New York where his inauguration was to take place, cities, societies, and educational and religious bodies presented formal addresses. In replying to an address in Baltimore, he said, almost prophetically: "I hold it of little moment if the close of my life shall be embittered, provided I shall have been instrumental in securing the liberties and promoting the happiness of the American people."

When he reached New York he was met by the members of the first Congress, Governor Clinton and a throng of notables, and ceremoniously conducted to the residence prepared for him. The New York Gazette of April 24, 1789, took due notice of the arrival of the liberator of his country. In another column it advertised for sale "a likely, healthy young negro wench, between fifteen and sixteen years old."

On April 30, 1789, Washington took the oath of office. "Long live George Washington!" The President must have felt more than a passing thrill of exultation as he looked upon the rejoicing throng and listened to their acclamations. This was the outcome of what had begun in petition and remonstrance to the king, had gone on through the suffering of Valley Forge, had striven against the apathy of some, the mercenary spirit of others and the petty jealousy of many.

Enthusiasm is contagious. "Laugh, and the world laughs with you." The unthinking and emotional catch the exhilaration of the moment, but in the slow, plodding, continuous effort towards the attainment of a high ideal, their spirits sink as far below the normal level as they had risen above it.

The President's first message to the Congress showed how impressed he was with the responsibility of his position. "Heaven can never smile," he wrote, "on a nation that disregards the eternal principles of order and right. The preservation of liberty, and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered as deeply, perhaps finally, staked on the experiment intrusted to the American people."

The newborn union was an experiment. If it was to succeed and perpetuate to generations yet to come the blessings that had been so dearly won, there should be fostered a highminded, patriotic regard for order and right, not as the exclusive privilege of the few but the priceless heritage of all. There had been many republics, but they had degenerated into oligarchical or autocratic despotisms. If a nation adopts and applies the principle that might makes right, that nation is smelting the metal for shackles with which a mightier nation will one day fetter it. Too much power and too much wealth are as dangerous to nations as they are to individuals, for they lead to contempt for those that are weak and poor.

Washington had a well-defined policy, the fruit of much deep thought. He would uphold the union, for he understood what was called, even at that early day, "the Southern genius of America," he would restore the public credit and would establish an American system in the foreign relations of the republic. His great object was to secure the constant and consistent cooperation that so great an undertaking imperatively demanded.

When the curtain rises, the habitual "first night" may applaud generously, yet his highest motive may be one of expectant curiosity. Others may join in and make the performance a "success." The boyish game of "follow the leader" is reproduced among the adults, sometimes for weal, sometimes for woe, so prone are many to range themselves under the leadership of one who catches their volatile fancy. Public favor is a fickle jade. The statesman who is welcomed with a shower of bouquets to-day may be greeted with a storm of brickbats to-morrow. When Washington first pronounced the oath of office, cheers and plaudits filled the air; before he retired to private life, he was openly assailed with coarse abuse. The Ship of State met stormy weather.

Corporate Reunion

The Catholic Church is one essentially. Heretics and schismatics go out from her, but they do not divide her. They go out because they no longer belong to her; she remains one and indivisible. This is an article of faith: I believe in One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church. Its oneness is not nominal merely nor material. It is not a unity of name, so that all called Christian belong to the Church; nor does it come from a material belief in Christ, as if all who profess to believe, each in his own way, in Christ, His mission, His revelation, are therefore united in His Church. The unity of the Church is a formal unity, coming out of its very nature. The living human body is undivided in itself and distinct from every other, because it is informed with one individual living soul; there is one living and indivisible Church distinct from every organization pretending to the name, because it is informed with the one, living Holy Spirit of God.

This is the unity for which our Lord prayed. "Not for them (the apostles) only do I pray, but for them also who through their word shall believe in me; that they may all be one, as thou, Father in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me" (John xvii, 20, 21). Those who should believe in Christ, would indeed come to the unity of the Church; but they would find in it something higher than the bond of the one faith, the being one in the supernatural unity of the Church. As the Father and the Son are one by the possession of one common nature, so were they to be one in the Father and the Son by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost and the fruition of His gifts. This unity Christ prayed for absolutely, without any condition; He made it an object to be obtained by the sacrifice to which He had consecrated Himself; He prayed for it solemnly as a necessary consequence of the establishment of the Church, likening it to the union between His Father and Himself; He connected it with the mission He was to give that Church, as the proof to all the world that He and His work are of God. Hence it follows that this prayer must have been answered fully from the beginning, that it remains fulfilled forever. The fact of the prayer demonstrates the perfect unity of the Church. Any interpretation, therefore, of the words :“ that they may all be one,” implying that the prayer is unanswered, or only partially answered, or fulfilled in one age but unfulfilled in another, cannot be tolerated for a moment.

Some may attempt to reconcile the fulfilment of the prayer with the existence of bodies of Christians outside the Church, by distinguishing between the essential and integral unity of the Church. This is one and indivisible in its nature, but this does not involve, they say, the impossibility of parts being cut off of which the loss does not destroy the nature. A man may live for years hale and well, though maimed in hand, foot or eye; so, too, the Church may exist, though deprived of this community of Eastern believers or that community of Western; and the prayer for unity may be for the reunion of these members with the parent body. But this supposes that these communities have carried off as such some of the parent's life and consequently a division of unity. Moreover it is contrary to what the Apostle teaches regarding the perfection of the Church. “ She is glorious, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing ” (Eph. v, 27).

The prayer, then, “ ut omnes unum sint,” is for the members of the Church existing within her unity. It is a prayer that they may continue within that unity, and demonstrate the unity of the Church. In general and with reference to the Church the prayer is efficacious. As it is applied to each individual, it, like every other prayer or operation of grace, supposes his free will, and for its efficacy depends upon that free will. One may refuse to consent to the inspirations of grace, he may go out of the Church, he may remain outside, his children may be born and grow up outside, but unless we would suppose them altogether reprobate, the prayer that properly was for them inside the Church, follows them by a kind of necessary extension into their exile calling them back to the unity they have abandoned.

From all this we understand the Catholic sense of the expression, Corporate reunion. It means the return of the members of a heretical or schismatical sect in a body to the Church. It excludes absolutely any idea that the sect has any claim to recognition as sharing in the life of the body; indeed the result of the return of the members is the extinction of the sect, the destruction of its false life, and the reception of its members as individuals into the Church. It therefore is diametrically opposed to the unorthodox, Anglican sense which involves more or less the famous branch theory, which implies the making of terms with the Catholic Church: “ If you will recognize our orders or grant us certain privileges, e. g., the use of our own tongue in the liturgy or some modification of the rule of celibacy, we will join you; otherwise we shall remain as we are ”; and would have not an act of submission to the supreme authority established by Christ, but a treaty with it on terms of equality. While it is possible that, should a schismatic or heretical body put itself unreservedly into the hands of the Roman Pontiff, he might make some charitable concessions conformable to the peculiar circumstances of the case, it is certain he would make none that could even give a color to any pretension such a body might have to a standing within the Catholic Church.

Corporate Reunion properly understood has, therefore, a twofold utility. It strikes the imagination of those outside the Church as something great, and therefore could well be a means to promote conversions. It might also make lighter the trial and the burden of each included individual convert. With these in view, Fr. Paul James Francis, who with his community has come into the Church, continues his work, as our readers will see from his letter we publish in this issue, which we commend to their charity.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Spanish Hospitals

A series of articles, “ Seeing the Hospitals of Europe,” by Dr. Leon L. Watters, is printed in the International Hospital Record, a monthly journal for hospitals and allied interests, published in Toronto. The second of these articles has something to say, or rather not to say, with regard to the hospitals of Spain. It is the old, old story, of how utter ignorance can be so much more emphatic in its assertion than knowledge could possibly be. He says: “ The hospitals of Spain! Reading the wonder stories of Washington Irving of the splendors of the Alhambra and the fame of the ancient Jewish physicians whose reputé resulted in calls to the far-away courts of tyrants, who otherwise did not tolerate their race, conjured up fine visions of what might exist in Spain in the way of hospitals. But alas for our hopes of high-arched Moorish windows sheltering learned science in its battle for health. The hospitals of Spain, like the fabled castles of Spain, are non-existent. In the doggerel of one of our party, ‘ we looked for the hospitals of Spain, but we searched for them always in vain.’ ”

But, then this party did not have to go to Spain in order to learn all these things. In one of the following paragraphs he says: “ But we were saved the trouble of searching out the hospitals of Spain, when one morning there stepped from the boat arriving from Algeciras a dust-begrimed and thoroughly disgusted confrère who had just ‘ done Spain.’ The hospitals of Spain? Why, it must be that the Spanish equivalent for that word had been dropped from the vocabulary, lost in the shuffle and carted away by the Moors when they were driven out of Spain, taking with them all of the impetus to learning and ambition that Spain had.”

What an astonishing lack of knowledge this sort of writing manifests. Apparently Dr. Watters knows nothing at all of the fact that in the century after the Moors were driven out Spain rose to the greatest height she had ever reached, and in the history of art, letters, architecture and education was the leader of Europe. From 1550 to 1650 Spain had such marvelous names in her literature as Cervantes, St. Teresa, Calderon, Lope De Vega, Tirso de Molina and others who made a literary epoch which no other country in the world has ever surpassed. At the same time Murillo and Velasquez and Ribera were doing their great work in painting. England had greater writers in Elizabeth's time, but not Spain's great artists. Besides, it was at this time that Spain finished her great cathedrals and made them the admiration of visitors ever since. Her universities during this period probably did the best educational work anywhere in Europe. The German universities had been seriously hurt by the so-called Reformation, the English universities were decadent, and in every way this was Spain's century in the history of the world. This much might be said with regard to the slur on the Moors taking away Spain's intellectual greatness with them.

With regard to our hospitals, it is infinitely amusing to have a visitor from our country, where until twenty years ago most of our hospitals were a disgrace, making little of Spain's hospitals. Spain has not the money that other favored nations have at the present time now. She has, however, some fine hospitals. The hospital of the Princess, built by Queen Isabella just about fifty years ago in Madrid, followed the model of the Lariboisière Hospital in Paris, at that time the best of its kind in the world. It is beautifully situated on some high ground to the north of Madrid. Down at Valencia there is a hospital the description of which as it is given in Burdett's great four volume folio, "The Hospitals and Asylums of the World," may be quoted here, calling attention first to the fact that though built forty years ago, the floors and the lower parts of the walls are of tiles, so that absolute cleanliness can be secured. The doors and the windows are large and high, and there is a ward for convalescents, qualities all of which we have very much wanted in our hospitals and have not secured satisfactorily even yet. Burdett says:

"The buildings are sumptuous, though irregular, giving the establishment the appearance of a small town. It includes a foundling department. The asylum building abuts on the main edifice. Altogether there are eighteen wards with a total accommodation of 1,100 patients, though that number is rarely reached. The men are located on the ground floor, the women on the first floor. There is a door at each end through which carriage and horses could be driven; the windows are high and lofty. Like many Italian hospitals, on taking one's stand at the central point one can look down the four wards successively, which are arranged in the form of a cross. The lower parts of the walls, to the height of five or six feet, are covered with colored glass tiles. There is a ward for convalescents, founded by a noble lady, in connection with the women's department, and containing eight beds. The floors are of splendid white glazed tiles. The foundling department numbers one hundred and twenty cradles. A bathing establishment also is provided, containing sixteen large stone baths, for use by patients in the hospitals. All patients are admitted without distinction, foreigners on presenting letters from their consuls."

Here in this country we know something about Spanish hospitals. According to Miss Nutting and Miss Dock, in their "History of Nursing" (New York, G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1907), the first hospital ever erected by the Spaniards in Mexico is still in existence. They give two photographs of it which show how beautiful it is inside and outside. It was erected by Cortez in 1524. It is still supported by some of the revenues from his estate. It is a model hospital building, and when we recall what awful hospitals were built in America in the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century, prison-like structures, providing only the most crowded quarters for patients, we can admire all the more the beautiful arcades and the fine large windows of the first hospital ever erected in America nearly 400 years ago.

This young physician, for surely he must be very young, if not physically then mentally at least, could probably learn more about hospital development in Europe from a story of the old hospitals in Spain than anywhere else in the world. There the Reformation did not interrupt nor the Revolution destroy hospitals, and the history of Spanish Charity is one of the beautiful chapters in the history of humanity.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

Religious Instruction in Schools

In the first volume of his report for the year ended June 30, 1909, which appeared last month, Dr. E. E. Brown, the United States Commissioner of Education, makes extended reference to the fact that "the year 1908-09 has been marked in our educational history by an unusual emphasis upon the moral aspects of instruction." A review of the proceedings of the First International Moral Education Congress held at the University of London in September, 1908, gives the Commissioner occasion to note "the astonishing amount of thought and interest which the topics of Moral Education have aroused, and he affirms that "the discussions of the past year show a marked tendency toward the consideration of morals as an independent and dominant concern in all educational procedure." One is not astonished, then, to find Dr. Brown advocating with grave earnestness the advisability of devising methods of teaching this subject in the public schools, since no object, as he well argues, has taken a serious place in the make-up of an educated man until it has been consciously thought about and studied, and morals can be no exception to the rule. Unfortunately the gratification is not increased as one reads the recommendations made by the Commissioner.

Not many, as he declares, but the vast majority of men and women of this land are firm in their judgment that the strongest motives of moral conduct are to be found in their religious convictions; nay, they agree that the precepts of moral living are, to say the least, insufficiently grounded and nourished without such religious convictions. To urge the explicit teaching of morals, then, as an important feature of a school system in which, as in our public schools, the teaching of religion is out of the question, is to urge a step forward which the majority will pronounce impossible. The explicit teaching of morals without an explicit reference to the eternal law of God and to its sanction of reward and punishment in a future life cannot be conceived by those who accept man's relation of entire dependence upon the Supreme Being as the foundation principle of morality. Nor will the achievements claimed for France and Japan as regards systematic moral instruction apart from religious instruction, to which Dr. Brown refers, help his plea. Even though one were not to find something of the religious principle in the veneration which impels the Japanese to accept almost as if it had come from heaven the edict of the Emperor making binding on conscience the virtues inculcated in the schools of that people, the paganism of Japan were surely a strange model to set up for Christian lands in a matter so important as moral culture. As for the disastrous consequences that have followed the efforts of the French school officials to eradicate every religious idea from their teachers' minds and from the children's as well, in order that the little ones of the land shall be educated without religion, the less one says the better.

In all probability the United States Commissioner of Education is himself conscious of the truth, unquestioned among believing men and women to-day, that moral training worthy of the name must have its roots in religion. Therefore, as the need of specific moral training in our schools is brought home to him with ever-increasing cogency he must seek a way out of the difficulty with which our public school system confronts him. Hence, mayhap, Dr. Brown's reference, in his recommendations, to proposals that arrangements be made between the educational authorities and ecclesiastical organizations under which pupils should be excused from the public schools for one half-day in the week, in order that they may in that time receive religious and moral instruction in their several churches. The proposal, even though it be haltingly referred to by the Commissioner, marks a decided step forward in the long drawn out conflict for the introduction of specific moral and religious training into our public school system. Of course, Catholics who are firmly convinced of the need of a religious atmosphere permeating the entire round of the school-day, will not be content with a few hours of religious instruction each week; but the recognition of the principle involved in the proposal means much indeed to all, who, through the years of conflict, have borne patiently the burden of sacrifice, which their insistent demands for religious training in schools entailed.

The Socialistic Kingdom of God

I.

After we have seen what Christian Socialists want to uproot from historic Christianity as pernicious outgrowths, we may well ask them what elements should, in their opinion, be kept as its pure and unalterable substance created by Christ Himself. We are answered that Christianity is essentially the Kingdom of God, that as such it was instituted by its divine Founder, and must be reconstructed in our day after it has degenerated in ages gone by. Undoubtedly Christianity is the Kingdom of God. But again the question returns, how the latter is to be conceived in accordance with Scripture and Christian tradition. Catholics can not possibly regard that as a correct conception of God's Kingdom which directly or by implication excludes from it dogmas as objects of our faith, rites as forms of divine worship, sacraments as means of sanctification, a church organization and hierarchy as teaching and administrative power. But Christian Socialists have searched the Scriptures by modern methods and have found that our conception is obsolete and must be supplanted by a new one, more enlightened and more progressive.

They have discovered that the Kingdom of God, as foretold by early prophets, as announced by John the Baptist, as established by Christ, the Messiah, was a temporal and earthly institution. Let us first hear the Rev. E. E. Carr, the foremost champion in Fellowship of Christian Socialists. Quite of late he writes in his bi-monthly: "When God undertook to uplift the Hebrews of Egypt, He did not come with moral principles and the promise of happiness in Heaven after death. He came with the promise of deliverance from slavery and want into freedom and plenty on earth." After quoting several texts from the Pentateuch, from Daniel, Amos, and Isaias, he concludes: "The words of Moses and the prophets did not refer to Heaven after death. . . . Moses did not teach about immortality. He founded the Kingdom on earth, and the splendid visions and songs of the prophets all climax upon the idea of God's people being freed from injustice, to revel in the joys of God's Kingdom here" (Christian Socialist, June, 1909). Of Christ, Mr. Carr says: "Jesus preached the Kingdom continually. In more than fifty places he uses the word Kingdom with reference to the temporal promise. The disciples expected Him to establish it. He was sorely tempted to establish it by force, but concluded that the truth alone could make them free. The Kingdom of God must be founded in a real industrial and political democracy of enlightened people" (Ibid).

Rev. John D. Long, Secretary General of the Fellowship (1908-1909) says in the same issue of June, 1909: "The Kingdom that Jesus announced was for this world. In one hundred and six texts where He used the expression 'Kingdom,' in more than nine cases out of ten he was undeniably considering something here on earth. This new order was not fundamentally spiritual as is assumed by most, but fundamentally physical."

Rev. Henry Frank, Ph.D., not less forcibly affirms: "When Jesus or John cry, 'The Kingdom is at hand,' they manifestly referred to the restoration of an earthly theocracy whose government should be on the shoulders of the Son of Man, and who would restore righteousness and justice and honor among men. Every parable of Jesus relative to the Kingdom of Heaven has reference only to earthly conditions and bespeaks his burning passion to establish a state of Justice in human governments and social relations" (Christian Socialist, Dec. 15, 1908). According to W. H. Watts the Kingdom of God founded by Christ was a communal brotherhood or a federation of communal societies already existing (Christian Socialist, Aug. 1, 1907).

That Christ's Kingdom has for its object the attainment of heavenly happiness, or that its existence extends beyond the limits of earthly life, is likewise directly or indirectly denied. Colonel Larned maintains that in accordance with Christ's teaching, the true attitude of man is not to seek post mortem bliss (Christian Socialist, March 15, 1907).

Rev. John D. Long, D.D., is still clearer on the subject. In an Easter sermon delivered in the Parkside Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., 1909, he explains the text of St. Paul, Coloss. iii, 3, as follows: "Like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. So, too, as in the text, those who were living in the glory of the resurrection were to seek the things that are above, which make for the elevation of human life and for its enrichment. These things above are not the things of a future life, but heavenly things that are to be realized in a new civilization on earth. Ruskin and others have dwelt on the other-worldliness that they opine should characterize the Christian. This is a cardinal error contrary to the teachings of Jesus and to the expectation of the earthly Church. They (the early Christians) had an 'other-worldliness,' but it was of this earth" (New York Evening Call, April 13, 1909). It is scarcely necessary to remark that Christian Socialists who with W. H. Watts regard heaven as an unravelled mystery, or rather an absurdity (Christian Socialist, May 15, 1907), or who like Prof. Rauschenbusch deny the immortality of the soul, do and consistently must disown any connection of the Kingdom of God with a future life after death.

It matters not that according to Rev. E. E. Carr as well as Dr. Long, the Kingdom of Christ is both spiritual and temporal and takes hold on both the present and the future life. For in their opinion the temporal is primary, the spiritual only secondary in importance. "True," says Dr. Long, "Christianity takes hold upon the life beyond, but if we are to judge the teaching of its founder its primary concern is with the life that is now" (Christian Socialist, June 1, 1909). Mr. Carr makes of personal salvation, which brings happiness in the other world, and salvation of the people, which means deliverance from temporal evils, the following appreciation: "All true Socialists, like Moses, would choose the salvation of mankind rather than the personal favor of God and personal immortality. Moses loved the people more than he loved God, or his own soul—which was the supreme proof that God was in him. The sole object of Jesus, and the sole object of Socialism, is to save the people" (Ibid., Jan. 1, 1909). Moreover it remains yet to be seen what the Reverend gentlemen understand by a future and spiritual life. The conception of the Kingdom of God as merely a temporal and earthly institution fully harmonizes with the views which Christian Socialists hold on salvation and redemption as also on the gospel and the mission of Christ.

"The gospel of Christ," says George Willis Cooke, "is a social gospel. Its chief feature is a fellowship of those willing to serve, a Kingdom in which kindness shall rule, a republic of man in which justice shall be promoted. The proclamation of his purpose set forth social duties as those he desired to advance, including relief to the oppressed, opportunity of the poor, freedom to the enslaved." (Ibid., Aug. 15, 1906.) Christ came, according to Herbert Cash (Ibid., Dec. 15, 1908), to save the world and redeem society, not primarily to prepare men for heaven, according to P. H. Strobell (Ibid., July 1, 1907), as a champion of a great movement for a righteous civil order. When Christ declared his mission (Luke iv, 18), he spoke as Mr. Carr opines (Ibid., Jan. 1, 1909), only of temporal evils from which he was to deliver men without mentioning souls at all, and taught, as H. Esell explains, a salvation here and now in the flesh with the promise of more life, comfort, and happiness here on earth. (Ibid., July 1, 1908.)

Professor Rauschenbusch comprises in terse language these utterances when he says: "The Kingdom of God is a collective conception involving the whole social life of man. It is not a matter of saving human atoms, but of saving the social organism. It is not a matter of getting individuals into heaven, but of transforming the life on earth into harmony with heaven." ("Christianity and the Moral Crisis," p. 65.)

Undoubtedly if Christ has come to save the social organism, not human individuals, to champion a better civil order, not to prepare men for heaven, to bring joy and happiness in the flesh and upon earth, not to redeem their souls for an immortal life after death, he must have founded only an earthly and temporal, not an eternal and spiritual kingdom.

A meeting of priests and ministers lately reported in the New York newspapers has excited the curiosity of some readers of AMERICA. We can assure them that if it took place at all it was perfectly harmless. Vice is not afraid of men who fear to act in the open.

Death of Cardinal Satolli

His Eminence Francesco Cardinal Satolli died in Rome on January 8. In recent times no figure was more in evidence in the College of Cardinals among whom his keen intelligence and activity won him a place of honor. He was born at Marsciano, in Perugia, July 21, 1839, studied in the diocesan seminary, and took his doctorship of philosophy at the Sapienza in Rome. In 1880, Pope Leo XIII, who had known and appreciated him during his episcopate in Perugia, called him to Rome as professor in the Apollinare and Propaganda Colleges, and in that capacity he soon gave evidence of his masterly speculative genius. Soon after, he was appointed Rector of the Græco-Ruthenian College, and in 1886 became head of the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics, which flourished under his care. In 1888 he was named titular Archbishop of Lepanto.

Cardinal Satolli first came to this country in 1889 as the Pope's representative at the celebration of the centennial of the establishment of the Catholic hierarchy of the United States, the first Catholic Congress, and the inauguration of the Catholic University in Washington. In 1893 he was here again as delegate to examine into the affairs of the Church, and to represent the Pope at the Chicago Columbian Exhibit, reaching New York on October 12 with Mgr. Denis O'Connell, then Rector of the American College in Rome. While in Chicago he offered the prayer at the closing exercises of the World's Fair, October 21. Later, from November 16 to 19, he attended the third annual conference of the archbishops of the United States held in New York City and offered fourteen propositions for the settling of the education controversy then agitating the Church in the United States, a document, he declared, which represented the mind of the Sovereign Pontiff. He also informed the prelates that it was the Pope's desire to appoint a permanent Apostolic Delegation in the United States with the concurrence of the archbishops. Mgr. O'Connell returned to Rome on December 17, and on January 17 sent back this cable from there to Mgr. Satolli: "The Apostolic Delegation is permanently established in the United States and you are confirmed as the first Delegate." The Rev. F. Z. Rooker, of Albany, N. Y. (the late Bishop of Jaro, P. I.), was named as the secretary.

The establishment of a permanent Delegation marked a period of transition as well as of development of the Church in this country. This new bond with Rome was to strengthen the Episcopate while it handled ecclesiastical matters more expeditiously. The task was a delicate one; the success with which it was accomplished was a tribute to the insight of character possessed by the Sovereign Pontiff, and a proof that Mgr. Satolli knew thoroughly the mind of his august patron and had the sterling qualities and the tact requisite to secure the acceptance of the wishes of Leo XIII by all. During the first year of his permanent residence here he became at his own request a member of the faculty of the Catholic University, where he delivered a series of lectures on the philosophy of St. Thomas, which may be said to have closed his long and brilliant career as a professor. On November 29, 1895, he was created a cardinal priest, receiving the red biretta at the hands of Cardinal Gibbons in Baltimore on January 5, 1896. Relinquishing the office of Apostolic Delegate to Archbishop Martinelli, he sailed for Rome on October 17, and received the other insignia of his new rank from the Pope on December 3. On June 22, 1903, he was promoted to the dignity of Cardinal-Bishop and transferred to the suburban see of Frascati. His third visit here was in the following year to officiate at the wedding of the daughter of his friend, Marquis Martin Maloney, at Springlake, N. J., on June 22, 1904. After this ceremony he went to the St. Louis Exposition and made a short tour in the West.

Cardinal Satolli was for several years Prefect of the Congregation of Studies. He was a philosopher and a theologian rather than a diplomat or an administrator, and up to the end he remained devoted to speculative thought. Among his writings are a valuable "Commentary on the Summa of St. Thomas" in five volumes, essays on the "Beautiful and True in Relation to the Study of Nature," and on the "Variety of Systems and Essential Defects of Modern Theology." His treatise on Concordats will always be valuable, as will likewise his all too little known treatise on philosophy, which is remarkable for its clearness. A contribution from his pen on "The Election of Ministers in the Primitive Church," appeared in the American Ecclesiastical Review, June, 1893. A convinced follower of St. Thomas, he ably seconded Pope Leo's efforts to bring back the Thomistic philosophy. As Archpriest of St. John Lateran he took part in the restoration of that basilica, but did not quite approve of the artistic detail of the monument to Leo XIII there. He took an active part in the election of Pope Pius X. A facile and eloquent speaker, he was a pleasant conversationalist, and his house in the far off Lateran quarter was a place of constant pilgrimages for his many friends from Europe and America.

Though his years had reached the scriptural limit, it was hoped that he had yet many years of service to the Church. By the Catholics of the United States he will be specially remembered as the first of the distinguished Apostolic Delegates accredited with a permanent mission to this country, and the first foreign Cardinal ever to touch these shores.

The Children of Our Lady of Loretto

A service of exceptional interest was held last Sunday evening at the mission church of Our Lady of Loretto in the heart of the Italian quarter, New York City. There was the singing of ancient Christmas carols, a cantata, "The Star of Bethlehem," with a sermon by the little son of an Italian workman, nine-year-old John Fugarino. The procession of the singing children through the aisles, the Shepherds and the Kings and the Angels, all personated by the little ones, the unaffected modesty of the select choir after they had taken their places in the sanctuary which was brilliant with lights and decorations, the musical richness and incomparable tone of the soft Italian voices, exquisitely trained, their reverential attitude when during Benediction they stood in graceful phalanx on either side like angels guarding the Sacred Host and chanted the Benediction hymns, made up a scene of fairy-like enchantment not soon to be forgotten by those present.

Rev. William H. Walsh, S.J., the rector of the church, is an enthusiast on children's singing, and out of six hundred boys and girls he had trained as choristers he picked thirty boys for the occasion. It is a pity that the service was not held in one of the large churches of the city where the results accomplished could be witnessed by thousands instead of the few hundreds that were crowded into the little chapel. The result would be a wider interest in devoted labors of priests and laity among the Italian immigrants. The beautiful service suggests what might be accomplished in other Italian parishes to develop the natural instinct of the race for what is beautiful in art and religion and to hold fast the Italian children to the faith of their fathers. Other agencies are active in weaning them away, and whatever money can do to proselytize is daily made use of by Baptists and Presbyterians and Episcopalians to ensnare Christ's little ones. Under the pretext of educating the benighted foreigners, halls are fitted up, lessons given gratis in English and in music, and the liturgy of the Catholic Church openly used as a decoy.

Catholics are generous where the Faith is concerned. But the needs and the possibilities must be brought home to them before their interest is aroused. The existence of more than forty parishes in the Archdiocese of New York, given over largely if not exclusively to the care of the Italians, speaks loudly of the zeal and devotion of the Most Rev. Archbishop and his clergy for the entire flock committed to their charge. An organized effort, in which the laity would assume a prominent part, to rescue these children from the vultures that prey on them, and to furnish them with the means in the shape of schools and special classes in which the study of the useful and the artistic are combined, would go far towards counteracting the agency of evil and preventing the leakage from the Church now unhappily existent.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Catholic School Question in British Politics

LONDON, DECEMBER 29, 1909.

Last Sunday in all the Catholic churches of England and Wales a joint pastoral letter of the bishops was read which dealt with the question of the elections. The letter begins by urging on all the duty of praying that the electorate may be guided to a wise decision:

"Catholics, bound by their religious duty to love their country and to be keenly interested in its welfare, cannot be indifferent to the serious political crisis through which we are now passing. Whatever view we may take of the various questions which divide the different schools of political thought, we know that their ultimate decision must vitally affect the future of the nation."

After directing public prayers to be said in the churches the bishops go on to say:

"While in the case of practically every other matter of current political discussion, Catholics will be found holding widely different opinions, there is one question so vitally affecting the interests of religion that there is no room for difference of opinion among those who have the interests of the Church really at heart. This matter of paramount importance is the efficient maintenance of our distinctively Catholic schools. You know the history of the last four years; how repeated efforts have been made to pass laws which would have done irreparable harm to our Catholic schools; how, in spite of every representation, the Government refused to make any arrangements which the bishops could have accepted as a definite settlement of the question. The united efforts of the bishops and clergy and of the laity, without distinction of political party, were able to resist, and with God's blessing, ultimately to overcome these repeated attacks upon our schools, but we shall not easily forget the terrible anxiety which we have passed through and the memory thereof makes us view the future with most serious disquietude, for we have no kind of assurance that these attempts will not be renewed. As we have so often pointed out, the question, in our eyes, is in no sense a political one. It is a matter of vital religious import."

They therefore direct that in each constituency the candidates shall be asked to give a pledge that they will support fair treatment for the Catholic schools, and they urge Catholic voters to sink all merely political issues and vote only for those who give a satisfactory pledge on this point. In order to concentrate attention on the one all important issue they direct that candidates shall not be questioned on their views as to the king's coronation declaration, or other minor Catholic disabilities, or on convent inspection. Finally they "beg the clergy to abstain from all allusion in church to the political crisis," except in asking for prayers and communicating to their people the replies given by candidates to the question as to the schools.

I must say frankly that it is to be feared that this grave and moderately worded admonition from the bishops will not unite the Catholic vote. The Irish element is strong in most of the places where there is any large body of Catholics, and Mr. Asquith's promise to make Home Rule a plank in his platform will secure many of their votes for Radical candidates whose views on the school question are unsatisfactory. I do not for a moment say that in thus voting the Irish electors will be conscious of disloyalty to the interests of Catholic education. They will be influenced by Mr. Dillon's oft-repeated saying that with more than eighty Home Rule members in the House of Commons the Government will be unable to carry legislation against our schools. Unhappily this is an illusion. Mr. Birrell's Bill was carried in spite of a splendid fight made by the Irish members. It was the House of Lords that prevented its enactment, and if Mr. Asquith returns to power the House of Lords will be crippled. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George have both pledged themselves that if the Liberals remain in office an Education Bill that will satisfy the Nonconformists will be part of their program.

While our bishops have directed the priests to keep politics out of the pulpit during the elections, every Nonconformist chapel in the land is being turned into an electioneering agency, and sermons are being preached from their pulpits that are undisguised political addresses. "No dogma in the schools"—"no denominational tests for teachers," "neither Rome nor Canterbury on the rates"—these are the watchwords of Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregationalist preachers. They denounce "clericalism in politics," but their whole church organization becomes for the time a political machine.

The Daily Mail, while denouncing the Government for allying itself with the Socialists, has opened its columns day after day to the most prominent and influential Socialist in England, Mr. Blatchford, in order to work the German scare for all it is worth. The object of this campaign is to frighten voters into supporting the Unionists as the party most likely to maintain a strong army and navy. The veteran Socialist Hyndman is a supporter of Blatchford's militarist views, but most of the party are opposed to this warlike talk.

It is pitiful to see a Conservative journal of wide circulation enlisting Blatchford's services for vote-snatching purposes. It can hardly fail to increase his personal influence and attract more readers to his own paper, the Clarion, in which he not only advocates Socialism, but vigorously attacks all Christian ideals, on the avowed ground that the Christian religion is an obstacle to the Socialist propaganda. But on both sides the professional politicians and their henchmen in the press are in too many instances thinking only of what will attract votes, and there is a terrible outpouring of mendacious misrepresentation and unfair argument in both the opposing camps. It is enough to make one sick of politics.

By a friendly arrangement between the Liberals and the Labor party in most cases the splitting of the pro-Budget vote will be avoided by a combination of forces. This will secure the return of a strong Labor contingent, at the expense of the official Liberal element. It will have a more Socialistic tinge than in the last Parliament, for the Socialists have driven several men out of politics who were Labor men only and would not accept the Socialist program. Thus Mr. Richard Bell, a veteran Labor member, and for many years the tried and trusted representative of the railway workers, has had to abandon his candidature, because he refused to be a mere delegate of Socialism. In about a dozen English constituencies, and two or three in Scotland, the Socialists have refused to withdraw their man in favor of the Liberal candidate. In all these cases the seat is actually held by a Liberal and the result of the split vote will be that in most of them a Conservative will be elected. A. H. A.

DECEMBER 20, 1909.

One of the latest developments of social life in Paris is the increasing number of lectures, or "cours" and "conferences," as they are called here, that take place daily on subjects religious, social, historical and literary. There is no denying that fashion has something to say in the matter and that many a Paris "élégante" considers it good form to attend these lectures, but as, in this case, fashion serves a good cause, it would be invidious to criticize motives, where results are evidently excellent.

Even more strongly than the written word, the spoken word carries knowledge, conviction and enthusiasm to those whom it reaches. The French tongue seems to lend itself more easily and gracefully to the purpose than our stiffer and more forcible English language, just as the French temperament, impressionable and artistic, possesses certain inborn gifts of speech that are more rare among our reserved and self-conscious countrymen. The greater number of these conferences are intended for women and young girls, belonging to the upper classes, and there is no doubt that they bring a more serious element into lives that are chiefly absorbed by society duties and pleasures. Without demanding any great mental effort on the part of their hearers, the speakers at these Parisian conferences, open out new vistas of thought and knowledge and this, in itself, is a fortunate circumstance.

The real campaign of lectures and conferences may be said to begin in January, when the Paris season has commenced in earnest and the celebrated Academician, M. Jules Lemaitre's lessons on Fénelon promise to be the literary event of the spring of 1910, but, in the meantime, certain well-known lecturers have taken up their subjects and, during the last month, many interesting "cours" have attracted a sympathetic and eager crowd. At "le Foyer," a social institution founded for the training of young girls by a wealthy and devout Catholic, Madame T., a series of conferences have just taken place on the provinces of France. These particular lectures are in themselves worthy of notice, the speakers being men of talent, whose treatment of their subjects is marked by much artistic and literary feeling; moreover, they are the outcome of a movement called "le régionalisme," that is fast gaining ground throughout France. As our readers know, the kingdom was, before 1789, divided into provinces, a division far more rational, besides being more picturesque, than the present division by "départements." With the ancient provinces are connected historical traditions, local customs, traits of speech and temperament that give a distinctive character to the Bretons, Normans, Gascons, Provençaux, Burgundians, Tourangeaux, Flemish, as the case may be. Within the last few years, efforts have been made to revive or to preserve the local industries, the historical or literary treasures of the provinces, for, if they no longer have an official existence, they possess a lasting interest and their history is closely bound up with that of France. The leaders of this movement do not pretend to reestablish the official and postal divisions that existed before 1789, an absurd and impossible task, but merely to guard against oblivion the picturesque or artistic memories of the old French provinces, that form a valuable portion of the national heritage. With this object, many societies have been founded: archeological, antiquarian, historical and literary; ancient buildings, doomed to destruction, have been preserved; local poems, traditions or legends have been sifted and reprinted, in some cases, local industries, such as lace making in Normandy, have been revived.

The conferences at "le Foyer" are another manifestation of the same spirit. They were inaugurated on November 29 by the eminent writer, M. Henry Bordeaux, who, himself a native of Savoy, spoke charmingly of his own land. He set forth the moral temperament and gifts of its sons, rather than its natural beauties, which any guide book is able to describe, and chose St. Francis of Sales as a typical Savoyard, at once gentle and firm, poetical and practical, sweet and strong.

A week later, another speaker took for his theme his native country of Gascony. M. Fernand Laudet, the director of a popular magazine, La Revue Hebdomadaire, is a graceful writer as well as an excellent orator. He described, with a subtle charm, the inner soul of the country that gave to France, Henri IV, her most popular king, and to the world St. Vincent of Paul, active, broad-minded and essentially practical. Last Monday M. Charles le Goffir did the same for the province of Brittany which, as our readers know, has more than any other district kept its faith, its national habits and beliefs, even its superstitions. Although three hundred years have passed since the marriage of its last independent sovereign, Duchess Anne, made Brittany French, its people are still a separate race, they have a distinct personality, to which they cling with pathetic faithfulness, a poetry, dreamy and melancholy in tone, but at times exceedingly beautiful; old customs that are handed down from one generation to another as a precious heritage.

Nothing can be more different from the alert, quick-witted, self-satisfied Gascon, than the dreamy, unpractical Breton, but these very contrasts are interesting and the strength of a nation lies, in a certain measure, in the varied gifts of its sons that, completing each other, contribute to the general welfare. The "Régionalistes" campaign is one that excites interest and sympathy and a conference on la Provence, the land of the sun, is forthcoming shortly. Another centre of lectures is the association called "L'Action Sociale de la femme," but here social subjects are more to the front and the audience is almost entirely feminine.

At the "Institut Catholique," the Catholic University of Paris, the "cours" of a young professor, M. Gustave Gautherot, are deservedly attracting attention. M. Gautherot has taken for his subject a well-worn theme, the Revolution of 1789, an upheaval, whose after-effects still control the destinies of modern France, but he treats it from a special standpoint and with undoubted talent.

The aim is to prove that, contrary to the generally accepted notion, the Revolution was not the spontaneous outbreak of a trampled down and miserable people, but a movement that had been carefully prepared and fostered by men with a definite object in view. That certain abuses existed under the old "régime" is an undoubted fact, but these abuses, of which so much has been said, were the pretext, rather than the cause of the Revolution. M. Taine, who was no clerical, has some striking passages to this effect. M. Gautherot prepares his lessons according to the modern system of criticism, he disregards second hand evidence, goes straight to the public archives, leaves nothing to chance or to the imagination and supports his assertions by first rate proofs. If these assertions are startling, it is because truth is often stranger than fiction. The lesson delivered on December 11 was particularly felicitous. The subject was the meeting of the States General in the spring of 1789, a crucial moment in the history of the French monarchy. Among the deputies who congregated at Versailles, many were well-disposed men, but totally out of touch with the new currents of opinion, others, at their head the Duke of Orleans, Philippe Égalité, had a preconceived plan and were the real makers of the Revolution. The philosophical teaching of the eighteenth century had destroyed the ideals of religious faith and respect for authority; these safeguards having disappeared, the field was free for evil passions to have full play. The blindness, credulity and optimism of the well-thinking and religiously disposed men of the day made the great upheaval possible.

M. Gautherot has a good delivery, clear and rapid, he endeavors to convince his hearers rather than to stir their emotions, he is accurate, rather than poetical, but, almost in spite of himself, the tragedy of his theme gives it a dramatic interest and certain traits of 1789 are curiously up to date in 1909. Other conferences, on varied subjects, chiefly historical and literary, are announced for the coming spring. Besides M. Lemaître's lectures on Fénelon, other Academicians, M. d'Haussonville, M. de Ségur, M. Frédéric Masson, will treat the subject that they have made their special province.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Political Divisions in Belgium

LOUVAIN, DECEMBER 10, 1909.

The military bill that has been troubling the peace of the country for the last few months has at last been passed in the House. The vote was 49 Catholics against 104 allied Catholics, Liberals and Socialists. The country is by this time almost used to this anomalous situation and from all sides reports come pouring in of resolutions taken by the different Catholic associations ratifying the course pursued by the Government. This can be taken as a safe sign that the Catholic people are gradually won over, and each day the probability of a crisis grows less. The measure passes immediately to the senate. There the Catholic majority is divided almost exactly as in the House, but by the peculiar state of the institution, there will be needed only ten Catholic votes to assure the passing of the bill, which votes it will assuredly get. Many, however, are indulging the hope that the Senate will amend the bill in such a manner that when it returns to the House, it will meet the approval of the whole Right who can then vote it without the hated help of the Left.

On the last day of the discussion in the house a significant incident occurred, one that twice necessitated the suspension of the session, and caused the death, by heart-failure, of one of the press representatives. It was when M. Beernaert, the most highly and most justly honored of all Belgium's statesmen, rose to say he could not vote with the Government, though in the previous vote he had declared for the suppression of substitution, the great point at issue, for, as he said, though this latter was the dream of his life, it came into the world in such unnatural circumstances that he could not, in this instance, give his adherence to the Government who had fathered it. All during his speech the venerable Minister of State—he is 82 years old—was interrupted by the frantic insults of the Socialists, but, as everyone realizes, he is too high placed in the public esteem to be reached by the accusations hurled at him. The next questions before the House are the Congo Budget and the Congo Reform Bill.

The Nicaragua Imbroglio

Nicaragua has not yet afforded the Dove of Peace a place where her foot might rest. After his enforced resignation, Zelaya undertook to leave the country on H. B. M. S. Shearwater, but the British minister, acting under orders from the Foreign Office, laid down as a necessary condition that the discomfited Executive should solemnly promise never to return to his distracted country. Objecting to the plan, Zelaya left on the Mexican gunboat Gral. Guerrero, in plain sight of the Americans who could have seized him, had they so willed, before he was aboard. The trip from Corinto to the port of Salina Cruz should have taken three days in normal conditions, but the Mexicans, possibly fearing pursuit and boarding, set their passenger ashore at Salina Cruz fifty hours after he had sought their protection. He proceeded at once to the city of Mexico, where he received visitors and spoke with more volubility than discretion until advice, probably from wise old Ignacio Mariscal, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, made him more close-mouthed.

General Estrada, strong in the support of Guatemala, even if formal recognition has not been granted him by the United States, plainly thinks that he is the one leader qualified to direct the destinies of his country. Hopes of reconciliation or of an accommodation through the mediation of General Fornos Diaz of the revolutionary army, who was personally on friendly terms with President Madriz, Zelaya's successor, were dashed to pieces by the accidental drowning of Diaz while on his mission of peace to Managua.

President Madriz has relieved the situation by abrogating some of Zelaya's most offensive measures regarding monopolies, but he has shown no intention of resigning in favor of Estrada. Thus far, the active military operations have taken place in the most thinly settled part of the republic. It remains to be seen what the people, civilians and soldiers, will do, if Estrada enters the lake country nearer Managua.

Whether Madriz acted from worldly prudence or from a sense of justice in denouncing Zelaya's execution of the two Americans, is a question not easily answered, but his move certainly served as a check to any unfriendly action by our Government. Should Nicaragua demand Zelaya's extradition with the intention of putting him on trial for abuse of power or even for murder, it remains to be seen what course Mexico would pursue. It seems plausible at this writing that whatever reasons might be alleged by Nicaragua, Señor Mariscal would find some way of showing all diplomatic courtesy and keeping Zelaya in Mexico. By common consent political offenders are not considered extraditable, and here Mariscal could rest his foot. If the United States should back up Nicaragua's demand, the affair would be much more critical. The impression in Mexico is that Zelaya will speedily wing his flight to Europe, where some friends of his have preceded him. In the meantime, Nicaragua men and boys are marching and countermarching and shooting and suffering and wondering what it is all about.

A Non-Religious Funeral in Montreal

L'Action Sociale, of Quebec, in its issue of December 27, published a letter from its Montreal correspondent, who reported that the late Dr. P. Salomo Côté, one of the editors of Le Canada, had been given a non-religious funeral, the cortège being followed by Hon. L. O. David, senator, Judges Lafontaine, Saint-Pierre and Choquet, and about one hundred and twenty other citizens. The remains were taken to the crematory for incineration. On December 30, there appeared in L'Action Sociale a letter from Senator L. O. David, explaining that when he accepted an invitation to attend this funeral he was not aware of anything that would prevent him, as a Catholic, from accepting it. The funeral procession had already started when he learned that, instead of the body being taken to the Catholic cemetery, it was going to be cremated in the Protestant cemetery. He then noticed that there was no cross on the hearse, and he immediately quitted the ranks of the walking mourners and returned to his home. The subsequent reports of certain newspapers threw additional light on the character of this ceremony and convinced him that he must "disengage his responsibility." The Senator furthermore wrote that he was authorized by Judges Lafontaine and Choquet to say that they were present at this funeral under the same misunderstanding as himself. This is probably the first time that a nominal Catholic has been carried to the graveyard without any religious ceremony and with so large an attendance of prominent so-called Catholics. The Action Sociale was the only Catholic daily to protest against this public scandal, which is significant of the growth of religious indifference among men who, having been brought up as Catholics, have gradually been tainted with freethinking principles and anti-clerical sentiments. Le Soleil, of Quebec, a professedly Catholic paper, edited by a native of France, was particularly bitter against L'Action Sociale for denouncing the scandal and accused the latter of acting through hatred of the late Dr. P. S. Côté. L'Action Sociale replied that it did not even suspect the existence of Dr. P. S. Côté until it heard of his death and funeral.

Galileo's Tercentenary

In a notice of a celebration at Amherst College, January 8, of the tercentenary of Galileo's first astronomical discovery with the refracting telescope, the Sun of this city tells how some inquisitive students questioned Prof. David Todd's assertion that Jupiter's four moons were first discovered by Galileo. The authorities referred to by the students credit Simon Marius with the discovery of the Jovian moons in December, 1609, though with the telescope invented by Galileo. On the same good authority, they might have questioned another statement of Dr. Todd in which Christopher Scheiner, a learned Jesuit astronomer and mathematician of the seventeenth century, is made to deny the possibility of spots on the sun. Dr. Todd should know that it is commonly admitted that the three astronomers, Galileo, Fabricius and Scheiner, through independent investigations and observations, discovered the sun-spots within short intervals of one another, and that each made known the discovery in separate and independent publications. Father Scheiner, it is true, was mistaken in his first explanation of the phenomenon which he discovered, but he soon admitted his mistake. Galileo was in no better plight in regard to the discovery, since he, too, blundered in his first attempt to explain the sun-spots. Naturally in the controversy as to priority of discovery which followed the publication of the observations of Galileo, Fabricius and Scheiner, some sharp things were said on all sides—but it is a late day to attempt to deny to Father Scheiner the honor of early knowledge of sun-spots, as does Dr. Todd in his off-hand talk to the young astronomers of Amherst.

When Is a Door Not a Door?

Kansas City, the P. E. diocese, has a diocesan seal of the most ecclesiastical appearance. There is a shield looking not unlike a Gothic chasuble, bearing what at first sight appears to be a huge pallium. We know where Canterbury got its pallium, from the Pope who made it the metropolitan see. But where did Kansas City get the pallium? The explanation is simplicity itself to one who knows or who reads the Living Church, which is the same thing, and may be given in the form of the old riddle. When is a pallium not a pallium? Answer: When it is an abstract form expressing the junction of the Missouri and Kansas Rivers at Kansas City. The ears of corn on each side of what we may call the stem of the abstract sign are easily explained; for Missouri and Kansas are great corn-growing states. But the mitre, the key and the crosier are doubtless abstract forms also; and we would like to know what they mean in Kansas City. The crescent moon between the arms of the abstract form is, of course, another abstract form. But this we can interpret. It expresses the genus mutabile of P. E. prelates.

A Lesson from Montreal

A curious though indirect and not yet publicly noticed revelation of the astounding ignorance of Catholic activity which obtains in the non-Catholic world is the sudden and widespread agitation among the most prominent non-Catholic citizens of Montreal for the immediate equipment of an emergency hospital on the plea that it was an urgent necessity because there were absolutely no beds to spare for typhoid patients in any of the hospitals, while all the time, as Archbishop Bruchési informed the citizens' committee, there were over three hundred beds ready for typhoid patients in the Catholic hospitals of Montreal. Three hundred and fifteen is about six times the number the new Typhoid Emergency Hospital, improvised with a great flourish of trumpets and high praise of self-sacrificing citizens and subsidized by donations amounting already to fifty thousand dollars, can accommodate. Now one could understand this ignorance of the actual resources of a city in such places as Toronto or Victoria, B. C., where Catholics are a comparatively uninfluential minority and therefore do not attract much attention. But it is very difficult to realize the purblindness, as to easily ascertainable facts, of philanthropic and generous non-Catholic citizens in such an overwhelmingly Catholic city as Montreal. Not only is the vast majority of the population Catholic, but the government of the entire province of which Montreal is the largest city, and of that city itself, is in the hands of Catholics, who are always ready to let non-Catholics know what the numerous charitable institutions of the Catholic Church are doing. And yet the intelligent ladies and gentlemen of the Citizens' Emergency Fund never discovered, till after they had got fifty beds ready in a factory swiftly transformed into an emergency hospital, that there were about six times as many beds free of cost to the poor in Catholic hospitals. If such ignorance prevails as to contemporary events what wonder that the ignorance of the non-Catholic world as to the past history of the Catholic body should be so dense? Once a man has adopted as a first principle the utter impossibility of Catholics doing anything praiseworthy he must suffer the consequences of his ignorant contempt.

A Physician's Warning

A very sensible and instructive article in the December American Journal of the Medical Sciences, by John K. Mitchell, M.D., calls attention to the danger and exposes the practice and pretensions of the Emmanuel Movement. The Emmanuelists make the occasional failures of all physicians and the inefficiency of some, a charge against medical practice in general, while the very best practitioners, they say, are materialists and therefore incapable of treating psychological cases. Dr. Mitchell retorts the charges moderately but effectively. "The best men of our profession," he adds, "regard as a poor physician a mere mender of broken bones who is not concerned for the spirit as well as for the flesh." The assistance of an intelligent and tactful clergyman is welcomed; his authoritative re-assurance is often helpful; but Dr. Mitchell has usually found ministers of small helpfulness, sometimes from want of knowledge of the world and of men, and oftener from inexperience in mental disorders and from lack of training.

To his general experience of ministerial unhelpfulness the doctor makes one exception. He admits the much greater success with which the Roman Catholic priest handles such difficulties—of discriminating between nervousness and the imaginary ailments of hypochondriacs who "enjoy ill-health," and of proportioning doses rightly to emotional subjects—and he attributes this success of the priest not merely to the confessional, which is probably only one factor, but mentions his elaborate training, the intimate personal character of his relations with his congregation and his more absolute authority, as other important elements. We might add that the priest, far from interfering with the physician recognizes his authority in matters that pertain to his profession and works in accord with him. Contrary to the Emmanuelist theory the writer insists that the usual cause of hysteria and nervousness is not moral but physical; that suggestion, the standard psychotherapeutic prescription, will never cure organic troubles, though it may give temporary relief; and that in neurotic cases it weakens the will power and leaves the patient less capable of acquiring self-control, the faculty he is most in need of. Suggestion, he asserts, is hypnotism pure and simple and this surrender of one's personality, one's mental independence, into the hands of another, decreases the power of self-control, obviously weakening the will and produces chronic enfeeblement. So serious is this danger considered by all physicians of repute "that the use of hypnotism in any form, manner or degree is a matter which should be under legal control. It is a dangerous remedy in the hands of the best qualified medical man and utterly to be condemned when used by any one not a qualified and responsible physician." The warning is timely and the proposal is well worthy the consideration of our legislators.

Another Correction

A week or two ago we had to correct an account to which the Milwaukee Living Church gave currency, of a number of Catholics and a priest who were said to have passed over to Protestantism. The same paper in its number of January 1 publishes a letter concerning a certain Professor Bartoli who, once a Jesuit, has become a Protestant. The account given is incorrect. Father Bartoli was not a Doctor in Theology, for the simple reason that Jesuits do not take degrees in Theology. He was a writer on the Civiltà Cattolica, and St. Cyprian had about as much to do with his leaving the Church and associating himself with the Waldenses as the man in the moon. Some day, should occasion call for it, we may give the entire history, which is now in our possession.

Reports in local wholesale drygoods concerns tell of a curious economic evolution of the shirtwaist workers' strike. The manufacturers and employees in this trade are almost entirely Jews. As a result of the present strike it is declared that the manufacturers, although themselves Jews, are refusing to employ any but Christian women in their shops. They assert that the young Jewish women, like the men, are demoralized by Socialistic theories that make them antagonistic to all rational authority and discipline and utterly devoid of any sense of a personal duty and responsibility in regard to their work. Manufacturers are refusing to hire any more of them and are taking into their employment only Christian women uncontaminated by the subversive influence of Socialism. It is impossible, the leaders in this trade declare, to do business otherwise with any certainty of satisfactory results in the work given out.

It has leaked out, says El Tiempo, of Mexico, that at the Pan-American love feast in Washington, Andrew Carnegie, the guest of honor, took occasion in his remarks to compare the policies of Mr. Knox and Mr. Root towards the other American republics. As the comparison was very much in favor of Mr. Root, who was also present, Mr. Knox resented the criticism and informed Mr. Carnegie that his views on the Nicaragua question were out of order and that nobody had asked him to ventilate them. Calmer spirits then intervened and the unpleasant incident was drowned in the good cheer that followed. La Patria calls on all Latin Americans to unite against "Yankee rapacity and downright national depravity."

When lately it seemed that the costly Spanish punitive expedition had accomplished its purpose so fully as to warrant the return to Spain of a part of the troops, a fanatical Mussulman threatened to precipitate further warlike operations by preaching a holy war with the object of driving the Spaniards entirely out of the country. Military supplies have reached him from Germany.

LITERATURE

THE POSE IN LITERATURE

In a note introducing the second instalment of the "Japanese Letters of Lafcadio Hearn," in the Atlantic for January, the editor of the letters offers an explanation for the difference of attitude towards Japanese life and customs as observable in the works published by Hearn, and in his private letters. In the former Japan is etherealized and sublimated into a public defense, artistic and indirect, of the author's rejection of Christianity, and his adoption of a pagan creed and citizenship. In the letters, however, where we discover him off his guard and resting, so to speak, after his hours of forced posing, he is frank in his disgust and does not hesitate to speak of Japan and the Japanese in most disrespectful language.

The point is a valuable one to call attention to. We do not say Hearn was a hypocrite. He was merely an artist, whose search for beauty went astray for lack of compass and sextant. Whilst he was writing he believed everything, no matter how remote from his saner convictions, that he put down on paper. That is a characteristic of the literary temperament allowed to run wild. William Butler Yeats, for instance, calls on all the gods to testify to his firm belief in fairies and second sight and evocations of dark spirits; and yet we are sure Mr. Yeats can stroll at midnight through any graveyard in Christendom without so much as blenching. It is all a pleasant pretence—this enthusiasm about strange magics and occult doings in lonely moorlands under the winds and stars. Sensible persons do not say, "Pshaw! all nonsense!" They lend themselves momentarily to the illusion of the writer. They get some fun out of it: it is reminiscent of a youth which played seriously at being an Indian and attacking a stage-coach, or of being a scowling pirate and boarding a Spanish galleon freighted with gold from the Barbados.

But, alas! for the limitations of readers. They change the rich brew of the poet into a Circe's cup. The unfledged innocents and the literalists, who believe everything in print though it appears only in the magazine portion of a Sunday paper, and the uneasy consciences that welcome self-delusion from every quarter, take all this excellent fooling of the artists seriously. They read Lafcadio Hearn and begin to exalt Brahma and Confucius above all things in heaven and earth; they read William Butler Yeats and begin to feel a real grudge, that actually distresses them, against the hard, unpoetic commercialism of this age and the vulgar definiteness of Christian dogma.

Now, it is a safe wager that when Mr. Yeats puts away the powder-puff and rouge-pot after his little act before the public, he is just as sensible as you and I, and no more believes in leprechauns and sidhes than Lafcadio Hearn believed, when off literary duty, in the pure and delicious charm of Japanese paganism. The stout, self-sufficient, arrogant literary artist gives himself away in private letters which are published after his death. In undress he is not nearly so positive, nor does he put on so many fine airs, as when on the stage. No great writer is a hero to his private correspondent. Ruskin, who during a long life talked loud (and beautifully) and settled everything for the public in art, politics, religion and economics beyond any peradventure of doubt, shows in his letters a poor creature snivelling over his ignorances and harassed to the verge of madness by his self-questionings. St. Gaudens, the happy and successful sculptor, whose art was his life and consolation, dies; and his letters are published, and lo! he is discovered faltering and unhappy. Art was a step-mother to him in all that contributes to the deepest spiritual peace. And so we might prolong our list of instances.

The important thing to acquire is the recognition of a fixed fact in most of our literature, namely, the existence of a certain moral and intellectual leeway which writers allow themselves in order to reach their goal, a habit of gross exaggeration to produce a small impression, a projection of themselves phantasmagorically for the amusement and recreation of the world-weary. When you find an author saying, in the midst of rhetorical sky-rocket splendor, that literature and art are adequate substitutes for religion, you may be sure that in the confidential secrecy of his private letters he will inform you that "sometimes he hates the very sight of books and pictures," just as we all do during the very moments when our religion is the only consoling thing we possess. Again, because our female novelists make it the fashion to insert all sorts of ribald suggestion into their stories, it does not follow that they belong to the class of ladies described by Byron in the line: "Some play the devil, and then write a novel." No; they are in all likelihood very respectable matrons and maids exteriorly, with no experimental knowledge whatsoever of the life they lure their readers towards by vivid and sympathetic portrayals.

Why cannot we all make allowances for the pot-valor and swaggering atheism of literature? Why must so many innocent readers surrender themselves unreservedly to the spell of the reckless weavers of words, so that religion, and purity and honesty must lose for them all significance and beauty and value? The enchanter enters singing bravely:

"Come hither, lads, and hearken,

For a tale there is to tell,

Of the wonderful days a-coming

When all shall be better than well," and straightway a cult is formed and, for the sake of the wonderful days a-coming, curses are heaped upon all the wonderful days ago.

Our sorrow for those who are thus misled reacts in indignation towards the authors whose wayward fancies are like the dastardly lights of wreckers leading storm-driven ships to their doom. Charlotte Brontë has expressed our feelings in a passage which needs no eulogy. We regret that Thackeray suffers in it, the passage applies so appositely to scores of writers more guilty than he. "That Thackeray was wrong in his way of treating Fielding's character and vices, my conscience told me," she writes. "After reading that lecture I treble felt that he was wrong—dangerously wrong. Had Thackeray owned a son, grown, or growing up, and a son, brilliant but reckless—would he have spoken in that light way of courses that lead to disgrace and the grave? He speaks of it all as if he theorized; as if he had never been called on, in the course of his life, to witness the actual consequences of such failings; as if he had never stood by and seen the issue, the final result of it all. I believe, if only once the prospect of a promising life blasted on the outset by wild ways had passed close under his eyes, he never could have spoken with such levity of what led to its piteous destruction. Had I a brother yet living, I should tremble to let him read Thackeray's lecture on Fielding. I should hide it away from him. If, in spite of precaution, it should fall into his hands, I should earnestly pray him not to be misled by the voice of its charmer, let him charm never so wisely.

"Not that for a moment I would have had Thackeray to abuse Fielding, or even pharisaically to condemn his life; but I do most deeply grieve that it never entered into his heart sadly and nearly to feel the peril of such a career, that he might have dedicated some of his great strength to a potent warning against its adoption by any young man. I believe temptation often assails the finest manly natures; as the pecking sparrow or destructive wasp attacks the sweetest and mellowest fruit, eschewing what is sour and crude. The true lover of his race ought to devote his vigor to guard and protect; he should sweep away every lure with a kind of rage at its treachery. You will think this far too serious, I dare say; but the subject is serious, and one cannot help feeling upon it earnestly."

The strong common-sense and quivering eloquence of our quotation will, we venture to hope, excuse its length. It is a strong and just indictment of the literary pose, so charming frequently to the strongly anchored, such a lamentable rock of offense to the thoughtless and the untrained, who are always in a majority. The authors—male and female—who affect a splendid wickedness and take on, for public admiration, bantering airs towards the holy things of life, ought to be judged by the code embodied in Charlotte Brontë's condemnation, "charm they never so wisely."

Learning the Office. An Introduction to the Roman Breviary. By REV. JOHN J. HEDRICK, S.J. New York: Pustet & Co.

The purpose of this little book is to supply for those who are preparing for ordination and who, consequently, are not familiar with the Breviary, a guide to the Divine Office and such practical instructions regarding it as may take the place of a viva voce instructor, or recall and supplement his instructions. The larger books on the Office, sometimes studied in the seminaries, while full of information, are for this very reason more valuable to those who know the Office pretty well than to beginners, who cannot so easily find in them the practical details they need know.

The present book is not one to be read through at one or two sittings, but is a text-book to be studied with the Breviary in hand. Its principle is that of Wackford Squeers of Dotheboy's Hall, that whatever is learned should at once be put into practice. Hence, as far as possible, general principles are given when they are to be applied immediately. Moreover, repetition by cross references is used abundantly and to make this easier the paragraph numbers are given on each page as well as the page numbers.

One of the best features of the book is a separate loose leaf on which are given in detail the several parts of each hour of the Office. It would be hard to better it for convenience of arrangement. The book will also be of service to those of the laity who appreciate the wealth of devotion contained in the Office and would be glad to learn how to say it, either in Latin or in the English translation of the Marquis of Bute, recently issued in a second edition. The citation in Latin of phrases from the Breviary, which is necessary for seminarians, can hardly cause them any special difficulty.

The Question of the Hour. A Survey of the Position and Influence of the Catholic Church in the United States, by JOSEPH P. CONWAY. New York: The John McBride Company. $1.25, net.

This volume gives a bird's-eye view of what the Church once was and now is in our country. The heroic days of the Indian missions, the hardships of colonial times, and our rapid increase in numbers are set forth in short, striking sentences which say something. The irreligious and unbelieving elements, with their shallow brainpans and leather lungs, receive due attention in two full chapters.*

It would be well, however, to drop the "Carroll of Carrollton" myth (p. 117), and the Te Deum story (p. 118), for their presence weakens the force of other statements less easily examined. The writer does not brag too much about our Church membership, for he admits (p. 186) that we have not been uniformly successful in holding the spiritual allegiance of our own.

In his statistics of the principal religious denominations in our country (p. 229) we should like to see tabulated the number of American missionaries in foreign fields for each one of the various organizations. While it is consoling to dwell upon the suffering and trials endured by our forbears in the faith, it would be more profitable, to our way of thinking, to see what we are now doing in the cause for which they labored. His conclusions about church membership (p. 187), are surely not warranted as far as Methodists and Baptists are concerned, and are only partially true of the Presbyterians. Every publication of this kind should not only comfort us with a view of the past, but should inspire us to do our share towards making the present and the future not less glorious.

Present Day Preaching. By CHARLES L. SLATTERY, D.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

While this little book is brimful of hints and practical instructions for young clerical speakers, what strikes us as a manifestation of the inherent weakness of the Episcopalian position is seen in what the author has to say about the Sacraments (p. 131). No rightminded person can help grieving that a considerable body of earnest people should be without a recognized teacher on so vital a point as the nature and efficacy of those means of grace. Skill, dexterity and agility would seem to be necessary in the minister who might venture to mention the word in a sermon; he must needs be a theological acrobat or juggler. It is with real pleasure that we note his condemnation of those preachers (p. 116) who "overstep the bounds of decency in their frank portrayal of crime, which is apt to be for some weaker hearer a temptation rather than a warning." That statement has the ring of sober sense.

Religious unity, as understood by the author (p. 133), is to come from compromise, each denomination yielding something. Otherwise, there would result, at most, a mere confederacy, which he very properly rejects. Thus far, we have been quite unable to find any marked advance towards the realization of the one fold and one shepherd, except upon a platform so wide that its thickness is dangerously lessened. The various sects and even the schools of thought among the Episcopalians are separated by chasms which no human ingenuity, to our mind, will be able to fill up or even bridge over. And yet we applaud the striving of many after unity.

El Nuevo Testamento en Griego y Español por el P. JUAN JOSÉ DE LA TORRE de la Compañía de Jesús. St. Louis: B. Herder. $2.60 net.

The author's purpose, as he states in his preface, is to present a pure, correct and clear Spanish translation of the New Testament, directly from the Greek text of Frederick Brandscheid. To express in Spanish, without adding to or taking from or changing what the Holy Spirit dictated to the inspired writers, was a task of great patience, examination and labor, to which the learned author brought a spirit inured to deep study and full of love for the subject. The result is a volume which has been issued by the authority of the Master of the Sacred Apostolic Palace. The Greek and the Spanish text are on opposite pages, thus facilitating their comparison. The print is clear, and the paper and binding leave nothing to be desired.

The Catholic Directory, with an Ecclesiastical Register and Almanac for the year of Our Lord 1910. Seventy-third Annual Publication. Burns & Oates: London, 1910.

The "Catholic Directory" of Great Britain for 1910 gives the total number of archbishops and bishops in England, Scotland and Wales as 26, of priests 4,240. Twenty years ago there were 20 archbishops and bishops, and 2,791 priests. This is an increase among the clergy of 65% since 1890. Whether this represents a substantial addition of native clergy is not clear, as the Directory states that of the 1,514 Regulars serving in Great Britain many are French exiles. Like the clergy of the United States, a very large proportion, to judge from the list of names, are of Irish birth or descent. There is a formidable array of Mac's and O's—550 of them—that would make you look a second time at the headlines to be sure that you are not reading the "Catholic Directory" for Ireland but for England. The Kellys, with only two still clinging to the O, lead all the other Milesian patronymics with 38 to their credit. Then come 26 Murphys, 18 O'Connors and as many Byrnes, 17 O'Briens, 15 O'Reillys, 14 Lynches and 11 O'Sullivans, with Leahys and Lonergans, Kennedys and Kennys, Collinses and Connollys, Coffeys and Carrolls, and Blakes and Flanagans galore, recalling the days of Columbanus and the monks of Iona and the centuries that closely followed; though perhaps these priests of Milesian descent are engaged rather in keeping alive the Faith among the children of St. Patrick living in England, than in ministering to the Sassenach as their forefathers did.

The "Directory" is not a bare enumeration of the dioceses with the clergy and their residences. The General Index points to a lot of information most useful to the priests of Great Britain, and at least interesting to the English speaking clergy of other lands; such as, Acts of Parliament affecting Catholic adults and children in workhouses and pauper schools, Army and Navy Chaplains, Catholic Knights, Lords, Peers and Members of Parliament and numerous data about the Catholic Church in the British Empire. E. S.

In the Irish Ecclesiastical Record for December, the editor reviews favorably the new "History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century," by Dr. McCaffrey, of Maynooth. In approving the historian's independent attitude towards ecclesiastics of the past Dr. Hogan says: "They did what they thought was best for the time. They guarded the Faith and the highest interests of their country with unselfish devotion, and succeeded in the course they adopted far better than any other hierarchy or priesthood in Europe. Dr. McCaffrey does well in leaving to others the congenial task of blaming them where blame can be justly avoided." The book gives just proportion to the religious educational and benevolent work of the Catholic Church in all lands. Dr. Hogan has also an interesting chapter on Macaulay's defence of Maynooth and of Catholic rights. Dr. Coffey continues his learned and discriminating study of "The New Knowledge and Its Limitations," and Rev. S. Wigmore shows that Sir Robert Kane's classic work, "The Industrial Resources of Ireland," anticipated in 1845 the contention of the leaders of the recent Industrial Movement, and amply supports their claim, that Ireland's resources, if developed, could alone support three times the present population. The possibility of utilizing Ireland's enormous water power in the production of electricity is an additional resource which Kane could not foresee. The book notices inform us that Mgr. O'Riordan, Rector of the Roman College, has issued in pamphlet form his lecture on "The Struggle for Liberty in Ireland and England," which was delivered in the pontifical academy in Rome and printed in the Revista Internazionale di Scienze Sociali. Dr. Hogan insists that Catholics throughout the British dominions should combine to wipe out "the abomination of the Royal Oath. No Catholic is worthy of the name who does not resent from the depths of his soul this monstrous insult on the Real Presence of his Redeemer in the Eucharist."

The fourth instalment of Mr. Roosevelt's "African Game Trails" appears in the January number of Scribner's Magazine. Another article, profusely and picturesquely illustrated, and more human in its appeal, is "The Midwinter Gardens of New Orleans," by George W. Cable. In most Southern cities house-gardens abound, prettily planted with shrubberies, vines and flowers, but New Orleans is the mistress in the art. Mr. Cable makes a fascinating plea for the introduction of "the gardening art and its joys" to the North, where "spring, summer and autumn come overlaid with their gifts," thus to "make fairer, richer and stronger the social, civic and national life." Brander Matthews contributes a just appreciation of Molière's attitude towards the physicians of his time. Medical scholars "have constant praise for the certainty with which he seized the spirit" of the Louis XIV physicians. "His was no haphazard criticism; it was rooted in knowledge . . . Molière had had thorough instruction in the official philosophy as the Jesuits imparted it to their students . . . He was by training fitted to understand the philosophic foundation on which were raised all the theories promulgated by the Faculty of Medicine . . . So it was that he detested vain theorizing and the building up of formulas and of classifications into rigid systems, false to the facts of life as he saw them with his own eyes." But while he laughed at their theories he was on the best of terms with the theorists. Among other articles worth reading is "Monarchical Socialism in Germany, by Elmer Roberts.

As is usual at the reception of a new member of the French Academy, two Academicians deliver a panegyric of the deceased Academician whose place has just been filled. The departed one this time—December 24—was François Coppée, who in early life was a somewhat careless Catholic, but later on was converted to ever-increasing fervor, which grew daily until his death last year. M. Jean Aicard, who is described by the Univers as "a dreamer with Catholic instincts," delivered, with perfect elocution, a speech in which the faith and Catholic practice of the great Coppée were praised with real sympathy. M. Pierre Loti, who is at best a sentimentalist, spoke, in a muffled, monotonous and almost inaudible voice, of the misfortune, which he admitted was his own, of having no faith, and expressed respect and a sort of love for Christ. The impression manifested by the majority of the audience was approval of doubt, as if the human creature were free to refuse itself to God.

EDUCATION

The opening of the new year was marked by the beginning of a conflict in Alsace-Lorraine which Germania terms "a forewarning of a new Kulturkampf and an unprecedented attack on the episcopal office." The incident has its own interest for Catholic school teachers the world over. It appears that Bishop Benzler, of Metz, had issued a circular letter forbidding, on religious grounds, the Catholic teachers of his diocese to take part in the associations of public school teachers of the Reichsland. The State-Secretary of the Ministry of Alsace-Lorraine wrote to the Bishop that he considered directions of the kind issued to the teachers as an interference with the officers of the state. He recognized, he said, the right of pastors to deal with members of their flocks regarding religious and church matters, as well as that of the Bishop, as supreme pastor, to address himself to the whole church of which he is head. But officials and teachers of the province received their orders from the state alone. Bishop Benzler, in his reply, assured the State-Secretary that he had no intention to interfere in any way with the prerogative of the government, but that he held it to be the right and duty of a bishop to point out to those in his jurisdiction the possible consequences of cooperation in the work of such associations as far as they touched the relations of Catholic school teachers with their Church. The associations concerned in the dispute are claimed to be anti-Catholic. Dr. Fritzen, the Bishop of Strassburg, has promptly made known his full agreement with the stand taken by his brother bishop in the Reichsland. Repudiating all thought of interference with the civil authorities in their proper jurisdiction, he, too, affirms it to be the duty of a Catholic Bishop to warn the faithful against the dangers which may face them in organizations which invite their cooperation, and, because of the anti-Catholic tendency of the school teachers' associations referred to, he forbids Catholic teachers to take part in the work of these organizations. That there is to be no lack of harmony among the priests of the diocese in the struggle likely to ensue is assured. Headed by the Auxiliary Bishop of Strassburg, who happens, by the way, to be the brother of the State-Secretary, the clergy of the diocese have presented an address to Bishop Benzler in which they promise loyal adhesion to their chief pastor and give him grateful thanks for the determined stand he has taken in his defence of the rights of the Church.

Columbus College, of Chamberlain, South Dakota, is one of the notable educational successes of the past year. Mainly through the efforts of the Rev. C. E. O'Flaherty, of Kimball, a beautiful site, overlooking the Missouri River, the former location of an Indian denominational school, was secured from the Government for the priests of the Congregation of St. Viateur, who have transformed the old buildings into a Catholic college that bids fair to be an important factor in the educational progress of this rapidly growing State. In the financing of the enterprise, for which $30,000 was required, the Knights of Columbus have taken a leading part.

SOCIOLOGY

The Charities Publication Committee have gathered into a volume the editorials of Dr. Edward J. Devine published in the Survey. ("Social Forces," by Edward J. Devine, Charities Publication Committee, 105 East 22d Street, New York. $1.25 postpaid.) No one will deny Dr. Devine's zeal in the work of organizing charity nor begrudge him the praise that is his due. The book we are considering may be considered justly to gather together what is most useful in his experience, and therefore, is to be read by all who have the physical betterment of the masses at heart. As Christians, however, we cannot give unqualified approval either to his ideas or his methods. He sets his scientific charity at the head of all charity, and calls upon all engaged in charitable work to submit to its direction. He ignores altogether the fact that the Catholic Church has its charity, which is supernatural rather than scientific, with methods that rest on faith rather than upon statistics, and seeks first of all the Kingdom of Heaven and its justice, for the objects of its charity, and then their relief in the evils of time. And we maintain that if the Society of St. Vincent de Paul and other such organizations and the religious orders which give themselves to the corporal works of mercy had anything like the patronage the Red Cross and kindred societies receive, their works would, to say the least, be in no way inferior to the results produced by these.

Above all we protest against the domination of the Red Cross Society. During the sad days that followed the earthquake and fire in San Francisco, Dr. Devine and the Red Cross Society were virtually imposed upon the stricken people to administer the relief so generously contributed from all parts of the world. We are only too glad to testify to the energy and devotion they brought to the work, and would not lay to their charge the inevitable shortcomings of an administration that was barely human in its ideals and methods. In one of his late works, William Dean Howells complains of the readiness with which Americans allow themselves to be imposed upon by public servants; and so it became the fashion to praise absolutely all that Dr. Devine and the Red Cross did; and, if we are not mistaken, Dr. Devine can show on his sideboard a testimonial from grateful San Francisco. But those who know are not blind to the defects of that administration, and see that had our existing Catholic organizations not been pushed aside, things might have been done better. As we are glad to do justice to Dr. Devine, we only ask that he do justice to us.

Father Dempsey's Hotel in St. Louis has just finished its third year. It provides clean, comfortable lodging for ten cents a night; good meals at from five to fifteen cents, and a reading-room, bath, and other means of comfort and cleanliness free. During the three years of its existence it has entertained 19,824 guests; has furnished free lodgings to 23,333, and served 8,616 free meals. It has put to work 1,417 men by means of its free employment agency; transferred 141 to free beds in Catholic hospitals, and has buried 8 in the "Exiles' Rest," its cemetery lot. During eleven months ended December 1, 1909, 6,420 guests were entertained, 1,829 free meals were served, 8,202 free lodgings were given, all expenses were paid, and other charitable calls were not neglected. Yet the institution is practically self-supporting, the deficit of the year being only $1,687, not quite 10 per cent. of the expenditures, which include several extraordinary items.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society of New Orleans, La., entertained about 500 sailors at the St. Vincent Seamen's Haven on Christmas Day. Seamen of all nationalities sat down to dinner, among them Portuguese blacks from East Africa. The Most Rev. Archbishop Blenk, attended by Father Carra, the Chaplain of the Haven, presided. The Haven, which consists of three commodious buildings, was founded in 1903, by the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and is open throughout the year to all sailors without distinction of creed.

A second school of aviation, the Zepelin school being the first, has been formally opened at Pau. During the inauguration ceremonies six new Bleriot monoplanes were sent aloft at one time. Louis Bleriot, the founder of the school, gave a thrilling exhibition with his machine.

ECONOMICS.

A national conference, called by the National Civic Federation, will be held in Washington, January 17, 18 and 19, to discuss the means to be used to bring about uniform state legislation with regard especially to negotiable instruments, warehouse receipts, the sale of goods and divorce, in which more or less progress has been made; also with regard to stock certificates and bills of lading, for which after four years' discussion the Uniform State Law Commissions have prepared measures. Other subjects of general interest will be discussed, as public health, interstate railways, natural resources, factory and mine inspection, compensation for accidents. The President will make the opening address, both before the Uniform Legislation Conference and also before the Conference of State Governors, that will meet to consider this matter in the same city, January 18, 19, 20.

The production of gold throughout the world has averaged for ten years over $340,000,000 a year. The question is, where has the gold gone? The production of five years would give the sum total of the chief commercial gold reserves of the world. Even allowing for a general increase in circulation, and in special uses of gold, for jewelry, etc., this could not begin to account for what apparently vanishes year by year. It is probable that war chests are growing quietly. Some say that Asia absorbs a great deal that is simply hoarded. It is certain that South American states, especially Argentina, take a large amount every year for developing their resources and their trade, which is becoming enormous. Thus the foreign trade of Argentina, with not quite 7,000,000 people, was $600,000,000 last year; that of Brazil was nearly $500,000,000.

The gold reserve of the chief banks of the world was in November last as follows:

Bank of England.....	£ 35,345,000
Bank of France.....	142,982,000
Bank of Germany.....	48,359,000
New York Associated Banks..	49,376,000
Bank of Austria.....	56,990,000
Bank of Belgium.....	6,315,000
	$339,367,000

The reserve of November, 1908, was virtually the same, as was that of the Banks of England and of Belgium. That of the Bank of France increased £9,000,000 during the year; of the Bank of Austria, £8,000,000. The reserve funds of the Bank of Germany diminished £6,000,000 and of the New York Banks, £11,000,000.

The final estimates of production and value of the crops in Canada given out by the Census and Statistics office at Ottawa show that an area of 30,085,556 acres has yielded a harvest which, computed at local market prices, has a value of $532,992,100 as compared with $432,534,000 from 27,505,663 acres last year. This is an advance of one hundred million dollars in value. The total value of the wheat harvest in Manitoba and the Northwest is $121,560,000, and in the rest of the Dominion, $19,760,000, as compared with $72,424,000 and $18,804,000 last year.

SCIENCE

There was a time when the New York Sun was famous for its exactness of diction. It has not yet fallen to the level of ordinary newspapers, which makes more surprising an egregious blunder into which it fell on the 10th inst. On turning its pages its readers were struck with a scare-heading, "Plague in California." On reading further one found that its information came from a report of Mr. Merriam, Chief of the Biological Survey, whom it quotes as saying "that the plague is epidemic in the State." On reading still further one finds that what Mr. Merriam says is, the plague is endemic there. What would Charles A. Dana have thought, had he been told of a coming time when the Sun would not distinguish between epidemic and endemic? The fact is that the plague, which is a disease of rodents, has been communicated to the ground squirrels, and that eight cases of human infection in the country districts round about the Bay have come from them during the past year. Mr. Merriam asks, therefore, for a war of extermination against these animals such as that which, waged against rats, freed San Francisco and other Coast cities from the disease. He will get what he wants, and the plague will cease to be endemic.

Santa Clara College, California, has just completed a photoheliograph. The tube is horizontal, nearly thirty-seven feet long and two feet in diameter. The coelostat is of the English type of Cooke & Sons, and can work through nearly the entire heavens from east to west. The diameter of the photo-lens is six inches. The apparatus, optical and mechanical, is by W. & D. Moge, Bayonne, N. J. The whole work has occupied about three years, the greatest pains having been taken with all the foundations so as to ensure freedom from vibration, and to secure perfection with the apparatus. The results are proving most satisfactory.

The Astronomical and Astrophysical Society of America, through Prof. Geo.

C. Comstock, of the University of Wisconsin, has issued a statement on the observation of Halley's comet. A long campaign is urged to secure the best pictures of the comet. An expedition will be sent to the Hawaiian Islands for this purpose during May, the time of the greatest brilliance of the comet.

The Rev. Hugh Benson lectured on December 7, in Dublin, on "Lourdes." General Sir William Butler presided. Father Benson spoke of his first visit to Lourdes last year and the miracles he himself had witnessed. On one occasion during the procession of the Blessed Sacrament seven miracles occurred, five of which he witnessed. These cures, he pointed out, could not be the result of nervous excitation, as one of them was that of a boy with a broken leg, and, he said, that if anyone told him that nervous excitation or auto-suggestion could cure a leg which had been broken for eight years he had nothing more to say to him.

A few years ago Father Peter Bandini started an Italian settlement at Tontitown, a garden spot in the "Apple Belt" of Northwest Arkansas. Under his paternal direction it has prospered and flourished until it has evolved into a modern town. Its first election for Mayor was held on January 11, and his admiring people insisted that he should be the first incumbent of the office, which he consented to do only until the municipal machine should be started along proper lines. All the other local offices were voted to Italian candidates, except the city marshalship which was awarded to a popular Irishman.

Very Rev. Ernest Helmstetter, O.S.B., was elected Abbot of St. Mary's Abbey, Newark, N. J., on January 4, forty-one members of the Order participating in the election. Abbot Helmstetter was born in Newark, October 7, 1859, and after making his college course at St. Vincent's, Latrobe, Penn., joined the Benedictines in 1879. He was ordained priest six years later. In 1887 he was made prior of the Newark community and has held that office ever since. He is one of the best known members of the American Cassinese Benedictine Congregation.

The Rev. William A. Mitchell, S.J., of St. Xavier College, Cincinnati, has been appointed Superior of the Jesuit Mission in British Honduras, to succeed the Rev. William J. Wallace, S.J.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Cardinal's Day, in honor of the annual visit of His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons to St. Patrick's Church, Washington, was observed last Sunday. At the solemn high Mass, which was attended by a large congregation, the Rev. Dr. Edward A. Pace of the Catholic University was the preacher. A reception followed, at which several thousand persons offered their felicitations to the Cardinal. The guests at the luncheon given by the rector, Father Russell, included the Italian Ambassador, the Austrian Ambassador, the Ministers from Sweden, Chile, Netherlands and Spain; Speaker Cannon, Senators Elkins, Aldrich, Beveridge, Carter, Overman and Taylor; Associate Justices White and McKenna, of the United States Supreme Court; Representatives Goulden, Fornes, Fitzgerald and Olcott, New York, and Ransdell, Louisiana; Maurice Francis Egan, American Minister to Denmark; Charles W. Russell, American Minister to Persia; a number of high officers of the army and navy, and many clergymen and several Government officials.

For the first time in the history of the state that such an event is recorded, Archbishop O'Connell of Boston offered the opening prayer at the New Year session of the Superior Civil Court of his see city. He stood at the right of the Chief Justice, with the other six justices ranged on either side of him.

The figures of the statistics of the Archdiocese of Boston for the year also give evidence of substantial progress. One hundred years ago, in 1810, the Diocese of Boston covered all New England, and it had only two churches, five priests and a handful of Catholics within that territory. With the opening of 1910 these are the figures:—one archbishop, one bishop; 654 priests, and 254 parish and mission churches. The estimated Catholic population of the archdiocese is 900,000.

Apropos of the selection of the Rev. Dr. J. J. Rice, of the Diocese of Springfield, to be the new Bishop of Burlington, it is noted that Springfield has also supplied bishops to Sioux City, Los Angeles and Fall River, and at one time lately had thirty priests loaned to other dioceses. The Rev. Dr. Rice was born thirty-eight years ago, at Leicester, Mass. and was graduated from Holy Cross College, Worcester, in 1891. He then went to the Grand Seminary of Theology at Montreal, and in September, 1894, he was ordained by Bishop Beaven of Springfield. He afterwards took a post-graduate course in theology at the American College in Rome, receiving the degree of doctor of divinity. Returning to the United States, he was appointed to parishes at Portland, Me., and Fitchburg, Pittsfield and Oxford, Mass. For two years he was professor of philosophy at St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Mass., and in 1902 was assigned to the pastorate of St. Peter's Church, Northbridge.

The Knights of Peter Claver, a fraternal organization for colored men, has been organized by the Rev. Conrad Hebescher, of Mobile, Ala., and it is expected to do much good throughout the South in filling the longing of the colored brother for the fraternal and ritualistic attractions of the secret society lodges. Forty men began the first branch, and commenced its career by attending Mass and receiving Holy Communion from the hands of Bishop Allen of Mobile.

The Rev. Xavier Sutton, the Passionist, recently gave a non-Catholic mission of eight lectures at Willow Hill, Ill., a town of about 800 inhabitants, in which there is not a single Catholic resident. The place has been styled the most prejudiced town in the country, and Father Sutton's visit there has already produced some very promising results.

The new church of St. Paul the Apostle, at Pinelawn, Mo., of which the Rev. Joseph H. Tettermer is pastor, has been built by the men of the parish, who volunteered their labor on Saturday afternoons and during the evening hours of the past fall and early winter. To enable them to work after nightfall, a string of electric lights was used. The building was dedicated during Christmas week.

Cardinal Satolli's funeral took place in Rome on Tuesday. On the same day, in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, a solemn high Mass was sung, with Archbishop Farley present in the sanctuary.

On January 25, the Golden Jubilee of the Paulist community and parish in this city will be observed in the Church of St. Paul the Apostle. His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons and many other dignitaries are expected to be present.

On January 11, six of the pastors of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia commemorated the Silver Jubilee of their ordination. The jubilarians are the Right Rev. Monsignor James P. Turner, D.D., V.G., chancellor; Rev. Matthew A. Hand, rector of St. Ann's; Rev. Hugh J. Dugan, rector of St. Michael's; Rev.

James A. Mullin, rector of our Lady of Lourdes; Rev. Denis J. Broughal, rector of the Ascension, all of Philadelphia, and Rev. Francis Brady, rector of St. Jerome's, Tamaqua.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Know Thyself," Berkeley Theatre.—Paul Hervieu's play "Connais-toi," as presented by Arnold Daly in an English version, is based upon the now very tiresome subject in the dramatic world divorce. In this instance, however, a rather new aspect is presented; in the end there is no divorce, though it has been in imminent culmination throughout. An old general has married a young wife and treats her with martinet discipline. He has very strict notions about marital duties, and is withal an egotistical tyrant. He urges divorce on a cousin whose wife has been guilty of indiscretions as the only possible and proper remedy for conjugal ills. Later on he discovers that his own wife has an "affinity" in the person of a young and trusted officer of his staff. While she is guilty of indiscretions, she has at last the strength to send him away. Denounced by her husband, she flings his severity in his face as an excuse. This situation changes the old general's ideas on divorce as the only remedy for marital unhappiness, and upon reflection he arrives at the conclusion that the fault mainly lies with himself. The result is a reconciliation and chastened opinions about himself and conjugal relations in general. As a drama it is well constructed, with a literary quality above the average, though its general tone is offensive. Arnold Daly in the part of the choleric and tyrannical general does effective, though somewhat violent and exaggerated work.

"The Bachelor's Baby," Criterion Theatre.—Praise is due Francis Wilson for the excellent moral he has injected in this his first attempt as a playwright. His comedy is humorous and clever though its slight literary quality is marred by the too frequent use of slang. A bachelor, who has an extraordinary dislike for children, suddenly finds himself confronted with the guardianship of his deceased brother's daughter. At first he refuses to consider this trust, but succumbs finally to the simple faith and love which the child confidently bestows upon him. Only when he is on the point of giving her up does he realize how much he would miss her and what a blessing the little ones are. Mr. Wilson is always comical enough to provoke laughter, but he has essayed a rôle which seems a trifle too youthful for his years.

"The Fires of Fate," Liberty Theatre.—Conan Doyle has written a typical old-fashioned melodrama with all the component characters in impossible and tragic situations. Combined with all this is a more serious and vital intent on the part of the author which, however, is obviously out of place. A young colonel, afflicted with a serious malady, is told by a physician that he can live but a short time, as there is no possible cure—other than a miracle. On hearing this diagnosis, the colonel determines to take his own life rather than suffer the agonies of a bitter end. The doctor's brother, a minister, appears on the scene and persuades him that his life is not his to take, and that even the few months that are left him on this earth may be of benefit to somebody. The colonel then accompanies the minister and doctor on an excursion up the Nile, where he falls in love with a young woman on the steamer but conceals his affection because of his sickness. When the party is on an expedition to view some historic rock, they are attacked and captured by a band of Dervishes, but afterwards rescued by an English officer and his Egyptian troops. In the mêlée the colonel receives a blow on the head which cures him and allows him to declare his love and incidentally justify the parson's practical theory. It is to be regretted that so true an exposition of the cowardice and folly of suicide is portrayed so ineffectively in the lurid setting of melodrama.

"The City," Lyric Theatre.—The stage at present is in an acute spasm of sensationalism, and Clyde Fitch's posthumous play, "The City," is an extreme example of the type. It is heaped with lurid situations, and in this respect the second act is appalling. But there is neither sincerity nor organic development in the theme. It is theatricalism throughout, though effective to a high degree. A family from Middleburg, a small town up the State, come to New York City, the son to find a wider field for his financial and political ambitions, the women of the family to gratify their social aspirations. Young Rand succeeds brilliantly, having become a great financial power, and is about to receive the nomination for Governor of the State. He has, however, a skeleton in his closet, in the shape of his confidential secretary, George Hannock, an illegitimate son of his father, who, however, does not know his true paternity, a secret possessed by Rand alone. Hannock is a victim of morphine, and had blackmailed Rand's father for years before the latter's death. Herein lies the radical improbability of the play. No one in his senses would have placed in the position of his confidential secretary a victim of the drug habit and a blackmailer, and upon Hannock's knowledge of Rand's shady business transactions hinges the crisis of the action, and it is Hannock's threat of ex-posure or blackmail that brings down Rand's castle of ambition in crashing ruin. The episode of Hannock's secret marriage to one of Rand's sisters is brought effectively to bear in the culminating horror of the second act when the confidential secretary, who has just heard the truth from Rand's lips that he is in reality the brother of the woman he has just married, in a fit of maniacal fury, kills her rather than let her know the terrible truth. The play is more than unpleasant, it is repugnant. The only redeeming element is Rand's manful resolution, after the lurid tragedy of his sister's murder, to make a clean breast of his crooked methods and redeem himself by starting life over again with an honest purpose.

"Your Humble Servant," Garrick Theatre.—This is an instance where the actor is the whole play. Otis Skinner as Life Towers carries a mediocre drama, a patch-work, original neither in motive nor construction, to a triumph, by sheer force of vital acting. He animates and fills out a rôle which in itself is rather flat and stale. He has put a soul in a part built upon purely mechanical lines. Mr. Skinner is a product of the old school of acting, the stock company, and the excellence of his work shines conspicuously amidst all the ineffectual force of the ready made star.

"The Commanding Officer," Savoy Theatre.—A time-worn, highly-colored melodrama, unrealistic in its portrayal of life at Western army posts in frontier days. The play is too artificial to be really effective even as a melodrama.

CHARLES McDougall.

A beautiful Christmas play, "The Little Town of Bethlehem," is to be given by the Ben Greet Company at the Garden Theatre, on January 17th. The author of the play, Mrs. Spencer Trask, has avoided a directly religious treatment of her subject, but it is an uplifting story based upon the Nativity and touchingly expressed. The play will run for sixteen nights and is put on experimentally. Mr. Greet is identifying himself with a movement to restore the true Christian spirit through the religious drama, and on January 6th his company gave Laurence Hutton's play, "Bethlehem," under the auspices of Bishop Greer and a number of Episcopal clergymen, who are in sympathy with it.

We have many Catholic parochial dramatic societies in New York, and nearly every college and academy has its circle that shows meritorious work. These societies are all giving occasional public performances. An occasional Mystery Play with impressive stage environments would do much to purify our city from the poisonous miasma of immoral dramatic attractions. The mere denunciation will not remedy the evil. One must build up rather than tear down, and the physician who with his medicines expels disease from the physical system dares not fail to supply an after-cure of the tonic elements the depleted system requires. The drama originated in the Church and was a wonderful adjunct to her teaching. In these days, when stage realism is almost perfect and there is a tendency to forward such a movement with enthusiasm, one may hope to see it crystallized even during the present year under Catholic auspices.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Professor Charles Zueblin, former professor of sociology in the University of Chicago, delivered a lecture in Vassar Brothers' Institute, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on "Education and Life." In the audience were members of the faculty of Vassar College, clergymen of various denominations and the representative literary persons of the place. The professor's open advocacy of free love and his undisguised contempt for the marital contract, duly reported in the press of the country, were a severe shock to the sober sense of the community. He said in part:

"If the average woman is blessed with the maternal instinct, why should she not satisfy it? Is there any reason why a woman who loves to have children should not do so, regardless of any of the conventions of Society? . . . 'We ought to make the opportunities for young people to meet each other more frequently . . . and we ought to see that the children which are the result of these unions are provided with proper physical protection.'

An indignant protest was sent to the local press by the Rev. Joseph F. Sheahan, pastor of St. Peter's Catholic Church of Poughkeepsie. Father Sheahan said in his letter:—

"Professor Zueblin's lecture was simply a plea for the abolition of the commandment, 'Thou shalt not commit adultery.' And not a woman present cried 'Shame,' and not a man present got up and cried 'Stop!' Shame on you who were present and were afraid to speak. Women who follow Professor Zueblin and ask men, not their husbands, to satisfy their maternal instincts, will receive the contempt that they deserve. We have more than enough fatherless children already in the foundling asylums and poor houses throughout the country without any efforts of Professor Zueblin's part to increase the number. . . . Professor Zueblin's filthy proposals are an insult to all the people of our city. It is to be hoped that he will never set foot in Poughkeepsie again. If the trustees of Vassar Institute have such little regard for decency as to invite him, I think they will have Vassar Institute all to themselves."

"Nothing can matter more than saving a soul, and the Catholic Church has always shown great charity in granting absolution at the moment of death and accepting indications of repentance," says the New York Sun. "In dealing with individual wrongdoing it has always been more lenient than where the question was of faith, and it may at times have been more gentle to rulers and the powerful than to ordinary men."

"It has never shown a lack of pluck in dealing with scandalous immorality; it made Louis XIV, the Grand Monarque, the Roi Soleil, at the height of his power, put away the Montespan before it would grant him the last rites. (sic) King Leopold would have remained unshriven if he had not made right before the Church a union that justly offended his people."

OBITUARY

The Right Rev. John J. Brady, D.D., titular Bishop of Alabanda and Auxiliary of Boston, died on January 6, after a long illness, at the rectory of Sts. Peter and Paul's Church, South Boston, of which he was pastor. He was born at Crosserlough, County Cavan, Ireland, April 11, 1842, and ordained for the Diocese of Boston, at All Hallows, December 4, 1864. For four years he was an assistant at Newburyport, Mass., and was then made pastor at St. Joseph's Church, Amesbury. He was consecrated Auxiliary Bishop on August 5, 1891.

Right Rev. Mgr. Joseph M. Flynn, rector of the Church of the Assumption, Morristown, N. J., died on January 5. He was born January 7, 1848, in Springfield, Mass., but was taken to live in Newark, N. J., when a boy, by his parents. He was a printer's apprentice when the Civil War took place and his father was a captain in the Irish Brigade. With patriotic ardor the young man ran away and enlisted in the Thirty-seventh New Jersey Volunteers, and served with conspicuous credit until the close of the war. In 1865 he went to St. Charles' College, Maryland, and later to Seton Hall, where, after the usual course, he was ordained priest in 1874. For a time he acted as Secretary to Bishop Corrigan, then of Newark, and as Diocesan Chancellor, and was appointed rector at Morristown in 1881. He was a zealous advocate of Catholic schools and made his own among the most successful and best in the State. All Souls Hospital, Morristown, in charge of the Grey Nuns, was also established by him. He compiled a history of the Church in New Jersey, which contains much valuable information of the growth and progress of the Faith in the State, and translated several popular books of devotion. He was appointed a domestic prelate by the Pope in 1908.

After a long illness, the Rev. Patrick F. Healy, S.J., former president of Georgetown University, died in Washington on Jan. 10. A native of Macon, Ga., where he was born 76 years ago, he became a Jesuit novice at Frederick, Md., at the age of sixteen. Later he was sent to Belgium to study philosophy and theology, and was there ordained. At the close of his studies in 1866, Father Healy was assigned to Georgetown College, where for several years he occupied in turn the most important positions on its staff, and familiarized himself with all the departments of its administration. He was an extraordinary man, eminent even among the presidents that have graced the roll of Georgetown. His finished scholarship, exceptional administrative ability and varied experience fitted him for the office of president, to which he was promoted in 1873.

During Father Healy's presidency, which lasted till 1882, the main building of the University was constructed, now known as "Healy Hall." For some years Father Healy was connected with the parish of St. Ignatius Loyola, New York City, until impaired health forced his retirement to Georgetown two years ago. Father Healy was a brother of the Right Rev. James Augustine Healy, Bishop of Portland, Maine. Another brother, Rev. Alexander Sherwood Healy, was rector of the Cathedral, Boston; a sister is the present Superior of a convent at St. Albans, Vt.

Father Peter Hoang died at Shanghai on October 8. Father Hoang was born on January 3, 1830, at Hai-men, the promontory situated at the northern bank of the Yang-tsze estuary. He was ordained priest in 1860, and thenceforward labored in the Nanking Mission till the last day of his long career. Chinese secretary to the various Jesuit bishops who governed the mission, he had to deal with many difficult and important questions, and treated them to the general satisfaction of all concerned. As a writer he is known throughout the East, having published various works, all relating to China, her administration, laws, chronology, banking, land, taxation, religious customs, and manners. The long list of his works bears witness to the literary energy and strenuous perseverance of the man. His very last efforts, on his dying bed, were given to elucidating the question of the genuineness of the great Chinese bowl, in the South Kensington Museum, of the sixth century B. C. Father Hoang, who was a secular priest, affiliated to the Jesuits of Zi-ka-wei, Shanghai, was one of the most learned men of the East.

The Rev. John T. Conwell, S.J., of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, died on Dec. 29, aged 44. Father Conwell was a native of Digby, Nova Scotia, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1884. A man of solid piety, of simple and unaffected manners, and devoted to the work of the class room, he was loved and esteemed by those who came under his influence. One of his sisters is the Superior of the Sacred Heart Convent at Elmhurst, Providence, R. I., another is a member of the Sacred Heart Community at Manhattanville, N. Y. Father Conwell was a nephew of the Rev. John Mullaly, a well known Jesuit who died some years ago.

Rev. Nicholas Simon, rector of St. Francis de Sales' Church, New Orleans, died December 30, after a short illness. Born in Dijon, France, 1828, he studied in St. Charles' College, Grand Coteau, La., and entered the New Orleans diocese in 1858. He formed the St. Francis de Sales parish, built the church and three schools, one of them for colored children, and was distinguished for his devotedness during the yellow fever epidemics. He was in active service from the day of his ordination to the Sunday previous to his death, when he celebrated the two Masses in his church and preached at both. He had two brothers, who were also priests, and a sister, who is Mother-Superior of the Sisters of Mercy in Dijon.

There died, on the 7th inst., in Montreal, Miss Robertine Barry, the most widely known woman writer in Canada. Although she was a daughter of the late John Edmund Barry, a native of Cork and a friend of Daniel O'Connell, she found herself, through the influence of her mother, formerly a Miss Rouleau, of Isle Verte, P. Q., identified with the French element, and, while speaking English with remarkable purity, she never wrote for publication except in French. She was educated at the Ursuline Convent in the city of Quebec, where she graduated with distinction. Almost as soon as she left the convent, she joined the editorial staff of La Patrie, a Liberal daily Montreal paper. As the witty, fascinating "Françoise" of that journal, she attained great local celebrity. She also contributed to La Revue Nationale and to La Revue Canadienne, and published, in 1895, "Fleurs Champêtres," a collection of sketches of the joys and sorrows, likes and dislikes of the French Canadian habitant, which was praised by La Revue du Monde Catholique as comparable with Georges Sand for wealth of imagination. But Miss Barry never fell into Georges Sand's immoral and irreligious vagaries. Her contributions to Canadian literature may not always have been theologically or even ethically correct; but she was at heart a Catholic and meant well. She founded a bi-monthly review, Le Journal de Françoise, which, after eight years of existence, came to an end last year. Miss Robertine Barry and Madame Raoul Dandurand visited the Paris Exposition of 1900 as official representatives of Canadian women, and in 1906 Miss Barry went on a similar mission to the Exposition of Milan. She was elected President of the Canadian Women's Press Association, the great majority of whose members write in English. She was also secretary of the Women's Section of the Historical Society and a member of the Lyceum Club, the Parisian meeting place of most literary women. She was a regular correspondent of Madame Adam (Juliette Lambert), the Countess de Mirabeau-Martel (Gyp), Mr. and Mrs. Theo. Gauthier, Mr. and Mrs. Claretie, the Duchess d'Uzès, President of the Lyceum Club, and a number of other literary women, such as the Queen of Roumania, Carmen Sylva.

Rev. Mother Caesaria McDonald, Superioress of the Marianites of the Holy Cross, died in New Orleans, La., on Christmas Day. Born in Carlow, Ireland, 1846, she entered the Marianite Congregation in 1876; she served twelve years as Provincial of the South and was called to Europe to represent all the American provinces in the General Council. A successful educator, she was also a wise administrator and established many flourishing houses of education.

Mother Mary Baptist Martin, died at the hospital of the Sisters of Mary, Davenport, Iowa, on January 2, aged 78 years. She was born in Ireland, and made her profession as a religious sixty years ago. She founded hospitals in six Iowa cities. Two of her sisters were also Sisters of Mercy and a third is a Presentation Nun.

The requiem Mass for the repose of the soul of Cardinal Satolli was celebrated in the Lateran basilica by Archbishop Stonor. All the Cardinals and the diplomats accredited to the Vatican were present. Bishop Kennedy, rector of the American College, and the students of that institution attended in a body. After the solemn requiem services the body was conveyed to Marsciano, Cardinal Satolli's native town, for burial.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In being permitted to address myself through your columns to the readers of AMERICA, I realize that I am speaking to thousands of the Catholic clergy and many thousands of the laity. I am, therefore, desirous of using to the best advantage the opportunity thus afforded me of putting before such a large and goodly company the especial work and purpose of The Lamp, of which I am editor.

After nearly seven years of somewhat strenuous existence in the field of Anglican journalism, as the advocate of Corporate Reunion with the Holy See, The Lamp has added example to precept by making its own submission to the Vicar of Jesus Christ, and has been graciously permitted by those in authority to continue its work for the reunion of Christendom on the only basis upon which it can ever be realized, that is, the return of all non-Papal Christians to the Unity of the Catholic Church.

My object in addressing the readers of AMERICA is to ask their help in making The Lamp a medium of communication between the Catholic priest or layman who is zealous for souls and those non-Catholics whom he wishes to see return to the old Faith, whether as individuals, families or congregations. Our aim is to make The Lamp a paper which any Catholic can read with interest and profit to himself, and which he can also put into the hands of non-Catholics as specially designed to allay their prejudices, win for the Church their increased respect, and finally, God willing, their allegiance and submission.

For the realization of our Lord's prayer, ut omnes unum sint, and the "restoration of all things in Christ," a very necessary factor is that we as Catholics be most careful to manifest a tender and intelligent sympathy towards those outside the fold, and to make this possible there must be contact, and the interchange of thought; for after all, we are agreed, I think, that it is love and comprehension, and not victory in argument, that will in the event prove to the "other sheep" the irresistible call homeward. St. Francis de Sales converted 70,000 Calvinists by the compelling power of love and the magnetism of a sympathetic understanding of their point of view, erroneous though it was.

To sum up, let me repeat my desire for our magazine is that it be a medium of communication between Catholics and well-disposed non-Catholics, the means by which our separated brethren may tell us the difficulties of their position, and the obstacles which they conceive to be in the way of their own individual submission to Rome or the corporate reconciliation of the religious body to which they belong; and that we by the same medium be enabled to make them understand how heartfelt is our intelligent sympathy, but how confident we are that a way can be found by which the apparently insurmountable difficulties shall be overcome.

The Lamp has enjoyed from its start the favor and support of many Catholics; these, of course, remain our friends and supporters, but we now, not unnaturally, desire and look forward to a much larger Catholic constituency. The Lamp is published at Garrison, N. Y. Price, $1.00 a year. Any communications so addressed will be gladly received and have our personal attention.

PAUL JAMES FRANCIS, S.A.,
Editor of The Lamp.

A WARNING AGAINST "ROYCROFTISM."

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have heard some Catholics tell of the wonderful "philosophy" of our self-constituted brother, Elbert Hubbard—he prefers being called "Fra Elbertus"—and have seen his "mottoes" hung about, and The Fra and The Philistine lying around their homes. "Fra" Elbertus is a press agent. For self-publicity I really can't think of a better. Aside from this, I see nothing interesting about him or his publications. Intolerance and cheap sarcasm are his characteristics. For his attitude toward the Church I would refer any investigator to Vol. 29, No. 2, p. 54, of The Philistine, issued July, 1909.

The Buffalo Express, of May 16, 1909, had printed an article describing the beautiful services at the Chapel of Perpetual Adoration, Buffalo, when seven candidates were admitted to the novitiate and five Sisters took perpetual vows of the Sisterhood of St. Francis. The article was printed by The Philistine, with preliminary comments running thus: "And this in America. No word of comment or argument can heighten the horrors of a superstition which takes young girls from a life of joy and natural usefulness and makes them life-long slaves to a religious fetich," and he refers to "the inhumanity of the proceeding."

Of course, Mr. Hubbard would prefer that they have their clubs, "platonian" loves and friendships, elimination of the "Marital Steam Roller," polygamy in the sincere form of Brigham Young's teaching; rather they should "hang about polling places" and "run for office"—in a word, cast all refinement, all womanly virtues to the four winds—than be "slaves" to such a "religious fetich," than lead good, pure lives, devoted to prayer and their God. God forbid all our women would be as he would have them. 'Twould be a sorry day.

I trust that this warning of a Catholic layman against "Roycroftism" and the publications coming from East Aurora will get into many Catholic homes through the medium of your columns.

THE FIRST FOUNDLING ASYLUM.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Whilst ready to concede that New York is and has been long in the vanguard, so far as national prosperity is concerned, we who are south of the Mason and Dixon Line are not willing to acknowledge your mercantile isle to be the pioneer in matters of Catholic charity.

Some time ago (Sept. 4, 1909, page 580) you published a statement that the first foundling asylum established in the United States was started by that heroine of charity, Sister Irene, in New York, in 1869. You thus overlooked, as we discovered a few days ago, the foundling asylum of New Orleans, begun there by the Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg in 1855, as well as the one started in Baltimore by the same Sisters in 1856 (see Dr. White's "Life of Mother Seton," p. 455, 10th edition, Kenedy, N. Y.).

Feeling that New York in all her glory will not deny this laurel to the brow of the South, we turn to you in perfect confidence that restitution will be most graciously made.

LEANDER DORSEY.

Baltimore, Md.

[In the official lists of the institutions conducted by the Sisters of Charity given in the "Catholic Directory" for the years 1855 and 1856 and subsequent years no mention is made of any "foundling asylum," either in New Orleans or Baltimore. There are, of course, enumerations of "orphan" and "infant asylums," but for a foundling asylum, as the term is usually and generally accepted all over the world, that is, an institution specially devoted to the care of abandoned infants, and in most instances having a crèche for their reception, we have to wait, here in the United States, until October 11, 1869, when at dusk the first foundling was deposited in the crèche of the first asylum that Sister Irene Fitzgibbon had opened in the house No. 17 East Twelfth Street, this city. Within a year she had to move to a larger establishment, No. 3 Washington Square North, near the present office of AMERICA. The records therefore still seem to accord to Sister Irene and Mother Seton's native city this splendid distinction.

We may also remark that Dr. White's "Life of Mother Seton" is hardly a good authority on this special topic. It was printed in 1853 and therefore is not infallible on what happened in 1855 or 1856. The Kenedy edition, that firm says, is a reprint without change from the plates of the original Dunigan edition.—Ed. AMERICA.]

FROM A NON-CATHOLIC.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am not a Roman Catholic, but I have had the good fortune to be a subscriber of AMERICA since its first issue. Within the last few years I have seen one periodical after another disappear from my table until I was finally bereft of any such reading whatsoever. What I had been taught to believe vice they extol as virtue, and what I believe virtue they decried as ignorance verging on vice. If in style they were polished, in subject they were trivial and puerile in thought. If they dared to be original, they attained originality at the expense of good morals and good sense.

In AMERICA I at last found a magazine cultured in style, serious in its object, and scholarly in the treatment of its subject, and interesting because it treats of matters of interest. Its editors and contributors are evidently men of learning and experience; not dilettanti but thorough, who do not force upon us their subjective impressions from superficial observation, but afford us information from a knowledge of the subject of which they write. They understand law though not lawyers, politics without being politicians; business, although they have no profits to reap, nor losses to sustain, for it is a rich estate which they administer, and a great government which they help to rule. They are free from the flippancy of the irresponsible, for they have always been under the shadow of responsibility; from provincialism, for their origin is scattered and their interests universal.

I consider AMERICA at once the most conservative and the most cosmopolitan periodical in America. I do not urge it upon my acquaintances, for the fact that it purports to be "Catholic" is already nine points against it; but I have no fear of its future, for in a community which is rapidly growing in wealth, in culture, and in number, there must always be an extended demand for a publication of this character.

If commendation be necessary for encouragement, or if encouragement be desired, AMERICA has mine without qualification.

ROBERT PRESCOTT GILMAN,
115 Broadway, New York.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

So many more important persons have said all that I could express in regard to your most excellent periodical that my words of favorable criticism cannot add to your success. Nevertheless the Kaiser's word may not be disregarded; certainly your paper is the most excellent of all that come to my table. Would to God that it could find its way into all Catholic houses. It is a cause of pleasure to send my annual subscription, because I am convinced I have received more than my money's worth.—Rev. John Kaiser, Melwina, Wis.

May I add my little tribute of praise and appreciation for the periodical which is meeting with such a warm welcome from our Catholic press, clergy and laity? It supplies just what we have need of in our Catholic homes. It presents, in a most interesting and readable form, the topics of interest of the day, and I find it of infinite help and pleasure in my daily life and shall lose no opportunity to speak ever for it a good and earnest word.—Mrs. J. M. Devine, Minot, North Dakota.

If there is one class of readers more than another to whom AMERICA should appeal, I think it is the collegian. It gives students just what they need—an able review of the week's work in a clear, unprejudiced and scholarly manner. It cannot but broaden and help them.—Joseph L. O'Brien, Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md.

God bless AMERICA! I consider its appearance and continuance as the most important event of Catholic activity in this country at this time. AMERICA gives us what we most needed—a sound representative and thoroughly Catholic Weekly Review.—Rev. Max Wurst, Wabasha, Minn.

With every issue it becomes dearer to me. Your paper is truly Catholic and truly American, knowing no national prejudice, and keeping its present standard, I sincerely wish it the well-merited support of every fair-minded Catholic.—Rev. Dr. A. Pitass, Buffalo, N. Y.

I assure you that I am delighted with AMERICA. It is a Catholic journal that we need and should commend itself to every one, both priest and layman.—Rev. J. A. McDonald, Carrington, N. D.

AMERICA is a valuable asset to historical students; so much so that I am unable to do without it.—Francis E. Carroll, M. D., Boston, Mass.

CHRONICLE

At Home.—President Taft has sent to Congress his promised message on the further conservation of the natural resources of the nation. The President dwells on the necessity for legislation in connection with the protection of the public domain and urges that the measures recommended be taken up and disposed of promptly. The subjects under discussion embrace the improvement of our waterways; the reclamation and irrigation of arid, semi-arid, and swamp lands; the preservation of our forests, and the re-forestation of suitable areas; the reclassification of the public domain with a view of separating from agricultural settlement mineral, coal and phosphate lands, and sites belonging to the government bordering on streams suitable for the utilization of water power.—A paragraph in the President's message declares that "the investigation by the Waterways Commission in Europe shows that the depth of the non-tidal streams is rarely more than six feet and never more than ten. And yet enormous quantities of merchandise are transported over the rivers and canals in Germany and France and England, and the existence of these methods of traffic naturally affects the rates which the railroads charge, and it is the best regulator of those rates that we have, not even excepting the governmental regulation through the Interstate Commerce Commission." The President hopes that the present Congress will take such steps that it may be called the inaugurator of the new system of inland waterways.—The champions of Mr. Pinchot maintain that the recommendations contained in the President's conservation message sound like reiterations of propositions expounded by the former forester.—The President appointed Henry S. Graves, director of the Yale Forestry School, Chief Forester of the United States, as successor to Gifford Pinchot. Mr. Graves was formerly assistant chief of the Bureau of Forestry under Mr. Pinchot. The latter, in a statement showing that he would continue his fight against Secretary Ballinger, says "that the conservation of natural resources and the conservation of popular government are both at stake. The one needs conservation no less than the other. The great moral issue now facing the country is not the loss of natural resources so much as whether special interests or the people shall rule."—The Federal Grand Jury indicted Charles R. Heike, secretary of the American Sugar Refining Company; Ernest Gerbracht, former superintendent of the Havemeyer and Elder refinery in Brooklyn, and James F. Bendernagel, former cashier of the same refinery. Indictments were also found against three former checkers of the company. The charges are the making of false entries of sugar importations and conspiracy to defraud the Government out of customs duties.—The Marquis de Villalobar, Spanish Minister to Washington, has been transferred to Lisbon.

The Cost of Living.—Congress is meditating an inquiry into the high cost of living, and the Secretary of Agriculture is undertaking a similar inquiry on his own account. The President's interest in the matter has been aroused and other prominent men in the country are expressing their opinions. President W. C. Brown of the

New York Central Railroad said in an address: "The most portentous cloud upon the political or economic horizon at this time is the steady, relentless increase in price of everything that goes to make up the cost of living. We must increase production per acre by more intelligent methods or we must face the relentless certain day when we shall not produce enough to supply our own necessities."

At a luncheon given by the Peace Society of the City of New York at the Plaza Hotel last week, Senator Burton, of Ohio, suggested as a partial and reasonable explanation of the high cost of living the increased burden of Federal taxation, due to the militarism developed of late in the country's policy. Senator Burton said: "In 1908 appropriations for naval purposes aggregated $135,000,000; in 1909 they were $136,000,000. That $135,000,000 is almost ten times as much as was appropriated in 1880. The amount is greater than the total expenses of the Federal Government in 1878, omitting interest on money spent during the civil war. The military and naval expenditures constitute two-thirds of the entire expense of the Federal Government to-day."

A special message has been sent to the Ohio Legislature by Governor Judson Harmon, calling for an inquiry into the causes of the high prices of the necessities of life. The Governor urges the legislators to investigate the charge that the present high cost of living is due to combines and conspiracies in restraint of trade, and in case it be found that the charge be true he asks for specific laws to curb the action of guilty parties. Governor Harmon reminds the Ohio Legislature that it has been affirmed that recent enactments of the national Congress are responsible for the general advance in prices, and suggests inquiry into this phase of the question.

To Crush Night-Riding Outrages.—The Government is now prepared to crush night-riding outrages in the Kentucky tobacco district. An investigation of the persecutions of the numerous tobacco growers who declined to enter the farmers' pool, the Burley Tobacco Society, has been conducted by a Special Agent under Attorney-General Wickersham. The investigation has brought to light a startling record of brutality and terrorizing. Proceedings will begin at once in the Federal courts of the district involved. The first move determined upon is a bill in equity demanding the dissolution of the Burley Tobacco Society as a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust law and the Interstate Commerce act.

National Honor for General Lee.—Official recognition in a limited way of the birthday of General Robert E. Lee was given by the Treasury Department. The anniversary of the birth of the famous Confederate soldier fell on January 19, and the Collector of Customs at Newport News, Va., was authorized to close his office on that day for as long a time as public business would permit. The honor paid General Lee's memory is an unusual one, as it rarely, if ever, happens that a public office is closed on the occasion of birthdays of noted Americans except where regular legal holidays provide for it.

Federal Corporation Tax Law Attacked.—A meeting was held in Chicago last week under the auspices of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, during which the publicity clause in the Statute enacting a Federal Corporation tax was bitterly attacked. It was claimed that the clause, which calls for periodic filings of statements of the manufacturing firms' condition with the treasury officials, is an unlawful interference with a company's private business. A representative delegation of the Southern Indiana Manufacturers' Association was present at the meeting.

Porto Rico.—Secretary Dickinson returned to Washington after a trip to Porto Rico, Santo Domingo and Cuba. "General conditions in Porto Rico are gratifying," he said. "The people are prosperous. Governor Colton has taken hold vigorously. There seems to be general satisfaction with his administration, and the promise is good for the cultivation of still closer relations between the Porto Ricans and the people of the United States and for the advancement of the prosperity of the island. No one who has not been in Porto Rico has any conception of the beauty of the island, its productiveness and the healthfulness and comfort of the climate. It is destined to become a popular winter resort for people of the United States."

Governor Colton sent his first message to the Porto Rican Legislature. The message, which was well received, recommends a reduction of $300,000 in the budget, amendments to the assessment and internal revenue laws, a careful indexing of the archives, the publication of an official gazette, the sale or lease of the swamp lands of San Juan, the establishment of a leper colony, and better care of prisoners in the jails and the insane in the asylums.

Canadian Naval Bill.—On the 12th inst. Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved the first reading of the Naval Defence Bill, drafted upon the lines of the Militia Act. It provides for a naval force divided into a permanent corps, a reserve and volunteers. There is, however, to be no levy or conscription for the navy as there may be for the land service under the Militia Act. The ships and sailors may be placed at the King's service by the Governor-in-Council in case of war, invasion or insurrection. But if such action is taken during a recess, then Parliament must be summoned at once. A naval college is to be established along the lines of the Royal Military College at Kingston. The armament is to consist of four Bristols or protected cruisers of 4,800 tons burden, carrying a crew of 391 men; one Boadicea of 3,300 tons, with a crew of 278 men; and six destroyers of the improved river class. The ships are estimated to cost $11,600,000 if built in England. If built in Canada they will cost approximately sixteen million dollars. The construction is to be begun at once, probably in Canada. The naval force will be under the command of a director with the rank of rear-admiral, assisted by a naval board. The discipline will be the King's regulations; and pensions will be provided for officers.

Quebec's Lieutenant-Governor.—Sir Charles A. P. Pelletier, Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, has written an open letter to Archbishop Bruchési withdrawing from the "Alliance Scientifique Universelle," of which he had been elected honorary president. He has found that the society, which he had at first supposed to be intended merely for the spread of science, is really an instrument for propagating anti-Christian ideas. Its members were prominent in the recent non-religious Montreal funeral which so shocked the Catholic population. The president of the "Alliance" is Dr. Louis Laberge, head of the city health department. Most of the members are natives of France. Lieutenant-Governor Pelletier's action is highly commended by the Catholic press.

Great Britain.—The centenary of Gladstone's birth was celebrated December 29.—The Liberals attempted to draw an argument against Tariff Reform from the condition of labor in America. The Unionists immediately sent for interviews with men prominent in politics, both municipal and national, and with the leaders in charity organizations, who all denied the assertions of Lloyd-George drawn from the conditions in New York during May, 1908, just after the panic.—G. M. Boyle, one of the chief lace-makers of Nottingham, and W. G. Player, an important tobacco manufacturer, and C. Coggan, a hosiery manufacturer, have declared for Tariff Reform, promising to employ more hands if this policy wins.—A remarkable thing about the election is the importance both sides attach to colonial opinion. The views of cabinet ministers in the colonies are published in the leading papers. They seem on the whole to incline to the Peers and Tariff Reform.—By Tuesday, 266 seats had been contested. The Liberals gained 118, the Unionists 120. The latter made a net gain of 42 seats.

Ireland.—The Loyal Orange Institute has issued a manifesto urging all loyal men to vote against the Government because by its promises of Home Rule it has "yielded to that disaffected portion of the Irish population which owes allegiance to the Church of Rome." Fear or intolerance of Catholic supremacy is the basic motive of opposition to Irish autonomy at present, and "Home Rule is Rome Rule," remains the last rallying-cry of Orangeism. It appears to have proved ineffectual at the present elections both in England and Ulster.

Neither Tory nor Liberal has had much to say about it, indicating that instead of being a terror it may be in some degree an attraction, to the British electorate. The leading Irish papers, dealing with the Catholic education question in England, consider that the Irish Party will have done its duty by strenuous parliamentary advocacy, as in the past, of Catholic rights, but that they are not called upon to sacrifice their own country's primary interests by advising their friends to vote for the professed enemies of those interests. The contests in six constituencies by rival Nationalists are being conducted without disorder. The main grounds of opposition are differences on the Budget and Land Bills, and the Central Council's interference with the rights of constituencies and the legitimate independence of members. In the Orange constituencies the differences are more accentuated and more numerous. There are Radical, Unionist, Orange, Independent and Agriculturist candidates, some of whom have a hard time explaining that their support of Liberal and Nationalist measures did not mean submission to Rome. It is clear that even in Belfast the Orange cohesion is broken and opposition to Home Rule as such has sensibly weakened. While several influential men have abandoned Unionism, there has been no defection from Home Rule.

India.—As AMERICA has already pointed out, the ignoring by the Imperial Government of the grievances of the Indians in South Africa, must have a great influence in increasing the discontent in India. The matter was brought up at the Indian Congress just ended at Bombay, by Surendranath Banerjee, who begged aid for them. Amidst great enthusiasm jewels and money were given to the value of £1200. The natives are discussing the question eagerly, and £5,000 had been subscribed at last accounts.—The Rajah of Mahmudabad, presiding over the All India Mohammedan Educational Conference at Ragoon, dwelt upon the need of teaching Mohammedans their own literature. He regretted that so many young Mohammedans study law, and advised them to take up science, medicine and technology. He recommended female education and a Mohammedan university.—Since the Boer war, in which, it was said some of the British troops were accidentally furnished with Dum Dum ammunition, forbidden in civilized warfare by the Hague Peace Conference, the Government has ceased to manufacture it for the purpose it was designed for, namely frontier war. Much chagrin is now felt at the discovery that former conditions are reversed, and that Dum Dum bullets are pouring into Afghanistan; the more so as it appears that they are coming in no small measure, at least indirectly, from English factories. This means that in the next trouble on the frontier the tribesmen will have Dum Dum bullets and the English troops only the ordinary service ammunition. The Pioneer of Allahabad asks the Government to check the exportation of such bullets and to forbid it absolutely.

with regard to Afghanistan. The Dum Dum is a so-called explosive bullet receiving its name from the site of the Government factory near Calcutta. The soft lead core is exposed at its tip and the casing is light, the effect of which is that in striking bone it spreads and strips, tearing open a frightful wound almost necessarily fatal. English troops like even less to face them than did the frontier tribes.—A package addressed to the Deputy-Commissioner at Umballa was left at his gate. A servant appropriated it and began to open it. He paid the penalty of his dishonesty as it exploded, blowing off his hand. It contained a bomb meant for the Commissioner.—The cotton crop is very good and growers are getting full advantage of the high prices. 10,000 bales have been shipped to America.

Australia.—Thirteen of the fifteen officials of the Coal Miners' Unions, prosecuted in New South Wales for offenses against the Industrial Disputes Act in connection with the coal strike, have been sentenced to a fine of £100 each or two months hard labor.

Religious Schools in France.—On the 13th inst. the Chamber of Deputies began a debate on the government bill to regulate religious schools, which is intended as an answer to the recent pronouncement of the bishops of France against lay schools. The debate immediately assumed a violent tone. A radical deputy from Indre-et-Loire, M. Besnard, denounced a university professor, M. Rocafort, as an agent of the Roman Curia in France and as the controller of the Catholic press. The Minister of Public Instruction, M. Doumergue, replying to M. Besnard, hinted that M. Rocafort was playing a double part in the government's interest. M. Maurice Barrès, nationalist deputy from the Seine, called for fuller explanations, and asked the Minister to be more precise. But M. Doumergue blinked the question and postponed his answer to the following week.

Catholic Social Action in France.—Le Temps, of the 5th inst., notes that there is among French Catholics a growing tendency to take hold, not only of religious, but also of social questions. "Clergy and laity vie with each other to find solutions for the formidable problems daily set forth by the antagonism between capital and labor. A new party—or at least something that has all the appearance of a party—is forming, and the moment is not far off when we, too, shall have our 'Social Christians.' Among the laity, Count Albert de Mun is at the head of this movement, and in this he is but faithful to himself. He has long been striving to inject into the lowest strata of the proletariat the idea that the Church is not indifferent to any of their claims and that it is even a part of her mission to help them to obtain a legitimate improvement of their condition. And his propaganda has always been viewed very kindly by ecclesiastical dignitaries, whose moral authority it could only increase. Now they do better than encourage M. de Mun; some of them—and these among the most notable—join him in active work with an intrepidity that for a moment baffled the public. At first, people asked what secret designs lurked behind an agitation that sometimes wrongly, or unfortunately, has coincided with other movements not at all evangelical, and how, for instance, it could happen that Mgr. Amette was not afraid to appear as an auxiliary to Citizen Bousquet." After enlarging on the misgivings of those who say this agitation is simply the clergy's way of recovering its lost influence, Le Temps magnanimously sides with those who say that the Catholic clergy and laity have no ulterior secret designs and are honestly anxious to help and console the poor. But the opportunist organ warns the Church against the influence of politicians who will attempt to divert her action into political issues.

Germany.—The Prussian Landtag began its session January 11. The speech from the throne was a brief and unsatisfactory document. The reform of the electoral system in Prussia, a topic engaging universal attention, was touched upon in a simple passage lacking clearly defined expression regarding the Government's plans. A growing improvement of the finances of the kingdom, following the marked advance in commerce and trade, was announced, but greater expenditures in behalf of the state-railroads and the sums required to meet the increase of official salary lists voted in the last session have caused a deficit which makes strict economy necessary. New legislation will be sought in the present session to further an extension of the state railways, to improve the condition of agriculture and the farmer, and a scheme for home colonization will be proposed. A new arrangement in the municipal franchises of the Rhine province will also be considered. The budget laid before the Landtag carries a deficit of nearly 100,000,000 marks. The press is united in its expression of disappointment over the unsatisfactory reference to electoral reform in the speech.—The Reichstag convened on the same date following its holiday recess. A point of interest to all Americans will mark this session of the body, the preparation, namely, of a new trade agreement between the Empire and the United States made necessary by the changes following the new tariff act of this country. The Kölnische Zeitung expresses confidence that mutual effort for a speedy agreement will have happy results. The same paper takes for granted that American interests will not seek to force concessions to all their demands, and bluntly insists that no compromise be made by the Government regarding the American cattle industry. The German Government, it adds, is bound to defend home interests which are especially affected by the Payne tariff, and it were unwise to permit these interests to be newly burdened by aiding an alien people to enter the markets of the country.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Pombal and His Epoch

On arriving in Lisbon last autumn I was told of a new publication, "The Marquis Pombal and His Epoch" ("O Marquez de Pombal e a sua epoca." Lisbon, 1909. A. M. Texeira, 477 pages, 1,200 reis), from the pen of Senhor J. Lucio d'Azevedo, already known by his work on the Jesuit Missions of Grao-Pará, and the high interest of the subject which had never been adequately handled, sent me to the book, which I read at Cascaes during the hot evenings of September. The author has explored the extensive Pombaline Collection at the Lisbon National Library and if he gives no startling novelties, he shows from documents good reasons for modifying some of the received views on Pombal as diplomat, administrator and foreign minister, while where the problem is unsolved and apparently insoluble, as in the case of the so-called Tavora conspiracy, he marshals the evidence on both sides with impartiality and leaves the reader to form his own judgment. Indeed though a host of writers in the principal languages have been busy with Pombal for more than a century, I do not for the moment recall a more satisfying study or series of studies, for exhaustive history it does not claim to be.

In view of his conflict with the privileged nobility it is important to know that Pombal was not a fidalgo and when considering his policy to remember that he only began public life as minister in London at 39 when men's minds are no longer pliable. It is true that by the hard work which was his habit through life, he there acquired a large stock of knowledge, but keen observer as he was and admirer of British political greatness and commercial prosperity, he failed to penetrate one of the main underlying causes, love of liberty together with respect for the law. He remained unaffected by many of the really progressive ideas then current in England. When he came to govern, he sought his models a hundred years back; Sully in economics and Richelieu in politics are the guides he chose. But even had his ideas been sound the arbitrary methods by which he forced radical changes on a backward country, rendered even the best of them sterile of results. It was probably in London and Vienna that he realized the economic importance of the Jews and so, in later years, ignoring the national prejudices against them, he abolished the odious distinction between old and new Christians, which Father Viêira had denounced a century earlier. There is no doubt too that in those capitals he imbibed a big dose of eighteenth-century scepticism, as well as the Royalist doctrines which he translated into laws, many of which still cripple the Church in Portugal.

Except for his marriage to an aristocrat, daughter of Field Marshal Daun, Pombal achieved little either in London or Vienna and, on his return, the king's distrust of him kept his ambition in check. This is common ground, but who recommended him to the new ruler, Joseph? A Jesuit confessor, probably, and also the Queen Mother, but it must not be forgotten that the famous diplomat, D. Luiz da Cunha, had also pointed him out to Joseph when the latter was only Prince and this indication would not be the least weighty of all these. At any rate it is certain that no sooner was Joseph on the throne than Pombal suddenly found himself Secretary of State and that in a short time he acquired an absolute hold over the king who was content to amuse himself like a Braganza, while his minister for a quarter of a century directed the whole machinery of the State as though it were his own property. In the view of Senhor Azevedo, Pombal's administration differs from those that preceded it in the following respects: (1) He imposed absolute obedience to the law, which, by the way, was generally his own will, for the Cortes had long ceased to be summoned; (2) he levelled down all classes before the royal authority; (3) he transformed the Inquisition into a mere department of state; (4) his audacious and successful attacks on Papal authority culminated in the breach with Rome and the suppression of the Company of Jesus, the old name for the Society, in the Portuguese dominions.

If it is strange to find the poet Virgil regarded as a magician by the Middle Ages, it is at least strange to hear modern Free-thinkers praise Pombal as an paladin of liberty when in fact he was her determined foe. It may be admitted that he had formed great ideals for Portugal and that he ever sought to raise her in the scale of nations, but he thoroughly detested democracy and when the common people ventured to oppose him in the case of the Oporto Wine Company, he punished their presumption so ruthlessly that they never dared to repeat the offence. I think the maxim, "everything for the people but nothing by the people," is quite wrongly applied to his rule, because the monopolies he established benefited the few rather than the many and it is significant that the first road connecting Lisbon and Oporto, the two principal cities of the realm, was made not under his auspices but by the much-abused "reactionary" government that succeeded him.

Senhor Azevedo shows that Pombal felt no interest in military affairs and greatly neglected both the army and navy, while, as he kept all important matters in his own hands, and would allow no one to help him who was not content to be a passive instrument, the work of the Government departments suffered the usual delays, and the foreign envoys were constantly complaining of the difficulty in getting replies to their communications. There is hardly a parallel in modern history to this concentration of all the power and all the business of the State in an individual of the nineteenth century. Directors of Paraguay acted in like manner, the comparison does not flatter Pombal and the results of one-man-rule were in each case deplorable. That in many respects he infused new energy into the government of Portugal and strove to render her economically less dependent on Great Britain is true enough and to his credit, but that he either did or could treat on equal terms is a fable and much as he detested the English, he was a firm upholder of the old political alliance. Though certainly ahead of his age for Portugal, his education left him far inferior to the foreign statesmen, his contemporaries. Many of his vaunted reforms were really no reforms at all, his administration was extravagant, the industries he founded died in infancy, and his own hands were by no means clean in matters of money.

The extraordinary activity he put forth on the occasion of the Great Earthquake of November 1, 1755, confirmed his ascendancy over the mind of Joseph and the mysterious attempt on the king's life gave him a pretext to avenge old slights and crush the independence of the nobles who, worthless as most of them were, had good reason to hate the upstart. Judging that the affair, which seems to have been an act of private vengeance on the part of the Duke of Aveiro, was really directed against himself, his rancor led him to magnify it into a widespread conspiracy, and after a trial which was a mockery of justice, the Duke and the Tavoras were put to death with horrible cruelties. Thenceforth the Pombaline terror met with small opposition from a coward people and even verbal criticism was rendered dangerous by the spies who frequented places of public resort, for perpetual imprisonment, exile and death rewarded the enemies of the Government.

Pombal was bound to come into conflict with the Jesuits who as confessors to the royal family exercised no small influence. Father Weld in his book, "The Suppression of the Society of Jesus in the Portuguese Dominions," seems to share the opinion that they blocked two of Pombal's projects, the marriage of the heiress-presumptive to the Duke of Cumberland and the granting of privileges to the Jews to secure their aid in the rebuilding of Lisbon, but the open dispute between the two powers arose over South America where the Jesuits had been the protectors of the Indians against the rapacity of the colonists and where they had formed great reservations in which, by virtue of royal decrees, they alone exercised authority. The Treaty of Limits regulating the areas of Spanish and Portuguese jurisdiction in the State was a deathblow to the missions and when the natives refused obedience, they were cut up by the royal troops in an inglorious campaign which inspired the poem "Uruguay" of Basilio da Gama. Pombal chose to attribute the difficulties he encountered to Jesuit machinations and opposition maddened him. He appealed to Rome and obtained the appointment of a creature of his as visitor with power to reform the Society, but what he really intended was to end it and the Tavora plot gave him a handle, because of the friendship between the victims and the Jesuits. He proceeded to confiscate the property of the Order and deported the Portuguese Fathers, about a thousand in number, to the Papal States, keeping the foreigners, who would gladly have gone, in prisons on the Tagus. And not content with vanquishing the Society, he resolved to humiliate it in the person of one of its most conspicuous members. He must indeed have had "hairs in his heart," when he himself denounced Gabriel Malagrida to the Holy Office for crimes against the Faith and had the old missionary who had lost his wits by suffering, strangled and then burnt in public in an Auto da Fé on September 20, 1761. The Jesuits had become a real obsession with Pombal and during the remaining years of his rule he used the best of his unceasing energy and almost unlimited power to compass the entire suppression of the Society and in alliance with the Jansenists he secured the assistance of the Bourbon Courts in bringing the Pope to an acquiescence in his design.

No success attended him at first, so he entered on an active war against Rome itself. The Nuncio was expelled, the Bishops were compelled to exercise the functions always attributed to the Holy See and the Portuguese Church came to have the First Minister as her head. Soon the religious autonomy of the nation was complete and with a view of justifying his action and influencing foreign opinion in its favor Pombal issued the famous "Dedução Chronologica," part of which is certainly from his pen. There he absurdly charged the Jesuits with responsibility for all the ills that had afflicted Portugal since the death of King Sebastian. In the end, to prevent a permanent schism, Pope Clement XIV yielded to the pressure brought to bear on him from all sides and by the Brief "Dominus ac Redemptor Noster," the Society ceased to exist. Though Pombal prided himself on having been the chief mover Senhor Azevedo brings evidence to show that the final resolution was wrung from the Pope by the Spanish envoy Moñino. As soon as he was sure of success Pombal was ready enough to make peace with Rome, but the ecclesiastical system of Portugal remained henceforth a sort of disguised Anglicanism. He did not long enjoy his triumph, for on the death of King Joseph he was deprived of his position and exiled and only respect for her father's memory persuaded Queen Mary to save him from the condign punishment he had earned. His splendid constitution enabled him to resist for five years, which leprosy and fears of the block made a continual martyrdom, and in 1782 he passed away. The Bishop of Coimbra presided at his obsequies which were on a grand scale and a panegyric was delivered by the Benedictine Father Joaquim de Santa Clara, which reminds me to say that Pombal had many friends and admirers among the clergy both in Portugal and in Rome.

Though Senhor Azevedo greatly reduces the number of his legitimate titles to fame, it would be mere prejudice to deny greatness to the rebuilder of Lisbon, to the powerful personality who marked an epoch in a nation's annals and played a leading part on the European stage.

His boldness of conception and tenacity of purpose in execution place him above other men, as his enemies freely recognized; indeed to many of them there was something preternatural in the fact that he should have been allowed a career of such continued successful ambition. Yet it must be remembered that history inscribes on her ample page, among the great, men bad and good and it is to be feared that the former have largely exceeded in number the latter. The true heroes are for the most part known to God only, the others have many to trumpet their renown, and success of any kind will have its worshippers until the end of things. One word and I have done. Chapter ten of the book includes some interesting extracts from Pombal's defence of his rule and in a former chapter there is a good deal of fresh information about his administration of the various departments of State. The work seems to me worthy of an English dress.

Schools for the Pueblo Indians

If the Indians, and especially the 9,000 Pueblos of New Mexico, are to receive a training that will be any more than a pretty though useless accomplishment, due attention must be paid to the environment in which the graduates will find themselves. The object of schooling is to increase the worth of the student as a unit of the great human family. Instruction confined to childish amusements or feats would be of little avail beyond boyhood, just as a practical knowledge of citrus culture would not be a valuable asset to an Alaskan. Whether in book lore or in handicrafts, it should tend to equip the pupil for some measure of success in that greater portion of his life which will be spent away from schools and teachers; it should furnish a fund whence he may draw as future need demands. As this object of teaching is so plain and reasonable to all thinkers, it ought to be equally plain and reasonable that if careful provision is to be made in early life for some success at a more mature age, even greater care should be shown in preparing the child, not for a few years of a life that he shares with the brute creation, but for the endless days of eternity.

Our object, however, is rather to dwell on providing for the temporal welfare of the Indian youth. Time and place are important elements in worldly success. Some occupations have disappeared. The clang of the armorer's hammer which once awakened the echoes in every village was stilled long ago, and the harness of the knight is seen only in museums. Other occupations are profitable if followed under conditions that are fully verified only in some out-of-the-way corner of the earth. Edible birds' nests are not gathered along the Palisades of the Hudson.

Four hundred years have been unable to effect any notable alteration in the life of the Pueblo Indians. Their agricultural methods, their social customs, and their manner of government are to-day substantially what they were when Coronado sallied forth into unknown lands on his journeys of exploration. Peaceable, unoffending, industrious, they have continued to dig and to delve. If their adobe towns have long had a church, they have had for a longer time the estufa, or lodge room, where the stripling is promoted with weird ceremonies from a place among the boys to the ranks of the men, where the ancients meet in solemn session, where heathenish rites are performed.

A few boys whisked away to Pennsylvania, where climate, soil and water supply are so different, may learn American ways and methods, but will they leaven the whole mass when they return to their native village with a knowledge of American ways and methods? As well might one try to graft an oak on sagebrush. The place for an Indian school as an effective sociological factor is in an Indian town, where even the adults may, at least indirectly, profit by its teaching.

If an Indian youth masters a trade, for instance, plumbing, which is as useful in his town as a knowledge of cuneiform inscriptions, he must drop it or lose himself among the whites, thus weakening his tribe or village. Preference and place have led the Pueblos to adopt an agricultural and pastoral life, but their pursuits are controlled and strongly marked by local conditions. Generally speaking, their land needs irrigation to secure a crop. How can the young Indian improve as a farmer if he is trained in a district where an irrigated field would be as great a curiosity as a buffalo? Let him be placed on a model farm where the conditions are such as he will have to meet on his reservation. The Mormons, though almost newcomers in southwestern Colorado, are far more proficient in irrigating than the Mexicans, among whom irrigation is handed down as a tradition. The Mormons have so worked and experimented that they now know to a nicety how to husband the scanty flow of water.

There is a common persuasion that the Pueblos form one tribe with a common tongue, but, though so few in number, five different languages are spoken among them. In the Pueblo of Jémez, not far from Santa Fe, fewer than five hundred Indians speak a tongue utterly unintelligible to the other Pueblos or to any other people, as far as is known, on the face of the earth. Spanish is the ordinary means of communication between tribes linguistically different. The number and difficulty of the languages explain why all the religious instruction that the Indians receive is given in Spanish, with which all the men and boys have a limited acquaintance, an acquaintance too limited by far to be of great help in assimilating religious truths.

The history of the Eastern States will infallibly be repeated in the West. The Indian must go. The Pueblos successfully maintained themselves for centuries against the raids of the bloodthirsty, war-loving Apaches. Have they held their own during the past thirty years of increased intimacy with the whites? The outward indications do not suggest an affirmative answer to the question. A simple agricultural and pastoral people may be protected against dishonest adventurers, may be assisted in its natural field of activity; but mingling with the white means racial corruption and extinction. The last surviving Pueblo Indian may have been already born.

The Socialistic Kingdom of God

II.

The Kingdom of God, though but temporal and earthly, is, as Christian Socialists assure us, the most perfect moral order, in which all the intentions of the Saviour of mankind will be fully realized. Is this mere ostentation or is it the expression of an incontestable truth? To solve this question we must further inquire into the constitution, the basis, the fundamental laws, the membership and the final consummation of this newly discovered realm.

The bond which is said to unite men in the Kingdom of God is love, and the fundamental law which is to govern and harmonize in it all conduct is that of civic righteousness. Professor Rauschenbusch has discussed this topic with much ingenuity.

"The goodness," he says, "which He (Jesus) sought to create in men was always the goodness which would enable them to live rightly with their fellowmen and to constitute a true social life. All human goodness must be social goodness. Man is fundamentally gregarious, and his morality consists in being a good member of his community. A man is moral when he is social; he is immoral when he is anti-social. The highest type of goodness is that which puts freely at the service of the community all that a man is and can." Jesus was indifferent even to religious duties when they did not serve men. But love is the power that creates society. "Human life originates in love. It is love that holds together the basal organization of the family. The physical expression of all love and friendship is the desire to get together and to be together. Love creates fellowship. In the measure in which love increases in any social organism it will hold together." Hence Professor Rauschenbusch infers that love was the fundamental virtue in the ethics of Jesus, that Jesus was a champion of a great movement for a right social life, and that the Kingdom of God which he established was the true human society, a fellowship of equality, justice and love. ("Christianity and the Social Crisis," pp. 66, 77, 91.)

In similar terms the Kingdom of God is generally described by Christian Socialists. Rev. Thomas P. Byrnes in an address delivered in the Toledo Conference, 1909, characterizes it as a society in which love and brotherhood will be the ruling power and God will be regarded as the common Father of all the children of men, as a commonwealth in which democracy and social equality will prevail. (Christian Socialist, June 1, 1909.)

Righteousness, however, such as must predominate in God's Kingdom, is economic. "Jesus," as Professor Rauschenbusch remarks, "discerned a danger to love and unity, to the finer sense, to the instinct of mercy, kindness and equality. This danger was the pursuit of wealth. He most distinctly called attention to it when he warned his disciples that the cares of this life and the deceitfulness of riches like rank weeds choke the good seed, or when he told them they could not serve God and Mammon at the same time. He encountered riches as a prime divisive force "which wedges society apart in horizontal strata," paralyzes fellow-feeling, "lifts individuals out of the wholesome dependencies on their fellows and equally out of the full sense of responsibility to them." Hence Christ's assertion that "it is hard for any rich man to enter into the Kingdom of God, harder than for a camel to wedge through the eye of a needle." ("Christianity and the Social Crisis," pp. 74-82.) Hence also his sympathy with the common people and the oppressed, and his aversion for the wealthy and powerful. To the former he was to preach the Gospel and to bring redemption, but the latter he threatened with perdition; he commended the qualities of the working classes and condemned those of the trading classes; he invited the poor to follow him and rejected the rich unless they gave away all their property to the needy. (Weeks "Socialism of Jesus," pp. 12-19.)

Christ, by thus instructing the people, not only recognized the ethical consciousness of the working class as the standard of the Kingdom, but also started a working-class movement. (Ibid. pp. 19, 20.) Rev. Paul H. Castle maintains that he made labor unionism a part of his scheme of salvation. "When Jesus came into the world he found Rome honeycombed with labor unions, but driven into secrecy because of persecutions. These labor unions practised communism and ate at a common table. They practised the principles of brotherhood in a practical way. The teachings of Jesus coincided with the democracy of the fraternity of the labor unions, and what they had been preaching in secret, Jesus declared openly to the world as a part of his scheme of salvation. Hence everywhere the laboring element, the poor and lowly, the labor unions, welcomed Him and His followers." (Christian Socialist, Nov. 15, 1907.)

The régime of the labor movement, it is said, was the opposite of that of the Kingdom of Mammon, or money-making. The law of Mammon was exploitation, the law of the movement which Christ started was mutual service and equal pay for all who do their best, the law of Mammon means division, inequality, each man for himself, in modern terms, competition, the law of the Christian movement means union, organization, mutual arranged activity for the common good of all, cooperation.

The peace, plenty, and happiness which will result from this new order, when fully realized in the Kingdom of God, is pictured in the literature of Christian Socialists in glowing colors. To give but one instance, Rev. Thomas P. Byrnes rose in the Toledo Conference to the following description: "In such a Kingdom hate will cease, and war, industrial, financial, economic and military, will end. Human needs will be met and provided for in an ethical, human and Christian manner. In this social order man will have ground upon which to stand, the first natural and common right of all men to the land will be recognized, the natural bounty of the earth will be open to all, and all will be permitted to live the large full, free, joyous, loving human life." (Ibid. June, 1909.)

The line along which Christian Socialists reason is obvious. All moral goodness consists in being social and living for society. Again society is held together by love as the bond of union, and develops only in so far as righteousness and justice are prevailing among its members. But with love and social justice the pursuit of wealth is absolutely incompatible.

The Kingdom of God founded by Christ is the most perfect society and the most accomplished brotherhood and for this very reason aims at the highest degree of moral goodness. Consequently its greatest opponent and its greatest danger is the Kingdom of Mammon, which has for its object the acquisition of wealth and for its law inequality, competition, and exploitation. It is therefore only by the conquest of this enemy, that is by keeping up economic righteousness and by establishing just economic relations that it can maintain its existence and unfold its beauty.

Manuals and Morals

Every child has certain sacred, imprescriptible rights. If he has a right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, a right to his little place in the world's sunshine, he has a better one to the light of the sun of Truth. If it is a crime to handicap him in his legitimate, rational pursuit of material happiness, to degrade him with the badge and gyves of slavery, to maim his bodily frame or deprive him of life, it is heartless tyranny to stunt his faculties and poison the sacred fountains of his heart. If it is a crime to do so for one single, helpless child, it is monstrous to attempt it for whole generations, over whose cradles, if the conspiracy be successful, the star of Truth will never shine.

The atheistic Government of France has plotted this treason. With relentless, machine-like progression, it has done its Vandal work of destruction. The religious were first driven out, helpless nuns thrust into the streets, beggars, outcasts in the land of chivalry and romance, bishops hustled from cathedral and palace, priests worried and dogged like criminals. Now the child's turn has come. He must be robbed of his birthright; he must be blinded to the Truth. He must be paganized. Agnosticism, materialism, infidelity, atheism, drop by drop must be instilled into his heart and brain. The State is to have the monopoly of his education. The State has turned pedagogue and has written the text-books and manuals of its New Evangel. These Manuals reek with nonsense and stupidity, they are packed from cover to cover with misrepresentations, lies and blasphemy. Julian the Apostate, in his warfare against Christianity, might have learned a few tricks from this odious Government. He was a pigmy compared to this ruthless giant cased in triple brass.

But its action has not gone unchallenged. The French bishops, like faithful watchmen from their towers, have sounded the alarm. They have unanimously condemned the State Manuals thus violently thrust upon their children. Every serious man, every Christian will applaud their generous and fearless action.

The child has a right to the Truth. He has a right to know his own nature and being, his origin, his end. That nature, that origin, that end, his catechism teaches in simple, clear, unerring words. Hear now what the State-Teacher M. Jules Payot tells the new generation of the Sacred Books in which these doctrines are contained, and of these doctrines themselves. Mark his self-conscious dogmatism, his pseudo-scientific jargon: "In apparently pure water, chemical analysis has discovered various bacteria and salts held in solution. So in those books where hitherto an over-confident Faith found the very words of God, a critical analysis discovered many elements unworthy of such an origin. It soon became quite evident that these books bear the imprint of the epoch in which they were written. These books contain errors, such as the legends of creation, of the formation of the first man and woman, of the fall and the deluge, etc., which the progress of science forces us to reject." ("Cours de Morale," 7e édition, p. 203.)

Surely M. Payot is dogmatic and, if high-sounding phrases count for anything, scientific enough. He forgets that creation is a scientific truth just as clearly demonstrated as any of those chemical facts of which he makes such a silly parade, scientifically proved by the same logic that led Pasteur to the discovery of the laws of fermentation, Newton into the secret of universal gravitation and Kepler to trace the mystic mazes of the planets wheeling in majestic flight over our heads.

M. Payot and M. E. Primaire teach evolution with a colossal assurance, a finality of judgment which would make Darwin himself gasp and stare. "The sciences dealing with prehistoric facts," writes M. Payot in the very introduction to his book, "comparative anatomy and morphology, comparative and experimental psychology, archeology, languages, prove that our race started from very low." Imagine the schoolmaster and the pupil who have to face all that. M. Primaire goes further. "In appearance like the animals, like the apes and the monkeys of the forests, primitive man lived like them. For him there was no morality, no law." ("Primaire, Manuel d'éducation morale," etc., p. 4.) What right has M.

Primaire to establish the identity of the brute with primitive man? Where are his scientific proofs? Why does he so coolly toss aside the inspired account of the creation of man and substitute for it his own gratuitous and groundless assumptions? Such an assertion needs a little more than his "I told you so." Haeckel himself would be hard put to it to make it good. To round off with a little rhetoric, Alfred Bayet, another of these mentors and guides, moralizing on the sad condition of this hypothetical man-brute, exclaims pathetically: "How wretched thou must have been!" More wretched the hireling shepherds who feed their flock on such empty and poisonous husks!

And when these high-priests of the State religion come to the vital question of morality, discuss good and evil, define right and wrong, what have they to give? Of the true origin and destiny of man they have no knowledge or if they have, they wilfully pervert it. Hence their whole system is radically vitiated and unsound. For in the true concept of things, that which helps man to attain his end is good, that which deflects him from it, is evil. The end alone regulates the moral formation and education of man. In Bayet and Payot, not a word of this. Not once are the eyes of the child lifted beyond the limited horizon of time, not once is there a generous "Sursum Corda," sounded like a trumpet-call to the soul, not once is a finger pointed to a nobler realm and a better world. Utilitarianism with them has become the final standard of morality. That which is useful to you, say they, is good, that which is harmful is evil. Jeremy Bentham prevails at last. What a training for the new generation! Who can foretell the mad carnival of egotism and crime to which such doctrines, if once applied, must inevitably give birth. For all efficacious sanction against the violation of Law is done away with. M. Payot blots out a belief in immortality, a hereafter, a heaven, a hell, from his books and his cosy little system. Of the life of the soul after death, he tells us, thanks to the law of progress, we know nothing. (Cf. "Cours de Morale," p. 207.) Our heaven is here on earth; so also our hell. Heaven is "the superior region of the noble instincts of the soul"; hell, "the inferior region of its low grovelling instincts." Happiness is in the memory of some generous act, in the sight of a beautiful child, and handsome youth, in the aspect of the starry heavens, the glories of the rising sun! And these are the hollow platitudes they would foist upon us instead of the splendid cycle of our doctrines and traditions, for our Faith, the boast and glory of sages and saints!

Alfred Bayet goes further. Though he would ignore God, he must discuss Him, and writes that we cannot tell whether He exists or not! Yet Pasteur and Pascal, Leverrier and Descartes adored Him! Yet a great scientist, Lord Kelvin, tells him: "If you think strongly enough, you will be forced by science to believe in God. . . ." But Mr. Bayet's own argument recoils against him. There is a flare back in his little popgun.

"We do not know scientifically," he writes, "whether there is a God or not. All that (the existence of God and the rewards and punishments of an after-life) we do not know scientifically, and do what we will, we shall never know. Science cannot teach it." ("Leçons de Morale," p. 149.) And in the same place he concludes by stating that whatever we do not know or cannot know scientifically is simply unknowable (Ibid, p. 149). Yet there are dozens of things and facts which we positively and for a certainty know, and of which science has never breathed a word. Mr. Bayet, we presume, recognizes the binding force of a solemn affirmative or an oath. On what leaf of its book does science teach it? He loves no doubt the mother who bore him, at whose knees, perhaps, he learned the prayers and the dogmas he now rejects. To love her is a duty he will say. But science never whispered it into his ear. Where does science teach the malice of murder? Where does that science as Mr. Bayet understands it, teach the right of private property, the foulness of a lie? Science has not ticketed or labelled any of these things: yet we know them to be; they are stubborn facts. Science teaches much and it is one of our noblest privileges that we can worship at its shrine, but there is a great deal more that may not be decanted into its retorts and analyzed.

One step more. M. Payot meets in the history of the world, the sacred Figure of the Saviour of our race, and heedless of the Faith of millions, deaf to the acclaiming voice of ages that proclaim His Person and His Work divine, he sneeringly puts Him on a level with neglected inventors or "persecuted" reformers, with Jacquart and Fulton, with Socrates, Luther, Galileo and Tolstoi. ("Cours de Morale," p. 113). After this what depths of folly and degradation will they not sound!

"In rearing a child, think of its old age," says Joubert. Put these manuals into the hands of a generation of children. Educate them on these platitudinous, illogical, unscientific, blasphemous lessons. What must be the result? National brain-deterioration. French intellect will be brutalized. Corroded by the poisonous acid of scepticism and atheism, the French mind will lose its vigor, its clearness, its classic equilibrium, its subtle delicacy and charm. French literature, so fallen already from its high estate, will become more and more mocking and irreverent, more coarse and obscene. The torch of true science and art will be quenched in academy and hall to be rekindled no more. Educate a generation or two on manuals and books whence the words God, the immortality of the soul, heaven and hell and the Adorable Name of Christ, true God and true Man, have been expunged, and France, struggling already in the maelstrom of fate, will be swept headlong into the gulf of national ruin and disgrace. (Cf. Etudes, 20 Nov., 1909: Bulletin de l'Enseignement et de l'Education, by Joseph Burnichon; Etudes, 5 Décembre, 1909: Les Manuels Condamnés par les Evêques, by Jules Grivet.)

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

Adieu Noel!

"Christmas time is gone," said the Rector with a sigh. "We took down our evergreens this week. It always makes me just a little sad when the Epiphany octave has gone by. How lovingly the Church lingers over the Christmas joys! And now the glad notes are dying down in the Breviary and the Missal and the first whispers of Lent are in the air. Eheu! How fast they come round, the Advents and the Christmases, and the Lents and the Easters and the Pentecosts!"

There was just a suggestion of weariness in his tone—a very rare thing with the Rector, who is a cheerful person if there be one on earth. Then he went on in that kind of dreamy monotone that men sometimes fall into when they are thinking aloud of those things that belong to the inner chambers of the soul.

"Every year the Advent season seems to renew my youth for me. When I shift from my Pars Autumnalis to my Pars Hiemalis and meet those words: 'Fratres, Hora est jam nos de somno surgere, it is like a trumpet-call, a kind of spiritual reveille. And for four weeks the Office is a perfect delight as the agony of expectation grows and swells until that last wonderful week when it seems as if all creation is waiting breathless upon the divine event. Then comes Christmas morning—"

Again a sigh. "I remember so well my first Christmas as a priest. In those days I was an assistant at St. — down town. It was a small church and a big parish—I'm talking now of 1879, remember. I'll never forget it to my dying day—nor in Heaven, either, when I get there. Our first Mass on Christmas was a high Mass at five o'clock. I was deacon. It was a typical Christmas morning, snow on the ground, dark, cold and clear. The church was a blaze of light. I can see it now as it looked when we went to the altar. It was packed to the doors. I felt my heart swell up within me as if it would burst as I saw the eager faces. When the time came for me to sing the Gospel and I began: 'Exiit edictum a Cæsare Augusto,' the whole scene, as that wonderful man, Luke, describes it, came up before me and I felt myself slipping. I went on more or less all right till I came to the 'Quia non erat eis locus in diversorio,' and then I went to pieces. I suppose I must have stopped for full fifteen seconds by the clock, and that's a long time. How I finished it I don't know, but I got through somehow. Then there came the 'Adeste Fideles' at the Offertory, and that smashed me again."

There was a moment's silence. The Doctor was sitting very still and I did not find anything to say. Again the Rector went on in the same curiously thin tone:

"There's a magic about the words of the Christmas Gospels and the Epiphany Gospels that is lacking to me at the other great seasons of the year. That second chapter of Luke, for instance—what a sweep of imagery there is in it. There's Cæsar Augustus in imperial Rome and his edict, then the journey of Joseph and Mary from Nazareth to Bethlehem, the crowded village, the shepherds keeping the night watches on the hills, the stable, the angels filling the night with their celestial song—it's easy to see them and hear them and sing with them. I suppose it's because the child in us is called to life again and we become for a time what our Lord wanted us to become, 'like unto one of these.' I wish I could see Mount Thabor, Gethsemane, Calvary and the Sepulchre as I can see Bethlehem."

"You're right about the child part of it, Padre," said the Doctor. "I said good-bye to Christmas last Sunday night. Padre, the children!—"

The unwonted tenderness in the Doctor's voice caused both the Rector and me to start. I had not heard that note in it before.

"What do you mean, Doctor?" said the Rector, obviously puzzled.

"On Sunday night last I saw the crib come to life. I saw the shepherds and the Magi and I heard the angels sing. I suppose, Park Row, you never heard of Our Lady of Loretto in Elizabeth street, and I'll bet you've never been there, Padre."

"I know where it is," said the Rector. I didn't, so said nothing.

"All right," said the Doctor, "I thought so. Now just listen to me for a moment. That's the place Father Walsh runs—a mission for Italians—Father Russo used to have it. Last Sunday night I went down to hear his boys and girls sing some Christmas carols. The church looks like an ordinary loft building with the second and third floors ripped out—plain is no word for it. The whole place is a labyrinth of alley-ways, nooks and crannies, holes and corners, pillars and posts, side doors, back doors, front steps, back steps, and so on—nothing in the way of space gone to waste, everything put to use every minute; that's what it looks like, and I suspect that's what it is. Well—"

"At eight o'clock out came a procession from the sacristy, the girls first, some thirty of them probably, all in white with veils as if for First Communion—eight to fourteen years old, dark eyed, olive skinned, self-possessed, yet utterly unconscious of self, and they sang the carol "See Amid the Winter's Snow" as they began the march round the church. Then followed the boys, a like number, of like age, dressed as shepherds, with their sheepskins and shepherds' crooks. Padre, the girls were beautiful to look at but you should have seen the boys! Every one of them a little prince! How they carried themselves, their grave dignity, the poise of body, the grace of movement, the simple majesty of their bearing! It was incredible, impossible, unreal, unearthly—and there it was. And the voices of them, boys and girls, so soft, so true, so extraordinarily sympathetic—to hear them sing the words 'Christ is born in Bethlehem' was to realize Christmas. Heaven knows I'm no hyper-aesthetic musical sensualist like Park Row here, but I, I—"

"Yes, I know, Doctor," I interjected, "don't apologize."

"I'm not going to," said the Doctor. "Then the girls filed into the front seats and the boys marched up to the altar steps and grouped themselves there around one of them who represented the angel with the star and they sang more carols. What a picture they made, with their dark curly hair, straightforward faces and pose so natural in its perfect ease and grace. Never a trace of awkwardness or artifice anywhere; and for an hour they filled the place with Christmas—just Christmas, Christmas, Christmas! Then there was Benediction. The larger boys ranged themselves with lamps on each side of the altar. I think it was about the most beautiful thing I ever saw in my life. This foreign immigration is going to be the ruin of our country, isn't it, Padre?"

"I feel as you do about it, Padre. Christmas has gone and I'm sorry. And now we've got to gird up our loins for Lent and be men—children no more. It's only a week to Septuagesima. But it was a beautiful goodbye to Christmas those children gave us. Next year the crib will mean more to me since I've seen it in life."

* * * * *

Browsing aimlessly at my club one afternoon this week I found in a French illustrated newspaper a prose poem on the word "Noël," by Lavedan, and I have made free to gather this paragraph from it:

"Ecoutez-le? Noël—N'entendez vous pas le vol d'un duvet, la chute d'un flocon sur le bras d'une croix, le tic-tac de bois d'un berceau, le soupir de la bûche, le bruissement de la paille et comme un son voilé d'éternelles matines? Noël!—mot blanc, d'une blancheur religieuse, mot givré, tombé d'une hostie, le lys des mots qui ne semble fait que pour s'échapper de lèvres virginales dans la buée de froid qui en est l'encens, mot d'argent, de nacre et de perle, mot de neige si fragile et si délicat que l'on a chaque fois l'impression—même avec une âme pure—de la ternir quand on s'en sert. Mot qui chante, mot qui tinte, mot qui prie dans la gaieté, mot tendre d'Église, allègre et pieux, frère d'alléluia, mot d'action de grâce, qui monte et voltige avec des dessins de cantique, et dont le son musical se congèle si suavement dans le bleu vitrail de la Grande Nuit"—*

And so—Adieu Noël!

ANDREW PROUT.

*"Hear it? Noël, do you not hear the flight of down, the fall of a snowflake on the arm of a cross, the wooden click of a cradle, the sigh of a burning log, the rustle of straw and, as it were, a muffled sound of eternal matins? Noël, a white word, of religious whiteness, a frosted word, dropped from a sacred Host, the lily of words that seems made only to fall from virginal lips in the vapor of cold which is its incense, a word of silver, nacre and pearl, a word of snow so fragile and so delicate that even with a pure soul, one feels as if one tarnished it each time it was used. A word that sings, a word that tinkles, a word that prays amid gaiety, a Church word tender, sprightly and pious, brother to alleluia, a thanksgiving word, which rises and flutters in hymn-like arabesques, and whose musical sound congeals so sweetly into the blue crystal of the Great Night."

CORRESPONDENCE

Religious and Social Conditions in Chile

The Republic of Chile is divided into the Metropolitan Archdiocese of Santiago and its suffragans, the Dioceses of Concepcion, La Serena and Ancud. Besides these, there are in the North, two Apostolic Vicariates, Iquique and Antofagasta. The bishops and clergy are generally men of the best families, descendants from the old Spanish stock, whose noble Christian sentiments, courteous manners and generosity they have retained.

The population of Santiago, the capital, is about 400,000, that of the whole Republic is about 3,000,000. Years ago, the Government deprived the clergy of the tithes, promised to rebuild and repair churches, and to support religion in general; but alas! these promises are very inadequately fulfilled. The consequence is that there is a great scarcity of clergy in the rural districts. In the capital some 600 priests, regular and secular, reside. The religious orders of men and women are well represented and do excellent work. In the city the majority of the secular clergy are sons of rich families who live on their patrimonies, and are principally engaged in teaching and in the service of the local parishes. On Saturdays many of these go out to country chapels, which are distant from a parish church, to celebrate Mass, preach the Gospel, catechise and administer the Holy Sacraments. During the week the gentleman owner of the hacienda, or his lady or eldest son, conducts the devotions of the Rosary and Litany and the various Novenas in season, in the estate chapel, surrounded by their numerous family and the families of the inquilinos. It is a lovely sight to see all, rich and poor, noble Spaniard and lowly Indian there gathered together in prayer. The country parish churches are frequently ten or twenty leagues apart. I think $50 per month would be about the average revenue of a country parish. The priest must keep one or two horses. The country clergy are apostolic men in every sense of the word.

The seminary is at the capital, Santiago, where an efficient staff of professors instruct some four hundred youths. The course of studies for the priesthood lasts twelve years; six are devoted to the Humanities, two to Mental Philosophy and four to Theology. The Diocese of Ancud, in the far south, extending to Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego, also has a seminary under the charge of the Jesuits. The Diocese of Concepcion and La Serena and the Port of Valparaiso have minor seminaries in which only the Humanities and Mental Philosophy are taught.

I have lived in Chile for ten years and it gives me much pleasure indeed to testify to the high intellectuality and morality of the Chilean clergy and people. Indeed, I have been edified by what I have seen and heard there, and I really think we, in the United States and Canada, could learn some salutary lessons from our noble Chilean brethren. One thing which has attracted my attention and admiration very much are their Houses for Spiritual Exercises (Casas de Ejercicios). These are found not only in the cities, but even in the country. They are very large; some receive as many as one thousand retreatants at a time. The Spiritual Exercises last nine days; during which time food and lodging are provided gratis to all the poor in attendance.

One can imagine the amount of good forthcoming from these retreats preached by zealous and learned priests, seculars and regulars, at short intervals throughout the entire year. When the course for men ends, one for women begins. Besides these, there is a mission of nine days given in every parish-church, and also in many private chapels every year, and novenas continually follow one another. Those old-styled Christians of Chile would think something was wrong and wanting if they were present at our missions and retreats in the United States. In their language they would call ours "retiros aguados" (watered retreats), for they would miss the hissing and cracking of the discipline in the church darkened by the extinction of all lights, except the faint glimmer of the sanctuary lamp.

There is no divorce in Chile. Family life is really beautiful in its patriarchal simplicity. The young girl is presented to society only a few months before her marriage. Courtings are very short and under strict vigilance. Once married, the young wife devotes herself to her husband; her flowers and jewels are the sons and daughters God blesses her with, and they grow up to love and respect and obey those fathers and mothers who have proven themselves so worthy of such affection. When speaking of their father the children say: "mi señor padre" (my lord father), "mi señora madre" (my lady mother). Children consult their parents even in trivial matters. Never, in any other country, have I seen such mutual respect and love between husband and wife and children and parents.

The principal newspapers are the private enterprises of Catholic gentlemen; the Union of Santiago, Valparaíso and Concepción. El Diario Ilustrado and El Popular of Santiago, El País of Concepción, as well as La Revista Católica do much to disseminate truth and correct error.

The haciendas are large, from one thousand to ten thousand acres, or more. The tillers of the soil are called peones or inquilinos. Their homes are built of adobe and divided into two or three apartments; the kitchen is outside of the house. Surrounding the house they have a half-acre of land for a kitchen garden; besides this they are allowed to work a few acres of land on equal shares with their patrons, who supply them with seed, oxen and implements gratis. In return for the use of the house and land, the inquilino, or one member of his family is required to work every work day for his food and a small wage, about fifteen cents per day. He is also allowed pasturage for a few head of cattle and sheep, and may keep fowls and pigs if he desire. His fuel is also free. The Conservative hacendados usually have a chapel on their haciendas and the people have Mass on Sundays and holidays, at least. A physician visits some of the haciendas once or twice a week, so that on the estates of the Conservatives the peones are fairly well off and generally contented. It is a grand sight to see so many thousands of the descendants of the aboriginal Indians every where present in these Latin Republics. They are all baptized; all instructed in their religion; all receive the Holy Sacraments. Many have Spanish blood in their veins. What a sad contrast to what we see in these United States and in some Provinces of Canada!

It is true that there is much discontent among the laboring classes in the cities, where the poor people earn little, learn expensive habits and are much addicted to gambling and intemperance in drink. But the bishops and clergy are laboring hard to improve the condition of the poor. Those of the clergy who are well-to-do are very generous, as are also the rich laity. There are free hospitals everywhere. Houses are being built for the poor on easy terms of payment. The laborers are encouraged to enter the Guild of St. Joseph, presided over by a priest, who attends to them spiritually; instructing them to be patient with their lot, and warning them against the utopian illusions preached to them by the Radicals and their Protestant allies.

The present Archbishop of Santiago, Dr. Don Juan Ignacio Gonzales, the Bishop of Concepción, Dr. Don Louis Enrique Izquierdo, and the Bishop of La Serena, Dr. Don Ramon Anjel Jara are spending their lives and their means in improving the condition of the working classes. The late lamented Archbishop Don Mariano Casanova and the late Dr. Fontecilla of La Serena were also hard working, self-denying and generous. Parochial and State Schools are to be found everywhere, and colleges and universities are open to all and within the means of many. Orphanages and homes for destitute children, Training Schools for artisans conducted by the Salesian Fathers, in fact, Christian charity is in evidence on all sides for the relief of sickness and want, and for the education of youth. In the face of such facts, I cannot comprehend how anyone can malign those noble and generous and hospitable South Americans. If all are like the Chileans, I must say I wish we were in some respects more like them ourselves.

One day about twelve years ago as we were approaching Port Limon in Costa Rica, the captain of the ship said to me: "You know only the clergy of North America; but I assure you those of these countries are a very different class of men." "In what respect?" I asked. "In their morality," he replied. "For instance," he said, "the bishop here has seven daughters, and on the last occasion that I was in port the people were celebrating the marriage of one of them." I told this good, Bible-reading and prayerful captain that when I went ashore I would inquire into the matter. I found the bishop to be a learned and holy man, a Lazarist, born in Austria of a noble family. Before his consecration he had been a professor of philosophy and theology, and since then had spent his fortune in building churches and other good works, and his energies in elevating the moral tone and intelligence of his flock.

The truth is that many northerners who visit these southern republics are prejudiced against their inhabitants. They get so-called information from people who are always ready to speak ill of the upper classes, and of a religion of which they know little or nothing or from those whose associates are Radicals and Freemasons.

The Outlook in Mexico

MEXICO, DECEMBER 23, 1909.

In the October issue of the Review of Reviews we are informed in the department assigned to "The Progress of the World," that notwithstanding the apparent prosperous state of affairs in Mexico, the horrors of civil war are by no means remote. The writer attributes the altered condition of politics in Mexico to the increasing popularity of Reyes who, according to the article, opposes Vice-President Corral in the forthcoming elections. I am very pleased to state, as a foreigner and resident in Mexico City that civil war is undreamt of. President Diaz has won the hearts of his countrymen and of strangers. The anti-Corral opposition party is at present gasping for breath. General B. Reyes himself has left the Republic on his way to Germany with the object of studying military tactics. I will not deny there was a slight manifestation in favor of B. Reyes; but few of the upper and well-to-do classes embraced his views as they clashed with the President's policy of peace and progress.

When President Diaz returned from the United States border after his interview with President Taft, he was enthusiastically welcomed home by innumerable throngs of people who lined the streets and cheered him as he drove by, nor were these spontaneous outbursts limited to this city, but were manifested all along the line in the different towns from the border to the capital. There is not the shadow of a doubt that President Diaz will be re-elected. The wealthier classes and all foreigners in general wish General Diaz "length of days," to hold the reins of government for many years to come.

ANGLUS.

N. B. I would have expressed myself more strongly: "The spontaneous outbursts in favor of Gen. Diaz presented a strong or marked contrast with the artificial manifestations made here and there in support of the anti-Corral candidate, B. Reyes."

But I do not wish either to correct or to try and improve upon Fr. Twaite's article.

This is also true: "B. Reyes per se has not been a candidate of anybody—some malcontents grouped round him in as much as he might prove an enemy of Corral, but never because Reyes represents an ideal, nor has his so-called party other ideal than to climb to the reins of government for their own (and not the nation's) benefit.

Two Meetings in Paris

DECEMBER 27, 1909.

Two meetings, with a very different object in view, took place in Paris on December 22 and December 23; both attracted much attention, the first had a social, the second a literary character; but both were, in some measure, connected with the interests of religion in this country.

At the first of these meetings, the Archbishop of Paris, Mgr. Amette, appeared on the platform, in the guise of a social reformer, to plead the cause of a certain category of workmen who, he considers, are hardly used; at the second, the French Academy paid homage to a well-known poet, Francois Coppée, lately dead, one of the prominent Catholic converts from indifference, whose simple faith was, no less than his undoubted talent, extolled by his successor, M. Jean Aicard and by M. Pierre Loti.

Within the last few months public attention has been drawn to the conditions of the working men, who are employed by the bakers in Paris and who, being obliged to work all night, are thereby deprived of the society of their wives and children and prevented from fulfilling their religious and social duties. Comte Albert de Mun, the well known speaker and writer, was one of the prominent French Catholics to take up the matter and in a series of newspaper articles he pointed out that it would be comparatively easy to modify the conditions in which these men earn their livelihood. In Norway, Finland and certain parts of Switzerland useful reforms have been introduced and, if public opinion in France were rightly directed, the same modifications might be brought about, without inconvenience to those for whom the bread is baked at night. It is not our province to enter into the rights of the question as regards its technical and practical aspect, but to dwell upon two features of the matter that touch the general condition of the Church in France; the apparently secondary question of the bakers has wider uses than appear at first sight.

Now that the bishops and priests of France are no longer the paid servants of the State, they are free, as the representatives of the Church, to enter into the vexed questions of the day, especially when these touch upon the moral and material welfare of the working classes. Hence, the excellent impression Mgr. Amette produced upon the Paris world at large when he publicly expressed his interest in the cause of the bakers. An exchange of views passed between him and the Socialist leaders and on Wednesday, the 23d, he consented to preside over a public meeting organized by a group of energetic young Catholics, belonging to all classes of society.

Around the Archbishop were gathered many leading Catholics: Comte Albert de Mun, M. de Lamarzelle, many Paris curés, and on his left hand sat the Vicomtesse de Velard, vice-president of the "Ligue patriotique des Françaises," an association interested in the social and religious welfare of the working classes. The presence of a lady orator at a meeting presided over by the Archbishop, is a novel feature in this country. The audience was a mixed one; popular rather than aristocratic; many workmen were present, who loudly cheered the Archbishop on his arrival at the "Salle des sociétés savantes," where over two thousand persons were assembled. The proceedings began by a speech by M. Gerlier, president of the "Jeunesse Catholique," then Madame de Velard spoke in a clear, sweet voice, next came M. Jay, a learned professor, and the Archbishop closed the meeting. The gist of the speeches was the same: the orators touched on the hard conditions to which the men for whom they pleaded have to submit, and laid stress on the point that, being disciples of Christ, Catholics are, in a special manner, bound to protect, defend and serve those who suffer. M. Jay enlarged on the prejudices that exist among the French lower orders against the Catholic Church. The anticlerical teaching of the Government schools has done its work and the rising generation of working men look upon the Church as their worst enemy. These prejudices are encouraged by the anticlericals; it rests with the Catholics to prove them false by taking an active part in all pressing social questions. Mgr. Amette closed the meeting by a felicitous speech that excited much enthusiasm and a resolution was moved, urging the necessity of a reform demanded by the sense of humanity.

It is no doubt a difficult and delicate matter to steer clear of the exaggerated claims of the revolutionists and Socialists and yet to keep in sympathy with the just grievances of certain workers; but, in spite of the difficulties that lie before him, the Archbishop made a move in the right direction when he assumed that, as the representative of Christ, he has a peculiar right to take part in questions touching on the welfare of the working classes. The emancipation of the French clergy, now freed from the fetters of the "Concordat," obliges its members to take part more boldly in the vexed questions of the day.

The second meeting was more aristocratic and literary. On Thursday, December 23, M. Jean Aicard, a Provençal poet, was made a member of the French Academy and, according to custom, in his opening speech, he spoke of his predecessor, M. Francois Coppée, who died last year. M. Pierre Loti, who answered M. Aicard, also spoke of Coppée, whose charming personality, no less than his brilliant, poetical gifts, made him a prominent member of the Academy. To Catholics Coppée is especially sympathetic; he was never antireligious; but a born Parisian, sceptical and careless, he gave during many years little or no attention to religious matters. His conversion in the prime of life, when his literary reputation was greatest, was a sensational event; he adopted the practices and ideas of the Faith to which he now returned with a constant simplicity and, during his last illness, suffered agonies of pain without a murmur. It was curious to hear M. Pierre Loti, according to his own confession a sceptic, enlarge upon Coppée's conversion and upon his book "La Bonne Souffrance," which was the outcome of his return to the beliefs of his boyhood. He wrote it during the excruciating pain of his long illness and M. Loti, although attracted by Coppée, evidently marvels at the sudden and stupendous change that turned the careless, mocking, Parisian into one who could rejoice in the mystical beauty of pain. The very title of Coppée's work, 'la Bonne Souffrance,' speaks volumes for the transformation that had been wrought by faith in his sunny, emotional nature. François Coppée loved the people. Most of his poems are written for the poor and the little ones of this world, and M. Loti records the fact that his funeral was spontaneously attended by the working men, women and children, whose joys and sorrows form the theme of his poems: "He had a very rare and magnificent funeral that he deserved, a funeral that the wealthiest cannot buy, because it was spontaneous and could not be bought with money."

The Church, to which Coppée adhered with a glad and grateful spirit, was more largely represented at this séance of the Academy than is usually the case. The dead poet's confessor, the Bishop of Chartres, Mgr. Baudrillart, the Rector of the Catholic University of Paris, the priest who assisted Coppée at the last, all were there. The fact that the poet's genius was developed and not quenched by his conversion, that his personality grew more sympathetic and admirable after his return to his childhood's faith, is an indirect, but telling argument in favor of the ennobling influence of the Catholic Faith. From this point of view, the séance of December 23 may be considered as making for the honor of the Church in France. ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Austrian Parliamentary Obstruction Ended

INNSBRUCK, DECEMBER 28, 1909.

Readers of AMERICA'S Chronicle have followed with interest the extended story of the obstruction policy of the Czechs which for more than a year has rendered fruitless every attempt at legislation on the part of the first Austrian Reichsrath elected through universal suffrage. The unlooked for termination of the struggle this month was, of course, as much a surprise to them as it was to us near the scene of action. The surprise would have been the greater had they known that the motion which led to the close of the trouble was introduced by two members of the obstructionist party. It was a clever move, for its success would enable the obstructionists to boast that they had saved the parliament; and in case it failed to pass, the odium of its defeat would rest upon their political opponents, especially upon their bitter enemies the members of the Christian Socialist party. The motion passed and peace prevailed. This result is due to the fact that greater power is put into the hands of the president of the Chamber, enabling him to postpone at pleasure until the end of the session any "urgency" motion that may be made, and, as will be remembered, it was the immediate consideration of such motions which made obstruction possible.

The president can, too, exclude from the house, for a term not exceeding three sessions, any delegate who persistently refuses to come to order. An appeal in every case is allowed from the president's decision to the house, which appeal must be voted on without debate. If no new rules of procedure be adopted before the date of expiration of the present temporary law, the old rules will come once more into effect. But there is every hope that a permanent change will be effected before the end of 1910. At any rate, the Austrian parliament can look forward with confidence to a year of fruitful work.

It is very significant that the success of the reform has raised a great storm of protest from the Jewish Liberal organs, especially the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna. The German Radical and Freethinking provincial press join them in the lugubrious chorus. The reason is not far to seek. This parliament is a parliament of the people, and the party of the people is above all others the Christian Socialist party, the "Ultramontane party" as the Vienna correspondent of the London Times likes to call it. The triumph of the people and the Christian Socialist party means the end of the Jewish plutocracy that has oppressed Austria for half a century or more, and the economic and sociological development of the nation on Christian principles. And Christian principles here mean Catholic principles—Protestantism, in spite of much boasting and "Los von Rom" propagandism, is pretty nearly a negligible quantity. Hence, the Jewish Radical-Liberal lamentations; and it is from such sources—especially from the Neue Freie Presse—that for decades American and English papers have been getting their impressions of Austria. Happily this is being changed. The Christian Socialist press is growing rapidly. The Vienna Reichspost as the organ of the Christian Socialist party, the strongest German party in the land, must in future be reckoned with by foreign journals.

The story of the events that led up to the libel cases which have divided, if it be not more exact to say which have monopolized most of the interest of the nation during the past three weeks, is briefly as follows: During the agitation following the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina last spring a well-known historian, Dr. Friedjung, published an article in the Neue Freie Presse containing sensational charges against King Peter Karageorgewitch, the Servian foreign office, the Serbo-Croatian coalition, the Servian Premier, M. Pasitch and the Young Turkish committee. About the same time the Reichspost published similar charges against three Croatian deputies, and in particular against M. Sapilo, one of the leading Croatian parliamentarians and the founder of the above-mentioned coalition. High treason was alleged because the accused were charged with having agreed for stipulated sums of money to stir up the people of the newly-annexed territory against Austria. Forty-nine members of the coalition brought suit against Dr. Friedjung for libel. In addition three deputies sued the Reichspost, and M. Sapilo brought suit separately against Dr. Friedjung. At the end of the first week of the trial the week ending December 18, things looked dark for the defendants. Before the end of the week following the case was compromised and dropped! It turns out that the reason for the compromise was that the genuineness of some, at least, of the documents was extremely doubtful. The disclosures made have aroused feelings of deep humiliation in many quarters. It was felt that Austria needed no such petty bolstering up of the justice of her claims to Bosnia and Herzegovina. Her claims were not based on the documents in question, but on the several decades of civilizing work that she had done in those lands.

Moral Training in Schools

The sentiment in favor of moral training in the schools is growing rapidly. Already the question has ceased to be a topic of merely academic discussion, and practical plans are being suggested for the introduction of moral instruction into the courses of the public schools. One of the latest is announced from Baltimore, where a meeting was held last week to discuss the permanent organization of a Moral Education Board. This organization proposes to send lecturers to the schools throughout the country to explain the value of good morals to the students. Milton Fairchild, a father of the movement, who says he has delivered experimental lectures on morality to 100,000 school children, with gratifying results, explains the proposal. It is planned, he says, that the lectures given be confined to the advantages of the cultivation of what one of the leaders of the movement characterizes as "good everyday morals." By this is meant the observance of the virtues of honesty, truthfulness, thrift, both personal and national, sportsmanship, courtesy, honor and proper ambitions.

This is all very good as far as it goes, but it is a pity that well-meaning men and women should be blind to the fact that the sad conditions in the moral world need a far more radical cure than homeopathic doses of instruction in purely natural principles. Dr. Henry Jacobs, a member of the Baltimore organization, proclaims that "the country is suffering from a lack of morals in business, and the average American boy and girl does not receive adequate moral training in straight morals. The Moral Education Board aims to show how it pays to be honest in everything from a game to a business transaction." And one is tempted to remind the Doctor that there are various ways in which a thing may pay, and that many a business deal is made to "pay" all concerned and yet leave much to be desired from a moral viewpoint. Why can not these people recognize that the only incentive to morality is that bound up in the principle of man's relation of dependence upon God which must enter into his every act?

The teaching of this principle, to be sure, involves the religious element and the recognition of religious faith. It is a pity that the prejudices of years will not allow them to cast aside the old fear of the religious influence in our schools, but if they mean to carry their praise-worthy plan to a genuinely successful issue, why should they not join in a movement to try the one experiment that will bring results? Why not study a feasible plan to embody religious instruction in our school courses?

Gospels of Socialism and of Christ

Father Ming is publishing a series of articles in AMERICA on "The Socialistic Kingdom of God." By picking out a few passages of Scripture and adding their own exegesis, Socialists pretend to prove that Christ understood His mission to be only the amelioration of man's lot in this world. They have to ignore the Sermon on the Mount, which such as they were wont to praise, when in order to throw discredit on Christian dogma it was the fashion to extol Christ's moral teaching. If the Kingdom of Heaven be nothing more than society reorganized on a Socialistic basis, how are the poor in spirit, the meek, those rejoicing in persecution, the merciful, the clean of heart, going to possess it? How are they to attain it, who think it better to renounce what they have a right to if it prove an obstacle to the gaining of the rewards of the future life? How are they to work for it, who will not resist evil but patiently suffer oppression? What will they care for it whose only thought is to lay up incorruptible treasures not of this world, and without thought for the morrow commit themselves, not to Marx, Lasalle and Engels, but to the God that feeds the sparrows and clothes the lilies of the field?

The theologians of Socialism make a great deal of the supposed fact that God promised only the good things of this world to the Israelites as the reward of their service. Assuming for a moment such to have been the case, what was the service required? "Consider that I have set before thee this day life and good, and, on the other hand, death and evil: that thou mayest love the Lord thy God, and walk in His ways, and keep His commandments and ceremonies and judgments, and thou mayest live" (Deut. xxx, 15-16). What an excellent idea it would be if Socialists would make only the moral law of Moses their rule of life! They would succeed much better with God's blessing in reforming society. But they read with little understanding if they do not note the words: "Love the Lord thy God." Can anyone conceive that to love the one God, immortal, invisible, was to have no other reward than the goods of time to be followed by extinction? Did the Israelites so understand the promises? They alone of all nations understood what it was to love God; yet all nations looked for a future life. Moreover, there was the greatest of all promises, that in them all nations should be blessed, intimately bound up with the hope of immortality. There is a maxim in logic: "what is omitted is not therefore excluded." The Israelites were not as we; and God dealt with them according to His wisdom. But in promising them the good things of time He gave them also the assurance of the good things of eternity.

The Gospel of Socialism is a doctrine of envy, hatred, covetousness, sensuality, incredulity and hardness of heart, under the guise of a caring for the poor. The Gospel of Christ is a doctrine of self-renunciation, patience, suffering, faith and love for both rich and poor. "Come unto me all ye that labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, because I am meek and humble of heart, and you shall find rest for your souls," says Christ. When we shall see the preachers of the Socialistic Kingdom of God bearing the yoke in meekness and humility, we shall be more inclined to admit them to have the spirit of Christ and to understand His kingdom. At present they belong to the camp of the Philistines, and their words are those to David of Goliath who defied the armies of the living God: "Come to me, and I will give thy flesh to the birds of the air and to the beasts of the earth." And he cursed him by his gods.

Darwin's Place in Biology

There is an interesting article in the Popular Science Monthly for January, 1910, on "Darwin's Probable Place in Future Biology," which shows how great a change has come over the feeling of even ardent Darwinians with regard to Darwinism and Darwin's work in the course of the last ten years. The article is written by Professor William E. Ritter of the Marine Biological Station of San Diego, California, who confesses that "the verdict of inexorable time will refuse to Darwin the glory of having really explained the origin of new species of organisms. It will allow that he did much in this direction, but not greatly more than others past and future have done and will do. Fame's recompense, so far as this is concerned, Darwin will have to take share and share alike with many a fellow-workman." This is of course to be accepted as an admission on the part of a Darwinian, and some who have been impressed with the idea that Darwinians claim much more than this for their great leader might be surprised at it. It is well to remember, however, that Darwin himself confessed that his book, "The Origin of Species," had nothing to say about origins, that he was sorry, as he wrote to a friend, that it had been called by that misnomer, and he would have preferred the title, "The Preservation of Favored Races in the Struggle for Life." It is indeed of preservation and not of origins that Darwin has anything to say. Supposing species, in existence, origin unknown and unaccounted for, then natural selection keeps certain of them best fitted for survival in existence. This is what Darwin's book really was. Professor Ritter has another expression of Darwin's which, unfortunately, more of his disciples do not take to heart. After he had thought over natural selection for twenty years he observed to Wallace, "My work will not fix or settle anything." Still listening, as we are, to the echoes of the Darwin Centenary, it is well to recall that it is to the smaller men and minds that have followed Darwin and who pushed his often tentative conclusions to extremes, that the unfortunate over-Darwinization of biology has been due. Professor Virchow did not hesitate to say that exaggerated attention to Darwinism had seriously impaired progress in biology during the second half of the nineteenth century.

Illuminating the Dark Ages

The story of Charlemagne in The Cosmopolitan is developing in such a way that it may be commented on with a proper understanding. It is interesting, of course, but it is even more amusing. The last place one would expect to find a serious study of the life of the old emperor of the Franks is in a modern popular magazine. Still popular magazines want sensations. The editor and the writer doubtless feel that they are springing one of the greatest possible sensations on the American public by showing them how much a great ruler of the so-called Dark Ages did for education, art, culture, enlightenment and the uplift of his people. They have discovered The Dark Ages. The subject is as interesting as the North Pole.

For some time our editors have realized that the American public is tired of muck-raking, tired of having only the seamy side of humanity served up to them. Now in the swing back of the balance we are to have humanity at its best. The writer's previous contributions were in very different vein. Mr. Charles Edward Russell has been writing up-to-the-minute articles about recent unfortunate social conditions and evils that humanitarianism was to obliterate. It is significant then to have him go back to find some good things to say of the dear old Dark Ages. Mr. Russell has fittingly but rather startlingly called his articles "The Story of Charlemagne, Champion of the Church, Patron of Learning." We welcome heartily this contribution to history. It will help our people to put away the foolish notion of the ignorance and lack of social uplift even in the Dark Ages and make them understand how much was accomplished in civilizing the hordes of barbarians who had overrun Europe and destroyed the old Greek and Latin civilizations. We hope sincerely that Mr. Russell will be tempted to go back one period further in the history of modern civilization and tell the American public the magnificent story there is in the work of the Irish Monks who, before Charlemagne did so much to civilize, to educate, and to raise even to a high culture the barbarians in the mainland. It was to them that Charlemagne turned when he wanted help in his great undertaking for the uplift and education for his people. The work that they accomplished in his empire exceeded that of all others; indeed, even the others, English and Germans, were disciples of the Irish schools. All that is needed to turn the so-called Dark Ages into ages of light and uplift in history is to know enough about them; to know how complex and unfortunate was the situation and yet how much was accomplished in a few short centuries for these barbarous peoples, so that when the thirteenth century came there came with it the foundation of all the arts, the architecture, the education, the literature and the liberties of modern Europe.

By a letter in one of the daily papers, attention is drawn to the reappearance of the "Whitman Myth." Most people thought, as Professor Albert Bushnell Hart of Harvard University declared in his recent address here before the American Historical Association, that the Whitman chapter of the making of the Northwest was one of the most interesting examples in American history of a myth that has now been "resolved into its elementary gases." It reappears, however, in the substantial guise of a raid on the Federal treasury.

"Professor Hendrick, financial agent and dean of Whitman College of the far West, is spending the winter in Washington," says the letter above cited, which is printed in the New York Sun of January 18, "urging Congressmen to vote in favor of a bill he has had introduced through the courtesy of Senator Jones, providing for the transfer free of cost to Whitman College of 600 acres of land adjoining the city in which the college is located and valued at from a quarter to half a million dollars. The land is now occupied by the War Department as a Government post, but that post is to be abandoned. Professor Hendricks is a very pleasant and resourceful gentleman, and he says that even the President and the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff of the army have examined his literature (which is quite sufficient) and consented to recommend to Congress this plan to endow at the expense of the Government a small sectarian coeducational college which continues to live in the glamour of this myth for reasons that can easily be understood."

The Old Flag and an appropriation! Imperial Cæsar, dead and turned to clay, might be put to an ignoble use, but Whitman—who saved the great and opulent Northwest from the Jesuits, the Pope, John Bull and a few other predatory and omnivorous assailants of its sovereignty, made the cloak for the last analysis of the spoilsman politician—could anyone have imagined it?

Spanish Hospitals—I.

I have read Dr. Walsh's criticism of the absolutely false statements of a Dr. Leon Watters regarding the alleged non-existence of hospitals in Spain. Probably Dr. Walsh did not have at hand the materials to show how lying the statements really were, but if the rest of Dr. Watters' information about hospitals is as correct as that about Spanish hospitals was, his articles had better be omitted by the medical journal which is printing them. I am not a physician or perhaps I might have gone into the subject to some considerable extent, but as a plain, ordinary traveler I discovered the existence of the following hospitals there, and I add their precise location so that Dr. Watters or any one like him may be enabled to find them and not trust to the "dust-begrimed and disgusted confrère."

In Madrid are the following: Hospital de la Princesa, Calle San Bernardo; Hospital de la Latina, Calle de Toledo; Hospital de la Orden Tercera, Calle San Bernabé; Hospital de Nuestra Señora del Carmen, Calle de Atocha; Hospital Clínico de Medicina, Calle de Atocha; Hospital General, Calle de Santa Isabel (a great new institution); Hospital de San Pedro, Calle Torrecilla. In Valencia: Hospital de San Juan, Calle del Milagro; Hospital Militar, Calle Orilla del Rio. In Granada: Hospital San Juan de Dios, Calle San Juan; Hospital de la Tiña, Calle de la Tiña. In Seville: Hospital Civil (one of the largest in Europe), Puerta de la Macarena; Hospital de la Caridad, Calle de la Aduana. In Cadiz: Hospital del Santo Angel, Plaza de Alfonso XII. In Cordoba: Hospital de Agudos, Calle Romero. In Malaga: Hospital Noble, Paseo de Alfonso XIII; Hospital de Santo Tomás, Calle de Santa Maria. In Salamanca: Hospital del Estudio, Calle de San Juan; Hospital Civil, Calle del Cáliz. In Burgos: Hospital Militar, Plaza del Instituto; Hospital de San Juan, Calle de la Puebla. In Barcelona: Hospital de Santa Cruz, Calle del Hospital; Hospital Militar, Calle de Tallers. In Saragossa: Hospital Provincial, Calle del Hospital; Hospital Militar, Plaza de San Leandro. In Tarragona: Hospital de San Carlos, Rambla de San Carlos. In Toledo: Hospital de San Juan Bautista, Calle de Cardenal Tavera. In Alicante: Hospital Civil, Calle Valencia; Hospital Militar, Calle San Vicente. In Santiago de Compostela: Hospital Real, Plaza de Alfonso XII. In Valladolid: Hospital General, Calle de la Audiencia. In Santander: Hospital San Rafael, Calle Alta. In Bilbao: Hospital Civil, Plaza de Santos Juanes. In Cartagena: Hospital Militar. In Aranjuez: Hospital Civil, Calle del Capital. In Leon: Hospital Civil, Plazuela de San Marcelo.

There is a list of some thirty-six hospitals in the principal cities in Spain which the ordinary traveler by using his eyes and speaking a little Spanish can easily discover. How many more a real physician or surgeon, devoted to his profession, could discover in a desire to really show what Spain is doing in the way of hospitals, I have no data at hand from which to judge.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

II.

Having read the statement of Dr. Leon L. Watters (in the International Hospital Record of Toronto), that Spanish hospitals were non-existent, I cannot resist telling of those we visited during an eight-months' tour of Spain. We were shown over the big hospital at Valladolid by an alert young doctor who spoke English. It was an up-to-date institution that could accommodate about 5,000 patients. There was a central rotunda from which long wards radiated, on both sides of these sanitary wards were large windows. Private rooms could be had for $2.00 a week; the public wards were free. The modern arrangements and cleanliness every where could not but appeal to a foreign visitor.

We also visited the hospital of Santiago, in the furthest northwest corner of Spain. It was housed in the beautiful buildings which Isabella erected for the pilgrims to the Shrine of Saint James. The nuns showed us the big kitchen whose walls were tiled in immaculate white, and we witnessed the arrival of the 400 fresh eggs daily sent in from the country. As we were leaving the kind old chaplain ran after us to bring us back to see something of which he was vastly proud. In a room subdivided into compartments, he turned on the water which dashed up from the floor and down from the ceiling through every kind of modern contrivance for health. Our guide seemed to say with pride: "There, you water-loving English, we're just as fond of it as you." Near Santiago was an insane asylum where noted cures have been effected. The world should remember it was Spain that founded the first asylum for mental diseases.

Again in another distant city, Oviedo in the Asturias, we found excellent new institutions, notably, a Model Prison. Sleepy little Salamanca shows signs of awakening. Her new hospital is a handsome affair, the long separated wards being connected by glass passages. The great hospital of Madrid is too well known to need mention. That of Barcelona is equally advanced as might be expected of that rich progressive city. A personal experience of illness there proved to us that the modern town doctor of Spain is not behind his American brother. Barcelona can boast a Poor House that has perhaps the best arranged system of its kind in the world.

Equally noted for its charitable institutions is plucky little Cadiz, that stands out in the sea miles from the mainland. No hospital in Europe or America has a finer position than hers as it faces the Atlantic breezes. All I can say to every tourist is, go to inspect it. Cadiz is justly proud of her public spirit, and is only too glad to show the visitor the famous Poor House, the Insane Asylum, a refuge for servants out of work, a Widows' Home, and others.

The hospital of Seville is still to be found in its artistic old shell, which in comparison with the modern buildings of Salamanca and Valladolid may seem unhygienic. The look of those patients who sat sunning themselves in the lovely patio on the day of our visit, told of good care and contentment.

Spain is fast stepping forward. She has no millionaires to leave their fortunes in charity; so she does not advance by leaps and bounds as does America; none the less her advance is steady. We English-speaking people should not forget that our nursing system is of late date, called into existence by Florence Nightingale when she went out to the Crimea to reform the horrors in the hospitals there. An Englishman, who was a young man of twenty in the Crimean War, has told me often how before the coming of Miss Nightingale he and his comrades looked with respect and envy at the well-trained Sisters of Charity who nursed their French allies.

A few bad examples of hospital conditions in Spain do not stand for the whole, just as the abuses in some of our prisons revealed during this past month do not represent the prison conditions of the United States. Because the public institutions of Spain eighty years ago were in a bad way—as were those of most countries at that time—they are not necessarily so now. The prisons and poor houses described by Dickens and Charles Reade are not held up as examples of the prisons and poor houses of England to-day. Why should a different justice be meted out to Spain?

ONE WHO LOVES FAIRNESS.

The Governor-General of Alsace-Lorraine has been in Berlin to make his report about the dispute over educational affairs between the Catholic Church authorities and the State-Secretary of the Reichsland. The correspondence passing between the disputants has been published, and both the Bishops of Strassburg and the Secretary hold fast to their original contentions. Bishop Fritzen insists that he has acted entirely within his rights in pointing out to the Catholic teachers their duty in reference to associations of school teachers. Germany is not inclined to the common opinion that the dispute will find a peaceful solution. It considers the position of the civil authorities as a declaration of war on the Church, since it is an open proclamation that the Church shall be allowed to exert no influence upon the teaching body of the land and upon their work in the schools. Still it is not likely that the government will countenance an aggressive policy on the part of the school authorities or associations formed under State auspices. It is too late in the day to try a kulturkampf, especially in a part of the Empire which is a Catholic stronghold.

LITERATURE

A BATCH OF BOOKS.

Felicità, by CHRISTOPHER HARE (Frederick A. Stokes & Co., New York), is a tale of Siena in the fourteenth century. Whether written by one of our faith or not there is nothing in the story which can shock the sensibilities of any Catholic. The style smacks of the middle of the nineteenth century, and the interest of the story is a trifle diluted.

When a Man Marries, by MARY ROBERTS RINEHART (Bobb's Merrill Co., Indianapolis). It is to be regretted that the clever author should cause all the fun and comedy of her book to arise from the doings of a divorced couple. The hero, divorced, is fat and good-natured, and belongs to the very best set. In fact, all the characters save the policeman and the maiden aunt of the hero belong to the same set. We are in the very best society. The author says of one of his characters, "He was a magnificent animal." So are they all magnificent animals. They are as playful as kittens and as moral as cats. The writer is certainly clever, but in these days it is hard for us to approve of a book which in any way makes light of the marriage tie. Altogether the book is rather flippant in character.

In taking up the Rosary, by FLORENCE L. BARTLEY (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London), one feels oneself transported to a clearer, fresher and purer atmosphere. The "Rosary" is a beautiful love story. Beginning with the ways of a man with a maid, it ends with the ways of a maid with a man. Singularly enough, we are again brought in contact with the best set. But what a difference! The characters of the "Rosary" are built on lines which suggest neither the kitten nor the cat. They have souls. They have ideals. The scriptures are to them the inspired words of God, and their loves "in higher love endure." The hero and the heroine gain our hearts. They are lovable; they are human, and religion enters into the very fibre of their being. The book is not by a Catholic author. Style and sentiment are good, and the plot is excellent; although the last part where the story leads up to the denouement is somewhat improbable.

The Little Gods, by ROWLAND THOMAS (Little, Brown & Co., Boston). The author in his epilogue says: "I feel regretful . . . that these stories are far from pleasant." We must admit regretfully that we agree with the author. Some of them are decidedly unpleasant. One of them, "What Okimi Learned," really has no imaginable reason for existing. It is an old story anyhow. Mr. Thomas in most of his tales, is Kiplingesque. He has power, he is gifted, and undoubtedly can tell a good story; but let Mr. Thomas "cease from Kipling."

A Damsel who Dared, by GENEVIEVE IRONS. (Sands & Co., London). The author has a story to tell, and, for the most part, tells it well. She is evidently a convert; and the conversion of the heroine is her main theme. There is no flagging in the interest. Some of the incidents are so improbable that one is forced to conclude they are records of things that actually happened. Genevieve Irons is herself a damsel who dares. She is outspoken in her criticism of the French nuns' Convent schools system. "The pious nuns," she says in speaking of one of her characters, "had done their best for the children committed to their charge, but their methods were antiquated and unsuited to the requirements of the present generation."

There are a great many people who believe that the French Catholic training produces a large crop of hypocrites and sneaks with a modicum of saints. Miss Irons seems to be of the number. Such a view is superficial: there are other things—home influence, manners and customs—to be reckoned with. The author should go deeper, and keep her results out of a novel intended for the general reading public.

One of the accomplishments which, by inference, she would have us believe are taught in Convent schools, is the knack of keeping one's eyes down and taking stock of "everything going on around." On one occasion "Suzanna peeped down at her shoe, as if counting the beads on its embroidered toe, while all the time she was keeping an eye on Mrs. Coverdale's unpassive face." Now really here is an accomplishment of which we Americans are innocent. Send us the nuns who teach this, and we will secure them a plenty of scholars.

The author is also at pains to point out the colossal indifference which English Catholics show towards those who desire to enter the Church. Somehow, we think she sees things larger than they are. Our opinion is confirmed by the language she puts into the mouth of two American girls travelling in Europe. Here, we are upon our native heath; and we beg to assure Miss Irons that not even our average shop girls use such atrocious language, hardly even when they do not mind what they are saying. Also, Miss Irons falls foul of the singing in Catholic churches. She gives us to understand that the English Catholics flatly disobeyed the letter and spirit of Pius X's Motu proprio. The question naturally arises does the author know what is forbidden and what allowed by this famous document? Experts are still disputing; and it is easier for us to believe that Miss Irons misunderstands the Motu proprio than that the English Catholics treat it with contempt. Finally Miss Irons, through her finest Catholic character, declares that a convert who wrote a book in which she "ran down religious orders" was a very staunch Catholic. If so, she must also have been as ignorant as she was staunch.

All these things, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, have nothing to do with the story. They are not edifying to the general reader, and it is to the general reader and not to the amateur reformers and half-baked theologians that Miss Irons' otherwise beautiful story is directed. "Sed nunc non erat his locus." F. J. FINN, s.j.

Stained Glass Tours in England. By CHARLES HITCHCOCK SHERRILL. New York: John Lane Company.

It is not a great many years since figure windows of colored glass were to be seen only in Catholic churches or in ecclesiastical edifices which were originally built and embellished by the faithful. All this, however, is now changed, as stained glass subject windows are to-day employed by almost every sect as an important decorative note in their houses of worship.

This remarkable fact is one of the outcomes of the Oxford movement, which not only engendered research along theological lines, but also in matters ecclesiological, so much so, that Christian Art was born again in the English speaking world; and its principles and ideals, although imperfectly understood, filtered from the Establishment into other sectarian organizations. Hence many things which were formerly looked upon by Protestants as "Romish abominations" became à la mode, none more so than the products of the glazier's art. At first it took upon itself the character of reparation, as it expended its initial efforts in restoration, by attempting to bring back to their pristine beauty the few colored-glass windows in England that had survived the greed and fanaticism of the early Protestants; secondly, its highest aim was to make close imitation of mediæval work; and its last endeavor was to create new works of art. The result so far of this renaissance, except in the cases of restoration and imitation, has not been altogether satisfactory. And for two reasons: a commercial spirit very early invaded the movement and largely controlled its output, cheapness having been sought rather than artistic value; and because the purchasers were usually without taste and profoundly ignorant of the history and development, possibilities and limitations of colored glass as a decorative medium—conditions which still dominate far too greatly the artist, the glazier and the consumer alike. Therefore all true lovers and students of the art welcome anything which will help to place the glazier's art upon a higher plane, equal in every respect to that of its sister decorative arts: mosaic, mural painting and ornamental sculpture. Such a help has appeared in a work recently published, "Stained Glass Tours in England." Written, it is true, by a mere looker-on, but a most appreciative one, a man of unusual culture and modest withal, whose words will no doubt stimulate other visitors to England to make similar "tours;" at the same time it will do much in the way of enlightening the general reader as to the important part colored-glass has played in Christian Art, more particularly in Pointed Architecture, Early English, Transitional, Decorative and Perpendicular.

It seems almost unkind, if not captious, to find fault with this excellent book, whose blemishes are indeed few, but one cannot help feeling if the author had only given more space to the history of the destruction of the windows of the Middle Ages, a war alike on beauty and truth, together with a brief sketch of the commendable attempts at restoration, often successful, he would have added greater interest to his book. And then again, if he had, by deeper study of his subject, disabused his mind of the grave error that "the errand of a window seems always to have been that of beauty," his book would have been far more useful, and would have made plain to all that church windows served a higher office than merely to display the beauty obtained by an artistic combination of colored glass, that they were, in fact, the Bible of the unlettered, the far-reaching teachers of the Living Truth, witnesses of the deep faith of the people of the Middle Ages and the outcome of their full realization of the object of man's creation. The greatest living authority upon colored glass, in concluding his remarks upon the medallion windows at Canterbury, said that, "there is more valuable knowledge to be acquired from studying the theological windows still remaining in the choir of Canterbury than in hundreds of modern volumes of so-called Scripture histories, and a finer knowledge of color than in hosts of modern pictures! Let the passer-by take a more than casual glance, and he will be repaid. I have seen multitudes of visitors, educated and uneducated, pass them by—gazing on them simply as wonderful pieces of glass, arranged with a natural skill and rude knowledge. Alas! it is not the rude or shallow knowledge of the mediæval artist that is at fault."

Our author, Mr. Sherrill, is no doubt very sensitive to the beauty of the old English windows, but "beyond the enjoyment and artistic refreshment to be obtained from the contemplation of stained glass," he sees nothing in them. The story they tell or their symbolic value apparently has no interest to him, and he does not seem to understand that the men who built them had any object in view other than to create a thing of beauty. This, however, is not strange, for the trend nowadays among non-Catholic lovers of art is toward the sensuous rather than the spiritual, caring little or nothing about the motives and the fundamental principles governing religious art. They seldom grasp the fact that the Church cares nothing for art for art's sake; that it cares for it only so far as it can be used as an instrument of instruction, as a means of honoring God and His saints, a truth well understood by the artists and people of the Ages of Faith, and with which they were in full sympathy.

The "Stained Glass Tours in England" on the whole is charmingly written, logically arranged, beautifully printed, and the illustrations are excellent as far as they go. The book will prove a great help, not only to those who are about to travel in England, but also to all who are in any way interested in colored glass.

CARYL COLEMAN.

La Perfecta Casada por EL MAESTRO F. LUYDS DE LEON, Reimpresion y Prólogo por ELIZABETH WALLACE. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. Price, $1.61, postpaid.

Fray Luis de Leon, one of the glories of the Augustinian Order in Spain, was not the least brilliant of the stars that made the sixteenth century the golden age of Spanish literature. While professing theology, his more than great talent won for him the enthusiastic respect of his students, but also aroused a tempest of envy and jealousy which finally lodged him in the prison of the Inquisition. After his triumphant acquittal, he returned to his chair and, without a bitter word or an unkind reference, resumed the lecture where it had been interrupted by his arrest and imprisonment. Only his leisure moments were devoted to literary composition, which was almost exclusively on religious and moral subjects. A lyrist of the first order, his purity and elegance of diction both in prose and verse, won him a proud place among Spain's classic writers.

"La Perfecta Casada" (The Perfect Wife) is in the form of a homily on the last twenty-two verses of Proverbs. The edition before us is a reproduction of the third Spanish edition (1587), with a critical study of the author and his style. Fray Luis does not confine himself to the dreamy and misty realms of abstract speculation. He descants upon woman's inborn love of finery and trinkets, speaks of the puffs and swirls that may have come from a foul and wicked head, and warns against softness, sloth, and giddiness. Anything against wifely devotedness to husband, children and home should be viewed by the perfect wife as a thing horrid, hateful, unclean. Though of high literary merit, "La Perfecta Casada" is more to be admired as a spiritual treasure.

Christ, The Church and Man. By HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL CAPECELATRO. St. Louis: B. Herder; London: Burns & Oates.

It is seldom one finds so much meat in so small a package and withal so tastefully served. In eighty pages of about 12,000 words, His Eminence, the Archbishop of Capua, surveys the mystery of existence; the methods of exposition, old and new, in theology, apologetics and biblical criticism; liturgical music and worship; the nature and mutual relations of Christ, the Church and man; the rights of Capital and Labor, and the new defence that Christianity should present in view of the social developments that have arisen from modern conditions. He defines the Catholic position on many important questions of the day, and lays down the lines and principles of direction for future activities in a few paragraphs as luminous as they are concise. To the clergy especially he points out "the new path they should follow in their studies and in the exercise of Divine worship, to promote the religious and moral renewing of Christianity." He appeals also to the educated layman, whose doctrinal equipment should be "proportioned to the vast increase of general culture." In former times no cultured layman could be ignorant of theology, "the science which treats of God by means of revelation and reason," and he instances Dante Alighieri, "that eminent theologian whose unique privilege it has been to render into poetry almost the entire range of Theology, preserving its integrity while marvelously adorning it."

Bridget, or What's In a Name. By WILL W. WHALEN (Boston: Mayhew Publishing Co.) is a story of the Pennsylvania coal regions, which were brightened by the virtues of Bridget and many another son and daughter of the coal-workers. The author calls it "this little firstling of my pen," and it bears the marks of noviceship. He is evidently well acquainted with the people he describes, and most of them are worth describing; but he has so much to tell and is so eager to tell it that in one short book he uses up materials for four, and we lose sight of Bridget in the overcrowded canvas. But both Bridget and her author are mistaken in thinking she should stick to the name because it is Irish. Bridget is the name of a Swedish saint; the "Mary of Erin" was Brigid, pronounced Breedh and anglicised Bride, as in McBride (the son of Brigid) and Kilbride, the church (cill) or the servant (gilla) of Brigid.

A Wreath of Ilex Leaves. By REV. P. L. DUFFY, LL.D., Litt.D. Charleston, S. C.: Nicholas G. Duffy.

At a time when verse is rarely welcomed, it is comforting to find that this little book, without trumpeting or advertising, has reached a second edition in a few months. The introduction, as graceful as it is modest, gives a pleasing glimpse of the mind and character of the author: "I am a laborer in His Vineyard, and these verses are but the glint on the grape; at most but wayside flowers culled on the way to and from the work of my Master, with never a dream of pressing them between the covers of a book." It is fortunate that they have been so pressed by those who had inhaled their fragrance. They are not withered leaves, and the years will not rob them of their freshness. Whether he sings of the heroes of the Church or of the Southland, of priest or patriot, of bird or flower or sun-lit sea, Father Duffy is always inspired by Catholic thought—by "Love, the Sacramental of the soul"—and, like Lionel Johnson and Francis Thompson, is all the more a poet for that reason. The illustrations are excellent, and the workmanship of the Charleston printer would do credit to a metropolitan publishing house.

We have many books on the Gospels of the Sunday, but the Epistles have been less generously treated. "The Sunday Epistles," by REV. B. SAUTER, O.S.B., (B. Herder), amply supply the want, and in a novel fashion that serves to interest and inform while it edifies. Each Epistle is the occasion of a dialogue between "The Master" and "The Scholar," whose objections, difficulties and sometimes unorthodox applications stimulate the Master to clear away all grounds for misunderstanding, supply the facts and customs implied by the Gospel writer, expound the true meaning and fill in the atmosphere of the times. The book combines the charms of knowledge, piety and naive literary grace.

The London Times prints the Latin Prologue and Epilogue used in the performance of Terence's "Adelphi," at the Westminster School, before the Christmas holidays. They are full of allusions to the public events of the year. In the Prologue, after a reference to the alleged socialistic tendencies of a certain political party, the actor thus describes the school life in Westminster:

"Quod an sit verum, nescio: tamen hoc scio.

Non aliam condicionem in hoc collegio

Annos trecentos jam exstitisse et amplius.

Nam lautiozem hic nemo vicinis habet

Domum, cubatve mollius: stipendium

Plus justo nulli solvitur: quin pallio Vestimur simili: cuique pro suo ordine

Eadem laboris hora, somni eadem, datur:

Una prandemus, una cenamus: neque Si cui sollicita mater delicatius

Obsonium clam miserit, id servat sibi;

In medium ponit, cumque par sit omnibus

Fames, pari quoque jure quidquid adest edunt."

This is democracy with a vengeance; at a time, too, when similar schools in America feel obliged to afford opportunities to wealthier students for special luxuries in the way of private rooms and like distinctions.

The Epilogue introduces an arctic explorer, who sends a telegraphema to his wife from the North pole: "Successi, Fridericus;" a suffragette; a fly-machine operator; and finally, Mr. Roosevelt, who enters the stage shouting to the universe:

"Ignoret nemo me jam posuisse labores

Civiles: simplex vita mihi placuit.

Occidi pardos elephasque atque leones,

Quot parit immanes Africa vasta feras."

The Nineteenth Century contains in its January issue a typical French review of present French literature. The writer is André Beaunier and the editor of the English magazine has paid him the compliment of forbearing to translate his article and of giving it to us in all its native sparkle. Among the interesting judgments that the French critic passes on the literature of his country are these: that contemporary novels are less romances than essays; that symbolism is dead as a poetic movement; that the drama is ceasing to be an integral part of literature by yielding to two distinct and urgent clamors of the populace, one, for impossible melodrama, the other, for unashamed lubricity; that Anatole France is merely a skilled plagiarist without a particle of originality; and that modern French writers on philosophy have an unphilosophical habit of jumping to all sorts of conclusions and clinging to them tenaciously. "Ils ont des esprits de sceptiques et des tempéraments de croyants." Other interesting articles are, "In the Shadow of the Tower," in which faults are found with the inhumanity of official methods in the working of immigration tests; and "The Making of a Poet," in which Stephen Gwynn, M. P., hails a new poet in the person of W. H. Davies. The latter is a Welshman with an unusual career for a literary man. At one time he "tramped" this country from New York to San Francisco in the company and after the ordinary manner of tramps. He was following adventure under similar conditions in Canada, "beating his way" to Alaska, when a misstep on a freight-car cost him a leg and he was driven to a sedentary mode of life and the cultivation of letters.

EDUCATION

For sixty years or more the Catholics of Austria have been planning the foundation of a Catholic University, which should be genuinely Catholic. The anti-Christian nature of the lectures given from many of the chairs of the State Universities caused the Austrians to realize long before attention was called to a similar state of affairs among ourselves, that the best means to secure Catholic teaching was to erect a university whose faculties would be entirely subject to Catholic control. Fifty years ago the Emperor Francis Joseph approved the project, giving under his personal seal the imperial sanction to the proposed university, and bidding the bishops of the land to build and endow it where and how they might desire.

As with the early story of our own Catholic University, the crucial question in Austria was the provision of funds to establish the school. For years little was done of practical value, until in 1884, there was instituted a University Building and Endowment Association, whose members entered eagerly upon the task of collecting the needful resources. Though keenly interested in the progress of the plan the Austrian Episcopate took no final action in reference to the University until 1901, when the accumulated fund of the Endowment Association had reached the sum of a million and a half crowns.

Then, assured of success, the bishops formally accepted the project and unanimously agreed to build a great Catholic University in Salzburg. Pope Leo XIII blessed their resolution and added his contribution to the fund. The action of the Episcopate gave decided impetus to the movement, and in the last eight years two million crowns have been added to the fund. Much of the energy of the present activity of these years is due to the unflagging zeal of his Eminence Cardinal Katschthaler, Archbishop of Salzburg, who is devotedly pushing the project to completion. Latest reports of the Building and Endowment Association give promise that Catholic Austria will soon possess its own University, in whose lecture halls her sons will not be called upon to listen to the anti-Christian teachings of men like Wahrmond, who unworthily and unfairly represent the spirit and the faith of a loyal Catholic nation.

Denver University, which is a well-known Methodist institution, has awarded the degree of Doctor of Laws to the Rev. William O'Ryan, rector of St. Leo's Church, that city.

Dr. Maurice Francis Egan, the United States Minister to Denmark, has presented to the library of Trinity College, Washington, D. C., a rare volume containing the "famous Saga of Lief the Lucky, in Danish, "Flato Bogen," called also "Leaves from the Flatey Book." It was written between 1380 and 1400, and tells of the discovery of America by Norsemen in the first years of the eleventh century. The Saga has been reproduced by the Danish Government, and Minister Egan secured a copy of the book for the Trinity library.

Frederic R. Coudert, LL.B., Ph.B., lectured at Carnegie Music Hall, on the evening of January 19, on "Colonies Under the Constitution," the first of the series in the public course of Fordham University School of Law. Other lectures in the course will be "Taxation, Regulation, and Confiscation," by Mr. Coudert, on February 16; "Professional Ethics," on March 11 and 14, by Hon. John J. Delaney, and "The Law in Relation to Labor Unions," on May 12, by the Hon. Charles E. Littlefield. Cards of Invitation to the lectures may be obtained by application to the Law School.

It is announced that the Catholic University of America has received two bequests, each for $100,000. One was made by the late Mrs. Emily Lusby of Baltimore, and has just come to the university from her estate. Another wealthy woman sent her check for an equal amount, with the stipulation that her name should not be made public.

SOCIOLOGY

The Contemporary Review for January has an exhaustive article on Fifty Years of Social Progress in England. From it we extract a few interesting figures. The population of the United Kingdom in 1851 was 27.3 millions; in 1901, 41.4 millions, and it is estimated as 44.5 millions in 1908. The death rate has decreased during this period from 22.7 per thousand to 15 per thousand. The birth rate was 33.9 per thousand in 1851; it rose to 35.5 in 1871-73. Since then it has fallen steadily and was only 26.3 in 1907. The Registrar-General reckons that 86 per cent. of the decline is due to deliberate violation of maternal duty. Infant mortality has fallen from 146 per thousand births in 1873 to 118 per thousand in 1907. The deaths from pneumonia, diphtheria and cancer have increased; from other diseases they have diminished. Typhus fever has virtually disappeared. The decline in deaths from small-pox, scarlet fever, tuberculosis and bronchitis is remarkable. In 1850-59 paupers averaged 49.2 per thousand; in 1900-08 the average was 25.3 per thousand. In 1907 wages were 80 per cent. higher than in 1850 and 40 per cent. higher than in 1860-67. Prices, on the other hand, have generally decreased. Friendly societies had a membership of 5 millions in 1877, and 14 millions sterling in accumulated funds. Now their membership is 13 millions and their accumulations over 50 millions. Savings bank deposits were £1.1s per head of population in 1850, and £5.5s.6d in 1907. In 1872 trades unions had 200,000 members with funds amounting to £100,000. In 1906 the membership was 1,700,000 and the accumulated funds £5,800,000.

In Prussia and Saxony inspectors of mines have been provided by law whose duty it is to inspect at least once a month and not oftener than three times a day, all the machinery and safety appliances of the mines. The inspectors must be thirty years of age, German subjects, and must have worked five years as practical miners. They do not give orders; but enter their recommendations in a minute book, which is inspected from time to time by the authorities. The mine-owners in the Rhenish-Westphalian province are attempting to set up a labor-exchange with its centre at Essen. Ostensibly for the benefit of the miners, it is so hedged about with regulations compelling men to work in the employment assigned them, that they naturally look upon it with suspicion.

Rev. William H. Ketcham, Director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, reports that the contributions to the Society for the Preservation of the Faith Among Indian Children during 1909 amounted to $21,482, or $6,670 more than the previous year. Of this amount the Marquette League contributed $3,132. "This gain to the Indian schools," says Father Ketcham, "has been realized at a loss to no individual, parish or diocese; indeed, it is safe to say that each individual parish and diocese having contributed to the good work is richer by far because of the 'bread cast upon the running waters,' for 'the pot of meal shall not waste nor the cruse of oil be diminished,' when there is question of almsgiving for the maintenance of the works of the Lord. The good record of the year has lit up a ray of hope in the hearts of the desponding missionaries and their friends; yet how dark and heavy are the clouds that hang above the Indian missions! The indebtedness of the Bureau to the schools at this moment is $33,000.

"Why should not the year 1910 see the returns of the Preservation Society increased to $40,000 or even $50,000?"

Bishop Canevin of Pittsburg is rejoicing over the great success of a five-days' retreat preached in the cathedral by the Rev. John H. O'Rourke, S.J., for men—Catholics and non-Catholics. The Bishop sent out five thousand invitations for the exercises and within thirty-six hours received more than a thousand acceptances.

ECONOMICS

Gifford Pinchot, Chief Forester of the United States, has delivered an address against special interests which he named as foes of forest reform. "The people of the United States," he said, "have been the complacent victims of a system of plunder often perpetrated by men who would have been surprised beyond measure to be accused of wrongdoing, and many of whom in their private lives were model citizens. But they have suffered from a curious moral perversion by which it becomes praiseworthy to do for a corporation things which they would refuse with the loftiest scorn to do for themselves. Fortunately for us all, that delusion is rapidly passing away."

According to a statement prepared by the Geological Survey and the Bureau of the Mint, the total gold production of this country for the last year shows an increase. It is estimated at $95,000,000, $4,000,000 more than that of the preceding year. Colorado stands first in the list of gold-yielding states and territories, with Alaska and California second and third. The value of silver mined is $28,050,000, a slight falling off when compared with last year.

A postal-telephone service for Sunday has just been introduced in London. People out of town send their messages on Saturday afternoon or evening to the Central Telegraph Office, attaching a penny-stamp to the envelope for postage and three pence in stamps for every thirty words. They state the hour at which they wish the message sent; but if no time be indicated, the messages are sent out at about 8.30 A. M.

Russia produced 783 million bushels of wheat last year, the largest crop ever recorded for one country, exceeding that of the United States by 26 million bushels. The land under wheat last year was 65 million acres, which makes the average yield 12 bushels per acre.

The export of frozen meat from Argentina to Great Britain was, in 1908, 573,946 carcasses of beef. Mutton amounted to nearly 3,000,000 carcasses. The export for 1909, it is thought, will exceed these figures by about 10 per cent.

SCIENCE

It may be recalled that some two years ago the eminent English chemist, Sir William Ramsay, announced that, as a result of the action of the emanation from radium on copper, he had observed the disintegration of that element into potassium, sodium and lithium. Madame Curie repeated his experiments, but failed to get a similar result. Ramsay thereupon repeated his tests, taking account of Mme. Curie's criticisms, his conclusions remaining the same as in the first instance. Recently he has completed a series of experiments on the metals of the Carbon family: Silicon, Titanium, Zirconium, Lead and Thorium. Solutions of the salts of these metals were subject to the radium emanation. In each case carbon was obtained in the form of carbon anhydride. Sir William Ramsay comes to the conclusion that the elements of the carbon group without exception yield compounds of carbon after being exposed to the emanation from radium. The amounts of carbon obtained are not the same in each case, but the evidence seems to show that the elements of greater are more readily disintegrated than those of feeble atomic weight. Lead is an exception to this rule, and shows a peculiar stability. Ramsay is conducting similar experiments on other series of elements. It looks as if the disintegration of the chemical atom by the radium emanation is an accomplished fact.

Dr. Henri Guinier studies in Etudes for December 5 "The Supernatural in the Cures at Lourdes." He confines himself to the cure of organic diseases, i. e., those followed by "loss of substance and destructive of anatomical tissue." Spending the summer months near Lourdes since 1862, for ten years a resident of the little town, a sceptic for thirty years, Dr. Guinier has at last yielded to the eloquence of facts. His word must count. The cures generally take place: (1) Without any appreciable healing agent. The water at Lourdes has no medicinal properties; some are cured without it. (2) Instantaneously; tumors disappear in a moment (for instance the cases of Sister Eugenia and Mme. Ranchet); so with burns, cancerous and scrofulous wounds (as in the cases of Marie Borel and Levêque). (3) Without convalescence; the sick usually pass without appreciable intervening stages from disease to health. (4) Irregularly. These cures are not to be calculated or foretold; they do not work "on schedule." What of a natural therapeutic agent which acts now, at another time suspends its action, does not always act in the same manner, does not act efficaciously in identical cases? (5) With some external sign or manifestation, usually an acute, intense pain in the affected part at the moment of the cure, index and proof of the restoration. (6) Sometimes where there is organic lesion the cure leaves a resultant "abnormal cicatrice," a "cicatrice fantôme," attesting the reality of the cure, and, in normal cures, unknown to medical art. (7) The startling phenomenon occurs of the reestablishment of certain bodily functions, while the organs remain diseased, materially incapable of performing their functions.

D. Guinier gives the case, studied by himself in 1908, of Mme. Biré, who recovered her sight, reads with both eyes, and—startling contradiction—both eyes materially are blind, both dead! Natural explanation to all this there is none. It exceeds all that normal therapeutics can do. Several hundred doctors, many of them sceptics, materialists, infidels, have examined the cases at Lourdes itself, where there is a special "Bureau" for the purpose, in which the work is thorough and searching. No sincere, upright, clear-headed man can deny the facts. What must the conclusion be? We must answer with the voice of True Science echoing to the voice of Faith: "The Hand of God is there."

M. George Rignoux has achieved wonderful results with his new television apparatus, by means of which he makes it possible to see the person to whom one is telephoning at a distance. The mechanism consists of concave parabolic mirrors focussing 3,000 candle-power on the object of which the image is to be transmitted. The image is thrown on a screen of 64 separate selenium cells. These cells, reacting to the light, produce an electric current in each cell, which in turn transmits luminous waves in direct proportion to the intensity of the light. The one inconvenience hitherto experienced is that each cell requires a separate wire, making sixty four wires in all for one apparatus. Attempts are now on way to transmit these waves successively over one wire, but with such velocity as to be virtually simultaneous with regard to the reproduction of the image.

According to a note in Cosmos for December, 1909, the well-known writer, M. Duhem, in an article in the Revue Générale des Sciences of November 15, on the life and work of Nicole Oresme, believes, as a result of his investigations, that the latter was not only a precursor of Copernicus but that he was also a source of inspiration to the author of "De Revolutionibus." Oresme was a doctor of theology of the University of Paris, was made Bishop of Lisieux in 1377, and died in 1382. Among numerous other works, he translated four books of Aristotle, which he never published but of which a number of manuscripts are in existence. This translation he enriched with a commentary, in which he criticizes the conclusions of Aristotle regarding an immobile earth as the centre of the solar system, cites a number of reasons against this theory and gives it as his opinion that it is altogether false.

In the annual report of the Smithsonian Institute R. A. Fessenden claims that the first instruments patented by Marconi were practically duplicates of those used by Sir Oliver Lodge. He also calls attention to the fact that wireless signals had been transmitted by Professor Joseph Henry as far back as the forties, and at a later date by Helmholtz. Elihu Thompson and others. Sir William Crookes, in the Fortnightly Review for February, 1892, indicated the whole field that might be covered by wireless telegraphy, pointing out at the same time all the obstacles that had to be overcome. Mr. Fessenden, however, admits that Mr. Marconi was the practical developer of wireless telegraphy.

Professors Scheiner and Wilsing, of the Astrophysical observatory of Potsdam, Germany, have made new measurements of the temperature of the sun's luminous surface by means of a specially constructed photometer connected with a thirty-two-inch refracting telescope, and place the figures at 5,130 degrees Fahrenheit.

Engineers, writes Vaughan H. Wilson, are coming to see the possibility of substituting aluminum for copper as a medium for the transmission of electricity. The recently discovered deposits of aluminum oxide in Georgia, Alabama, New Mexico, Nevada and Greenland have made it the cheaper of the two metals, and its lightness makes the substitution most desirable. At first it was believed that its lower conductivity and tensile strength would be insurmountable difficulties, but actual tests have shown this to be false. Many of the French power companies have been transmitting their power through cables of this metal, and in this country the Niagara Lighting and Power Company is doing the same with satisfactory results.

An international conference has recently been held in London to discuss the construction of a new map of the world on a uniform scale of one to one million, which equals sixteen miles to the inch. All technical arrangements have been settled and the British foreign office will now officially communicate, through the several embassies, with all the civilized governments of the world, requesting that each prepare maps of their territory in accordance with the plans adopted. The delegates representing the United States were Bailey Willis, geologist, and J. S. Kobel, chief engraver of the Geological Survey.

"The True Aim in Scientific Education," a paper read by Rev. James P. Monaghan, S.J., before the Southern Educational Association a year ago, has been printed in its quarterly Bulletin by the St. Louis University, St. Louis. It crowds a very large amount of valuable observation into small compass. Readers of popular science journals who are puzzled over the certitude of science in every domain of thought, even religious thought, and those who are at a loss for means of judging the methods of scientific education in many universities, will find this little pamphlet a useful storehouse of principles and a luminous and interesting statement of the legitimate field and inherent limitations of scientific activity.

In consequence of the growing demand for titanium, mines are being worked in Virginia, New York, Minnesota and Wyoming. This metal, discovered as far back as 1789, is now being used for the hardening of steel and cast iron. It is found that rails made of steel containing a little titanium are very durable. It is also being used for electrodes for arc lights.

General Brun, commander-in-chief of the French army, expresses himself strongly in favor of the aeroplane over the dirigible for army purposes. He declares that during the last French manoeuvres the military dirigibles were a failure. Up to a height of 4,800 feet they could easily be pierced with bullets; above that height no useful observations could be made from them. Aeroplanes, on the contrary, he says, have been tested under all conditions and proved themselves equal to almost every emergency.

Professor J. Joly has published the results of his study of the radio-active properties of lava. The Vesuvian lavas that have been deposited from the year 1631 to the present day are relatively very rich, their values ranging up to three times the normal for igneous rock. Moreover, the more recent their eruption the greater is their radio-activity, which indicates that, with the progress of time, this volcano is tapping fuel richer and richer in radium.

Chemistry has suffered a severe loss in the death of Dr. Ludwig Mond, who died recently in London. Dr. Mond was the inventor of many commercial processes, among them that for the manufacture of soda and ammonium.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"Don." The New Theatre.—Half comic, half serious, amusing and clever, Rudolf Besier's play has a certain amount of dramatic force. It is interesting though somewhat superficial in its characterizations, but has considerable literary quality. Beneath its lighter surface it is a clever satire upon the human failing of attributing bad motives to the best of deeds and avoiding the consequences by a lie, where truth would be the wisest escape. A quixotic young man—hence the soubriquet of "Don"—has befriended a young girl in numerous ways, who afterwards marries a fanatic member of the Puritan Brotherhood. Meanwhile he has become engaged to the daughter of a blustering old general. When his betrothed and her parents are visiting his home and he is on his way to join them, he receives word from the young girl he has befriended that her bigoted husband has maltreated her, which causes him to hasten to her assistance. With scant regard for conventions, he takes her away and brings her to the shelter of his own paternal roof. Her husband in a rage writes to his father that his son has run away with his wife, and demands her return, swearing revenge on her and her gallant rescuer. His parents, and also his fiancée's, are horrified, and mistake his chivalrous though heedless act for one of bad intent and upbraid him for the disgrace and scandal he has brought upon them, for the girl's husband has threatened to obtain a divorce. His betrothed is the only one who has faith in him, knowing as she does his generous and impulsive nature. In the end her confidence is justified, for the husband is convinced that he been cruel and unjust to his wife in attempting to force his fantastic beliefs on her, and promises to treat her with kindness and consideration if she will return to him. This she does, and consequently dispels the hasty suspicion that has been cast on "Don's" good name. This act pacifies the old general, and he finally consents to his daughter's marriage to the modern "Quixote." Concomitant with its humor and serious intent is a sprinkling of the conventional in the characters, and an improbability which jars with the smoother action of the central theme. This undoubtedly is the result of youthful inexperience, and but slightly blemishes a very clever play. The interpretation of the various characters by the members of The New Theatre Stock Company was intelligent, pleasing and capable.

"Cameo Kirby." Hackett Theatre.—Ancient material in melodramatic setting with a professional gambler as protagonist, whom every body regards as a thorough reprobate, but who turns out to be a hero. After being persecuted through three thrilling acts of hair-breadth escapes he achieves all that a man's heart may desire in winning wealth and the heroine. Sentiment is spread thickly throughout, and all the old theatrical devices are patched together in the construction of an ordinary melodrama. To those who enjoy sensation and are not sensitive to the banalities of stereotyped melodrama "Cameo Kirby" may prove a "thriller." Dustin Farnum fills the part of the hero satisfactorily, and Emmet Corrigan shines in the role of the humorous gambler who serves as an excellent foil to the aristocratic and serious Kirby.

"A Little Brother of the Rich." Wal-lack's Theatre.—An ineffectual portrayal of the reputed wickedness of the social life of a large city at the present day. The authors have made a futile attempt to satirize, and a serious dramatic mistake in trying to amuse or edify an audience with a plot devoid either of wit or human interest. The play is clumsily constructed and overburdened with unpleasant scenes, imagined from the life of the "smart set." Most dramatizations of novels are failures, and when an effort is made to stage such a crude and highly fictitious book as Mr. Patterson's failure is inevitable. To expect any display of histrionic ability on the part of the actors would be asking more than is fair.

Charles McDougall.

Harry Lauder, the well known vaudeville entertainer, was given a luncheon in Cincinnati by the Caledonian Club a week ago. Among the guests invited was Archbishop Moeller, who sent a letter of regret, in which he gave his views of the stage to-day.

"To do away with all plays, all theatres," wrote the Archbishop, "would be advocating something extravagant, and, I venture to say, not desirable. We might as well endeavor to make the waters of the Ohio flow up stream, as to try to suppress all diversions. The nature of man calls for them, and the man who would live without them has about him something that is abnormal. Mind and body need relaxation in order that they may be able properly to perform their functions. Amusements and plays afford these needed diversions and relaxations to many people. The best things may be abused, and thus what is highest and best may become lowest and meanest. This holds good also in regard to plays.

"Plays, then, that foster vice and immorality are gnawing at the very vitals of the state, and hence, those who are called to preside over city, county or state, should not give such performances any quarter. I am fully convinced that plays, as well as press and pulpit, can be made a means of doing good, of lifting up the people from a lower to a higher level of probity, of instilling on the one hand a love of virtue and on the other inspiring a hatred for all that is bad and wicked. In a word, a good, moral, carefully prepared play will bring home to those present at it salutary lessons, inspire them with noble sentiments, which will have a beneficial influence on their whole manner of living.

"Hence, I say, that while amusements which are objectionable will do a world of harm, on the contrary, those that are clean and of an elevating character, will do good to the individual as well as to the community at large. I believe, if a committee, consisting of men of well-known probity and prudence were appointed, whose duty would be to determine what amusements, plays, etc., are objectionable, and to advise the public as to what they should not patronize, a step would be taken in the right direction. This committee should also try to induce the owners of theatres not to rent their houses to companies that would put on the stage indecent plays. And if the civil and ecclesiastical authorities would give this committee their encouragement and support, I believe that ere long the amusements and plays that take place in our midst disgracing the fair name of the Queen City of the West and making her blush with shame, will be things of the past."

PERSONAL

The last male descendant of the Gutenbergs, Baron Henry von Molsberg, Adjutant-General of the King of Württemberg, died lately in Stuttgart. The deceased was related to the inventor of the art of printing through a niece of the Gutenberg's, who married into a member of the Molsberg family. On account of this relationship, Baron von Molsberg was invited by the city of Mainz to be present at the Gutenberg celebration in 1900.

Dr. J. J. Walsh, of New York, who has been delivering a series of successful lectures in New Orleans, under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus, addressed, by special request, the Medical Society of Louisiana, January 11, on Superstitions in Medicine. The Society, which consists of over three hundred prominent physicians, elected Dr. Walsh an honorary member.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

As now arranged the program of the exercises commemorating the golden jubilee of the Paulist Congregation and the parish of St. Paul the Apostle, in this city, is as follows: January 24, 8 P. M., solemn Vespers in presence of His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons; sermon by Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Hickey. January 25, 10.30 A. M., solemn pontifical Mass in presence of His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons; celebrant, the Most Rev. John M. Farley; sermon by Rev. Walter Elliott, C.S.P. January 25, 8 P. M., solemn Vespers in presence of His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate; sermon by Rev. Thomas F. Burke, C.S.P. January 26, 8 P. M., choral service with solemn Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament; sermon by Rt. Rev. Mgr. Joseph F. Mooney, V.G. January 27, 8 P. M., choral service with solemn Benediction; sermon by Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J. January 28, 8 P. M., choral service with solemn Benediction; sermon by Rev. E. G. Fitzgerald, O.P. Mass meeting, under the auspices of the Catholic laity. February 2, Carnegie Hall, New York City.

At the Boys' Orphan Asylum near Kingsbridge many of the old inmates gathered together, January 2d, to celebrate the golden jubilee of the superioress, Sister Mary Martha, who had been to them in their youth a friend, guide and protector. She has been connected with the asylum since she first entered religious life, fifty years ago, and has had charge of it for the last twenty-five years. During that time over 30,000 boys have been sheltered and given an education that well fitted them to battle with life. All, with but few exceptions, have reflected great credit on the institution; a score or more have embraced the religious life, a large number grace the professions, and many fill responsible positions.

A press cable from Rome is authority for the statement that the Right Rev. Neil McNeil, Bishop of St. George, Newfoundland, has been appointed Archbishop of Vancouver, in succession to Archbishop Dontenwill, who resigned September 21, 1908, when elected General of the Oblates. Bishop McNeil was consecrated titular Bishop of Nilopolis and Vicar-Apostolic of St. George on October 20, 1895, and was transferred to St. George on February 18, 1904, when the vicariate was raised to a see.

Diocesan statistics prepared at the close of 1909 show splendid progress during the last twenty years in the Diocese of Duluth. When Bishop McGolrick took charge in 1890 the Catholic population was about 20,000, with 2,000 Indians. There were 20 priests in charge of 32 churches and 10 stations, and 5 schools with 800 pupils. The pro-cathedral was a poor wooden structure. The Catholic population now numbers 52,000 whites and 4,330 Indians, with 52 secular and 24 regular priests attending 98 churches and 52 stations. There are 10 schools with 1,800 pupils, 4 academies having 450 pupils, 2 industrial schools for the Indians, an orphan asylum, high school, a fine new cathedral and other substantial evidences of material improvement, while the spiritual progress has been equally satisfactory.

Mgr. Heylen, Bishop of Namur, chairman of the permanent committee on the organization of Eucharistic Congresses, arrived in Montreal on January 16, to confer with Archbishop Bruchési and other church dignitaries interested in the preparations for the congress to be held in Montreal next September. At the cathedral he lectured on the great religious event, and spoke on the organization, purposes and effects of Eucharistic Congresses. They had had, he said, tremendous moral influence upon the various cities and countries in which they have, thus far, been held. At the Archbishop's palace a grand reception was given in honor of the visiting prelate, which was attended by many of the Catholic clergy and laity of the city and vicinity.

Dom Gasquet, to whom the revision of the Vulgate has been entrusted by Pius X, delivered a lecture in Rome last week, on the progress of the work. Of the $9,200 so far contributed to defray the expense involved, a great part, he said, had been received from the United States. Much more money is needed. The work of revision, which was begun in 1907, will take eight years. Abbot Gasquet spoke with appreciation of the assistance of J. Pierpont Morgan, who has permitted photographs to be made of fifteen leaves from a sixteenth century edition of the Gospel in his possession.

Rev. John J. McCort, rector of the Church of Our Mother of Sorrows, Philadelphia, has been elevated to the dignity of Domestic Prelate by the Pope. Besides coping successfully with the onerous duties of his own parish, which is one of the largest in Philadelphia, Father McCort has also built a substantial church in West Philadelphia for an Italian congregation.

Archbishop Quigley has announced the appointment of three vicars-general for the Archdiocese of Chicago: the Rt. Rev. Paul Peter Rhode, the present auxiliary bishop; the Very Rev. M. J. Fitzsimmons, and the Rev. Aloysius J. Thiele, pastor of the Church of St. Aloysius.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

At the solemn requiem Mass for the late Cardinal Satolli, at St. Aloysius' Church, Washington, D. C., the sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Mgr. T. J. Shahan, D.D., Rector of the Catholic University. We are pleased to publish the following extract from the scholarly tribute to the late Cardinal:

Francis Satolli rose to his high office through sheer merit, though, humanly speaking he owed much to the esteem of his powerful friend, Leo XIII. Satolli was one of the best Catholic theologians of his day and a distinguished and successful teacher of the younger clergy. His vast and sure acquaintance with the beauty and consistency, the variety and depth of Catholic doctrine, was acquired by diligent study of St. Thomas Aquinas, the greatest of Catholic theologians. It was at the feet of Leo XIII, then Archbishop of Perugia, that the young priest acquired the strong grasp on the doctrine of St. Thomas that soon characterized him even among older men and more experienced teachers. He was yet in the prime of life when Leo XIII committed to him the task of renewing in Rome itself the study of St. Thomas. For ten years he filled the city with his eloquent, solid and aggressive teaching, and during that time captivated a host of younger men and sent them back to their native countries equipped with reliable learning but filled also with his own enthusiasm.

His strength lay mainly in a remarkable power of reaching down into the vitals of a great question and probing for the underlying principles. In this he had few, if any, equals, and he worked with a sure method, the trained use of the most delicate reasoning power, a clear and incisive logic, that seemed infallible once its starting point was granted. His Latin diction was choice and closely woven, and though his ideas were profound, they were always clear and consistent. The rational processes of theology were especially dear to him and he was a finished master in all that pertained to them. He sought religious truth habitually and with great earnestness, not the history of truth, nor opinions about truth, but the very truth itself. Hence there was often in his speech and manner something forceful and militant. Few Catholic theologians in the last century so impassioned their hearers as this truly admirable disciple of Leo XIII, himself one of the greatest theologians of the last three centuries. Fewer still had so large a daily audience drawn from so many countries, both in the Old and New World. In many a distant land there is to-day genuine sorrow for the eloquent voice now stilled forever and the ardent spirit now quenched in death. He wrote many volumes, mostly in Latin, and therefore never exercised on the larger world the personal charm that won him so many friends among his army of pupils. Yet he wrote his native Italian with precision and nervous strength, and was one of the best pulpit orators of Rome. He remained always, however, a foremost teacher of Catholic theology and philosophy as found in the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas, from whose wise teachings, he firmly believed with Leo XIII and many others, would one day come the social and religious regeneration of our modern world.

It is a far cry from the professor's chair to the office of first Apostolic Delegate to the Catholic Church in the United States. Nevertheless, the professor of Thomistic theology was not unequal to a task that would have been at any time a delicate and arduous one, but was then peculiarly so because of grave differences of opinion among American Catholics on certain domestic matters. The situation called for a man of insight, courage and prudence, and the new Apostolic Delegate exhibited these virtues in a high degree. He amply justified the words of Leo XIII that in Francis Satolli he was sending to the Church in the United States "an illustrious man, equally renowned for his learning and his virtues." He travelled far and wide, mingled freely with all the people, and obtained at first hand an intimate acquaintance with all the elements and forces, the strength and the weakness of our Catholic life.

He was a fearless man and desired honestly to be impartial. His decisions were not in every case equally pleasing to all concerned, but his conscience never reproached him, and he was always convinced that he had acted on solid principles of theology and equity, and that he retained the approval of his superior, the Pope, in whose name he came and whose authority he exercised. He had a very keen sense of justice, detested any kind of wrong, and was ready to act in a quick and summary way when the ends of justice or equity could not be otherwise served. It is no small tribute to him that by his strong character he not only established in its fullness the office imposed on him, but also left it highly respected, popular, and widely efficient. This was due, in great measure, to his real sympathy for the people of the United States and their form of Government. He admired their large and sane freedom, their respect for the rights of others, their moderation, their good will towards the old mother Church and their many fundamental virtues and principles. He learned well our language and retained to the end many warm friends among us, and was always pleased to meet at Rome those whom he had known here or who went recommended to him.

The dominant note in the dead Cardinal's life was his strong love for the Catholic Church.

In his long experience as educator, judge and administrator, he came to know her as the only truly wise and truly permanent friend of humanity, and the longer he lived the more he believed that men had only to know her as she is in order to love her as he did. He lit in the hearts of his numerous pupils a fire of devotion to the ends and ideals of the Church, and that force remains now that he is no longer with us. While he lived the professor may have, to some extent, become lost in the prince of the Church, but now that his rank and office are no more, it is the scholarly faith and the splendid idealism of this truly great teacher that live on and sustain many thousands of hearts in the never-ending conflict that goes on about them.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE MAKING OF THE NORTHWEST.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of December 4 there appeared a favorable review of Lyman's recent book on the Columbia River. Your reviewer says very truly that Professor Lyman has given us a most interesting book—indeed, that he could scarcely have done otherwise, considering his subject. I fear, however, that in his anxiety to present an interesting and picturesque narrative, Professor Lyman has overlooked the claims of historical accuracy. It may have been the cry of the publishers for "copy" that deterred our author from the painstaking labor demanded of the exact historian. To produce a book worthy of the great Columbia River is a high undertaking. Hence it is to be regretted that Professor Lyman, in contributing this volume to the American Waterways series did not subject it to severer criticism before turning the manuscript over to the publishers. I shall instance here only a few of the more flagrant errors which obtrude themselves on the most cursory perusal of the book.

There are so many blunders in the assignment of dates that the volume becomes quite untrustworthy in regard to chronology. To mention three cases at random: (1) The author states that the explorer Vérendrye set out from Montreal for the Rocky Mountains in 1773 (page 70), though Monsieur de La Vérendrye died in 1749. His western explorations occupied him chiefly from 1738-43. (2) The arrival of Fathers Blanchet and Demers on Oregon soil is assigned to 1837 (page 155). They actually arrived late in 1838. (3) We read on page 51 that Vitus Behring, the Danish navigator in the service of Russia, "in 1771 had gone as far south as latitude 46 degrees, just the parallel of the mouth of the Columbia. But he was so far off the coast as not to see it." Unfortunately for this chronology, Behring had died in 1741, just thirty years before the date fixed for his voyage. The reference to Behring introduces us to a geographical miscalculation as well as to an error of date. The voyage in the course of which Behring reached the 46th degree of latitude was along the Asiatic, not the American coast. Hence the statement that Behring could not see the mouth of the Columbia because of the distance. Quite so! The Pacific Ocean interposed its vast width between the intrepid Dane and the mouth of the Columbia!

On page 155, where we learned that Father Blanchet came to Oregon in 1837, the author gives us the equally reliable information that "McLoughlin had been brought up a Catholic," and that Father De Smet had come in 1840 into the Flathead country, in what is now northern Idaho. As a matter of fact Dr. McLoughlin was reared in the Established Church of England and became a Catholic in 1842, at the height of his power and at the age of fifty-eight. As to Father De Smet, the home of the Flatheads was in the Bitter Root Valley, in western Montana, and here De Smet visited them in 1840. On another page we are informed that De Smet sailed from Antwerp to Oregon on the ship "L'Indefatigable," despite the impossible form of the word. The ship was L'Infatigable. On page 158 we are informed that the Catholic College at St. Paul's is the successor of the school founded in 1839 by Blanchet. The fact is that Father Blanchet established the school at St. Paul (St. Joseph's College) in the fall of 1843, and there has been no Catholic College at St. Paul (Ore.) since 1849.

Professor Lyman has a very high regard for W. H. Gray's "History of Oregon," from which he draws much of the coloring of his narrative. Gray is one of his source-books. Hence we need not wonder at his story of the provisional government, of the influence of the missionaries and of the Whitman affair. He recognizes that Gray is intensely hostile to the Catholics and to the Hudson's Bay Company, yet his "History" is a "work of high value" (page 149). A testimony concerning the value of Gray's "History," from a competent and impartial source, may be of interest in this connection. Jesse Applegate was a pioneer who came to Oregon with Peter Burnett in 1843, and was closely identified with public affairs here for many years thereafter. He was one of the most capable and intelligent of the pioneers and was universally conceded to be a man of high principle and of judicious mind. In a private letter preserved in the Bancroft Library at the University of California, Mr. Applegate writes to the historian, Bancroft, under date of August 29, 1878: "You mention Gray's 'History.' . . . It is like the man, a mere bundle of insane and baseless prejudices. It is a loss of time even to read such stuff."

We may conclude this criticism by mentioning an error of fact into which Professor Lyman is led by his favorite authors, and which he elaborates through several pages. It is the old story of the Oregon Indians' search for the "White Man's Book of Life." Four Indians from the Rocky Mountains arrived in St. Louis in 1831. Their mission, according to the story, was to secure and bring back to their tribe the White Man's "Book of Heaven." They were unsuccessful in their quest, but before leaving St. Louis they were entertained at a banquet, and one of their number made an eloquent speech, which was spread broadcast in the Protestant religious press and started the great missionary movement towards Oregon. In the course of the reported speech the Indian chief said: "You took me to where they worship the Great Spirit with candles, but the Book was not there. You showed me images of the good spirits and pictures of the good land beyond, but the Book was not among them to tell us the way." So the story runs in a hundred books on Oregon, and Professor Lyman finds room for the myth in his volume, even to the neat fling at Catholic worship in the supposed speech of the Indian chief.

The real mission of the Indians in St. Louis was to ask for priests to come among them. They called on Bishop Rosati in that city, and when two of their number took ill they received the Sacraments and were buried in the Catholic cemetery. The whole story of the speech about the White Man's "Book of Heaven" is mythical—a pious invention.

There are few things in Lyman's book which are prejudicial to Catholics. But in view of the errors of which the above mentioned are only typical, the work can hardly be said to rank high as a history. It is sincerely to be regretted that so important a subject as the Columbia River was not assigned to some able and painstaking historian who would have produced as creditable a volume on the history and legends of the River of the West, as, for example, Mr. F. V. Holman, President of the Oregon Historical Association, has brought out on another phase of the history of the Pacific Northwest, viz., the "Life of Dr. McLoughlin." Professor Lyman will certainly add to his own credit as an historian and to the usefulness of his book by a rigid revision of his work, should a second edition be called for.

CHRONICLE

At Home.—The President declared only six European countries entitled to the minimum rates of duty imposed by the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. The favored nations are Great Britain, Russia, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, and Turkey. Of the continental countries of Europe, Italy will profit most by the President's declaration, as her exports to the United States exceed those of any other. —The National Civic Federation held a three days' conference in Washington, President Taft making the opening address. The conference was called primarily to devise means for the enactment of uniform legislation by the various States on important questions concerning which the Federal Government has no power to legislate. The convention adjourned after the adoption of resolutions favoring uniform laws. —Another important event at the national capital was the meeting of the Board of Governors, representing thirty States of the Union. States' Rights was the burden of several addresses, with particular reference to the conservation of natural resources, and the supervision of public service corporations. Ambassador Bryce spoke at one of the sessions. After three days the convention adjourned, having planned for a future meeting at some State capital. —The Japanese and Russian Governments declined to accept Secretary Knox's proposal for the neutralization of the Manchurian railroads. Great Britain and France were also opposed to the project. The Secretary's alternative proposition for the building of the road from Chinchow to Tsitsihar with a terminus at Aigun, received the approval of the Chinese Government, and American interests will share equally with those of other powers in the construction of this road. Although both Russia and Japan make reservation regarding the Aigun-Tsitsihar proposition, the Temps insists that the concession would be a violation of the Anglo-Russian convention of 1899 and the Chino-Japanese conventions of 1905 and 1909.

The Western Switchmen's Case.—Arbitration under the Erdmann Act, to settle the differences between the switchmen and managers of western railroads entering Chicago, although announced in the "Chronicle" of two weeks since, was not resorted to at the time. Chairman Knapp of the Interstate Commerce Commission and Commissioner of Labor Neill have been using their good offices to effect a settlement without recourse to the provisions of the act. Reports from Washington announce their failure, and under the agreement reached two weeks ago each side will name an arbitrator within five days and the two selected will name a third. The demands of the switchmen for a readjustment of the wage scale and improved working conditions will be considered, and the findings of the board will follow. This means that there will be no strike since the Erdmann Act requires both parties, under penalty, to accept the award of the arbiters. The decision of this board will have wider scope than the settlement of the Chicago troubles. Its effect on the strike of the switchmen on the northwestern roads, which began before the holidays and is still affecting traffic in the St. Paul district, will be immediate. Both the northwestern switchmen and those of Chicago interested in the arbitration now determined upon are members of the same union.

The Eastern Railroads' Situation.—As announced at the time, requests for wage increase were made simultaneously on the managers of thirty-two eastern railroads a month ago, and January 20 was the day set for their reply. On that date the railroad officials refused to grant the demands of the trainmen, and the next thing in order will be the holding of conferences to effect a peaceful settlement. The conferences will continue for weeks, and should negotiations fail, a strike involving 150,000 men will take place, say the heads of the trainmen's associations. Happily neither managers nor men are in the mood for a strike, for both sides feel that nothing would be gained by it.

The Cost of Living.—The country-wide agitation due to the steady advance in the cost of the necessities of life, to which reference was made last week, is growing more intense every day. The committee appointed in the Ohio legislature, following a special message of Governor Harmon, to investigate the causes of high food prices in the state, reports that the law of supply and demand which has been held by many to be responsible for existing conditions, cannot be held to be sufficient explanation. A belief that there are artificial causes as well as natural ones for the high prices prevails. Members of the committee consider that statistics at hand indicate that the present food prices are due to manipulation, but before formulating a decision they announce that a thorough study of the economics of production and transportation of foods must be made.—A movement against prevailing high prices of meat was begun in several cities throughout the country. In Pittsburg 125,000 workmen, representing 600,000 persons, have enlisted under the banner of total abstinence from meat for thirty days. The most active centres of opposition are Chicago, Pittsburg, Boston, Richmond, Baltimore and Kansas City. The dominating influence on the price of fresh meats throughout the United States seems to emanate from the National Packing Company of Chicago, whose operations moreover affect the price of cattle on the hoof. An inquiry by the officials of the Department of Justice into the practices of the National Company has been under way for six months and efforts are being made to punish persons responsible for the present state of affairs and to dissolve any combinations operating in restraint of trade.

Conservation of Niagara.—The report of the committee on the protection and restoration of Niagara Falls, which is approved by the Secretary of War and is now before Congress, presents a plan to preserve the great cataract for all time in an appropriate setting. It recommends the acquisition by the United States of a strip of land extending from the State reservation to the other end of the Gorge, and including the face of the cliff and a hundred yards of the table land. This is to be cleared of the present buildings and restored as far as possible to its original state. The taking of water from the river above the falls is to be restricted to an amount which will not perceptibly lessen the flow. For complete success the cooperation of the Canadian Government will be required.

Railway Disaster at Spanish River.—On January 21, the most terrible accident in the history of the Canadian Pacific Railway occurred at Spanish River, thirty-eight miles from Sudbury, Ont., where a train, consisting of an engine, combination mail and baggage car and express car ran off the track into the river. Though the ice was twelve inches thick, the momentum and weight of the cars broke through and submerged them. Fire that broke out at once added to the horror of the accident. The number of bodies lying in the submerged cars is not yet known, thirty-one having been recovered up to Sunday. Fifty may be dead, frozen in the cars under the ice. The conductor, Thomas Reynolds, dived and saved seven passengers. B. M. Pearce, the only passenger who escaped from the first class coach, ran five miles in his frozen garments to deliver a report of the wreck at the Canadian Pacific station at Nairn, the telegraph wires being all down. Among the known dead are Father J. E. Carrère of Blind River, Ont., and Father Chaillou of Dorval, Que.

Tariff War Threatens.—The reports from Berlin indicating a possible tariff war with Germany, have caused the President and Secretary Knox to give consideration to the policy that shall be pursued with that country. France, too, has come to a serious stage in its tariff relations with this country. The meat and cattle question is the crucial one. Home politics in both countries is responsible for the enforcement of so-called sanitary regulations practically prohibiting the importation of American meats and live stock. In Germany a strong agrarian party stands fast in its opposition to any concessions to affect this discrimination, and similarly France has to consider its agricultural interests. The Payne-Aldrich law denies the benefit of the minimum rate to countries which fail to allow that equal treatment to American imports which other nations enjoy and Germany is known to be less severe upon such importations coming from Austria and Denmark. The fact that the President by proclamation has already extended the benefits of the minimum tax imposed by the new tariff to Italy, Great Britain, Russia, Spain, Turkey and Switzerland, will be a factor influencing Germany in its decision. The competition in trade which this advantage supposes will have much to do in bringing about harmony. It is believed that Germany cannot discriminate against American cattle and meat and thus jeopardize its annual trade of $400,000,000 with the United States.

and Germany once admitted to the benefit of minimum rates, France in self protection will follow with concessions necessary to safeguard its own trade of $250,000,000 annually.

Great Britain.—A cable from our London agent states that the Irish leader, John Redmond, controls the House of Commons. No ministry can hold office without his support. The Catholic vote undoubtedly caused the defeat of several Liberals, who would not declare in favor of impartial treatment of all interests in providing for the schools. This was a deciding factor in producing the balance of parties. The Catholic schools are thus absolutely safe.—Up to Tuesday evening the candidates elected were distributed as follows: Liberals, 213; Labor, 36; Unionists, 238; Irish party, 72.

Ireland.—The Nationalist party have lost only one seat in the elections, Mid-Tyrone. They have made one gain, South Dublin, and will number 83. Mr. Shane Leslie failed by 56 votes to win Derry City from the Marquis of Hamilton, whose majority at the previous election was 67. Mr. T. M. Healy retains North Louth against the combined efforts of the leading members of his party. His election and that of Mr. O'Brien in Cork, will probably influence the Irish party in more carefully scrutinizing the Budget from the point of view of Irish interests. Mr. Redmond, speaking at Bradford on the Catholic school question, said it would be calamitous to bring Ireland's nationality and her religion into conflict. They might take it from him that the Catholic schools were in no danger from a frontal attack. The real danger was from a compromise between the Nonconformists and the Church of England. "The one safe course is to trust neither Liberal nor Tory, but to keep our own power intact. I give this pledge to the Irish Catholics in Great Britain, that the declaration of the Catholic bishops in England defining the Catholic demand is accepted to the last syllable by the Irish Nationalist Party; that their demand is our demand. In the presence of the Irish party, Catholics need have no fear of injury to their schools whatever party comes into office." The House of Lords, he said, had consistently opposed, and the Irish party had consistently championed, every Catholic cause. It was the duty of English Catholics to stand by the party that stood by them and help "to win a struggle which has been going on for centuries, for the faith and fatherland of Ireland."—The Irish Land Bill recently passed is now in operation. Its best feature was to increase the powers of the Congested Districts Board, doubling its area of control in the West and trebling its resources. Mr. Birrell had intended the Board to be partly elective, but this clause was thrown out by the Lords. He has now appointed a board which includes Bishop O'Donnell of Raphoe, Bishop Mangan of Kerry, Rev. D. O'Hara, P.P., Sligo, Rev. P. Glynn, P.P., Clare, Mr. J. Fitzgibbon, chairman Roscommon Co. Council, and others who are equally satisfactory. Mr. Russell, who was defeated in Tyrone, retains the Presidency of the Board, and Sir Horace Plunket is also a member.

Australia.—Four more union officials, including the President of the Miners' Federation, are to be prosecuted under the Industrial Disputes Act for their refusal to submit the coal-strike grievances to the decision of the tribunal constituted by the Act. Legally they are in the wrong. On the other hand, they appear to have good grounds for complaint. There is a combination among the coal owners in New South Wales to regulate production, and when times are dull the mines are not worked to their full capacity. The miners say that the owners take this opportunity to punish the more strongly organized miners and to favor the less strongly organized by giving the latter work for from four to five days a week and reducing the employment of the former to one or two days, or even closing the mines in which they work, thus throwing them on the unions for support. The owners take refuge behind the Disputes Act and refuse to meet the men in any other way than it provides; while the miners claim that the owners' combination is an illegal restriction of trade punishable by law. The Railway Commissioners proposed to refuse to transport coal from the mines that are not in the combination except for railway use. This was met by a threat of a general strike on the part of all workmen in any way connected with the coal trade, and the proposal was given up. Railways in Australia are almost entirely owned and administered by the Government, and their action in this case is worthy of attention. Cardinal Moran, alluding to the strike, avoided taking either side, but recommended his hearers to pray for the accomplishing of justice and congratulated New South Wales on the absence of violence though 20,000 men were out.

India.—A party from the British warship Perseus landed at Pishkan in Baluchistan and destroyed 850 rifles and 100,000 rounds of ammunition destined for Afghanistan, after driving off the Afghans who were guarding them.—Upwards of thirty persons have been arrested in connection with the murder of Mr. Jackson. Most of them are Brahmans and three were in the Government service. The extent of the conspiracy is attributed to the violence of the native press. Loyal Indians are puzzled at the inaction of the authorities in the face of so evident an evil.—Eleven Mohammedans, 11 Hindus, 2 Europeans, 1 Parsee, 1 Sikh and 1 Burmese have been elected to the Imperial council up to last advices. The active part taken by the landholders gives great satisfaction to the Government.

School Debate in French Chamber.—On January 21, the debate on the school question occasioned important utterances. The leader of the Catholic Party, M. Jacques Piou, deputy for Lozère, defied the Government to grant freedom of education. "I am quite certain," he said, "that the members of the Government will not accept my challenge. They are well aware that Catholic education is decidedly superior, from the point of view of morals, to lay education such as is imparted in the primary State schools. I regret that the Government cannot accept freedom of education, as it exists, for instance, in the United States; for I am persuaded that the only way to bring about peace between Catholics and their adversaries is free competition between independent and public schools." M. Briand replied that while the members of his Government had determined to exercise a severe control over private schools, they would not follow those who urged them to monopolize education and close the free schools. "A monopoly in education," he went on to say, "could be acceptable only in a better instructed democracy than the French, in a country better pacified than the France of to-day." These last words were a categorical reply to the Combists, and M. Ferdinand Buisson, deputy from the Seine, proposed that M. Briand's speech be posted up in the 36,000 communes of France. But the Radical-Socialists of the Combes-Pelletan group protested so strongly against this that M. Briand himself begged the Seine deputy not to insist. This incident is considered very grave in political circles. It shows once more how profound is the antagonism between M. Briand and the Combist group.

Floods in France.—The floods in France have assumed alarming proportions. In the north, east, and west hundreds of people are shelterless and ruined. The property losses are enormous. In Paris last Sunday the Seine had risen 24 feet 8 inches, whereas at this season the usual rise is only 8 feet 2 inches. The bridges, especially the Pont des Arts, were threatened. The continued rain forecasted still higher floods. Many quarters of Paris were without light and without drinking water. The water in the sewers was backing up. As telegraphic and telephonic communication is interrupted, the situation in the provinces is not known exactly, but it is said to be somewhat improved in the valleys of the Loire, the Rhône, the Marne, the Yonne, and the upper reaches of the Seine and the Aube. On the other hand, the valleys of the Saône and the Doubs are nothing but a large lake ten miles wide. The whole of Champagne is in a very critical condition. Vitry-le-François (Marne) is isolated in the midst of a lake two miles wide. All the country between Arrigny and Larzicourt is under water, and several houses have collapsed. Many villages on the banks of the Marne are submerged.

Germany.—In official circles the possibility of a tariff war with the United States is seriously considered, although the hope is expressed that the experience to come to both nations during February and March, in which months the Payne bill will govern trade with Germany, will lead to the mutual concessions to be asked for in the conference soon to be held. That Germany is at present indisposed to yield much is apparent from the utterances of the press as well as from the stand taken by legislative and commercial bodies throughout the empire. This disposition is clearly shown in the principal speech delivered at the annual banquet of the American Association of Commerce and Trade, a leading commercial body in Berlin. In the presence of Ambassador Hill, the guest of honor at the banquet, it was bluntly affirmed that Germany had hitherto done all the conceding and it was now the duty of America to make such advances as would assure a tolerable condition of affairs in trade relations between the two peoples. Bavaria, through its representative in the Imperial Government, has urged that its interests be strongly supported in the coming conference, presenting data to prove that its trade will be seriously affected by the new schedules of the Payne Act. As announced last week, any compromise in reference to the importation of cattle is generally denounced. —Violent storms have prevailed for some days and the unusually heavy accompanying rains threaten serious flood conditions in the Moselle and Rhine valleys and across the borders into Tyrol and Switzerland. —Another laudatory reference to the United States navy by a German critic was made this week. In a speech before the Naval Association of Kiel, Admiral von Koester, his Majesty's representative at the Hudson-Fulton celebration, speaking with the assured knowledge his recent opportunity had enabled him to acquire, praised the American fleet as well-disciplined, well-manned and commanded by a corps of officers thoroughly trained in their profession. He commented favorably on the fact that the naval force was drawn largely from the farm hands of the West, seeing in this an agreement in policy with the Imperial idea of drawing its marine force largely from the agricultural population of middle Germany.

Roman News.—By a Motu Proprio of December 15, the Sovereign Pontiff has united the Spanish Institute of the Sons of the Holy Family with the Theatines, and has made Cardinal Tuto y Vives, hitherto protector of that Institute, protector of the whole Congregation thus formed, with power to renew and reform it. —A decree of the Sacred Congregation of Religious has detached the Trappists of Mariannahill in Natal from the parent Order and has established them as an exempt Congregation under the name of the Missionary Religious of Mariannahill. They will follow for the present the Cistercian rule, but the general chapter to be held three years hence will form new constitutions suited to their peculiar circumstances. The central house at Mariannahill will be also the novitiate and house of studies. Its provost, the head of the Congregation, is granted the use of pontificals.

The Philippines.—The Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands handed down a decision to the effect that the island government has power to regulate foreign commerce with the islands.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Protection of Immigrant Girls

President Taft's first message to Congress discusses, amongst other important issues, the question of the so-called "White Slave Trade." He says:

"I greatly regret to have to say that the investigations made in the bureau of immigration and other sources of investigation lead to the view that there is urgent necessity for additional legislation and greater executive activity to suppress the recruiting of the ranks of the prostitutes from the streams of immigration into this country."

One of the investigations referred to estimated that 15,000 victims are annually imported into the United States. It seems, moreover, that the nefarious trade is regularly organized, with a central bureau, and branch offices in all the large cities from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and agents at all the immigration harbors and in different parts of Europe. The most cunning and successful agents in Europe are "traveling American ladies," who have plenty of money and use it freely to lure their victims to destruction.

The President's call for Federal legislation and the bill bearing on this matter recently brought in by a Congressman are moves in the right direction. But all the legislation in the world, as it only punishes a convicted offender, will not be able to decrease materially the number of the unfortunate victims of vice, unless the prostitution evil is attacked where its deeper roots lie hid.

Much is being done for the girl that remains at home; there are hundreds of thousands of charitable institutions to take care of the orphan, the sick, the poor, the unfortunate girl; but has the same care been bestowed on the girl that seeks a livelihood in foreign parts—the girl that only too often falls a prey to the agent of immorality? Before she leaves her native town or village, on the journey when she arrives at her destination and during the period of her exile, until she is safe again in her old home or has settled down for life in her new one, this girl should be guided and protected by the hand of Christian charity. This hand must reach from city to city, from land to land, over deserts and seas—it must be the hand of internationally organized protection of the emigrant girl.

A Protestant organization of this kind has been in existence for more than thirty years. Its headquarters are in Neuchâtel (Switzerland) and it counts nearly 15,000 members in forty different countries of the world. The kindred Catholic organization is of more recent birth. The imminent moral dangers to which the numerous Swiss servant girls were exposed in Hungary and Russia, in 1896 inspired M. Léon Genoud, of the University of Fribourg, with the idea of founding a society for the protection of Swiss emigrant girls. He was ably seconded by Madame Louise de Reynold. After a fruitless effort to amalgamate the proposed work with the already existing and very active Protestant organization, Madame de Reynold founded at Fribourg, September 22, 1896, the "Œuvre Catholique Suisse de Protection de la Jeune Fille," identical in aim with a society organized in Bavaria, 1895, the "Marianischer Maedchenschutzverein."

The new association spread rapidly over Switzerland, and its fame was heralded through the continent. The first general reunion was held in August, 1897, and was attended by delegates from all the Swiss cantons and the principal countries of Europe. At this congress M. Genoud's proposition to internationalize the association by affiliating with it all the existing works of the same description in other countries, was unanimously adopted, and a constitutive assembly was convened under the chairmanship of Mgr. Werthmann, of Baden. The result was the "Association Catholique Internationale des Œuvres pour la Protection de la Jeune Fille." Fribourg, the seat of the great international university, thoroughly Catholic in population, situated in a neutral country, where the great languages of continental Europe—German, French and Italian—meet, was chosen as the headquarters of the association. (The address of the international secretary is 28, Rue Romont, Fribourg.)

The association is governed by an international board of directors, an international committee, and the periodical international congresses. The Blessed Virgin, under the title of Mother of Good Counsel, is the heavenly protectress of the association, the "Year-Book" (German and French), "Guides" for traveling girls (in fifteen languages), and the Monthly Bulletin, are the official international organs. It has been repeatedly blessed and recommended by the Holy See. The Cardinal Protector has always taken the most lively interest in the progress of the work. In 1899 he sent Mgr. Müller-Simonis, of Strassburg, to South America, and, in 1907, to Turkey and Greece, in the interests of the association, and he has already given him letters of recommendation to the bishops of the United States and Canada, some of whom he intends to visit in the course of the current year. The governments of the various countries have not been behindhand in appreciating the social significance of the association, and at the Expositions of Liege, Milan and Bordeaux first prizes of merit were awarded to it by the unanimous decision of the judges. The association is, moreover, in continual touch with the "International Society for the Prevention of the White Slave Trade," founded in London, 1899, and the various national organizations of the same description.

The end of the association is threefold: First, to unite, for common action, the works and institutions, which, in the various countries, are occupied with the protection of girls. Second, to facilitate the foundation of societies and institutions where they do not exist. Third, to enlist the services of isolated members in places too small or too poor to support regular organizations. The Association is, therefore, a coalition of works, institutions and isolated members for the protection, material, moral and religious, of girls of all classes, but especially of emigrant working girls. In this way it carries on a social apostolate amongst one of the most numerous and interesting classes of society.

Among the ways and means employed are the securing of employment, protection during the journey, the organization of courses of instruction and manual training, the establishment of savings banks and sick and old age pensions, houses of refuge, homes and social clubs, the systematic fight, in conjunction with the civil governments, against the white slave trade and the dangerous newspaper advertising. An instance related to me by Mgr. Müller-Simonis at the Charity Congress in Erfurt last October, will illustrate one phase of the work. "Some months ago," he said, "there was question of sending a fifteen-year old orphan girl from Strasburg to her sister, a servant girl in Madrid. Everything was arranged by the Strassburg branch of the Association. One of our representatives brought the girl to the train, and recommended her to the care of the conductor. In Paris, where she had to change trains, a member of the local organization met her at the station, secured good refreshment at a moderate price, conducted her to the Gare d'Orleans and placed her in the train bound for Bordeaux. At the station in Bordeaux, ladies in the employ of the local secretaryship, which had been notified by its Paris correspondent, met her and conducted her to the train bound for the Spanish frontier. Here a frontier-commissioner, one of our confidential agents, looked after the fulfilment of the customs formalities and saw her safe on her way to Madrid, where her sister met her at the station. The orphan girl and her protectors everywhere recognized each other by the official international countersign: the yellow and white-covered guide in the hand of the girl and the yellow and white ribbon on the shoulder of the ladies and the frontier-commissioner."

During the twelve years of its existence the Association has made wonderful progress. The following is a list of the various countries with the number of national committees, secretaryships, works and institutions affiliated with the International Association June, 1909:

Germany, 435; Austria, 88; Belgium, 263; Denmark, 2; Spain, 40; France, 913; Great Britain and Ireland, 30; Greece, 5; Italy, 65; Luxemburg, 6; Monaco, 2; Norway, 4; Holland, 193; Portugal, 8; Roumania, 8; Russian Poland, 19; Sweden, 6; Switzerland, 241; Turkey, 6; South America, 165; Asia, 43; Australia, 1; total, 2,572. This makes an increase of 882 institutions in three years.

Neither the United States nor Canada figures on this list. May this short and imperfect sketch of the great Catholic Association help to realize the hope expressed by M. Genoud at Strassburg, that at the next International Congress the Great Republic of the New World will be fittingly represented and give a new impulse to the movement.

The Catholic Mission Field

The persecution now harassing the Catholic Church in France brings with it a crisis in the life of the Universal Church, which Catholics the world over may not overlook. No nation has rendered service in the world mission field at all comparable to the work hitherto carried on by the French people. To them is the Church indebted almost entirely for the splendid achievements of the last century—the associations for the support and spread of missionary activity, the majority of the newer Mission Congregations, and the Apostolic schools. Catholic France has sent into the field of apostolic labor the best she possessed of manly courage and womanly devotedness, until to-day she numbers thousands of self-sacrificing sons and daughters toiling their lives away in distant mission lands. In a recent article in the Katholische Missionen, Father Huonder, an authority on the mission work of the Church, supplies data to enable one to measure the wide extent of France's influence. He tells us that of the 108 missions districts in the Orient, just one-half, of the 60 accredited to Africa, about 30; and of the 18 in Oceanica, 9 have been long entrusted to the exclusive charge of French missionary bodies. And while it is undoubtedly true, he adds, that not all of the religious, men and women, engaged in these fields are of French origin, the considerable number of French priests and nuns devoting their lives to the service of the Church in non-French districts is an element of France's generous zeal not to be disregarded. Moreover, throughout the nineteenth century the material support of the army waging the war of Christ in these pagan lands has been drawn, if not entirely, at least in more than proportionate share, from the charity of the eldest daughter of the Church. The same reliable authority affirms that from the year 1822 to 1900 the Society for the Propagation of the Faith collected $69,000,000 from the Catholic faithful, and during the interval between 1843 and 1900 the Association of the Child Jesus gathered nearly $22,000,000, of which sums Catholic France contributed nearly two-thirds of the former and at least one-third of the latter.

Can the zealous charity hitherto prompting the Catholics of France be depended upon to continue the splendid work in equally generous spirit in our own day? Were there question of zeal and charity merely, no one might hesitate to answer, but the bitterness of the blow which has struck the Church of France in these latter years makes clear the impossibility that her devoted children should continue to honorably lead all others in bearing the burden. The losses entailed upon the French mission societies, whose home property has been confiscated through iniquitous legislation, whilst their members have been exiled to make new foundations in alien lands, have been enormous; the annual large gifts flowing in for the work from the rich endowments of ancient abbeys and monasteries must cease now that the religious houses have been secularized; the French diocesan clergy, noted for their large-hearted charity to the missions, are now engaged in a desperate struggle to support themselves in the changed conditions that obtain; the subventions of the government, once no small element of help in the vast expense, practically are withdrawn from all save a few missions of the French protectorate.

And most inopportunately does the resultant straitening of material resources enter into the perplexing problem facing the men and women who have given their lives to this work so near to the heart of the Church. The critical hour in which the future of the missions among pagan peoples is to be determined appears to be close at hand. To understand one has but to consider the upheaval wrought in the Orient through recent happenings. The rapid progress of Japan during the last few years has aroused all Asia to a consciousness of its strength. Already signs are observed which mark the impatience with which it bears the four-hundred year tutelage Europe has exercised in its regard, and in consequence the protection of the missions by European powers, once a large element of strength to those who labored among the Asiatics, unquestionably will cease soon to be a helpful influence. Missions and missionaries, in the changed policies which seem to threaten in the Eastern hemisphere, will be obliged to take a stand independent of the aid they have been enjoying from the world powers.

It is an entirely new state of affairs and it brings hitherto unthought of difficulties to those whose duty it is to shape the policy of the foreign mission work of the Church. The difficulties are in no wise lessened by the notion which unwise writers of an earlier day have done much to spread among Catholics. No doubt these meant well when they wrote of the futility of non-Catholic efforts in the mission field and of the sterility of Protestant missions, but their contentions have wrought harm in lulling the Catholic mind to a false security. They neglected to distinguish clearly two quite different things: Christianity as a supernatural religion and the Christian civilization which follows, as a purely natural result, the spread of the Christian religion. Fail as they must in their efforts to implant the former, Protestants are by no means unsuccessful in introducing the latter, and with the immense resources they have in hand, they are winning, as our own missionaries testify, a wide influence among pagan peoples. The success which comes to them in what can be the only outcome of their work in the mission field may be readily analyzed. What the awakening peoples of Japan and China desire is precisely the advantages they note in the civilization, in the intellectual and material progress that marks the western world to-day. The heroes and heroines of the Catholic Church, who do battle for the Faith in these un-Christian lands, have the higher aim, but it is mainly through the lure of the natural that they will bring home to the nations among whom they struggle the blessedness of Christ's kingdom which it is their supreme purpose to build up among men. And we at home must not be blind to the increasing difficulty, which the growing influence of non-Catholic workers in a purely natural sphere necessarily opposes to them.

Catholics in other lands are beginning to appreciate the fact that mission work among nations still in the darkness of paganism may no longer practically be relinquished to the generous sacrifices of one devoted people. The changed relations growing out of the political life of the world demand that the whole Catholic body arrange its forces in new alignment to face the need that is pressing in the sphere of mission activity. Catholic Germany has already responded to the call, and in the last great Catholic Congress in Düsseldorf a resolution was adopted by delegates present from all parts of the empire. Its framers worded the resolution well. Heretofore at similar meetings the support and encouragement of missions distinctively German in their inception and development have been urged upon the delegates, but this year, wide awake to the critical situation existing, the resolution calls for a united world-wide support of Catholic effort in the mission field. With the characteristic energy of the Catholic people of the empire, the work is already being carried into practical effect, and in every parish a vigorous impulse is noted in favor of the associations for general mission work in foreign lands.

What shall we of America do? It goes without saying that it is easier to do civilizing than Christianizing work, and unless the missionary idea and spirit take hold of our Catholic clergy and laity infinitely more than is the case to-day, the strong non-Catholic organizations in the field will so assure the propagation of their mission ideals as to win a paramount influence in the eastern hemisphere. That influence once obtaining, through the lure of the civilization these ideals stand for, the vast field of the Orient will be lost to Catholic effort. The fact that the English language has come to be the world vehicle of western civilization already assures to Protestant missionaries, seventy per cent. of whom, we are told, are of our race, a decided advantage over Catholic workers, the majority of whom have thus far been of French antecedents. The question is one that appeals to every child of the Church—What shall we of America do?

Poland's Last War for Freedom

The last week in January is dedicated by the Poles all over the world to the commemoration of their last struggle for independence against Russia. The incidents leading to the uprising, as well as the war itself, are interesting to the world at large as one of the issues involved was the liberation of serfs not only in Poland but in Russia also. Historians have generally accepted the freeing of serfs in Russia as Russia's voluntary act. when in fact a study of the events of that period will credit the Polish movement with that reform. After Russia was humiliated in the Crimean War in 1856, Czar Alexander made two promises in Paris which were not included in the formal treaty, but nevertheless made a part of it by a secret clause. He promised to grant Poland reforms and to abolish serfdom in his own domain. But as soon as the foreign troops left Russia, the Czar saw fit to regard the proposed reforms and the proposed abolition of serfdom as premature and injurious to the economic interests of Russia.

The first signs of unrest appeared in Poland in the beginning of 1861, five years after the treaty of Paris. The movement made itself manifest by gatherings of people in the churches, and the singing of patriotic hymns. From churches the people marched through the streets of cities and towns and continued their prayer for freedom. The Russian authorities recognized the signs. All Polish rebellions began in the same way. For two years Russia used the usual repressive measures, then in the beginning of 1863 conceived a bold plan to prevent the impending uprising. An order of conscription was issued, which was to have been enforced in one night, for over 50,000 Polish recruits. But the agents of the Polish national government, maintained secretly in Warsaw, learned of the order in time and even secured partial lists of the intended victims. The would-be conscripts fled to the woods, armed themselves as best they could; thus the actual struggle began. The Polish secret government, seeing that the movement could not be delayed longer, proclaimed a general rising January 22, 1863.

Now note what happens. At the first signs of the movement in Poland two years before, the Czar, in order to propitiate his serfs, granted them partial freedom, which, however, did not include the right of ownership of land. They were still bound in servitude to their landlords. The Polish national government, in its manifesto, declares:

"In this first day of our holy struggle for Poland's independence we declare all inhabitants, irrespective of creed or race, class or occupation, free citizens and equal before the law. The land which the peasants have tilled as serfs or otherwise becomes by this decree the absolute property of the tillers; the landowners will be compensated for their losses out of the treasury of the Republic."

Immediately after this declaration, the Russian government, in order to deprive the revolutionary movement of the sympathy and support of the peasantry, granted on its side liberty to the serfs, thereby practically ratifying that part of the Polish manifesto.

The price of liberty of the serfs in Russia, as well as Poland, was the Polish insurrection, the consequences of which were indeed terrible and, considering the meagre chances of success, pathetic in the extreme. The success of the movement depended almost entirely on the intervention of other Powers. And indeed Napoleon III contemplated such intervention, and even opened negotiations with the governments of England and Austria.

But here Prussia stepped in. Bismarck made an open alliance with Russia to maintain the status of the Poles. Then Austria hesitated; and against the alliance, France and England, too, did not seem to think it worth while to persevere. Over 200,000 Poles and Lithuanians engaged the Russian forces in a sort of guerilla warfare. In all there were over 600 battles and skirmishes. The losses on the Polish side are calculated at 50,000. The Russian statistics place their loss at 40,000.

The second and the most pathetic period of the struggle was directed by Dictator Romuald Traugutt who, with a cabinet of five members, constituted the Polish government. They held their meetings secretly in the zoological cabinet of the Warsaw University. They were discovered in April, 1864, and executed August 5 of the same year. The last skirmish was fought in March, 1865, in which a small detachment of patriots was commanded by a priest, Father Brzoska. That, like the solemn and final act in a religious rite, closed the rebellion.

ADAM GREGORIUS.

The Socialistic Kingdom of God

III.

(Conclusion.)

Economic justice, as was explained, is deemed necessary for the Kingdom of God as a bulwark against Mammon, its deadly and most dangerous enemy, and as a protection of its existence, unity and vitality. There are other reasons for its necessity of still greater importance. According to Economic Determinism moral righteousness is essentially based on the economic conditions of society. It rests on them and develops from them; it rises to ever higher degrees of perfection, when sustained by them, and on the contrary, it decays and withers away, when lacking their support. This view is held by revolutionary socialists of all descriptions, by the members of the fellowship as well as by those of the Socialist party, and it is believed to hold for the righteousness and moral elevation of the Kingdom of God no less than for the morality of any other society.

Rev. E. E. Carr expresses his mind on this point clearly and unmistakably. "The God of Moses," he says, "proved Himself the God of nature by recognizing the force of Economic Determinism in dealing with the Hebrews in Egypt. He might have sent them preachers to tell them to be good and they would be happy, but He did not. He might have advised them to bear their wretchedness on earth patiently and they would have rest and plenty in Heaven, but He did not. . . . No. God knew that before He could uplift a race of slaves spiritually, He must get them out of the slave's environments, make them free and give them a country of their own, where they might enjoy peace, plenty and leisure. Therefore He undertook first to deliver them from their economic woes—to save their bodies, their basic human lives—before He tried to work on their souls. . . . The same may be said of the New Testament. The Gospel record is full of stories of body-healing, and but few cases of soul-healing are mentioned. The people are sheep having no shepherd, said Jesus, therefore He spent His time 'going about doing good,' because he had compassion on the multitude, and he preached occasionally, as it seemed good." (Christian Socialist, June 1, 1909.)

We must hence conclude that the Kingdom of God itself is based on economic conditions. For if they are the basis of social righteousness and justice, and righteousness is the fundamental law of God's Kingdom, the latter must rest on an economic foundation. This is, as an undeniable tenet, expressed in one word by Rev. Paul H. Castle, when he repeats the saying of Ward: "Christianity lies on the bedrock of the labor movement" (Ibid. Nov. 15, 1907); and not less concisely by W. H. Watts, who says that we cannot have the Kingdom of God on earth until we right the economic wrongs at the base of our social system (Ibid., May 15, 1907), and by Professor Edwin Markham, who maintains that Christ began to base his Kingdom on the social and material needs (Ibid., Dec. 15, 1907).

Rev. Thomas P. Byrnes gives us a more detailed description of how the Kingdom of God rises on economic conditions and develops by the economic activity. He says: "We cannot build the Kingdom of God as a castle in the air. God's Kingdom must have foundations rooted and established in the very nature of things. It must rest on the earth, on the hills and on the rocks, it must grow naturally out of fields, forests and mines and must send its spires up from the native soil to the sky." (Ibid., June 1, 1909.)

Owing to economic righteousness as its fundamental law the Kingdom of God, which Christ founded as a labor movement, is essentially revolutionary. For economic righteousness, as understood by Christian Socialists, means the abolition of classes and of accumulation of wealth in the hand of a few; means the suppression of competition in production and commerce, as the cause of all social evils; means the overthrow of the power and authority of all those who support capitalism and possession of wealth; means in a word the overthrow of the entire industrial, commercial and political order which for centuries the world has established and is always bent on upholding. This entire order is the Kingdom of Mammon, which must be utterly destroyed, before the Kingdom of God can spread and triumph on earth. No doubt such a universal change in the relations of human society, brought about by struggle and combat, is a revolution, the most thorough and universal that ever took place.

According to Professor Rauschenbusch and other divines, it was this revolution that Christ had in view, when He said that He was not to bring peace, but the sword, and which His Blessed Mother foretold when she sang: "He has brought down the mighty from their seats and exalted them of low degree; He has filled the hungry with good things, and the rich He has sent away." Rev. E. Dean Martin boldly affirms: "The principle of revolution is Biblical. It is as the very heart of the Evangel. Messianism properly understood is Revolution." (Ibid., Feb. 1, 1909.) Rev E. E. Carr with equal boldness ventures to say: "True religion is necessarily a proletarian revolution, proceeding on the class struggle, until injustice and inequality are destroyed and the human race is fully redeemed from oppression, want, ignorance and sin." (Ibid., June 1, 1909.)

From its revolutionary character we understand why Christian Socialists distinguish two periods in the Kingdom of God. The one is its foundation, its time of combat, the other its consummation, its final triumph and golden age. The first period begins with its inauguration by Christ, when He said to the people: "Repent, the Kingdom of God is at hand," that is, as Weeks interprets these words, "Revolutionize your ideas, the era of co-operation is here." The second period will come with the universal dominion of righteousness. In the language of Scripture it will be the city of God; in that of the Socialists, "the moment when the forces, deep-seated in human nature, the sense of order and the love for cooperation, at last set free by the sweeping away of an outgrown system, will build up a new system by which the best that is in man will be evoked into its natural activity." (Weeks, 'Socialism of Jesus,' pp. 40,42.)

The Socialistic Kingdom, as analyzed and characterized in this and the two preceding articles, proves devoid of any supernatural element. As such we must regard it not only for the reason that it is temporal and earthly. Its very foundations are laid on the rock of economic conditions, and not on any institution beyond the material world. The morality that is to prevail in it rises exclusively from earthly soil, and consists merely in the exercise of faculties seated in human nature. There is in it no redemption from sin through the death of Christ, but only deliverance from temporal evils, poverty and economic oppression. Nor does it prepare man for a future immortal life in heaven; for its aim and object is happiness, plenty and enjoyment on earth. Nor are there in it belief in divine revelation, religious rites for the worship of God, divinely instituted sacraments, a ministry of priests, and hierarchical authority. Such things are not needed for the purpose for which it is said to exist.

"In this temple of humanity," says Rev. T. P. Byrnes, "industry will be a sacrament and labor a ministry," and we may add, class-struggle, revolution, collective ownership and production will be the proper means of salvation and redemption. In short, the Socialistic Kingdom of God is mere naturalism, and that of the lowest kind; for it is but disguised materialism, inasmuch as its often vaunted spirituality and loftiness are but the outcome of the material conditions of human society and in no way the gift of God. Therefore, notwithstanding all the protestations to the contrary, it turns out to be the radical abolition of Christianity as a supernatural and spiritual religion.

Mother Duchesne

The cause of Mother Duchesne having been recently introduced at Rome recalls the story of a life remarkable in its far-reaching influence, in its strange vicissitudes, in its suffering of mind and body, heart and soul; remarkable, above all, for a sanctity which was attained inch by inch against the odds of marked natural defects. The ardent piety of the child, Philippine Duchesne, existed side by side with faults which, without sharp and persevering struggle and great graces from God, are incurable. She had what, in her native town, was known as the "Duchesne character," strong, valiant, devoted, but uncompromising and sadly lacking in pliancy and amiability. There were years of striving for patience and sweetness under the wise direction of Mother Barat; years of purification, when she waited, yearned, hoped, prayed; of humiliation, apparent failure, broken health, helpless old age.

It was she who, just eighteen years after the foundation of the Society of the Sacred Heart, led a band of its religious to the lower Mississippi Valley, which, except for the flourishing towns of New Orleans and St. Louis and a few villages, was little more than a wilderness. Nevertheless, thanks to the untiring zeal of a handful of missionary priests and their bishops, Catholicity was spreading steadily in spite of stupendous obstacles. Mother Duchesne suffered privations that daunted the hearts of the most intrepid pioneers, suffered them bravely, joyfully; but the houses she founded prospered slowly or not at all. It was the work of others that succeeded. How often God deals thus with especially favored souls!

Her practice of poverty and mortification was heroic. She ate scraps of food from the children's table, drank only coffee diluted with a little milk and much water. She wore a habit rusty with age and mended until there was little of the original fabric left. In a climate, severe for those who are accustomed to it, and doubly so to one who had spent the first fifty years of her life in France, she never had fire in her cell; she rested on a thin mattress thrown on the floor with only one light covering. She slept very little. During the night she would mend the clothes of the children and the religious, or again, spend hours motionless before the Blessed Sacrament. Though superior, she helped in the kitchen, fed the chickens and cattle and cared for the sick with untiring devotion. In the midst of almost inconceivable poverty she managed to help the missionaries, generously giving them both food and supplies.

As a young girl Philippine Duchesne entered the convent of Sainte Marie-d'en-Haut where she had been educated. She had not received the black veil when the Revolution broke over France in all its diabolical fury. Her community shared the common fate. Philippine returned to her father's house to practise in the world the virtues of the cloister. Some years later when order was restored and religious were once more free to follow their vocation unmolested, she leased Sainte Marie and returned to it two or three companions. She resolved to gather together the scattered community. In time most of the nuns did return, but their superior was old and ill fitted to govern her disorganized band. The greater number had lost their fervor during years of contact with the world. Many went back to it; so that when, after prayerful deliberation, Mother Barat affiliated the convent with her infant society it had but few inmates and several of those had been received after the departure of the greater part of the old community.

In 1806 the saintly Dom Augustin de Lestrange, Abbot of La Trappe, spoke to the religious at Sainte Marie of the condition of the Church in America. He told them of vast regions sparsely peopled by savages who had never seen a priest, never even heard the name of the one true God; of the immigrants, Frenchmen and Irishmen, heirs to the Faith, who, surrounded by Protestants and unsupported by the grace of the Sacraments, forsook the Church either through carelessness or worldly ambition. From that hour the great desire of Mother Duchesne's strong heart was to devote her life to spreading the knowledge of God beyond the Atlantic.

Twelve years passed before her wish was gratified. She plead incessantly that she might be allowed to go but Mother Barat wisely and prudently urged that the Society was then too small, too weak to scatter its forces. Mother Duchesne's impetuous character and indomitable will could see no difficulties, and it was in a spirit of childlike obedience that she blindly submitted to the decision of her saintly superior. When, at last, the permission was granted, her joy knew no bounds. There is a note of triumph in her farewell letters to her relatives that sounds loud above the undertone of sadness at parting to meet no more.

After a voyage, long and trying even for those days when the small, over-crowded vessels were dependent on the caprice of the wind, Mother Duchesne and her companions landed in Louisiana. Then followed a series of wearisome delays before they reached St. Louis to learn, to their disappointment, that it would be impossible for them to settle there. They were obliged to go on to St. Charles, a poor village on the Missouri, some miles further north. At the end of some months' struggle against direst poverty the brave little band had to move to Florissant where they remained for many years teaching the children of a few wealthy St. Louis families and some wild little Indians.

In time other foundations were made in what was then the enormous territory of Louisiana, bought not long before, from France, one at Grand Coteau, one at St. Michael (both within the present State of Louisiana), another at St. Louis; the once forsaken school at St. Charles was reopened. During the first twenty-two years of Mother Duchesne's American apostolate the houses of which she was superior were always poorer than any of the others. It was, she thought, owing to her inefficiency that they failed to prosper. Repeatedly she begged to be relieved of her burdensome office and at last her wish was granted. She was sent to St. Louis as a simple religious.

The following year, at the age of seventy-three, the victim, not only of the infirmities that come with the years, but of enfeebled health brought on by unimaginable hardships, she crowned her heroic life by a deed worthy of an apostle of a Crucified Master. She went to a settlement of the Pottawatomie Indians and for a year, with the simplicity of a child, tried to master their extremely difficult language and to accustom her frail old body to life in a village of savages. Her heart was indeed valiant but her health gave way and soon she was able to help only by her prayers. She spent hours at a time in the poor little makeshift chapel until the savages, with their love of designating people by their leading characteristic, christened her "the woman who always prays." Under these circumstances her superiors felt obliged to send her back to St. Charles. Her recall was a great trial. To live with the Indians and to work for them had been her ambition. She had long been an ally of Father De Smet, whom she had known when he was a novice in the early days at Florissant, and had afterwards aided in many ways.

For ten years she suffered on at St. Charles in a small, bare room which opened into the chapel, and is still to be seen as it was when she sanctified it by her presence. It was not until 1852 when she was in her eighty-fourth year that her long tried soul was released. For months she had grown weaker and weaker. The end came peacefully and sweetly.

FLORENCE GILMORE.

Senhor Joaquim Nabuco

Senhor Joaquim Nabuco, Brazilian Ambassador to the United States, died suddenly at the embassy in Washington on January 17. He was born in Recife, Brazil, August 19, 1849, and was the son of Senhor Nabuco, a leader of the Liberal party during the reign of Dom Pedro II. His grandfather and great-grandfather also were Senators, so that he represented in the Brazilian Parliament, when he entered it in 1878, the fourth generation of his name. He took an active part in the movement for the abolition of slavery and after a visit to Portugal and England for the furtherance of this cause he went to Rome where his efforts were approved and supported by Leo XIII. Senhor Nabuco's attachment to this movement allied him to the imperial dynasty and when the republic was proclaimed in 1889 he held aloof from the old monarchical parties who accepted the new order of things. Later he became reconciled with the republic and from 1900 to 1905 was Envoy Extraordinary to England. During this period he was sent on a supplementary mission to Italy to advocate the rights of Brazil in the arbitration of her dispute with Great Britain concerning the boundaries of British Guiana, of which the King of Italy was the arbitrator. The importance of the part Senhor Nabuco had in the settlement of that question may be measured by the published documents which form a series of eighteen volumes. He was a member of the Hague permanent Court of Arbitration and was president of the third international conference which met in Rio Janeiro in 1906. A year earlier he became Ambassador in Washington, having been appointed in 1905 when Brazil created her first embassy to the United States. Senhor Nabuco was the author of a work in Portuguese: "Um Estadista do Imperio," or the life of his father, Senhor Nabuco, which is a constitutional history of the reign of Dom Pedro II. Another valuable contribution from his pen is his "Minha Formacao," a literary and political autobiography. Director Barrett of the Bureau of American Republics, says of him:

"Mr. Nabuco undoubtedly was one of the most profound scholars that has ever represented a Latin-American country in foreign lands. He had an exceptional knowledge of international law and affairs. He was the master of many different languages and he was a brilliant writer upon a great variety of subjects, ranging from law to poetry. His name will go down in history as one of the notable men of Pan-American progress and relationship, and always will be known as one of the foremost statesmen of Brazil and Latin-America. The cause of Pan-Americanism and the International Bureau of American Republics have lost a most distinguished and earnest advocate and a sincere friend in the death of Mr. Joaquim Nabuco."

The funeral services were held with all the impressiveness and solemnity befitting the rank and services of the distinguished ambassador at St. Matthew's Church, Washington, where solemn high Mass was sung in the presence of the Apostolic Delegate, the Most Rev. Diomedes Falconio. President Taft, the members of the Cabinet, nearly all the diplomats in Washington, members of the Supreme Court and a number of Senators and Representatives were also present. The Washington Post editorially pays him a graceful tribute for "his courtly kindness, his conciliating diplomacy, his grasp of affairs, his splendid literary ability, but most of all his warm and attractive personality. He was a strong man, yet gentle; firm in diplomacy, yet kind and generous; a man of letters, yet close to humanity. And in his passing the Capital, where he served for five years, suffers a deep personal loss."

The School Question in British Politics

LONDON, JANUARY 8, 1910.

Already the election campaign is in full progress. The original issue is being obscured by a number of subsidiary questions, and the vote will not be by any means a clear plebiscite on the action of the House of Lords. On both sides individual candidates and their supporters and even some of the leaders are indulging in more than the usual exaggerations and palpable misstatements of election times. The appeal to popular opinion is sadly marred by the intrusion of appeals to popular prejudice and ignorance.

Catholic candidates muster more strongly than in any previous contest. There is, of course, the solid phalanx of Catholic Home Rulers in Ireland, but in Great Britain a few Catholics appear among the Liberal candidates and in the more moderate wing of the Labor party, and a considerable number among the Conservative candidates. One may reasonably expect that there will be about ninety Catholic members in the new House of Commons, and however much they may differ on other issues they will vote as a solid body whenever and wherever the Education question comes up for discussion.

Conservative candidates are nearly all giving clear and satisfactory replies to the question proposed by the Bishops as to their action with reference to the rights of our Catholic schools. The Liberals are mostly avoiding a direct reply and contenting themselves with calling attention to Mr. Asquith's declaration that in any future legislation on the Education question liberal concessions will be made "to minorities in populous districts." Unfortunately the restriction of special treatment to "populous districts" would have the effect of penalizing and starving out of existence some four hundred Catholic schools. But even as to the other schools, those of large towns and cities, Mr. Asquith's declaration, read in its context, is not reassuring or satisfactory. For he says that the Government stands just where it did four years ago, that is, on the platform of the Birrell Bill, which even with its amendments Catholics would not accept, and which they successfully resisted, thanks to the action of the much abused House of Lords.

A large gathering of Catholic Trades Union delegates has passed a resolution declaring that Catholics will refuse to subscribe further to Trades Union funds unless secular education ceases to be an item in the political programme of the Trades Unions. In the north of England, in the textile industries and in the mining centres, Catholics muster their tens of thousands in the Trades Unions. It is well that they are taking combined action to make their influence felt.

There died yesterday at his house in North London the Rev. Michael Baxter, clergyman of the Church of England, popularly known as "Baxter the Prophet." At least ten times in the last forty years he confidently fixed the date of the general judgment and lived to see it pass by. He was a bold interpreter of Apocalyptic prophecy, and, as usual with such people, found his key to the problem of the world's end in discovering the number 666 in the names of various public characters written in Greek letters. Napoleon III, the unfortunate Prince Imperial, Prince Jerome Napoleon, General Boulanger and Prince Victor Bonaparte were successively identified as the "Beast, No. 666." When the lapse of time showed his dates were wrong, and the passing away of the men he had marked with the mystic number proved that he had blundered, he began again with a new series of interpretations. He had a considerable following, and the newspaper in which each week he published his views had an enormous circulation, and became a valuable property. Once this paper gave striking proof that the "Prophet's" view of the future was very limited. In order that it might reach the remotest subscribers on the Saturday morning, he printed it in the middle of the week. When the King's coronation was first arranged Mr. Baxter, with a journalist's intelligent anticipation of coming events, brought out his paper with a report of the ceremony and a picture of the King's state entry into the city after the event. Some thousands of copies were already on the way to subscribers when the coronation was suddenly postponed because the King was in the hands of the surgeons. But there was the faked record in print and picture showing things that should have happened but at the last moment had failed to occur. Mr. Baxter calmly went on with his paper, prophesying the exact date of the world's end, after showing he could not foresee the events of the next three days. And his subscribers took him at his own valuation and went on buying his ever varying Apocalyptic prophecies. There is a large market for this curious literature in Bible-loving Protestant England. One of the most virulent of the anti-Catholic weeklies is full of it every week end.

Christmas Among the Lepers

MOLOKAI, JANUARY 3, 1910.

Christmas time and New Year's, here at the Leper Settlement, have passed in a very pleasant manner. At the home our people have been for about two years in fine disposition, spiritually and otherwise. It seemed a wave of piety but is lasting extremely well, nearly all making frequent Communion and special devotions, very edifying, even the blind—those who can walk—going to the church several times each day.

Good order prevails over the settlement, and this whole happy season has been doubly so through the good will of the people—our lepers—and the generosity of our friends over the islands.

JOSEPH DUTTON.

The New King of the Belgians

LOUVAIN, DECEMBER 25, 1909.

Le Roi est mort. Vive le Roi! The first part of the famous phrase was accomplished; the second part was not to be until the old king was buried. To accentuate and help along the sorrow, more official than heartfelt, it must be confessed, of the nation, a heavy rain fell all day Wednesday. Four days before the body had been brought from Laeken and lay in state at the Royal Palace. Wednesday morning it was solemnly carried to the Cathedral of St. Gudule where Cardinal Mercier was to officiate. The great Gothic edifice was decorated in black, and formed a striking contrast to the brilliant uniforms of the many foreign princes who followed the king. After the absolution of the body, the funeral cortege made its way along the road lined with enormous crowds, to Laeken, where the body was placed beside the bodies of his dead wife and son and near those of his father and mother. It was all very solemn and very simple, yet much more gorgeous than what Leopold himself called for in his will. So passed from view the second king of the Belgians, not so bad a man as some would have him and probably not so good either as others make him out; but a great king, who did many good things, and many bad ones. According to Belgian tradition Prince Albert of to-day will not be King Albert until to-morrow.

Vive le Roi! On Thursday, December 23, the new king of the Belgians, Albert I, made his solemn entry into Brussels amid an indescribable burst of enthusiasm and formally took the oath of fidelity to the Constitutions before the united Parliament. As early as eight o'clock in the morning the streets, now gaily decorated in marked contrast to the mournful colors of yesterday, were thronged with the crowd. All the morning, trains from all parts of the country poured in their thousands and by ten o'clock the route of the triumphal procession was thronged eleven or twelve deep, tier upon tier, with an eager, well-affected crowd. The procession started from Laeken, a suburb, passed through Molenbeek and was at last received by the Burgomaster of the city at the gates. Queen Elizabeth came ten minutes before the king. There was first a regiment of Lancers, gay in their holiday trappings, at their stirrups long lances with a flowing pennon at the top; a court dignitary or two followed in a carriage and then a band playing "The Brabançonne," the national air. It is the queen. She is in a brilliant court equipage of gold and white drawn by six prancing horses; behind stand two giant lacqueys in long coats of mauve, and within are the Countess of Flanders, the King's mother, radiant and happy, the Queen, and the two little Princes, Leopold and Charles. The Queen is immensely popular with the Brussels people and the ovation she received was deafening; she graciously returned the salute, while the two little yellow-haired princes, eight and seven years old, took it all as a matter of course. A detachment of Lancers followed.

Just as the King entered the city, the heavy clouds until then threatening the happiness of the day, suddenly cleared away and the sun shone out brightly from a brilliant blue sky—a splendid omen surely. On the streets the King was awaited more and more impatiently. At last he came. First a regiment of cavalry, as before, then the marshal of the court; then an interval of thirty or forty feet. In this interval rode the King, alone. Tall, majestic, easily mastering his restless horse, he was very much moved, and frequently saluted the crowd, which by this time was frantic in its applause. The king is light haired with a light mustache and beard, with an intensely earnest expression and is retiring, almost timid, in appearance. The enthusiasm he called forth was wild for he is very popular, and justly so, and the moment of his passing was unforgettable, for one could not help feeling, however democratic and republican in conviction, that here was something concrete and human for Belgian patriotism. Their love of country is not a mere abstraction but incarnated in a living, lovable man. It marked a great and welcome revulsion of feeling, for of late years, King Leopold had somewhat lost the hold he once had on the people. Indeed it must have been a discouraging day for the Socialist leaders, for, as some one remarked, the only red flag seen flying was the red handkerchief brandished by a good Capuchin Brother to show his loyalty.

The scene in the House was just as imposing. When the Queen and her following entered, it was already packed to overflowing and brilliant with color. On one side the special royal representatives and princes, on the other the diplomatic corps—each in the picturesque uniform of his country—in the centre the Senators and Deputies; while the galleries were crowded with the élite of the land. As her majesty entered, the acclamations were so loud that she stood still a moment, while the little princes clung very close to her skirt. Then she advanced to her place. A few minutes later the Duke of Connaught, brother of Edward VII, entered, in his brilliant red uniform of General. Here a pretty incident occurred. Prince Leopold who was bravely ensconced in an enormous armchair, very gallantly offered it to the Duke, who, in his turn, took the little prince in his arms and making room set him down beside him in the same chair. The King's entrance was the sign for a delirious ovation which lasted for several minutes, all joining in, except the Socialists whose cries "vive le suffrage universel" were happily lost in the tumult to which they served only to add new volume. In a firm, manly voice the King took the oath, swearing to observe the constitutions and the laws of Belgium. He then read his speech, a vivid personal pronouncement that was cordially received by all parties alike. When he came to the passage on the Congo, he electrified the assembly by suddenly standing up and crying: "we have promised to accomplish a reform and" (with a forcible gesture) "no one has the right to question our word." It was all the more impressive as the King of England's brother was sitting within a few feet of him. The King's passage from the palace of the Nation to his own palace was even more triumphant, if possible, than before; while once he was within, the crowd stood outside cheering for half an hour until finally the King and Queen appeared on the balcony bringing with them the two princes.

The day was a successful one, successful beyond anyone's wildest dreams; the only blot on a glowing day of national pride and loyalty being the stupid, if consistent, attitude of the Socialists. This, however, has certainly been rather a blow to their cause than a triumph. The dynasty is more firmly seated than ever and, what is more, Belgium has a king who is in close touch with the people. Albert I is a man of great depth and earnestness of character, and a good Catholic. In connection with this last, here is an incident. Prince Leopold's tutor was once said to be a Freemason; at this, the king, then Prince Albert, asked him if he was, on his word of honor, which he gave that he was not. M. Val. Brefant, however, discovered that he was one, and made his discovery known to Albert. The next day the old tutor was gone, and a new one in his place. The King is a most versatile man; a great student of social questions, he is also an accomplished scientist, electricity being his specialty. He has done almost everything, worked stripped to the waist in a blast furnace, dug coal in the mines, driven a locomotive, hunted in Africa, climbed in Switzerland—only last year he crossed the wildest part of Africa. His mental qualities have often been depreciated, and fears expressed for the future of Belgium and the Congo. Friday's speech has opened people's eyes, and all feel that the years to come will be an era of prosperous expansion for Belgium, even more than was the last reign, if for no other reason than that Albert will work undividedly for his country, which, as he said, "he loves with all his heart." The politicians are already forecasting a new state of things. The old régime of absolutism, and minister-bullying is over, say they, and indeed the splendid speech of Friday seems to warrant the outlook for a closer understanding between Throne and Government, and a more harmonious and hence more fruitful working together for the good of the country. In the speech the hopes expressed for a greater moral and mental advancement in the country and the little stress laid on material progress is widely remarked, and commented on favorably by all and looked on as another sign of a change. What promises to be a great reign was opened the next morning with a solemn Te Deum at St. Gudule when the king in answer to the Cardinal's speech avowed his attachment to the episcopate and his firm confidence that God will help him to fulfil the promises he has made to the Nation.

Straws Show How the Wind Blows

ROME, JANUARY 10, 1910.

I entered a first-class carriage on the express from Naples to Rome, and had hardly taken my seat when two other men came in. They were young, one probably thirty-five, the other a few years younger. One had a red beard; some one of Barbarossa's troopers had probably left his mark on the family centuries ago. The other had the look of a Northern Italian. Both spoke without the Venetian or the Sicilian accent, and both were educated men. We three rode alone from Naples to Rome. When one of them saw the old foreign priest in a seat, he said: "Una bestia di Prete." "They are all beasts," replied the other. Both spoke aloud. What could I do against two? was my thought. And I remembered the words which Corneille put into the mouth of the Roman father. What could he do against three? "Qu'il mourût." The phrase is sublime; but I belonged neither to the Curiatii nor to the Horatii, and I was not ready to die yet by rashly fighting two ruffians in a railroad train. But I watched my chance. They did not suspect that I knew their language, hence their brutal speech. They spoke freely to each other and from their conversation I judged that they were employees of the government and staunch supporters of the King. One went out for a little while, came back, and was in the act of sitting on his friend's hat when I touched his arm and, in Italian, I warned him. He jumped as if a snake had stung him; and the red-beard blushed almost as red as his beard. Then we entered into conversation, during which they heard the praises of a republican form of government in a country with a written constitution which forbids the taking of private property without compensation, in a republic which respects liberty of conscience and in which Protestants, and even freemasons, respect the Catholic Church and often help the priests in their charities. They tried to defend what had happened in their own country; but they could not deny facts, and both had given an example of poltroonery and brutality. The old priest contrasted the genuine republic with their country and its indecent and religion-hating politicians, and ended by saying: "Your nation, and other nations of Europe united with you, are very small physically; and if you gentlemen will permit me to say it, you are like a lot of little roosters fighting in a barnyard; while the great bird on the other side of the Atlantic looks on with contempt and despises your false notions of liberty and of justice." We reached Rome, sound in limb and wind, but two men left the train like two beaten curs.

In Rome a bishop and an American priest were getting out of a tramway, when a well dressed Roman tried to force his way out by hustling the bishop, but the bishop's burly form brushed him aside. He then tried to force his way out before the priest, who was close on the bishop's heels. The man put his arm out to intercept the priest's exit. The priest had the right of way, so with both of his hands he pushed the rude fellow's arm aside. The three left the car, when the man said to the priest: "You are an ignorant fellow." The priest made a verbal retort, quick, scathing and Dantesque, and the poltroon said no more but sneaked away. Such are two glimpses of dark life in two days of Italy. But there is a bright side. Father Brandi, S.J., told me that the number of students in the Gregorian University had doubled since 1870. I stood on one of the corners near the Gesù and watched the students going to the University to class. The whole Catholic Church was represented from Great Britain to Russia, from America to Africa, Asia and Australia. I saw the Catholic Church in the students and the friars who entered the portals of the old University. The Church is not dead yet and she will bury her enemies as she has always done. Again, on a visit to St. Mary Major's, I saw the Catholicity of the Church. The German students dressed in red were there near an altar. I wanted some information about a picture over the altar and spoke to one of them. He was very courteous and I asked him what part of Germany he came from. "I am not from Germany," said he, "I am from St. Petersburg, Russia." Turning over to another altar I asked a cleric, with no distinctive college dress, where he came from, and he answered, from Poland. We shook hands, and the thought that I, who stood for America and for Ireland, should meet in a few minutes in a Roman church my brothers in the Faith, from such antagonistic countries as Russia and Poland, brought me to my knees and I thanked God that I was a member of the only Catholic Church.

Speaking of the German students, among whom I had met the stray Russian, I want to say that they give very great edification in Rome. By accident I went one morning into the church adjoining their college during the Christmas holidays and found one of them instructing a class of boys in catechism. I admired his patience, for the boys were very unruly and constantly looked around in the church, turning their backs to the speaker. He gave a model instruction, evidently carefully written out and committed to memory. The ideas were all logically connected, the style was simple but polished, and his illustrations apt and such as should keep the attention of fairly well behaved boys fixed on the subject. But the boys were unruly. I noticed the same characteristic in other churches of Rome, and in churches in France, where I saw priests giving boys instruction in catechism. An American catechist would have boxed their ears. How could the stalwart Teuton keep his temper with the lads? Ah! the Jesuits were next door and they were his trainers. I waited for the Mass which the German students were to sing, and was delighted with the music but especially with their edifying conduct. Not one of the forty or fifty students ever turned his eyes from his book except to look at the altar, although the people in the body of the church would have been a cause of distraction to any ordinary Christian.

When Mass was over I was told that Father Wernz, the General of the Jesuits, was living in the house adjoining the church and college, and I was determined to see him if I could. A lay brother mentioned to me the name of an American Jesuit, Father Mullan, who was there, and to him I sent my card and to him I owe the pleasure and the honor of seeing one of the busiest and most important men in the world, one of the best scholars in the Catholic Church and one of the greatest men in Rome. I found a gentle, courteous gentleman, subdued in manner, not very old; with kind eyes and a brow and head which reminded me of Dr. Herbermann, though the color of the hair is different and the doctor is more portly. Father Wernz is of the dark type of German whom you often meet in the Rhineland and in parts of Bavaria or in the Tyrol. Up to his room I went and forced him, after much effort, to let me kiss both his hands, the right one for St. Ignatius and the left one for St. Francis Xavier. Except my two visits to the Pope nothing gave me greater pleasure than the visit to Father Wernz.

I went one Sunday afternoon to St. Ignatius' Church to a distribution of prizes to the students of a Catholic school for young men conducted by laymen. It was most interesting. Several Cardinals were present, among them one who will always be dear to Americans, Cardinal Martinelli. At this distribution I heard an address delivered by a Catholic gentleman. I am sorry I did not keep his name. It was exceptionally clever and eloquent and was a defense of the whole ground covered by Catholic ethics. One passage I remembered: "How can any government," said he, "be unfriendly to a Church that teaches children to obey their parents, that teaches parents to sacrifice themselves for their children; that teaches citizens to be sober, honest and pure? Are not the rulers who hate and oppress such a Church the enemies of virtue and the enemies of the people whom they govern?"

There is hard work to be done in Rome by the clergy. The comparatively easy times of long ago have disappeared, and the parochial clergy outside the walls and inside the walls will have to imitate the zeal of the over-taxed Pope and his hard working Cardinals and Congregations. Pius X makes every one around him work hard; and no one works harder than himself. How he can stand it is a wonder. The audiences alone would tax the energy of any man; for the applications for audience from America take up many hours of the valuable time of Bishop Kennedy, the courteous rector of the American College.

There is no finer body of young men in Rome than the one hundred and forty-seven students in that College. It has the largest number of any Roman college; the best baseball players, and probably the best choir in the eternal city. They think their choir is the best and so do I; but we are prejudiced.

The old Romans were fond of the grandiose and fond of glory and fame. I fear the medieval and the modern Romans have inherited some of the failings of their pagan ancestors. If you read the inscriptions in the churches, you will see family pride conspicuous, and the desire to perpetuate family names. Did they get this love of fame from the inspiration of the Great Florentine's poem? The love of fame crops out in it, from "Hell" to "Paradise."

And the Irish, how do they do? Some of them visit St. Peter's in Montorio, and kiss the tombs of Princes O'Donnell and O'Neill therein buried. I saw an old Irish priest on his hands and knees kissing the slabs over the princes' graves in the floor of the church; and they all kiss the slab that covers the heart of Daniel O'Connell in the church adjoining the Irish College. The Florentine shows that he wrote his great poem partly from love of fame; but the great Irishman worked for God alone and not for fame. The following anecdote, told me by Monsignor O'Riordon, the Rector of the Irish College and a writer of ability, shows how little O'Connell thought of fame. The Secretary of the Liberator said to him one day: "Mr. O'Connell, what do you think of your future fame?" "What the devil good is fame to a man," replied Dan—he will always be "Dan" to the Irish peasant—"when a man is dead and judged?" O'Connell knew Thomas à Kempis as well as law, and no doubt was thinking of the words: "Ama nesciri et pro nihilo reputari." UMILITA.

A Newly Discovered Maya City

Count Maurice de Périgny, a well-known French archaeologist, on a scientific mission in behalf of the French Government, has favored AMERICA with the first reports of the discovery at Nakum, on the Rio Hondo, district of Peten, Guatemala, of an important old Maya city.

The ruins which include four temples and cover an area of about 400 yards square are considered by the French explorer some of the most important hitherto found on Guatemala soil. Judging from the magnitude of the pile, an innumerable multitude of men must have been employed in its construction. Some of the temples, of solid masonry, rise to the height of thirty-five meters and one of them though distinctly Maya presents peculiarities of form seldom encountered in Maya architecture.

Shall the new Maya city give us additional clues to the history of that ancient race? Judging from the manner the count is prosecuting his excavations we feel inclined to think so.

A Word for French Catholics

NEW YORK, JANUARY 22, 1910.

In these days when the religious conditions of France are a constant source of comment and criticism, and when so few real facts concerning them are generally known on this side of the water, it may be well to say a word from personal observation during a long residence in that unhappy country.

The assertion is made that Faith is dead in France. "That the French people have given up God," etc., etc. Nothing could be further from the facts. The Government has undoubtedly fallen into the power of miserable unbelievers and the bitterest enemies not only of the Church of God, but even of their native land.

But they are not representative Frenchmen, nor do they reach their stations of power by fair means, as we understand elections. In one case in a certain town four hundred dead men were counted as having voted! No further comment seems necessary as to their methods to reach control.

Now, as to there being no faith, the writer has found the innumerable Sunday Masses crowded to the doors and with a larger proportion of men than we see in most of our churches here. The week-day Masses, of which there are many more than with us, are well attended, many men as well as women receiving Holy Communion, and occasionally an officer going to the holy table in his uniform, though that may bring him degradation from the army.

In regard to what is done for the faith of children, we with all our boasted faith are put to shame. Hundreds of French parents are sending their boys and girls out of the country to colleges and convents in charge of the religious who have been exiled from their own land. It must be remembered that French people have felt till now that to separate themselves from their children was not to be thought of, and those not educated at home were sent to colleges or convents in their own city or at farthest within an hour's drive from home. These same people are now sending their children to Belgium, Italy, Spain and even to England since the suppression of the religious orders, rather than have them risk their faith with lay teachers.

The Jubilee of the Paulists

The Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle, popularly known as the Paulists, have been celebrating the Golden Jubilee of their foundation during the present week. In New York, the cradle of their existence and the principal field of their labors, the highest ecclesiastical dignitaries of the nation have gathered to grace the occasion with their presence and to wish the young society God-speed at the end of its first half-century.

During the comparatively brief span of life through which, as an organized body, they have passed, the Paulists have made a notable contribution of energy and achievement to Catholic missionary enterprise and to the apostolate of the Catholic press. We offer our congratulations on the success they have met with in God's work during their fifty years and, as for the future, we can only say from our hearts, ad multos annos, for the glory of God, the salvation of souls, and the strengthening of the Church!

Has Dr. Van Dyke Met the Issue?

Dr. Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton University, lectured last week before the University Extension Society on the subject "Self-Development and Education in America." Though usually sweet-tempered in his utterances, he indulged on this occasion in some caustic criticism of the men who brought the charges of late against American universities and colleges. If he cannot make stronger defense of his clients than that urged in the lecture his sharp criticism will help not a whit to induce us to hold these institutions guiltless. No one has attacked the American college because of its snobbishness, no one has particularly condemned it for lack of a democratic spirit among its students. The charges made are clear and definite, they turn on the unsound teaching common in these institutions. Un-Christian doctrines are affirmed to prevail and infidel tendencies and rationalism and principles destructive of the elementary concepts of good morals. And when they who make the charges quote admitted utterances of members of distinguished faculties in proof of their contentions, shall one find their logic faulty when they deduce the consequence that the influence of colleges, whose teachers openly advocate what is abhorrent to the Christian sense, must be bad? This it is that Dr. Van Dyke should have met in his defense and this he does not meet. It is quite a novel plea to insist, as does Dr. Van Dyke that it is "up to" the parents of this country to "instill into their children such positive qualities of good character and manliness that whether they enter a university or a counting-house they are superior to evil influence." Hitherto one has been taught that parents send their sons to college to be trained into qualities of good character, and if in the training it be the misfortune of young men to meet guides who deliberately shatter the foundations of Christian faith, it is strange, indeed, to have a Christian minister claim that "nowhere in the world will you find a finer, cleaner and nobler set of young men than are to be found in American colleges." Caustic criticism is a poor weapon unless back of the biting word there stand a truth that satisfies. And the accusers referred to by Dr. Van Dyke will not be satisfied until the heads of American institutions of learning affected take up their charges seriatim and prove that the accusations are unfounded. Can this be done?

Sense and Sensibility

The Milwaukee Living Church is shocked at two things; at the administration of the last Sacraments to the late King of the Belgians in presence of Baroness Vaughan; second, at the punishment of the Abbé Brémond for officiating at the burial of Father Tyrrell, while he who assisted Leopold II goes free from blame. The Living Church assumes the presence of the Baroness Vaughan to be a fact. We, who as yet have nothing more certain on the matter than the contradictory reports of the newspapers, cannot do so. We can, however, lay this down as morally certain: if she was present, she was so as the king's wife, at least in the judgment of him who administered the Sacraments. The Living Church calls her hysterically, "a woman who appears to have been married to the king while her canonical husband was still living—some say even without a divorce—by authority granted by Cardinal Merry del Val, if not by the Pope himself." We do not know the distinction in Christian marriage between a canonical husband and some other kind. A man is a woman's husband, or he is not. If he be, she can not marry anybody else: if he be not, then so far as any tie with him is concerned, she is free to marry even a king. The decision of the case belongs to the Church and not to any amateur Milwaukee canonist. "By authority granted by Cardinal Merry del Val, if not by the Pope himself," involves two errors. It implies that a special permission to contract an impossible marriage was given in this case, apparently because a king asked it. The craft of Rome is a byword with such as the Living Church, which, therefore, ought to have been certain that Rome would never have been so mad as to gratify an old man's whim, at the cost of offending the whole Belgian royal family including the prince who was to succeed him in a very short time. If Leopold II and the Baroness Vaughan received anything from Rome, it was what is granted to the humblest in the Church, a decree, resting on evidence, that whatever marriage the Baroness had attempted in the past was invalid and that she was a free woman. How false it is that only the great can get such decrees, a mere looking into the Acta Sanctæ Sedis will show. The other error is the implying of a distinction in jurisdiction between the Cardinal and the Pope. Whatever comes from Rome in the matter of jurisdiction comes from the Sovereign Pontiff, and the Secretary of State especially can be but a simple intermediary. "Some say, even without a divorce." Here the Living Church shows its ingrained Protestantism. A divorce would not have improved the status of the Baroness in the least, and consequently would not have influenced in any way a Roman decision. All this, however, is purely hypothetical. We do not know whether the case was carried to Rome or not. Moreover, there are more ways than one of submitting such a case to the Roman Curia.

Anyone not blinded by passion can see the difference between the case of the Abbé Brémond and that of him who gave the last Sacraments to the dying king. Father Tyrrell died obstinate under excommunication which cut him off from the Church, its ministrations and prayers. Leopold was not excommunicated. He had the right every dying sinner has to receive the Sacraments provided he fulfil the necessary conditions of giving signs of contrition and the will to amend. This Leopold II did, and no priest could turn away from him merely because he was a king and the tongues of heretics and infidels were wagging. Had the unhappy Tyrrell given the least such sign there is not a priest or a bishop who would not have hurried from the extremity of the kingdom to reconcile him to God, and none would have rejoiced over his return more sincerely than his former brethren, than the calumniated Bishop of Southwark and the Sovereign Pontiff.

The Baroness Vaughan is not a pleasant person and the feelings towards her of the Belgian princess are intelligible and justifiable. But if she was a wife, she had and has her rights, which can not be sacrificed to gratify princesses however great they be. The Living Church seems to be of a different opinion. But this is the way with Protestants who are always contradicting themselves. The Living Church rails at Rome for being, as it supposes, too complaisant toward the king and then turns round to show towards the princesses the complaisance it has just reproved. The sneers at Cardinal Gibbons and the prelates who celebrated the king's obsequies are unworthy of notice. These and the strange metaphor of the odor of sanctity its writer uses, show how he had lashed himself into the fury that takes away judgment.

Education in Japan

The present status of Japan appeals in a special manner to the Catholic missionary spirit. Her success in war, the adoption of a political constitution of a modern type, her alliances with great European powers, and her rapid development in civilization have given to the land of the Rising Sun a preeminence among the countries of the Far East. To the people of the yellow race Japan is an object of admiration; they are eager to imitate her progress and to discover the secret of her sudden elevation. Father Lebon writing in the Annals of the Propagation of the Faith on "The Future of Catholicity in Japan," attributes this extraordinary preeminence to the advancement of education in the Island Empire. Even to-day Japan not only receives students from the neighboring countries at her schools and universities, but furnishes Japanese professors to Corea, China, Indo-China and India, where they extend her influence while accelerating the progress of these nations towards the civilization of western lands.

In Japan itself primary schools have a larger attendance than in any other country of the world and recently, says Father Lebon, the government department of public education has decreed attendance at school compulsory for all children from the age of two years upward. Secondary and high schools and colleges are also numerous and well attended. The University of Tokio alone has three hundred professors and over six thousand students. This is a larger attendance than that of the University of Michigan, which in point of numbers leads the other universities in the United States. And yet Japan is still a pagan nation. Its inhabitants are close to fifty millions, among whom there is a leaven of sixty or perhaps sixty-five thousand Catholics. The Protestants number nearly as many as the Catholics, and they are reinforced by thirty thousand schismatics.

The old traditions that formed the basis of Japanese morals are beginning to crumble and there is need of a power and an authority that will give to this progressive nation something better than it surrenders. A collapsing Protestantism or rank infidelity and agnosticism are not conducive to the ennobling of a nation. The only power that will enable Japan to fulfil a worthy destiny is to be found in the teachings and the doctrines of the Catholic Church. Father Lebon tells us that Protestant sects are multiplying their missionary efforts among these people and "our zeal should certainly surpass their activity."

The Fathers of the Paris Society for Foreign Missions were the first in charge of the modern Japanese mission.

Later other religious orders and congregations were invited to share especially in the works of Christian education. For twenty-one years the Marianists have devoted themselves to the education of Japanese youth. Their college at Tokio has 800 students, and at present they are building an apostolic school in Urakami. Educational establishments are now conducted by the Trappists, the Dominican and Franciscan Fathers and the Fathers of the Divine Word. The Jesuits are opening an academy in Tokio where lectures on scientific and philosophical subjects will be given in English and in German. Sisters of various religious congregations have also opened schools and academies for girls in this promising country. The Apostolic workers in Japan, according to the "Kirchliches Handbuch" of Father Krose, S.J., now number 130 European and 33 native priests, 416 Catechists and 389 missionary sisters. These zealous workers minister to the sixty-five thousand Catholic Japanese, but they are striving for the spiritual conquest of fifty-million souls.

We thought the fable about one of the Popes excommunicating Halley's Comet was dead. The myth was riddled and turned inside out and cast into the waste-heap in a dozen periodicals during the last six months. And yet it persists in a process of what seems to be eternal recrudescence, merely to illustrate, we suppose, the difficulty of downing a lie. The "World Almanac" for 1910 repeats gravely and seriously the same old Protestant fiction. One would imagine the editors of the "World Almanac" would be acquainted with the literature of the last six months, at least. We hope the rest of the information contained in the almanac is of a more reliable character.

Very properly, the centenary of Gladstone's birth was celebrated enthusiastically in Greece, Bulgaria and Servia, which owe not a little to his support. The two Balkan States may consider their existence due to the zeal with which he defended their cause at the time of the last Russo-Turkish war and the Berlin Congress.

Latest press reports credit Secretary Knox's commercial policy in his administration of the Department of State with the award of the Argentine Government of contracts to an American firm for the building of two Dreadnoughts for approximately $22,000,000. The Argentine Government has also closed contracts with the Bethlehem Steel Company for $1,000,000 worth of ordnance for the use of the torpedo boats now building in Europe.

Yielding to the wishes of his wife, who is of Belgian blood, ex-President Zelaya has decided to give up the elegant house that he had taken in Mexico and establish his residence in Belgium.

LITERATURE

A SAINT AND A POET.

"Saint Ignatius," by Francis Thompson (New York: Benziger Brothers), is not professedly a study in ascetism, nor a work of historical research; yet it has probably more value than if it were either or both. It is not of common occurrence that the greatest living English poet possesses the temper, education and sympathy to turn to a great modern saint in a spirit of reverent appreciation for the purpose of interpreting his life to the world at large. The present biography is just such an interpretation. We have never before had anything like it in English. It is a treat peculiarly acceptable to Catholic readers, who can so seldom, in a hostile and wayward literature, abandon themselves to the charm derived from perfect speech without uneasy reserves and the protests of injured feelings.

Moreover, a poet enjoys the advantage of special equipment for his task as the biographer of a saint. For there exists, on the natural side, a close kinship between poets and saints. We have never read about a saint without thinking that he might have been a great poet, nor of a poet without discovering grounds for believing he might have been a great saint. Even in the villainess into which some of our poets have sunk we can see the corruption of one superiorly endowed and called to higher things, who pays in his debasement the penalty of wilful heedlessness of grace and noble inspiration. And no poet has been so consistently deaf to celestial whisperings as not at times to show us, in intervals of bitter self-knowledge, glimpses of that high estate from which he has fallen. He then discloses, at least in his ideal life, the same capacity for generous enthusiasms and the same serene detachment from petty aims which the saint translates into supernatural conduct and blessed realities.

On the other hand, if the saint had not rare potencies of human affection, if he felt not sharply the soft incitements of color and line in the springs and summers of the world, if he was not strangely stirred by the music of sounds and voices, if he were blind from birth to the beckonings of Glory and dull to the enticements of earthly attractiveness, his rejection of all these for something higher and more beautiful would not have that quality and degree of heroism which the Church must first recognize before she will place him, a Confessor, upon her altars. His very sainthood must involve and be the index of a mighty sacrifice. If he could not have been a poet, sensitive to the witcheries and gentle influences of nature and life, he would not in all probability have achieved his humble and all-unconscious heroism of sanctity.

It is not, then, altogether a subject for surprise that Francis Thompson, like his forerunner, Crashaw, has discovered attractive points of contact in the saints, enabling him to understand and pay reverential homage to their strenuous activities, ruthless denials, and fiery ardors in the service of an Infinite Lover. Not many are so fitted as a Catholic poet, by virtue of golden language, natural qualifications and the gift of Faith, to tell the world of what he has seen on the distant heights of the supernatural life. The intervening gulfs of renunciation are broad and deep, and the poet, like so many of us, may not have had the will or the grace for the hardy adventure; but it is given to him, as to few, to appreciate the fine and reckless valor of them that made light of shipwreck and suffering and sore privation in their eager longing for union in thought and word and action with their Creator and Redeemer.

These observations are not so much by way of introduction to what we have to say about Francis Thompson's Life of St. Ignatius as an embodiment of the general impression it produced on us. Those who have formed their idea of the poet from stray fragments of his checkered life and failed to catch the melody and message in the gorgeous turbulence of his verse will have to reconstruct their estimate of Thompson after reading his elaborate study of St. Ignatius. They will have abundant opportunity for discovering that he was no erratic genius, no neurotic emotionalist, no idle juggler of prismatic phrases, without any sense of the seriousness of life and eternity or of the spirit and substance of truth. He has verified his own contention—the subject of an essay by Charles Lamb—that mental sanity and balance, hard common sense, is the eminent quality which distinguishes true genius from whole or partial imitations. He has not fingered the pretty fringes of sanctity; he chose a saint who held in slight regard the mere accidents of holiness, and in his picture has avoided impressionistic vagueness and laid due emphasis upon all the most telling features of his saintly subject.

It is frequently a practice in biography to shirk difficult explanations by saying "Other times, other manners." Thompson's poetic intuition and insight serve him best in just such critical exigencies. He knew his contemporary world, and his Faith privileged him with understanding of spiritual excellence: the dual knowledge taught him the cunning skill to coordinate, without any diminution, the fearless and uncompromising religious vigor of his hero with the dim lights of a faith-cold audience. Thus he utters the rebuke: "An age which drinks with epicurean emotion the tears of perished lovers, preserved in the lachrymals of dainty editions, is intolerant and disgusted only when the beloved is—God."

In a brief review one cannot yield to the strong temptation to quote which such a biography invites. At most it is possible merely to refer to some points of exceptional brilliancy and interest. The long struggles and gropings before St. Ignatius realized his Order as we see it to-day; the significance of the name, "Company of Jesus;" the recognition of a strong and legitimate individualism coexistent with the "military precision" of Jesuit obedience; the relations between St. Ignatius and the youthful Ribadeneira; the Saint's admixture of severity with gentleness, of minute painstaking with an all-embracing and far-reaching vision; his tender care over the weak and the sick, and, in the end, his own pathetically unheeded sickness and dying, all these topics are occasions, not so much for fine writing on the part of the biographer, as for level and illuminating narrative copious with inspiration. Through it all there shows the glow of gentle humor, as when St. Ignatius refuses to make some mild concession to comfort at the urgent entreaty of his brother's wife. The biographer exclaims: "It is a hard matter to be sister-in-law to a Saint!" Again, in describing the intimacy between St. Philip Neri and the Jesuits, "It was said in Rome that there was not a button left on the Jesuit cassocks—they had all been pulled off in colloquy with Philip Neri; whence it would seem that St. Philip had one point of resemblance to so very different a man as S. T. Coleridge. One remembers Lamb's tale of the poet left, with closed eyes, haranguing to the cut-off button."

The single fault that we think we have discovered in our poet-biographer's story—we are not quite sure in the matter—is the stress of blame which his keen sympathy as biographer leads him to lay on Spain for her early antagonism to St. Ignatius. This opposition is ascribed to an over-rigid formalism which was the germ of national failure in more recent history. We are suspicious of this view. We think of John Howard, the English prison-reformer, struggling, two centuries later, against official inertia and active discouragement, for the most elementary reforms such as existed in many places on the Continent. The much-needed reforms introduced into English political and social life in the first half of the nineteenth century were simply dragged by main force from an unwilling government. The way of a reformer is necessarily hard. And this is as it should be. We are inclined to suspect the stability of a state where every new cry is hailed at once as that of a prophet. The prophet's cry must first fall on the empty spaces of the wilderness. His sojourn in the desert is a test of his sincerity and of the need of what he urges. The damaging volatility of France in politics and of America in education is a grave defect which can be traced, in large measure, to a mad eagerness to sit at the feet of reforming lecturers, incense-loving college presidents and volatile monomaniacs.

But, of course, conservatism has its proper limits. Whether Spain transgressed these or not in building barriers against her Saint is a difficult question to decide. Perhaps the poet is right, and with wonted perspicacity has been able to determine where healthy conservatism ends and dead formalism begins. At any rate, his book on Saint Ignatius may well win respect for his intellect even in quarters where his sympathies are not shared. Which of us could have conjectured the affectionate attachment of a dreamer like Francis Thompson to a soldier-saint, who cut so close in the matter of human affections and weaknesses, who, as organizer and ruler, was obliged to turn to the eyes of the world a cold impassiveness and a captain's imperative severity? The admiration and love of the poet for such a saint expose profundities of spiritual power and hint at secret longings which open up new chambers of tragic pathos in his weary life. Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, his literary executor, to whom we owe this book, tells us that the poet's love for the Saint and his Companions "moved him to ask spiritual alms from the London sons of the Saint during the last stages of his arid journey through life." The biography which the poet left behind him should make such alms-giving, were there need of it, a duty for all English-speaking sons of St. Ignatius.

Catholics and the American Revolution. Vol. II. By MARTIN I. J. GRIFFIN. Philadelphia: Published by the author.

The rule that one must fish or cut bait does not hold for the readers of this truly precious volume, for we may enjoy at our ease what has cost the indefatigable author much labor, patience and time. The deluge of so-called historical romances, with their modicum of history and their abundance of fancy was welcomed as a refreshing shower, while history itself was left languishing in unmerited oblivion.

Though of some of the idols of our earlier days nothing may remain but shattered fragments, the historian's office is to portray the real, not to garb the imaginary in the guise of established fact. We Catholics have suffered so sorely from wilful or ignorant perversion of truth that we owe a special debt to one who has brought forth from obscurity the facts with which the book is simply crammed.

First, Commodore John Barry's proud title of Father of the American Navy is vindicated, and we are treated to a detailed account of the Wexford boy who rose by sheer pluck to a post of great honor and responsibility.

Then we are told more fully than before the folly of the patriots in denouncing George III for favoring Popery and then trying to win the Catholic Canadians to the cause of independence. The wonder is that the turn of events was not more unfortunate. Whatever may have been the motive of the prime movers, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, who was at the time laboring under religious disabilities in once tolerant Maryland, foresaw in the triumph of the colonies a speedy release for Catholics from the hardships to which they were subjected or exposed in all the colonies but Pennsylvania.

The important part taken by the Catholic Indians in the Revolutionary War receives due recognition. They sided with the colonists from love of liberty and with no knowledge, it would seem, of the fierce denunciations of their faith which had preceded and accompanied the colonists' stand against Great Britain.

Brief sketches of some twenty Catholic officers of the Revolutionary War will have all the merit of novelty to the average reader, who at most knows the names of a few titled leaders whose social position kept them in the light.

The action of the French hierarchy in donating six million dollars to the American cause must have been a bitter pill for some of the anti-Catholic howlers of the day. Although John Adams thought a change in the solar system as likely as a change in New England Congregationalism, our personal opinion is that there were comparatively few fanatics in the colonies, but they made up in noise what they lacked in numbers. The patriots, therefore, used such raguments as they thought would induce their hearers or readers to cast their lot with the revolutionary party. Hence, "No Popery" or "Canadian Brotherhood," but both for independence. During the campaign of 1908, we believe that the Catholic clergy received literature sent out in the same spirit; possibly the Protestant clergy were favored in a similar way, but with a different excerpt. This is Mr. Griffin's second volume; the third will soon appear. As the edition of the first volume has been exhausted and that of the second has grown very scarce, those that are interested in the historically accurate presentation of Catholic activity during the Revolutionary period should bespeak the third volume before the demand for it causes a rise in its price.

Dramatists of To-day. By EDWARD EVERETT HALE, JR. New York: Henry Holt & Company.

Mr. Hale gives us a pleasant surprise. After studying such thoroughly modern playwrights so widely different in their methods and stage-craft as Rostand, Süderman, Hauptmann, Stephen Phillips, Pinero, Shaw and Maeterlinck, he is conservative enough to adopt the Aristotelian idea of tragedy. Tragedy, he says, practically quoting the old Greek, should be a purifying, strengthening, ennobling influence on our moral nature. Many of the plays reviewed by our critics do not measure up to this high standard.

Mr. Hale knows the stage well and speaks of the seven representatives he has chosen with intelligence and discernment. On Rostand especially he has passed an accurate and impartial verdict. We do not indorse all Mr. Hale's judgments. How can he maintain, v. g., that real morality appears beautiful in the "Monna Vanna" of Maeterlinck? But his sympathies seem to be in the right direction. We miss, however—and it is a serious lacuna—a clear, full-toned note of indignation at many of the themes and scenes of the drama of to-day. Our author evidently does not like to preach; he might have stated a few plain truths. Israel Zangwill, who surely ought to know, is not afraid to write that the two protagonists of the modern stage are "Drivel and Devil." Much that is seen and heard on the boards is untrue to life, extravagant, morbid, decadent. Südermann, v. g., in "The Love of Life," as Mr. Hale is forced to admit, champions the rights of "Personality," and that means unbridled selfishness. The German dramatist tells you: "Evolve your own personality, be yourself, suit yourself, even if order, social conventions, law and morality have to be trampled under foot." Bernard Shaw, with his "Candidas" and his "Posnets," seems to have but one aim, to advertise himself at all costs. He must be supremely happy; the Warwick of English letters, the great G. K. Chesterton has written a book about him. Maeterlinck's drama, with its "nebulous tenuosity," its pseudo-mysticism and symbolism, its puerile dialogue, is false to life, false to true dramatic standards. Neither life nor the stage is "static," as Maeterlinck would have it; action and movement are essential. Too often Maeterlinck, like his own Ariane, morbidly curious to solve the dark riddle of a world from which he has ostracized God and Providence, thrusts open forbidden doors to find only unclean, grinning skeletons. How true of many dramatists to-day, what Amiel said of the poets of his time: They carve beautiful "urns of agate and onyx, but inside the urn, what is there? Ashes."

Die Freiheit der Wissenschaft, Ein gang durch das moderne geistesleben. By DR. JOSEF DONAT, S.J., Professor an der Universität Innsbruck. Pp. XII-494—Innsbruck; Felician Rauch, 1910. (Kronen 4.80—$1.00.)

It is extremely difficult for an American, and I presume it is just as hard for an Englishman, to realize the bitterness of the intellectual battle that is continually being waged in Germany, Austria-Hungary and in most other countries on the Continent, between the two "Weltanschauungen"—between the Christian and the anti-Christian ideal of the universe and of the laws that govern it. Sometimes the fight waxes very fierce, as it did, for instance, in Austria in the spring and summer of 1908 when, on the occasion of the notorious Professor Wahrmund's blasphemous attack on the Church, the legitimate defense of Catholic truth was proclaimed far and wide to be an attack upon the inviolable right of science to think as it pleased. At this time as on so many similar occasions, the cry of "Freiheit der Wissenschaft"—freedom from every trammel to research and freedom of thought—was used as a battle-cry to rally the forces of infidelity and materialism against those of traditional Christianity. The author of the volume before us offered at this juncture a course of lectures at Innsbruck University, which was then the focus of the disturbance, but was obliged to abandon it because of the state of anarchy prevailing in the universities of Austria during the months in question. These lectures he has now expanded into a book bearing the same title as the proposed lecture-course, and after perusing it, one is inclined to feel grateful that the lecture course came to such an untimely end, since the adjournment has had as its result the excellent work under review. As the author shows, true research, true science, using the word inasmuch as it comprehends all knowledge, not in the restricted sense it so commonly bears in English, must be untrammelled, it must be free to draw its legitimate conclusions, to construct hypotheses and propound theories. This no sensible man can deny. But it cannot and must not free itself from the laws to which it owes its very existence—the laws of thought. Liberty is not license. A theory is not to be taken for a fact, nor is the coincidence that an hypothesis explains some or even all the facts in a given case, a proof that it is the true explanation. All this would seem to be common place to the veriest tyro in philosophy. But it represents accurately the mental attitude of the coryphæi of the rationalistic "Weltanschauung." Science to them must be free from every bond, even from the supernatural, from God, authority, dogma, above all free from the "incubus of a worn-out creed," which means in most cases Catholicism. It is even asserted that one who professes the latter cannot be a scholar; indeed that no great scientist was ever a sincere Christian. And it is folly, of course, to call theology a science.

To answer these and similar groundless assertions Father Donat has written this very valuable book. We shall be very much mistaken if it does not take a high place in apologetical literature. With subtle analysis and a wealth of fact, he examines the principles that underlie the anti-Christian "world-ideal" and the arguments which the upholders of that ideal have used so effectively with the unthinking, and over against them he places the principles and arguments of the Christian "world-ideal," which he shows is the only true ideal, because it is the ideal of reason. As a result he has produced a veritable encyclopedia of apologetical principles, armed with which one need not fear the onslaughts of positivism, subjectivism, materialism and other errors. We hope it will speedily be translated into English. Recent disclosures regarding the character of the teaching of many of our universities, show that the anti-Christian "world-ideal" rules as dominantly in the United States, as ever it did in the most rationalistic school in Germany. To counteract these errors a translation of Father Donat's work would be of inestimable value.

Bosnia and Herzegovina. By MAUDE M. HOLBACH. New York: John Lane Co. is a book of travel. Telling of people as well as places, it fills in what is apposite and illustrative in their history, and interests at the same time that it imparts information. It has the additional advantage that its subject has recently occupied the attention of the world. Racially the people are Slavs, but in religion they are about equally divided into Greek Orthodox, Moslem and Catholic. According to this writer they prospered under the rule of Austria, which has built roads, and factories and established and stimulated industries. Taxation is the same as in Austria, and is much lighter than it had been under Turkish rule. At first it was resented by the Moslems, who had been exempted by Turkey, the Christians having to pay taxes for both. Now, however, in spite of reports to the contrary, the writer affirms all sections are attached to Austrian rule. Perhaps other observers would not be so sure of this; at least our own correspondents take sides. The book deals chiefly with picturesque places and persons, curious manners and customs and illuminative stories and incidents, and all in a chatty style that carries the reader pleasantly along. The numerous illustrations of quaint and striking figures are a story in themselves, and the tasteful binding gives a fit setting to a very readable and instructive narrative.

The Boys of St. Batt's. A Day-School Story. By R. P. GARROLD, S.J. London: Macdonald & Evans, 1909. (2s. 6d.)

This story for boys is one of the latest issues of the publishers of the admirable St. Nicholas Series, and is by the author of a previous issue, a set of three stories of saints, entitled: "The Man's Hands." Father Garrold knows boys thoroughly; what's more, he knows how to tell a story with a charm of language that is quite above the ordinary. The result in "The Boys of St. Batt's" is a book which we would be willing to wager few boys will fall asleep over; indeed, we fear that not a few will be tempted to stay up late nights in order to finish it. The plot centres about a prize rabbit, which dies an untimely death from eating too much of an old copying-pad. How the copying-pad came to be administered and the complications to which the death of the pet rabbit gave occasion, we must let each discover for himself. For the American boy the story will have an additional novelty, in that it will introduce him to English school-boy life, which Father Garrold presents very attractively. We are glad to hear that the story will probably be published in the United States. We hope it will have a wide sale. May the author give us more like it, a thing he will be much more likely to do if his present effort has the circulation it deserves.

Reviews and Magazines

In The Month Father Thurston, assuming that no other Catholic writer has treated Christian Science and Mrs. Eddy fairly, undertakes to give the system and its author a fair hearing. Possibly he never read the Messenger, in which were published two sufficiently exhaustive articles. Of these, one by Father T. J. Campbell, "The Delusion of Christian Science," appeared in 1901, and was afterwards published in the Catholic Mind collection of pamphlets. According to one of the chiefs of the sect, it was the deadliest blow ever given to the new teaching. Father Thurston acknowledges he has not read "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures" from cover to cover, but he gives us to understand that he has studied the greater part of it very carefully, examining and weighing the statements contained very seriously to see whether they have any sense. We have a better opinion of Father Thurston's intelligence than to suppose that he would waste time in trying to read some sense into what manifests itself to his first glance as nonsense. Anyhow, "Science and Health," etc., was too much for him. In discussing it he comes at times very near the flippancy which grieved him in the few articles on the subject he has read, and soon casts it aside to examine the rather irrelevant and very uninteresting question of the extent of Mrs. Eddy's indebtedness to P. P. Quimby for her ideas. C. S. C. gives an interesting account of Social Progress in England during the past year. An appreciative article on Longfellow is followed by a readable, if at times fanciful, discussion of surnames ecclesiastical in their origin. Father Pollen treats "Blessed Edmund Campion's Challenge" and Thomas Pounce's connection with it. "A Half Hour in the Grafton Galleries" and a strange story of faery, "The Tune He Could Never Find," with the usual Flotsam and Jetsam complete the number.

The Irish Ecclesiastical Record does not confine itself to subjects exclusively or mainly ecclesiastical. Dr. McCaffrey, author of the recent "History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century," opens with a masterly review of the world events of 1909 from the Catholic standpoint. Among other things he reminds "those who are contemplating a collecting tour among the Catholics of the United States" that our church debt in official figures is $49,488,055. Dr. Coffey continues his learned study of "The New Knowledge and Its Limitations," while his previous examination of the qualities, energies and specific differences of matter are subjected to critical analysis by Rev. W. McDonald, D.D. An able review of Dr. O'Sullivan's examination of the Kantian and Hegelian systems in "Old Criticism and New Pragmatism" (first published by the Kant-Studien of Berlin) gives further proof of the ardor with which philosophical science is now cultivated at Maynooth. Dr. Hogan, the editor, throws further light on the British Parliament's treatment of Maynooth. O'Connell's defence, staunchly and outspokenly Catholic, shows that the great tribune was an excellent controversialist, well informed on the history and vagaries of Episcopalianism and Presbyterianism. In a noble speech, which this article rescues from oblivion, the Hon. G. A. Smythe says of the Irish priest: "It is because he is of the commons that he leads the commons; he is the representative not of thousands a year but of millions of souls." Mr. Gladstone does not figure well in his treatment of Maynooth, though he made some amends in 1869.

The Irish Theological Quarterly, also edited in Maynooth, is of a more technical character, but "Truth and Toleration" and "The Teaching of the New Testament on Divorce" might be read by laymen with interest and profit. In "A Thirteenth Century Review of the Bible," showing "that the Dark Ages are ages that are dark to us," Father Jarrett narrates how Hugh of St. Cher, Provincial of the Dominicans and afterwards Cardinal, organized a commission of Dominican Friars at Paris, between 1230 and 1240 for the revision of the University version, known as the "Paris Exemplar." His aim was to produce a correct version from the original Greek and Hebrew rather than to revise the Vulgate of St. Jerome, though he used, he declares, the glosses of St. Jerome and the other doctors, the Hebrew writings and the oldest texts from even before the time of Charlemagne. Meanwhile he and his collaborators were vigorously attacked by Roger Bacon, and the Friars Minor undertook a revision of their own on more practical lines, taking St. Jerome as a basis and using original MSS. to correct the glosses, interpretations and other defects of the text. Both partially failed, but their failure was a noble one; it is only after seven centuries that the undertaking is renewed on such comprehensive lines. Father Jarrett, though a Dominican, approves of the Franciscan plan, but appositely remarks that the Church has shown a wisdom more than human in never officially sanctioning the critical endeavors of her scientific sons to establish the primitive texts. The book reviews are thorough.

The New Ireland Review deals chiefly with social, scientific and literary matters. "Two Great Irish Chemists," Bryan and William Higgins, are shown to have anticipated in the eighteenth century the science of the nineteenth. Leibnitz's plan for Napoleon's conquest of Egypt, and in consequence for the hegemony of the world, is offered by Professor Meldrum for the consideration of the German Emperor, with a variety of ingenious arguments. Philip Hanson has a thoughtful paper on the causes of unemployment, showing that they are rooted more in an uneven distribution of prosperous and slack seasons and of demand and supply, than in the idleness or perversity of the workers. He considers an even distribution by government action the only effective remedy. There is an essay on an Irish Christmas, a good story, a poem from the Gaelic, and an excellent set of book reviews.

The latest number of the Dublin Review contains two "ecclesiastical ballads," by Francis Thompson, with the titles, "The Veteran of Heaven" and "Lilium Regis." The metrical movement of both poems is not characteristic; but the sentiment, imagery and diction are. The "Royal Lily" of the second poem is the Church, to whom in her present sorrows he sings:

"O Lily of the King! low lies the silver wing,
And long has been the hour of thy unqueening;
And thy scent of Paradise on the night-wind spills its sighs
Nor any take the secrets of its meaning."

But the poet sees triumph for the Church in the future, and the last stanza has an intimate personal touch in its cry of hope:

"O, Lily of the King! I shall not see, that sing,
I shall not see the hour of thy queening!
But my song shall see, and wake like a flower that dawn-winds shake,
And sigh with joy the odors of its meaning.
O, Lily of the King, remember then the thing
That this dead mouth sang; and thy daughters,
As they dance before His way, sing there on the Day
What I sang when the Night was on the waters!"

The editor of the Dublin Review tells us that the poet planned a series of "Ecclesiastical Ballads," but completed only these two. He promises, moreover, that each number of the Review for 1910 will have a hitherto unpublished poem by Francis Thompson.

The other articles in the present number are of more than ordinary interest. Mrs. Meynell gives distinguished expression to the mood which sees naught but wonderful excellence in Tennyson. American readers, who have been bemused by the contradictory reports in our papers and periodicals about Ferrer, will welcome the article by Hilaire Belloc, M.P. The evidence on which the Spanish anarchist was condemned is given, and it proves to be most damning. Mr. Belloc asks why this evidence was suppressed in the news agencies and answers the question by pointing to "The International" and the grasp of Masonry on all the channels of public information. Other interesting articles are "The Ethics of Strong Language," in which the editor very adroitly presents a political pamphlet under the thin disguise of a psychological study; "Challoner," by Canon William Barry; "The Martyrs of Cambrai," by Comtesse de Courson; and "The French Bishops and the Education Problem," by the Marquis de Chambrun.

The Irish Monthly as usual is a class by itself. Stories, reminiscences, literary talks and a life of Bl. Eudes by the editor are flanked on either side by nine poems, which in quality as well as number are suggestive of the muses. One of the best, "To an Irish Mother," is by an American, Michael Earls, S.J. Father Russell, discussing the question, "Are Catholic Writers Handicapped?" thinks they are, to some extent, for "the world loves its own," but "the Catholic writer and the Catholic everything else are handicapped chiefly by themselves—by their sloth, want of earnest purpose and neglect of duty." To show that Catholic publishers are also handicapped he quotes from J. S. B., in Bishop England's Miscellany, 1835: "If those who are able will pay up their bills, some of which have been standing for years, and if others will return four-fifths of the books belonging to us now in their possession, our purse will be heavier by a number of hundreds, our library will be augmented by two hundred volumes, our debts will be paid," etc. And he adds: "Literature, and especially religious literature, does not come, it seems, under the rules of common honesty."

Robert Underwood Johnson has succeeded Richard Watson Gilder as editor of the Century.

Literary Notes

The posthumous "Saint Ignatius," by Francis Thompson, contains the following dedication: "To dear Mother Austin, nun of the Visitation and sister of Francis Thompson, his literary executor dedicates this volume with no less than a brother's love."

The late Professor Whitley Stokes left to his daughters the finest private library in existence of works dealing with Celtic literature. The library has been presented to London University. Among the many books in the collection out of print and hard to obtain are the publications of the Ossianic Society, of the Irish Archeological Society and the "Annals of the Four Masters," published in Dublin in 1848. An interesting book in the library is the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae" (Louvain, 1645).

The interesting "Et Caetera" chronicler of the London Tablet had occasion recently to refer to Robert Louis Stevenson's eloquent passage ending with these words: "So vulgar a thing may our Anglo-Saxon Protestantism appear side by side with the doings of the Society of Jesus." The writer in the Tablet refers the passage to "Across the Plains." We recommend the passage to our readers, if they have not yet read it; but they will not find it in the title-sketch of the volume mentioned by our contemporary. It occurs in the second paper, entitled, "The Old Pacific Capital."

G. Bell and Sons, London, published in the second week of January a volume on Thackeray by G. K. Chesterton. The work takes its place in a series entitled "Masters of Literature," the plan of which, in each volume, is to make a selection of the best passages in an author's works, connecting the various excerpts with original comment, and to add thereto a biographical and critical introduction.

ART

The Winter Exhibition at the National Academy is unusually good this year. There also seems to be a great variety of subjects, though the religious and the historical are conspicuously absent. The landscapes, perhaps, taking them all in all, are the winning class, but one hesitates to say this when such paintings as Ben-Ali Haggin's "Little White Dancer" and Sergeant Kendall's "Psyche" come to mind. The rendering of the flesh in the latter is wonderful, and so is the drawing of the arm and foreshortened hand upon which the thinker leans. We would like to call attention to John Alexander's "Sunlight," Whittmore's "Youth in Cavalier Costume" is convincing as a likeness and painted with a good deal of dash and bravura. In the way of likenesses one of the best is Montague Flagg's "Portrait of My Wife." The whole strength of the subject is in the countenance, as an expression of character, and the brush-work holds this in prominence. Robert Henri has a clever full-length portrait of a lady in which a black dress, hat and muff are treated with skill in that difficult color. Sad to say, the cheeks and lips are so bright they detract a little from the value of the painting. As a curiosity, Boldini's full-length of Mrs. Clarence Mackay might pass, but he scarcely does her justice and the drawing is eccentric and convulsive.

Sargent seemed a trifle below himself. One cannot call his canvases anything but admirable, yet both the "Gitana" and the "Miss Carter" want something. Miss Lydia Emmet's portraits are always agreeable, but perhaps it would be hard to produce every year such canvases as she exhibited in 1909. "Nora Iselin" and the children, this season, are less interesting than usual. Robert Sewell's "Psyche seeking Love beyond the River of the Dead" has excited curiosity. We do not have many classical themes; the few are welcome. One might object to the cold and monotonous color, but this may be a part of the artist's scheme. Classical only in name is Childe Hassam's "Aphrodite," a rather heavy figure on a seashore. Charles Bittinger repeats last year's problem of double illumination, in his "At Twilight;" his pictures are always personal and uncommon.

Frieseke is a little disappointing, for he is one of our prominent younger men in Paris, and the "Woman Trying on a Hat" is merely a study, a delicate and pleasant one certainly, but still a study, in the harmonizing of fine shades of pale blues and pale pinks. Curran's "On the Heights," three blonde maidens on a boulder, with clear sky behind them and sunshine on white garments, excels in all Curran's qualities of freshness, brilliancy and aerial effect. One may not overlook, among the figure pieces, Ballard Williams' "Chant d'Amour" with its group of interesting figures that recall certain Venetian colorings of the Seicentisti, or Kenyon Cox's over-mantel for the Custom House at Cleveland, more reminiscent of the Roman frescati—"Passing Commerce pays tribute to the port of Cleveland"—a Mercury figure, winged cap, wand and sandals, showers gold into the lap of a matron wearing a mural crown. The colors are fresh and brilliant and the groups will appear to greater advantage in its proper surroundings.

Only a few among the many fine landscapes can be mentioned. George Smillie's "Squally Day on the Coast," a dramatic snatch of rock and wind-wrenched trees, and sea and ship in a gale. Ballard Williams' "Hills of Purple and Rose," a very remarkable piece of painting as to its manner, curiously effective from afar, and almost lost when you draw near, yet lovely withal and of a very rare tone; "Ice in the Glen" is full of radiating light; through the groups of trees standing in deep snow, the amber and rose-tinted day comes athwart the white drifts and searches the pool where the steely ice is hardening. The atmosphere aglow, and clear brilliancy of out-doors are wonderfully rendered. Walter Palmer Clarke's "March," melting snow this time on a wooded hill-top, is done in soft browns and grays, spring felt and not yet seen.

One of the best marines—several of them are worth noting—is Waugh's "East Coast." Last but not least there is Gardner Symons' large canvas of the "Opalescent River," Deerfield Valley.

Even the somewhat insufficient group of sculpture, this season, is fuller and more satisfactory than usual. Chester Beach shows an admirable portrait head (Mrs. Purves) and wins the Barnett prize with his "Young Nymph." Be it remembered, after observing the anatomy, the fine movement of the outline and the artistic ensemble of this figure, that the Barnett prize is only awarded to sculptors under the age of thirty. Attilio Piccirilli has a pitying "Mater Consolatrix," with a child weeping upon her arm. Miss Wheelock's Russian wolfhound "Ski" is remarkably true and clever. Bremer's "Nature the Consoler" conveys a thought, though one could have wished for more intrinsic beauty in this calm woman before whom the spent man flings himself face downward with unnerved hands trailing across her knees. Nature is serene indeed, but still more is she profoundly and inscrutably lovely. Edgar Walter's "The Source" is beautiful and mysterious, the wedded figures, and the two faces of man and woman close together in shadow express well the secrecy of hidden founts, mountain spring or mighty river, which at birth your hand can span. It is a pleasure to greet Herbert Haseltine. Not long since, a boy in the house of his painter father in Rome; then a student in Paris; now among us. His "Riding Off," with its gaunt, energetic frames of men and horses reeling together in polo play that is battle, has tremendous qualities of strength and reserve, and a masterliness of touch that should make all future work of the same hand significant.

EDUCATION

The London, England, County Council has issued the educational section of its report for the year which ended March 31, 1909, and its figures are startling even to us, accustomed as we are to generous expenditures for school purposes. The total spent by the Council last year in educational work amounts to £5,044,386, of which sum more than £4,000,000 was for elementary schools, more than £1,000,000 for higher schools, and £21,443 went into scholarships and prizes. The report speaks of new school sites secured and of contracts let for new school edifices, and one is gratified to note that, unlike ourselves, the Londoners are specially interested in supplying the need of elementary schools, leaving the question of the spread of secondary schools for later consideration. Six schools were ordered built for physically and mentally defective pupils, and four industrial or handicraft centres were provided for. The Council conducted 511 permanent schools with sittings for 583,285 children, and 37 temporary schools for 11,316. Evening schools to the number of 299 accommodated 128,084 students. The elementary schools carry a staff of 17,739 teachers, of whom 5,038 are men, a proportionately much stronger force of men teachers than is usual in America. Only 18 secondary schools are conducted by the Council, though it subsidizes 50 more and cooperates with 40 others which it does not aid financially. That the recent investigations of the Council's Special School Commission have not been barren is evident from the new features this year saw introduced into the school system. The report makes commendatory reference to its open-air schools, its plans for the extension of playgrounds and the like. A feature of school administration new to most of us in America is the statement that food was furnished to as many as 55,181 school children in one week. Special commissions, the report tells us, are looking into the question of vocational schools and traveling expenses are now regularly provided by the educational authorities for visits by school children to parks, museums, galleries and places of historical interest.

A published assertion of President Needham of the George Washington University, during the discussion regarding the proposed government subvention to his institution, called forth an interesting reply from Mgr. Thomas J. Shahan, Rector of the Catholic University of America. President Needham was quoted as saying that the Catholic University does not maintain a college in the mechanical arts. Dr. Shahan, as he explains, "in the interest of truth and not with any desire to affect the interests of the George Washington University," in an open letter to the Washington Evening Star, thus answered the assertion: "The Catholic University does carry on quite a varied instruction in the mechanical arts. This instruction was first undertaken in 1895, when the university established a technological school, with courses in civil, electrical and mechanical engineering. The work was successful from the beginning, and its scope was soon broadened by the addition of courses in chemical engineering, industrial engineering and metallurgy. To-day the equipment of the Catholic University in this respect, its power plant, laboratories and shops, is the most extensive of the kind in the District and ranks favorably with that of much older institutions. The present enrollment is eighty-seven students, working under eight instructors, in both undergraduate and advanced courses."

In an open letter, Bishop Candler, of the Methodist Church South, declares that the money given by Rockefeller and Carnegie to educational institutions, under the conditions of acceptance, tends to godlessness. "The Carnegie fund," he says, "excludes from its use members of the faculties of the church schools, and the Rockefeller fund denies the use of any part of what is given for theological instruction. These two foundations embody prevalent notions on this subject. Now, we may as well understand first as last that the policy of religionless education and unmoral culture can end in nothing but ruin."

"The colleges of the Roman Catholic Church have not asked a penny of the Rockefeller fund or the Carnegie fund, and one risks nothing in saying they will not. These colleges do not propose to be drawn away from their mission by any promises of gold. Would that our Protestant institutions were equally devoted to the religious objects they were founded to achieve."

The Catholics of the Archdiocese of Boston are maintaining 79 grammar schools and 26 high schools. The number of children in the grammar schools is 22,612 boys and 28,395 girls; in the high schools, 171 boys and 964 girls, a total of 52,142 pupils.

These pupils are taught by 83 Brothers, 956 Sisters and 36 lay teachers, representing a teaching staff of 1,075 persons. The figures here given are taken from the annual report for 1909, recently submitted to the Archbishop by the Rev. George A. Lyons, Superior of Parochial Schools in the Archdiocese of Boston. The report further shows that buildings valued at $2,700,000 have been erected in Boston alone by the various parishes for the education of children who cannot conscientiously avail themselves of the public school.

The Rev. George M. Searle, C.S.P., will hereafter direct the work at Newman Hall which Archbishop Riordan has established at the University of California. He is a distinguished mathematician and astronomer and will carry on there his observations of Halley's comet.

SOCIOLOGY

As stated in this column at the time Superintendent Hotchkiss of the New York State Insurance Department denied the original application of the Metropolitan Insurance Company to buy 250 acres of land in Westchester County, for the purpose of building a sanitarium for the treatment of consumption among its employees. Such use of company funds, Mr. Hotchkiss decided, would be opposed to the Insurance law, which prohibits insurance companies from buying real estate except what is necessary for the transaction of its business. A friendly suit was entered in the Appellate Division following this decision of the Superintendent, and the judges recently affirmed the project to be within the discretion of the Insurance Department. Superintendent Hotchkiss consequently granted the application last week. The company claims a working force of 14,000 persons. It is thought that the scope of the Institution will be later extended to include the treatment of policy holders suffering from tuberculosis.

From the fact that the Archbishop of Paris is taking an active part in the movement to ameliorate the condition of the bakers in that city, certain papers speak of a revival of Christian Socialism. The Archbishop and the men and women associated with him have in their minds only Christian charity, which is the very antithesis of Socialism, whether this be called Christian, or Socialism without any limiting word.

The Educational Alliance, a Jewish Charitable Organization, had its annual meeting in New York January 16. The Acting President, Justice Samuel Greenbaum, announced the expenditure of the year, $100,834.30. The organization is engaged in twenty-seven different activities, Reading Room, Library, Seaside Home for Girls, Roof Gardens, etc. In the course of a discussion on immigration, Edward Lauterbach denounced the Junior Order of American Mechanics as the successor of the Know Nothing organization.

A year ago the New York legislature was considering the Hamilton-Whiting Tuberculosis Hospital Law. Since that time Ontario, Schenectady, Onondaga, Ulster, Monroe and Dutchess Counties have voted appropriations for such hospitals, and twelve other counties have the matter under consideration.

The Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, in charge of St. Peter's Hospital, Brooklyn, a free institution for the benefit of the poor, are about to erect another hospital on the block bounded by Vanderveer and Woodhaven Avenues and Fulton and Elm Streets, Queens Borough. The cost will be $500,000.

ECONOMICS.

Enumerators for the census are paid in three ways: per capita, i. e., so much for each enumeration; per diem, or so much per day; and a mixture of the two. The first is used in populous districts; the second in the sparsely peopled districts of the far West, and the third in districts of which the density of population is between these two extremes. The per diem rate will range from $3 to $6 for an eight hour day. It is to be presumed that the other two modes of payment will bring a corresponding wage to the enumerator.

Louis Brennan, inventor of the mono-rail carriage, has granted August Scherl, who lately exhibited a design of his own, a license to work his patents in Germany, and to exhibit his car in the United States. The license is confined to the first Brennan patents.

During 1909, 243 ships of 403,670 tons were built on the Clyde. In 1908 the numbers of vessels was 569, but the tonnage was only 355,580. The larger number was due to the construction of many small vessels and lighters for abroad. The figures for these two years are the lowest since 1897.

The foreign trade of Japan for 1909 was in round figures: exports 204 million dollars; imports, 195 million dollars. The corresponding figures for 1908 were 182 million dollars, and 210 million dollars.

SCIENCE

Readers acquainted with the literature of the planet Mars, will remember that Lowell's chief argument in favor of its habitability is its famous canal system, and principally the straightness and uniform width of these lines, which, as he claims, are so perfect that they cannot but be the work of intelligent beings.

He and his friends must then be much mortified to read in the last (January) number of The Observatory, that A. Stanley Williams, in a review of an article by E. M. Antoniadi in the November L'Astronomie, says that "the prevailing impression resulting from his work with this magnificent instrument (a 32.7 inch refractor) may be summed up in one word—irregularity. 'Canals' are there in plenty, using the word in its technical sense, but the close geometrical network of unnaturally straight spider lines, with which the work of smaller instruments has rendered us familiar, is conspicuous by its absence. My observations were made with a 6½-inch reflector, and were of a most desultory character. Nevertheless, the amount of detail that could be made out was surprisingly great, no doubt on account of the large size of the disk combined with the higher altitude of the planet. And the general impression produced upon me by the observations may be again expressed by the one word—irregularity." He then cites many technical instances of his own observation. It may be remembered that Lowell's telescope was only a 24 inch, whilst Antoniadi's is nearly 33, the fourth largest in the world, the Yerkes being 40, the Lick 36, and the Pulkowa (in Russia) 33 inches.

In the preceding (December) number of the same periodical, The Observatory, T. E. R. Phillips says the same of the canals. "It is disappointing that, owing to the tilt of the axis, these objects show to less advantage at a near approach of the planet than when it is more remote; but after making due allowance for this fact they have seemed surprisingly few and ill-defined. The writer has observed none whatever in the dusky regions, and those seen in the desert areas have been generally faint, diffuse, and irregular in appearance. The clearest and strongest have perhaps been those in the Solis Lacus region, but the hard, sharp, narrow lines commonly shown on drawings of Mars have rarely or never been seen as such at Ashtead."

Nature of December 23 last sums up in a few words a short controversy, which had appeared in three numbers of the Astronomische Nachrichten, concerning another of Lowell's habitability arguments, the faint blue line fringing the melting polar caps. Such a cap is almost what geometry would call a zone of one base. Its edge is, therefore, almost a circle. This circle is foreshortened by projection into an ellipse. If the faint blue line is water or fog or some other objective entity on Mars, it must share in the foreshortening of the projection and appear wider at the major axis of the ellipse than at the minor axis. As this fringing line is, however, always observed to be of uniform width everywhere, it can be only an optical line, and does not, therefore, exist objectively on Mars.

The director of the Johannesburg observatory announces the discovery of a new comet on January 16, 8h. 11m. 9s. G. M. T. Its position is given as: Right ascension 19h. 50m. 28s.; Declination $-25^{\circ}, 9', 24''$. The new comet outshines Venus in brilliancy, and along the Atlantic seaboard in the South, when the skies are not clouded, it can be most clearly seen. The big telescopes which survey the skies from the observatory on the heights at Georgetown have located the comet but three times, but the observers are in doubt as to its identity. By daylight, when the sky has been clear, the sun has outshone it, and at night, when the scientists would have the advantage of a dark background for their observations the sky has been clouded, except for short intervals.

A bill has been introduced into the House of Representatives at Washington, providing for the creation of a wireless telegraph board. This measure is the result of a series of complaints made by the Navy Department, the Revenue Cutter Service, and the wireless telegraph companies of amateur operators who render their service useless. The duties of the board, according to the resolution, shall be to prepare a comprehensive system of regulations to govern all operators afloat and ashore under the jurisdiction of the United States, with due regard alike for Government and commercial interests. $2,000 was appropriated to expenses.

The Navy Department has almost finished testing a new torpedo, which will be an offset to the English Hardcastle torpedo. It consists of an automatic-firing gun, charged with a heavy explosive, and encased in an ordinary torpedo envelope. Its speed within a range of 6,000 yards is practically without limit.

A British inventor is said to have perfected an aerial bicycle. The total area of the machine is one hundred square feet and its weight but fifty pounds. The wings measure twenty feet from tip to tip. The propeller can be worked up to six hundred revolutions per minute. In shape the aeroplane resembles a bird and a running start is necessary from elevated ground.

The Smithsonian Institute announces the discovery by the Roosevelt expedition of a new species of otocyon, a kind of wild dog. It has been named otocyon vergatus, and is a small carnivorous animal resembling a fox. Hitherto only one species has been known, otocyon megalotis.

Press reports from Havana state that on January 13, at the Observatory of the Colegio de Belen, Halley's comet was sighted in the form of a faint white cloud between the planet Mars and a star of the Pisces constellation. This observatory is in charge of the Jesuit community of Havana.

Prof. E. E. Barnard, of the Yerkes Observatory, has succeeded in obtaining a photograph of Halley's comet showing the tail. He describes this as slender, straight and about ten degrees in length.

From the official report of the U. S. Fish Commission for the fiscal year 1909, it appears that the distribution of fish and eggs for propagation and hatching surpassed that of any previous year. It aggregated to 3,117,131, 811, being an increase of 240,000,000 over the year 1908.

The latest application of the X-ray is to dentistry. It is claimed that it enables the dental surgeon to ascertain the condition of the teeth and jaw more quickly than by any method heretofore used. Excellent radiographs, showing all possible anomalies of the teeth, are obtainable with a new apparatus recently placed on the market by a German firm.

The Geological Society of London has conferred upon Dr. William Berryman Scott Blair the Wollaston medal, in recognition of his research work in geology.

E. W. Maunder, superintendent of the Solar department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, says of the so-called Martian canal theory: "Nobody has ever seen a single canal on Mars. There has never been any real ground for supposing that the markings on the planet supplied any evidence of artificial action. It were better for science that the canal theory be abandoned completely."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The following letter has been received by his Grace, Archbishop Farley, of New York, in reply to his congratulations on the occasion of the Episcopal Jubilee of the Supreme Pontiff:—

Venerable Brother,

Health and Apostolic Benediction.

In the letter we recently received from you on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Our Episcopate, We welcomed the good wishes which you so kindly offered Us; We welcomed the zeal with which you collected funds to minister as far as was in your power to Our poverty. Both offices beautifully illustrate your devotion and that of the clergy and people who are under your care, and who have been your associates and helpers in offering us the same homage.

This splendidly united devotion, which has, indeed, long been known to Us, We joyfully and paternally accept in its latest manifestation. Our own good offices to you and to your flock will never be lacking, and all Our affection shall be bestowed upon you. Meanwhile, as a pledge of heavenly gifts and token of Our affection, receive the Apostolic Benediction which We most lovingly impart to you, Venerable Brother, and to all those who occupy your care and thoughts.

Given at Rome at St. Peter's, November 18th, 1909, in the seventh year of Our Pontificate. PIUS X, Pope.

Archbishop Ireland announces that in affirmation of the recommendation of the bishops of the Province of St. Paul, the Holy See will establish two new dioceses, Crookston and Bismarck. The first will be taken from the Diocese of Duluth, and have a Catholic population of about 6,000. The see city, Crookston, is sixty miles northeast of Fargo, N. D. Bismarck is the capital of North Dakota, and has a population of about 4,000. There are now five dioceses in Minnesota and four in the Dakotas. Crookston takes in all that part of Minnesota west of the easterly line of Hubbard and Beltrami counties, and north of the southerly lines of Clay, Becker and Hubbard counties. Bismarck takes in all that part of North Dakota west of the easterly line of Emmons, Burleigh, McLean and Ward counties. The new see cities will be Crookston and Bismarck respectively.

A pastoral letter of Archbishop Bruchési, addressed to the Catholic citizens of Montreal, was read, on January 23, in all the city churches. His Grace exhorts the faithful to register their vote in the approaching civic election; abstention from voting and indifference to the grave moral crisis now confronting the citizens of Montreal are not permissible. They should vote according to their conscience and the dictates of honor for candidates whose sound principles and blameless conduct in the past give promise that they will be valiant champions of justice and temperance. Speaking of the Eucharistic Congress to be held in Montreal next September, the Archbishop thanks the Protestants for withdrawing their mayoralty candidate as unsuited to so Catholic a demonstration, and hopes that Christian charity will exclude, in the coming election, all bitterness based on racial or national differences. Without mentioning the recent revival of Le Pays, an anti-Catholic paper directed by French-speaking Freemasons, His Grace warns the faithful against voting for any candidate who belongs to a Masonic lodge or favors Freemasonry, and concludes with an earnest recommendation of the anti-alcoholic league.

President Taft has just signed a commission making Rev. James F. Houlihan a First Lieutenant, and appointing him to the post of Chaplain in the Fifth Cavalry, now stationed at Honolulu. Father Houlihan belongs to the Scranton Diocese, and has been designated for service in the army by his Bishop, Right Rev. M. J. Hoban, on account of his peculiar fitness for the work. He was born in Susquehanna, Pa., thirty-four years ago, was graduated from Niagara University in 1900, and began his ecclesiastical studies with the Vincentian Fathers in the Seminary of Our Lady of Angels, Niagara, and finished them at Dunwoodie, N. Y. He was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Hoban, and for some time was attached to the Cathedral in Scranton. Then he did missionary work in Tioga County, and as a reward for his successful labors was made first assistant in Mount Carmel Church, Dunmore, Pa. Father Houlihan's splendid work with boys and men in these various parishes attracted the attention of his Bishop.

At the invitation of Bishop Canevin, five Passionist Sisters are coming from Corneto, Italy, to establish in Pittsburg the first house of their Institute in the United States. This sisterhood was founded by St. Paul of the Cross in 1770 and is cloistered. The members wear a habit like that of the congregation of men established by St. Paul. In their monasteries the Sisters take women who desire to spend a few days in retreat. The Passionist Congregation was also introduced into the United States in 1859 by the first Bishop of Pittsburg, the Right Rev. Michael O'Connor.

The Right Rev. Charles E. McDonnell dedicated, on January 16, a new building which is to serve the purposes of a monastery for the Capuchins and of a school for the children of St. Michael's parish, Brooklyn. The Rev. Gabriel Messmer, O.M.Cap., rector of St. Michael's Church and builder of the new school, is a brother of Archbishop Messmer of Milwaukee. The school house will be open for instruction on February 1.

The Convent of the Sacred Heart in St. Louis, through Mother Donnelly has fallen heir to $200,000, the whole estate of the Rev. Michael McFaul, her uncle. Father McFaul's father was a wealthy citizen of St. Louis in his day; the share of his fortune that fell to the priest was allowed to accumulate until it reached a considerable amount. Much of it was given in silent charity during his life; The remainder was bequeathed to Mother Donnelly.

The late Miss Rosine M. Parmentier, of Brooklyn, besides giving many valuable books to the U. S. Catholic Historical Society of New York, left in her will $200 for the furtherance of the work of the Society, of which during her lifetime she had been an active and much-esteemed member. She was the first pupil the Religious of the Sacred Heart had in New York, and her father, Andrew Parmentier, was one of the founders and trustees of the first church, St. James', built on Long Island in 1824.

Bishop Nagl, of Trieste, has been appointed coadjutor, with the right of succession, to Cardinal Gruscha, Archbishop of Vienna. The Cardinal is ninety years of age, and the archdiocese of Vienna has two and a quarter millions of Catholics of several rites, and fifteen hundred priests within its boundaries.

Archbishop Farley, to comply with the wish of the Pope that the Society for the Preservation of the Faith Among Indian Children should be helped, has directed the pastors of New York to select a promoter for the Society in each parish. These promoters will cooperate with the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, in assisting more effectively the maintenance of the Catholic Indian Mission Schools.

Brooklyn College, in its second year, has just opened a new hall with a seating capacity of 1,200. The students now number more than four hundred. The Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., has been added to the faculty. as lecturer and professor of ethics.

In commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of his ordination, Archbishop Farley was the guest of honor at the annual banquet of the alumni of Fordham University, on January 20. His fellow members presented him with a valuable pectoral cross as a souvenir of the occasion.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"The Little Town of Bethlehem," Garden Theatre.—Mrs. Spencer Trask has demonstrated her ability beyond cavil as an author, and in this little play has succeeded in entertaining and uplifting the mind of the audience. The religious and biblical story has been purposely avoided in any direct way; however, this does not detract in the least from the charm and grade of an exceptionally excellent production. Mr. Greet and his company interpret their various rôles with intelligence. More plays of this type would do much towards teaching the public the value of clean and wholesome drama.

"The Affinity," Comedy Theatre.—A satirical play, purporting to expose the evils resulting from "affinities." It is neither edifying nor convincing. Obviously designed to be humorous and flippant, with a slight serious undercurrent, it fairly well accomplishes the author's object. The conclusion is morally askew. If written in a serious vein with a more pronounced and logical conclusion, its effect would be telling. Mr. Irving is clever as the man, but Miss Hackney slightly overdoes the part of "the affinity." The more comical characters were well portrayed.

"The Mollusc," Empire Theatre.—a comedy of light weight with some humor and a mild wit, admirably performed by Sir Charles Wyndham and Miss Moore. It is intended to show up, with gentle satire, that type of selfishness metaphorically designated "a mollusc," i. e., a person who succeeds by a perverse ingenuity, in getting everybody else to do things for her (for it is a she in this case) and basks in any easy self indulgence of laziness, with the world at her feet.

"The Faith Healer," Savoy Theatre.—Mr. William Vaughan Moody has here attempted a theme which has its evident risks in dramatic presentation. The scene is laid, at the present time, in a town of Southwestern Missouri. A young man has suddenly appeared in the neighborhood with the reputation of a faith healer. He believes that he has a divine mission to go about the world performing miracles of cure such as are described in the Bible.

The dramatic possibility lies entirely in the conflict between the faith-healer's loyalty to his ideal and his love for a young girl. Dramatically speaking two issues only are possible: either he should reject the temptation of the flesh and remain faithful to his mission, as he regards it, or yielding to it bring down the catastrophe of disloyalty to his ideal, which would spell ruin to all that is best in him. Instead there is a weak and incongruous attempt to solve the conflict by reconciling radical antagonisms in the same character. Mr. Moody has clearly missed his opportunity, and, to save the situation in a popular sense, forced a maudlin conclusion. Mr. Miller seems constitutionally unfitted for the part of the faith-healer. He is staid and complacent in his delineation of an intense and enthusiastic character. A man who sees visions and believes that he has a divine mission to heal the world does not go about with his head down in sober and plaintive meditation, nor does he deliver his speeches in velvet accents and with parlor gestures.

"The Barrier," New Amsterdam Theatre.—As usual the attempt to dramatize a novel proves futile in as much as the flavor of the old wine poured into the new bottle is entirely lost. Mr. Rex Beach's novel of the same name has not been an exception, though the staged story makes effective melodrama of the stereotyped kind. All the delicate shadings of the written story, which enhance its plausibility as literature, are blotted out in the dramatic presentation, and the rough edges become only too visible. The scene is laid in Alaska, where the adopted daughter of John Gale, a trader and a squaw-man, meets and loves a young army officer of the bluest Kentucky blood. Gale had fled from the States many years before under a charge of murder. Just as his adopted daughter has acquired riches from a gold claim staked out for her by a French Canadian, who is also a suitor for her hand, two "bad men" appear upon the scene. They endeavor to rob the girl of her mine and to persuade her that the Captain will never marry a half-breed. Then the usual melodramatic issue comes about. Gale in a thrilling duel in the dark, kills the villain, who turns out to be the girl's father and who just lives long enough to declare Gale innocent of the murder, of which he had been accused, and to reveal the fact that the girl is not a half-breed at all. So disappears "the barrier" between the Captain and the young woman. The play is full of thrilling incidents and movement and will prove undoubtedly entertaining to lovers of the melodramatic. It is well acted and reflects credit upon the performers.

CHARLES McDOUGALL.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The following speech, made by King Albert at the Ki-Santu Mission during his visit to the Congo last summer, is published in the Journal des Missions:

"The work of the missionary, the work of moral and religious perfection, which is so difficult because it is essentially individual and free, has a right to the respectful homage of all impartial minds. In the colonies founded by Christian and civilized countries, religious missions have played an active part; they have represented so well one part of the influence exercised abroad by the mother country, that the majority of governments carefully watch over the rights and interests of their missionaries and encourage as much as possible their moral and material activities.

"In the work of morally and physically uplifting the tribes of the Congo, who are so primitive, and who are hardly yet conscious of the advantages of civilization, the collaboration of the congregations of missionaries is not only useful but indispensable. No great humanitarian work can be carried on without the ideal, and in colonization this truth asserts itself with vigor. The history of the Congo shows us that in the realization of this noble but arduous task, our missionaries have spared neither suffering nor sacrifice nor fatigue. They have consecrated to it their strength and their intelligence.

"You bring with you to the Belgian Congo, to stimulate you, to uphold you, and to strengthen you, if need be, in your strenuous apostleship, a magnificent heritage of glorious memories. First, the memory of your immortal founder, St. Ignatius Loyola, who was a valiant captain, a great patriot, a great saint; St. Francis Xavier, the apostle of modern times, who in ten years had accomplished in India and in Japan works and conquests which compel admiration; St. Peter Claver, who was also one of you, the apostle of the negro slaves of Carthage, who for forty years endured all the sacrifices inspired by that heroic devotion which caused his holiness Leo XIII to proclaim him the patron of all missions established among the negroes of every country, wherever the Catholic priest carries the light and peace of the Gospel."

"It is hardly necessary, after these great names to recall the flourishing Christianity established by the Jesuits in India, in Japan, in China and in the two Americas. Since I am speaking to Belgian Jesuits, I should like to recall two names, which are the glories of Belgium: the name of Father Verbiest, who was perhaps the most celebrated missionary in China in the seventeenth century, and the name of Father Peter De Smet, to whom Termonde, his native city, has erected a well-merited statue, for this Belgian hero evangelized entire Indian tribes in the United States, created there vast dioceses, and on many occasions acted as an able and devoted negotiator between the government at Washington and the Indian tribes in arms against the whites. These, my reverend Fathers, are family memories, to which I render homage, and render it the more willingly because you here in the Belgian Congo remain faithful to these traditions with a devotion which knows neither respite nor hesitation."

The Church Times (Protestant Episcopalian), reviewing Joseph McCabe's "The Decay of Rome," questions the accuracy of the statements, challenges the statistics and denies the inference. In one instance it grants the general correctness of the statistics, but offers a different explanation. The following is the passage: "In England and in the United States there has been for sixty years a great immigration of Roman Catholics, chiefly from Ireland. Mr. McCabe himself was born of that immigration, and he is personally interested in its record. The immigration, together with the natural increase of population, ought by this time to have planted in these countries so many Roman Catholics. There are, in fact, so many fewer. The numbers are considerable; the loss is enormous. Here there is evidence of decay. What does it mean? It means that in England and the United States there are very few of those looser adherents of the Roman Church who abound in France. Those who fall away lapse altogether. And to what? One knows those lapsed Irish. They do not bear out Mr. McCabe's most cherished illusion; they are not the cultured and the progressive of their kind; they are of those illiterate and those derelicts whom he supposes to be the last remnants of Catholicism. What has become of them? They have sunk down into that mass of dull indifference which painfully characterizes the English-speaking populations of the world. And they come from Ireland, where is, with many faults and much poverty, a certain wealth of imagination and of unworldliness which the world itself cannot afford to lose. Their loss is the loss of the world, as even Mr. McCabe may perhaps acknowledge, and temper his satisfaction at the change. It is the loss also of the kingdom of heaven, which is not his concern."

OBITUARY

Maurice O'Meara, an old and prominent resident of Brooklyn, died on January 14, in his 77th year. He celebrated the golden jubilee of his wedding a year ago, and after the Mass Bishop McDonnell, in recognition of Mr. O'Meara's life-long work for the Church, not only imparted to him a special blessing from the Pope, but, as the day was Friday, dispensed, for the wedding feast, the family and their guests from the precept of abstinence.

Mother Clara Ward, at one time Mother Superior of St. Jerome's Convent, died after a long illness at Mount Ursula Convent, Bedford Park, New York. She was born in Ireland in 1850, and came to the United States at the age of fifteen. She entered the Ursuline Convent at Morrisania in New York, and later taught at St. Jerome's school. Finally she became Mother Superior of the Convent which was conducted in connection with the school. On account of ill health she retired from active work four years ago and went to live at Mount Ursula.

Karl Pustet, senior member of the publishing firm of Fr. Pustet & Co., died at Ratisbon, Germany, on January 17. A requiem Mass for the repose of his soul was celebrated at St. Peter's Church, Barclay street, New York, on January 19, and was attended by representatives of the leading Catholic publishing houses and many friends among the clergy and laity.

PERSONAL

Mr. Henry R. Sargent, formerly Superior of the Episcopalian Order of the Holy Cross at West Park-on-the-Hudson, and who recently became a Catholic in England, arrived here on January 25, and will be for the present at the Newman School at Hackensack, N. J.

Max Pam, a well known lawyer and sociologist of New York and Chicago, has given $1,000 to Notre Dame University as a prize for the best thesis or book dealing with the subject of religion in education. The faculty are to arrange all details concerning the competition, which will be open to all.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

D. F.—Mathew Pattenson was a famous Catholic controversialist, who flourished about 1623. He was a medical practitioner in the reign of James I, and was made physician in ordinary to Charles I. He was the author of "The Image of Bothe Churches Hiervsalem and Babel, Vnitie and Confusion, Obedience and Sedition." By P. D. M. Tournay (Adrian Quinque), 1623, svo, pp. 461; London, 1653; 12mo, pp. 643. It was dedicated to Charles, Prince of Wales, and Charles Butler, in commending the work, says: "In a short compass it comprises much useful information and many excellent observations, arranged methodically in a style always perspicuous and generally elegant." (Hist. Memoirs of Eng. Catholics, IV, 453.)

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE FIRST FOUNDLING ASYLUM IN THE UNITED STATES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

While New York and New Orleans are discussing their rival claims to the first Foundling Asylum in the United States, St. Louis is saying nothing. There were times when even St. Louis was more assertive in making honorable claims; but with a modesty becoming the city's title, its virtues are for the present concealed. This is particularly true of the works of the Daughters of Charity, who from our early pioneer days have been so large a part of St. Louis when good works are being counted. I note that in Mr. Meehan's splendid article, in the current Catholic World, on the works of the Daughters of Charity during the hundred years since Mother Seton's time the St. Louis chapters of that bright story are entirely passed over. It was not always so. In the "Encyclopedia of the History of St. Louis," Vol. IV, page 1949, under the heading "St. Ann's Foundling Asylum," it is stated that "this institution, the first asylum for abandoned infants opened in the United States, was commenced May 12, 1853. Fourteen infants were received the first day." Mrs. Ann Biddle, the daughter of John Mullanphy, was the founder. The name was doubtless assumed in honor of her patron saint. At present the asylum is consolidated with other charities in one building, known as St. Ann's Hospital.

In searching through the back numbers of the "Catholic Directory," the earliest mention of the Biddle Infant Asylum, as it was then called, occurs in '57; the New Orleans rival disappears in '60. If you put us down, then, for '57, put us down modestly. The reason of our reticence is somewhat cogent.

There is an article in the Metropolitan Magazine for the year 1857 (our very year), "The Catholic Element in the History of the United States," wherein, on page 525, there is an enumeration of the various Catholic educational and benevolent institutions in the country. The writer, who was well informed on his subject, and who wrote with precision, says there were then (in 1857) four "Foundling Asylums."

Surely the first Foundling Asylum antedates 1857, but where was it?

CHRONICLE

Federal Investigations.—The Federal grand jury began the promised investigation of the Chicago Beef Trust to ascertain whether it has operated to control the price of fresh meats. The firms against which the Government is proceeding are the Swift, Armour, and Morris Companies, the three great packing concerns forming the National Packing Company. President Taft sent Assistant Attorney General Wade Ellis to take charge of the case. Subpoenas which call for all important books of the concern, including the record of shares issued, were served on officers of the National Packing Company.—The Congressional committee of inquiry into the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy began its sessions. The first witness was L. R. Glavis, the dismissed official who preferred charges against Secretary Ballinger, in connection with the Cunningham coal claims in Alaska. Counsel for Glavis said the charges were that in a number of cases Mr. Ballinger had acted with impropriety.—Uncertainty as to the extent of the forthcoming inquiry into the affairs of the Trust Companies and the possible injury to legitimate transactions resulting therefrom, led to a denial on the part of the Federal Administration that the purpose of the Government with reference to prosecutions under the anti-trust law is other than as set forth in the President's Message of January 7, 1910. The President declared that "sensational statements as if there were to be a new departure and an indiscriminate prosecution of important industries have no foundation."—Judge Hough, in the Criminal Branch of the United States Circuit Court in New York dismissed the Government suit against the Press Publishing Company, publishers of the New York World, charging the printing and circulating of libelous statements concerning Theodore Roosevelt, William H. Taft and others in the purchase by the United States of the Panama Canal. The court strongly intimated that the proper method to pursue in the prosecution of the libel was to have recourse to the courts of the State where the offense had been committed, and ruled that the indictment was not sufficiently authorized by the Federal statute on which it was based. Judge Hough held that it was not clear Congress intended to intrust to the courts of the United States the punishment of offences other than those primarily and exclusively committed in United States territory. An appeal may be taken. This makes the second prosecution for the same alleged offense ending in the defeat of the Government. The first proceeding was on the part of the Government to extradite from Indianapolis to Washington for trial Delavan Smith, the proprietor of the Indianapolis News. United States Circuit Court Judge Anderson dismissed the proceedings on October 1 last at Indianapolis.

Miscellaneous.—The agitation against high prices for foodstuffs resulted in a material reduction of prices for beef, mutton, pork, poultry, eggs and milk, and the hope is entertained that vigorous prosecution of certain trusts will do still more to cheapen the necessities of life. Secretary of Agriculture Wilson declared he was gathering proofs which will show that American farm products are being sold cheaper abroad than in this country.—Gifford Pinchot, ex-Chief Forester of the United States, was elected president of the National Conservation Association, succeeding Dr. Eliot, who becomes honorary president. Mr. Pinchot promptly assumed charge of the headquarters at Washington. The present membership of the association is estimated at ten thousand.—Sixty chambers of commerce and boards of trade from as many cities were represented in the fortieth annual meeting of the National Board of trade which met in Washington. Twelve of the largest bodies came with strong resolutions calling for a ship subsidy to promote an American merchant marine. Twelve others called for harbor and river improvements. Others stood for conservation of the national resources of forests, water power and minerals.—In the United States District Court Judge Cornelius H. Hanford decided that the title to more than a thousand acres of valuable coal lands in Lewis County, Washington, claimed by P. C. Richardson and several members of the R. S. Wilson family, all of Seattle, should revert to the Government.—As anticipated last week the agreement of the switchmen on western railroads entering Chicago to accept arbitration under the Erdman act has had immediate effect on the strike of the switchmen on the northwestern roads centering in St. Paul. It is announced that these latter, who have been on strike since Nov. 30, will return to work next Monday. Their complaints regarding the wage question remain unsettled, but will be governed by the figures agreed upon in the Chicago compromise conference. They adopt this course because they are members of the union which has determined to accept the Chicago compromise.—Work on the Panama Canal goes on apace. The latest Canal Record, shows that in the year more than 35,000,000 cubic yards of material were removed, though this was 2,000,000 yards less than the record for 1908. A reason for this decrease is found in the nature of the work which has become more difficult in dredging the wet excavations. Great progress is reported in the construction of the enormous locks at Gatun, where two thousand yards of concrete were laid in a single day.

Ontario Legislature.—On January 25 the second session of the twelfth parliament of the Province of Ontario was opened by Lieutenant-Governor Gibson with one of the most notable gatherings of the kind since Confederation. Among those present was Archbishop McEvay. Noteworthy passages in the speech from the throne were, first, the reference to the expansion of the mineral industries of the province, which in the ten months preceding October 31, 1909, amounted to about one million dollars, the mines of Cobalt having raised Ontario to the third place among the silver-producing countries, while the Sudbury nickel mines now yield the bulk of the world's supply of this metal; secondly, the successful operation, during the last fiscal year, of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway, which during that time transported without accident, to and from a newly opened agricultural district, 580,498 passengers, and realized, as net earnings, $692,407; thirdly, that the revenues of the province, being considerably in excess of the estimates, show a substantial surplus. After the reading of the speech from the throne, Sir James Whitney, Prime Minister of Ontario, said that, although it was the custom of British parliaments to take up that utterance before doing any other business, yet he would in this instance, with the Lieutenant-Governor's permission, give precedence to thirty-three statute amendments for which the bills had been prepared by a special committee during the past several months, and he, therefore, introduced these bills, which immediately received first reading. On January 27 the public accounts of the province were laid on the table and showed that Ontario had, at the present time, $5,086,000 cash in the bank. The provincial government has spent $132,480.98 for good roads. The public institutions of the provinces were carried on during the year without one cent of overexpenditure. Not a single appropriation was exceeded.

Canadian Naval Bill.—Mr. Henri Bourassa, head of the Nationalist party and editor of Le Devoir, addressed a gathering of 2,500 people in the Monument National, Montreal, on January 20. His speech, which lasted two hours and three-quarters and was frequently interrupted by applause, was a frank arraignment of the Laurier Government's naval policy. He condemned it as a violation of those constitutional principles which are the basis of a self-governing colony. He protested against Canada having anything to do with the Imperial dreams of Chamberlain or Balfour and was indignant at the idea of Canadians being ordered to the ends of the earth to atone for the blunders of British diplomacy. He repeatedly quoted Laurier against Laurier and wound up by declaring, amid roars of laughter, that Sir Wilfrid, in his new found imperialism, was now destroying the gods whom he had once adored. Mr. Bourassa has no confidence in Sir Wilfrid's estimate of the proposed naval expenditure, for he remembers that when the Premier first advocated the Transcontinental Railway he assured the House that its probable cost would be thirteen millions, and now, as a matter of fact, the probable cost of this as yet unfinished railway is nearer two hundred millions. Mr. Bourassa also condemned the attitude of the Opposition leader, Mr. R. L. Borden, while he praised Mr. Monk as holding the only patriotic view. The meeting passed Mr. Bourassa's resolution requesting the House of Commons to defer the adoption of the Naval Bill until the people have manifested their will by a plebiscite.

Newfoundland's Prosperity.—The Legislature of Newfoundland opened its winter session at St. Johns on January 26. On that day the local newspapers printed their issues on the first paper ever manufactured in the Island Colony from native stock. The year 1909 was a memorable one for Newfoundland in many respects. Politically, it opened with a situation unique in the annals of British countries (see AMERICA, Vol. I, pages 4, 9, 116). The recent general election had resulted in a tie. Sir Robert Bond, the Premier, resigned at the end of February, because the Governor would not grant him a dissolution. Sir Edward Morris, the leader of the opposing party, then formed a ministry and tried to elect a Speaker, but Sir Robert Bond blocked this. Thereupon the Governor, Sir William McGregor, granted a dissolution to Sir Edward Morris early in April, and in the resulting election, on May 8, the Morris or People's party carried twenty-six seats, while the Bond party held only ten. Commercially, the past year has witnessed a remarkable advance from slack times to an era of real prosperity. The revenue of the Department of Lands and Mines, which in the whole fiscal year from July 1, 1908, to June 30, 1909, was but $56,000, has considerably exceeded that amount in the first six months of the current fiscal year. This season's fishery has been unusually good and the price per cwt. is nearly double what it was last year. Industrially, Newfoundland witnessed during 1909 the inauguration of one of the largest pulp and paper plants in the world, the Harmsworth Mills. And economically, the end of 1909 marks the beginning of a period which furnishes new avenues of employment in the construction of railways by workmen whose wages are fifty per cent. higher than those paid for the same sort of work five years ago and ten per cent. higher than the prevailing rates for unskilled labor in the colony to-day. The revenue of Newfoundland in the six months ending with the end of last December is more than two hundred thousand dollars in excess of that obtained for the same period twelve months ago.

The British Elections.—The new parliament is distributed as follows: Liberals, 274; Unionists, 273; Nationalists, 82; Labor Party, 41. The composition of the last parliament was Liberals, 364; Unionists, 168; Nationalists, 83; Labor Party, 55. The Liberals, therefore, have lost 91 members; the Labor Party 14; the Nationalists 1. The Unionists have gained 106, chiefly from the Liberals, as the great part of the Labor Party's losses were to these. All parties except the Nationalists, whose loss of one seat is insignificant, are disappointed. The Liberals looked to return with at least their old majority; the Labor Party reckoned on increasing their number to 60; the Unionists looked upon a gain of 128 as absolutely certain, and of 80 seats they professed to consider doubtful, they expected to win enough to give them a working majority. The Irish Party controls the House and T. P. O'Connor said that we may look for spectacular politics.

We are informed by cable that Westminster Cathedral is to be consecrated on June 28. Many foreign prelates are expected to attend. The first stone of the great church was laid June 29, 1895. The opening for public worship took place on Christmas day, 1903.

Outlook for Home Rule.—The parliamentary strength of the Nationalist representatives is the same as before the election. The fact that six successive elections left their status practically unchanged prompts an English paper to remark that while the stable English vary at the polls, the "fickle Irish" remain invariably solid. However they might have increased their numbers. Derry was lost by a few votes, a Nationalist seat was presented to Mr. Barry, Attorney-General for Ireland, another which might have been won by a Nationalist was lost by T. W. Russell, on account of his doubtful attitude on Catholic questions and Home Rule, and in North Tyrone, the Nationalist member, Mr. Murnaghan, was defeated by a Unionist because, contrary to the advice of the clergy, the party council set up another Nationalist against him. The arbitrary methods of the Central Council in disregarding local sentiments was resented in several constituencies, with the result that ten Independent Nationalists were elected. Most of these are able men, and, Mr. O'Brien excepted, had generally the sympathy of the clergy, who, however, took no prominent part. Cardinal Logue wrote a strong endorsement of Mr. Healy and Archbishop Walsh telegraphed his congratulations. The immediate result will be to stiffen the attitude of the entire body in regard to the Budget and Home Rule. It is thought that a working unity will soon be effected as their differences are on policy and methods, not in principles. The Liberals, with a few exceptions, seem to be in a receptive mood. Messrs. Birrell and Lloyd-George have declared for a generous policy of Irish self-government. Mr. Churchill attributed his victory in Dundee and the Liberal successes in the industrial centres to the Irish vote, and declared that they will not fail to make return. Mr. Asquith, before leaving for the Continent, repeated his pre-election pledge of full self-government for Ireland, and said that he had not specified further, because he could promise no legislation of any kind until we have settled conclusions with the House of Lords. Mr. Pease, Chief Liberal Whip, who explained that Mr. Asquith's declaration did not pledge the Liberals to bring in a Home Rule measure in the next parliament, is no longer a member, having lost his seat in London.

Paris Flood.—Since our last chronicle the flooding of Paris went on increasing every day till two o'clock in the morning of January 29, when the water had risen nearly thirty-two feet above normal level. Then it began to subside slowly about one inch every hour. At this rate it would take the Seine twenty days to return to its usual volume. No other flood—and there have been more than fifty floods recorded in Paris during the past three centuries—attained so high a general level. The damage done to property has been estimated pretty generally at two hundred million dollars ("un milliard"), precisely the estimated value of the property taken from religious orders by the French Government; and this estimate of loss by flood is confirmed by the announced intention of the municipality of Paris to negotiate a loan of one hundred million dollars ("un demi-milliard"), merely for necessary repairs after the flood shall have completely disappeared. At the beginning of this week the river had fallen thirty-two inches, but the danger of the situation was far from past. The water was still rising rapidly under ground from sewers and drains, so that the area of flooded cellars was continually expanding. Sewers were still bursting in many places, filling the surrounding atmosphere with an intolerable stench. Many streets were caving in, and the foundations of many buildings are so unsafe that the police will not allow anyone to dwell in them. Both the people and the government are acting nobly in maintaining order, and in helping the famine-stricken victims of this unparalleled disaster. Societies of devoted women are particularly self-sacrificing in visiting and assisting the poor. The New York Sun's Paris despatch of last Sunday notes that "the Catholic clergy are giving aid everywhere. The Archbishop of Paris goes around every night, visiting the suburbs and dangerous quarters, helping the victims with money and food." One consoling feature of this great calamity is that there has been very little looting, and that the deaths by drowning have been very few.

The Week in Austria.—Official proclamation of the new constitution for Bosnia and Herzegovina has been made. All native born inhabitants, as well as those Austrians and Hungarians who have reached the age of twenty-four and have resided in the former Turkish provinces for the space of one year, enjoy the right of franchise by constitutional provision. As will be recalled, Bosnia and Herzegovina were incorporated into the dual monarchy by imperial proclamation October 7, 1908.—The destructive storms which raged in Central Europe during the latter half of January wrought extensive damage in Tyrol. Railway operations practically ceased because of the prevailing floods and factory work was suspended throughout the province. Much misery and distress are reported among the people.—The stormy scenes predicted to follow the first appearance of Premier Graf Khuen-Hedevary's cabinet in the Reichstag of Hungary were fully realized; disorder such as has not been known in years marked the occasion. Still the new Premier is not likely to meet the violent opposition earlier looked for, since the proposed coalition between the two wings of the Liberal party has not been effected. Former Minister Kossuth, head of the moderates, and Julius von Justh, late President of the lower house and actual leader of the radicals, after several meetings have not succeeded in coming to an agreement in policy. During the second day's sitting of the Reichstag the new Premier announced his program. In seeking a solution of the critical question facing him, he affirmed that he would be guided strictly by existing law and the constitution. A new election will be soon called for. The demands of the radicals for industrial independence and for an independent state bank, Graf Khuen held to be questions of expediency merely. He heads his program with the question of universal franchise, which he means, however, to arrange for along the lines of the historical policy of the kingdom. The Premier concluded his address, which was frequently interrupted by the opposition, with a request that a provisional budget be accepted to meet the needs of the two months to come, during which time the possibility of a policy acceptable to all parties might be considered. In the upper house the proposals of Graf Khuen were favorably received and Graf Tisza, one of his predecessors in office, spoke with special earnestness in their defence. An unexpected reverse met in the third day's sitting again threw the parliament of the land into complete disorder. The opposition succeeded in passing a vote of "lack of confidence" in the new cabinet and Graf Khuen, giving no notice of his plans, suspended the meetings of the house until March 4.—Surprise is generally expressed that ex-Premier Wekerle and his late colleagues in the cabinet have not received the customary decorations from the Emperor. The ruler's grateful acknowledgment of the loyal service they had rendered was proclaimed, but for some reason not made known, the usual conferring of special orders did not take place.

Tariff Situation in Germany. The commercial relations between Germany and the United States under our new tariff law are still a subject of diplomatic negotiation. The reply of the American officials to the note sent late last week by Germany was a grave disappointment, since it contained no assurance that the United States intended to yield its demands regarding the cattle industry. Early in the week, in consequence, the dreaded tariff war seemed unavoidable as it was deemed impossible to come to peace terms by February 7 when the present commercial agreement between the two countries will expire. The industrial associations and the press of the empire remained steadfast in opposition to concessions in the matter of the cattle trade. Late in the week, however, an official statement appeared affirming more hopeful aspects. The live cattle and meat inspection provisions of the German law were tentatively adjusted, the United States yielding as to live cattle and Germany waving her microscopic meat inspection regulation. A proviso is added that the question of the importation of American live cattle into Germany be later taken up diplomatically or through a special commission.—On January 27 Emperor William celebrated his fifty-first birthday. The usual elaborate festivities marked the occasion and congratulations poured in upon his Majesty from all sides.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Paulist Jubilee

As one contemplates the incongruous environment of the Church of St. Paul the Apostle, at Fifty-ninth street and Columbus avenue, New York, the question naturally suggests itself to the stranger why the Paulist Fathers ever selected such a place for their ministrations. They did not; though the fact that their vast church is always packed with thousands of people at all the services would suggest that it was providential. But, as a matter of fact, when the first Fathers laid the foundations of their house in Fifty-ninth street, they found themselves in what was almost the open country. There were only a few houses scattered here and there, with no groups of them closer than lower Fifty-fourth street near the river. The country to the north was an unsettled region of rocks and swamps and woods. Central Park was only then beginning to be reclaimed from the wilderness; while further to the east, Harlem, whose name is still found on the general map of the city, was a village separated from "downtown" by the waters of the East River which at high tide lapped the shore of Third avenue. The Beekman swamps covered with malaria a wide stretch of that part of the Island, and the Harlem Railroad crawled over them on a rickety trestle. The New York Central, or Hudson River Railroad, as it was then called, had no entrance to the city on that side, but deposited its passengers on the west as far down as Chambers street, and covered with its freight yards what was once St. John's Park, below Canal street. In the vacant lots of Fifth avenue stood the white foundations of St. Patrick's Cathedral, on which work had been suspended, for the Civil War was then in progress, and upper Broadway, which is now an uninterrupted line of palaces, under which the subway hurries to the end of the island and beyond, with its millions of passengers, was then only the narrow Bloomingdale Road, where the old-fashioned "stage" lumbered sluggishly along on its way to Manhattanville. The river front had not yet been surrendered to commerce, but projected in high and precipitous rocks out into the then unpolluted waters; and there were swimming places for the boys in nooks and coves, as secure and secluded as if they were in some far away rural retreat.

Such was upper New York when Father Hecker and his associates laid the foundations of their great establishment. The block on Fifty-ninth street which is now so congested was in great part a beautiful garden, and on the Fifty-ninth street side of it they erected their residence high above what was then an unpaved roadway. They had no church, but set aside a part of their dwelling for the congregation which, because of its relatively small number, and the remoteness and isolation of the place, almost compelled its members to know each other intimately. The church was only a hall running along the street side of the residence; it was not large though the people thought it was, for New Yorkers were not then accustomed to vast ecclesiastical edifices; nor was it beautiful, but they were devotedly attached to it for many reasons, and perhaps because at times it expanded into the garden outside, so that on feasts like Corpus Christi they could accompany the Blessed Sacrament along the flower lined pathways and sing their jubilant anthems in the bright sunlight which always seemed to illumine those days. They were particularly happy then, for they were giving vent to their piety amid the verdure and fragrance in which the church was embowered; but inside or outside the edifice they all loved and admired the distinguished men who spoke to them from the sanctuary.

First of all was Father Hecker, then in the full vigor of his splendid manhood, erect, tall and robust; always radiating light and fire around him; panting with eagerness to impart to others the love of God that was burning in his own heart; constantly planning new ways to extend the Kingdom of Christ, and ever possessed and impelled by the idea that absorbed him of leading the world and especially his native country out of the darkness of error into the splendor of the light of faith. He seemed like a man who in other circumstances, and in other times, if the opportunity were offered, would have made a magnificent martyr. But his enthusiasm consumed him before his time; and the occasional glimpses his people caught of him in the fifteen years during which he lingered as a wreck of his former self brought deep sorrow to those who knew him when life was pulsing vigorously, perhaps too vigorously in his veins, and when his brain was busy with plans he could never realize.

With him was the gentle Tillotson, sweet, amiable, and persuasive, whose sermons were not set speeches or harangues, declaiming, demonstrating, denouncing, but conversations which explained, expostulated and pleaded. He was even coaxing in his tones at times; nor did he ever hesitate to lay bare the workings of his own candid soul. "I have completely forgotten what I wanted to say to you," he told us on one occasion; and then after a few more or less relevant sentences, he exclaimed as if he had recovered a lost treasure: "It has come back again; here it is," and he resumed his line of thought. Needless to say that such a speaker convinced and persuaded, for it was clear that his hearers were not being carried away by the brilliancy of rhetoric or the devices of the accomplished orator. It was not the value of the recovered thought they cared for, but they were captivated by the simplicity of the soul that was revealed.

The striking personality of Father Baker, of course, arises from the past. His handsome face was like a medallion. The features were perfect and their unalterable tranquillity suggested the ascetic, the man of prayer and mortification. His voice had almost a metallic ring about it in the beginning of his discourses, but it soon melted into music, and its charm held his hearers to the end. It was a sad day when the people gathered around his coffin, but there was a glory in those obsequies, for he had ended his career in a way that every priest would desire. He died a martyr of charity, because of the devoted care he had lavished on one of his brethren who was at the point of death. At the end, not the patient but Father Baker was carried to the tomb, and the new pall with its red cross which he had devised was first employed to shroud his coffin.

The well beloved poet and musician, Father Young, was there then; and indeed it may be said that he is still there in the song that rises from the sanctuary which he loved so much and for which he labored so long and well.

In that group also was the intense, the concentrated, the apostolically argumentative Hewitt, whose locks had even then begun to whiten. He was venerated chiefly for having almost achieved martyrdom, when he attempted to stay the fury of the mob in the bloody uprising of the Draft Riots which held New York in terror for many days. Indeed it was a marvel that he ever recovered from the savage blow of the adze that stretched him in his gore in the streets.

Finally, there was the single-minded, straightforward, but kindly and affectionate Deshon, whose name is written on every stone of the great edifice. It is his work, and his military training has imparted a fortress-like aspect to some parts of its exterior. Soldier though he was, he had the tender-heartedness of a child, and his friends remember how when he spoke of the death of Father Hecker his eyes were streaming with tears.

The advent of these men to the Church gave a shock to the Protestant world and sent a thrill through the heart of every Catholic. They came at a time when the outbreaks and outrages of Know-nothingism were not only fresh in men's minds but actually occurring; when the warrior prelate of New York, Archbishop Hughes, was maintaining his unaided fight against bigotry, misrepresentation, calumny and injustice; when there were scandals and tumults even within the fold; when the main body of the faithful verified what St. Paul said of the early Christians: "There are not many rich, not many wise, not many powerful." It was a time when Catholics were mostly immigrants, or their immediate descendants; almost exclusively of the laboring classes, and regarded with suspicion as foreigners; hated, scorned, despised, avoided, and actually proposed as fit subjects for miscegenation, which was to solve the problem of negro emancipation; in a word, as an inferior race who to all appearances would be forever debarred from any social, industrial, or political preferment by those who held in their possession the wealth and power of the land.

It was at this juncture that these single-minded men understood that misery, poverty, lowliness, and general social inferiority, which were the characteristics of almost all the Catholics of those days, were not marks of infamy and proofs of divine disapproval, but on the contrary, unimpeachable evidences of the divinity of the Church to which they belonged and necessary consequences of an ideal of life for which worldly prosperity and power were only of secondary importance, and which were not to be attained or retained at the expense of the supernatural purpose for which man was created.

It was to realize that divine distinction that these petitioners for the grace of God, though imbued from birth with all the prejudices of their class, occupying what is conventionally considered as a higher social position, and cherishing well founded hopes of all their world aspirations and ambitions, deliberately turned their backs on the world and cast their lot with the helots of the land; not fancying that they were conferring a favor on the Church in so doing, but blessing God for his ineffable mercy in giving them a pledge of predestination, and fixing on them the stigmata of Christ. Like St. Paul, their patron, they could now glory in their infirmities.

Their successors have done notable things during the fifty years that have elapsed since then, in their missions, their publications and their enthusiastic labors for the sacred ritual and the venerable chant of the Church. Warm-hearted and grateful recognition of their success has been universally accorded to them in all places and at all times, but especially on the splendid anniversary of their foundation which has just been celebrated. Countless throngs of people have crowded the immense basilica to overflowing; the purple and scarlet-robed princes of the Church have enhanced the splendor of the ceremonies by their presence, and multitudes of priests from far and near have come to say God-speed. It has been a notable week and a time of rejoicing for all Catholics, for it is a proclamation of the power and efficacy of the Catholic Faith; it is an acclamation of praise to God for His mercies in the past and a pleading for grace in the future. It is especially grateful for those who are passing away that while glorying in the present it recalls the memory of those illustrious men who made the present possible. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Father Tabb: the Man

The writer can claim no special friendship with Father Tabb. He, however, confesses to a deep admiration for the man; and it is his good fortune, not only to have passed through his English drill at St. Charles', but to have the figure of the amiable poet impressed indelibly on the tablets of a grateful memory. I see him now—tall, lank, short-cassocked, a girdle fastened loosely around his almost girthless loins, head erect, eyes flashing, and his facile tongue pronouncing the wizard's warning to Lochiel with the intensity of feeling and the solemnity of tone which we are accustomed to associate with the divine afflatus. Others have written of the poet—the literary artist who wrought in diamonds. Perhaps a vagrant in literary fields may be pardoned for viewing him as a man and a teacher, and, with due apologies to the critics and the craft, as a poet, too.

By birth and long lineage John Bannister Tabb was a Virginian; a Virginian in accent and affection he remained till the grave opened to receive his ashes. He was born at "The Forest" near Richmond; he was buried at Richmond. Nor can we fancy him quite at home in heaven, if there is no room there for love of the dear soil that yielded him.

"Nurtured upon my mother's knee,
From this mountain-breast apart,
Here nearer heaven I seem to be,
And closer to her heart."

These are his words, penned, as he tells us, in the mountains of Virginia. The spirit of the patriot was strong and deathless within him. He loved his native soil and suffered for it. The Lost Cause never had a more devoted champion or a more fervent eulogist. Though frequently invited by pupils and admirers to visit them in the north, he never could be induced to cross the Mason and Dixon line. He remained to the end an "unreconstructed Rebel."

The poet's family was one of the oldest and, before adversity frowned, one of the wealthiest of the Old Dominion. John Bannister was the third of four children. He had a grown-up sister to whom he dedicated his "Later Lyrics." With his passing the goodly old household ceases. Like the scion of many a quality family in the South, Father Tabb's infancy was spent under the tutelary care of a colored mammy. Of this faithful guardian of his helpless days the poet always spoke in terms of gratitude and affection. Nor did he halt at the re-telling of a family tradition to the effect that the good old granny, on first receiving in her arms her new-born charge, suddenly and without adding in the slightest degree to the wardrobe provided by nature, rushed through the house calling upon all that dwelt therein to come and see the homeliest baby ever born in Virginia. This incident may have taken on detail in the poet's fancy, for Father Tabb had no part in vanity. He enjoyed cordially the quaintness of his long, gaunt figure and his pointed features. He poked no end of fun at himself for being born into the world adorned with such exquisite homeliness, and devoid of every line of beauty. But what the body lacked was more than counterbalanced by his radiant loveliness of soul. His features were always lit up with intelligence and spirit. There was about him the air and distinction of the poet, and one forgot that nature's journeyman had made his person and made it ill.

When only six years old he had his servants. They were his property. One day he tried to barter one of them with a pedlar, offering a good healthy slave in exchange for a tin vessel whose brilliancy had caught his fancy. This youthful episode shows that the boy was father to the man, for by no stretch of imagination could the poet be associated with the driving of cold bargains. He would have made a sorry figure in the market-place. He disclaimed all familiarity with the mysteries of numerical combinations and never would admit that he had mastered the multiplication-table. If he had the poet's soul, he had the attendant horror for the things that make the merchant.

His boyhood was passed on the paternal estate. He was enamored of plantation life. He had his pets, and in their company grew in that love of nature which is so charmingly betrayed in his poems. His parents looked carefully to his intellectual training. He learned reading and writing at his mother's knee. At twelve he was provided with a private tutor, the children of the neighborhood being allowed to share the privilege. Here under the vigilance of his instructor he laid the foundations of that fine culture which is reflected in the high thought and exquisite form of his verses. When ten years of age he visited Richmond to consult an oculist. On that occasion his cousin, the daughter of Gov. Giles, took him sight-seeing. Before returning they strayed into the cathedral at the moment of Benediction. If the prophetic soul of the child of destiny could have lifted the veil, he would have beheld himself again in the same temple, drawing nearer the font, to have the waters of regeneration poured upon him by the future cardinal. If he could still further have penetrated the mystery, he would doubtless have been astonished to see himself in the same place discharging the same sublime function.

The affliction which came upon him towards the close of his days was foreshadowed even in boyhood. Between the age of fourteen and seventeen his sight was poorest. Much of his time was spent at the piano and away from his books. At fifteen his eyes were so weak that his tutor had to read to him daily. His sensitive soul made him realize vividly the supreme dereliction of those wholly bereft of sight. After twenty-eight years an incident of the class-room stands out strong and fresh before the writer. We had been reading "King John" and had come upon the famous word-duel between Hubert and the little prince. After reciting with deep pathos the lines:

"Hubert, the utterance of a brace of tongues
Must needs want pleading for a pair of eyes:
Let me not hold my tongue; let me not Hubert:
Or, Hubert, if you will, cut out my tongue,
So I may keep my eyes: O! Spare mine eyes!"

he paused and spoke at great length, and with marvelous insight of the utter misery of those who are cut off from the sweet light of day. And so he ever discovered a predilection for those who groped in "the primal gloom." To a six-year-old brother of one of his pupils he sent a copy of his "Child Verse." Of the incident he writes to a friend: "I sent a copy; because, like myself, he had suffered with his eyes, and been mercifully relieved. Cyril appreciates his book and affirms that 'twas sent to him directly by St. Tabb.'

Hardly had he completed his early education when the civil war broke out. The path of duty, as he conceived it, led him to the field. Too delicate, however, to serve in the camp, he was assigned to the navy, being appointed clerk to Capt. Wilkinson, a cousin by marriage. He left Richmond August 12, 1862, for England. The voyage was without incident save for the death of a passenger whose lonely departure quickened the fancy of the poet and gave occasion for the tender verses, "Off San Salvador." He returned from England on the Robert E. Lee. This famous craft won distinction as a blockade runner, and young Tabb passed through many a thrilling experience on her decks. During his naval career he was detailed as secretary to Col. Stone, who was sent to England on an important mission. On the same boat was Father Bannon, a chaplain of the Southern army, who was going to Rome in the hope of inducing Pius IX to recognize the Confederacy. The gifted young secretary had gained his knowledge of priests and the priesthood from ancestors reared in an atmosphere charged with anti-papal prejudice. Standing on the bridge one day with the captain, young Tabb was attracted by a distinguished looking gentleman who was reading a book. Learning from his superior officer that the stranger was a clergyman and a friend of the cause, he resolved to meet him face to face. With characteristic simplicity he accosted Father Bannon with these words: "Are you a Catholic priest?" On being answered in the affirmative, he ventured the further question: "Was your father a priest?" "No, my boy," returned the chaplain with a smile. Reassured by the kindness of the reply, Tabb urged: "Will your son be a priest?" Noting the good faith of his interrogator, Father Bannon said with gentle condescension, "I think not." Curious to examine the contents of the book which the priest was reading, the breviary was placed in his hands. Having satisfied himself that it was not filled with imprecations upon all dissenters from Rome, the interview ended. Before reaching Glasgow, however, the secretary and the priest had become good friends and a cloud of prejudice was lifted from one honest mind.

On June 4, 1864, Tabb with his chief, the captain of the Siren, was taken captive. After some delay they were sent to Point Lookout, a dungeon styled by the inmates, the Bull-pen. Here prisoners were thick; but the vermin were thicker, and the poet's vivid description of the creeping horrors of that prison-house made his pupils realize that the hell of war is not entirely confined to the cannon's roar and the horrible execution of the field. It was amid the squalor of the Bull-pen that he first met Sydney Lanier. Their spirits had previously met "somewhere in space." Lookout Prison was the last place in the world for two poets to meet. But no prison wall could restrain those ardent souls. They went abroad in fancy to suffer and bleed with their distracted countrymen. On a memorable February morn in 1865, the prison bolts were unfastened and together they stepped forth to breathe the air of freedom. So happy was one of the twain that, to use his own words, "I thought I was in the kingdom of heaven." So changed was he, however, that his family hardly recognized him. The horrors of those long prison months served to deepen his love for the ill-fated Confederacy.

It was the turning point of his life. The days of opulence had forever past. "After the war," said he, "I was poor." It became incumbent upon him to gain a livelihood. Music allured him and he hoped to find in it a career. A patron was at hand and the quondam soldier addressed himself to the work of preparation with an earnestness which amounted to genuine enthusiasm. For a year and a half he practised seven hours a day. But, his patron failing him, want stared him in the face and he was forced to abandon music—"a bitter disappointment," as he afterwards acknowledged. In the hour of distress his excellent early training stood him in good stead. He readily secured a position as teacher in St. Paul's school in Baltimore and filled his new post with distinguished success. Here he fell under the influence of the Rev. Alfred A. Curtis, pastor of Mt. Calvary Episcopal Church, a man of deep learning and earnest life, but of decided Roman proclivities. After attending the Episcopal Convention held in Boston in 1870, the Baltimore divine seemed to realize that his proper place was in the bosom of the real Catholic Church. Before making the great step, Mr. Curtis went to England and took counsel with the leading Tractarians. This was in 1871. A year later he was followed into the Church by his faithful Timothy, who was for some time a Catholic at heart, believing in Confession and the Real Presence.

Bishop Curtis must have communicated to his beloved disciple something of his respect for the English Tractarians. Newman had as many admirers as any man of modern times, but he numbered none more ardent than the young Virginian. Tabb loved the great Churchman, his prose, his poetry, his learning, his spirituality, his personality, his subtlety, and eagerly learned all that was to be known about him. Do we not owe something of the grace and beauty of "The Old Pastor" to the author of "Lead Kindly Light"?

"How long, O Lord, to wait
Beside this open gate?
My sheep with many a lamb
Have entered and I am Alone, and it is late."

There was never a more enthusiastic convert than Father Tabb. To serve the Church was the master passion of his Catholic life. With the gift of faith came also the poetic gift, or at least the realization of the gift. It was not till he had entered the true fold that he came before the world as a poet. Speaking of his first published effort he says: "God gave me the cloud." It was this same faith in God's goodness that sustained him in trial, and made him a personage of surpassing interest, whose career as a teacher and whose qualities as a man are hardly less fascinating than his achievements as a poet. In another article we shall accompany him to the class-room.

Mexico and the Yaquis

Although no serious person will look upon George Kibbe Turner's articles otherwise than as a means to sell the magazine for which he writes, it is well to give an account of the campaign which the Mexican Government has carried on against the Yaquis. Both during and after Colonial times, it has been forced to subdue them in order to prevent their depredations. During a period of peace the cacique Cajeme succeeded in uniting the two tribes, the Yaqui and the Mayo, and the result of this union was the equipment of about 5,000 warriors. Cajeme ruled with absolute power over the two tribes until there arose among the Yaqui tribe a party of opposition headed by Loreto Molina, a former cacique. They took refuge in the port of Guaymas (Sonora), where they remained until January, 1885. At that time a band of thirty armed men of Molina's party went toward the Yaqui river to attack Cajeme's house and kill him. In part they succeeded, for they burned his house and made his family prisoners. Cajeme, at the time, was absent. Cajeme then asked the Commander of the port of Guaymas to surrender his enemies, and stated that if they were not delivered within three days he would declare war. The Commander did not accede to Cajeme's request, and soon afterward 1500 Indian warriors appeared in the Valley of Guaymas. This was the beginning of the last period of the Yaqui war, which under different aspects has continued for twenty-four years. The Yaquis were defeated in 1886 by Gen. Angel Martinez and more than 2,000 prisoners were taken. The Indians sued for peace when their resources were exhausted; but during the periods of tranquillity they supplied themselves with arms and ammunition, which they generally bought in Arizona.

In a council which took place at Ortiz on the Sonora Railroad, the Yaquis, headed by their chief, Fetabiate, swore faithful obedience to the government. But after a period of two years the tribe took up arms, killing the missionaries as well as the other white inhabitants. When they once more were routed, they fled to the Bacetete mountains of Sonora, not to build new homes and live in peace, as Mr. Turner says, but to enter upon a guerilla warfare. The history of Sonora records many instances of the cruelties of these Indians. One of them is the following: One Sunday afternoon, five young men who were hunting were attacked and killed by a party of Indians. The authorities of the State examined into the case, and when the guilty parties were convicted they were sentenced to death. Mr. Turner gives us two photographs of the execution of these Indians, but, of course, he is careful to omit the cause that called it forth.

Mr. Turner says that foreigners, particularly if they are Americans, were never attacked by the Yaquis. The same opinion was held in the press of this country some time ago, but soon it was found to be a gross mistake.

The government of Mexico had to devise some means to check such outrages. The only possible ways were: (1) to exterminate the Indians, as was done in this country, or (2) to deport them to some part of Mexico where, away from their haunts, they could be useful to themselves and to others. The deportation plan was adopted. In 1906, the first party of Yaquis was sent to Yucatan. The last party was sent in the fall of 1908, and since that time not a single Indian has been sent to Yucatan or anywhere else. The number of those deported was from 5,000 to 6,000, counting men, women and children. The measures taken to subdue the Yaquis have been most successful. These Indians are noted for a great love for their native soil. So it was that during the latter part of 1908 the Yaquis who still remained in rebellion (20,000 to 25,000 in number) submitted to the government and since then they have remained peaceful, working either on their own account or in the mines and farms of the surrounding towns.

Mr. Turner tells us that G. G. Lelevelier wrote him to the effect that Gen. Angel Martinez used to hang the Yaquis because they refused to betray their companions. If these charges be true, the Mexican Government can not be blamed, because in the same letter we are informed that the General was removed when the Federal Government was informed of his deeds by the chief of the geographical commission. One of the two examples of Mexican cruelty which Turner quotes from Santa de Cabora (whom he considers to be a highly educated woman) is exaggerated, and the other is absurd. In the first place, it is charged that the number of Yaquis hanged at Navajoa in 1892 was so large that the supply of rope in town was exhausted. Now, the method of execution used by the Mexican Government is the rifle, and this method would certainly be used with greater facility than hanging by the general of an army in actual service.

The second charge is that in July, 1892, two hundred Yaqui prisoners were dropped into the ocean, all of them perishing. What advantage could the Mexican Government derive from such cruelty? Was it not more logical to send them to Yucatan and make $13,000 out of them, since according to Turner himself the Yaquis are sold to the Yucatan hemp planters at $65 a head? Mr. Turner made the trip to Yucatan with a Mexican officer, who disclosed his easy way of making money to a stranger and gave out names of persons, who, while holding high positions in the government, were accomplices in the slave trade. But the names of these persons Mr. Turner, perhaps out of the bounty of his charity, has failed to mention. Many letters of protest have been sent to the editor of the American Magazine, but they were not published because the editor "has not found them to be of any interest." On the other hand, a number of letters have been published in the same magazine corroborating Turner's statements; but the majority of these letters are published without signatures. The editor ignores the articles that have been written against the statements of Turner in the press of Texas and California, states whose people, on account of their nearness to Mexico, are well qualified to judge of the conditions of that country. He also ignores the fact that Governor Warner of Michigan, who visited Mexico and the State of Yucatan in particular, denied the charges of Turner in an interview with a reporter of Actualidades.

BENJAMIN MOLINA.

The Canals of Mars

The Astronomische Nachrichten No. 4382, just received (Jan. 25, 1910), contains communications from two eminent astronomers concerning the nature of the canals of Mars. The first is in Spanish from José Comas Solá, Director del Observatorio Fabra, Barcelona, Spain. He uses a 15-inch twin photographic and visual telescope. In his article, "Observaciones de Marte," under date of Barcelona, November 18, 1909, he has the following to say about the canals:

"I must observe that never in my twenty years of observing Mars with a great variety of instruments, have I succeeded in seeing the geometrical wonders which have been published so profusely in every part of the world. I have ever been an enemy to these imaginations, and have been convinced that they were either illusions or exaggerations of the observers.

"I do not deny that there are borders whose appearance could lead one to assert the existence of the canals. In fact, I have myself often observed some like those that appeared in maps long before the classical observations of Schiaparelli; but those borders are wide and diffuse and rarely well defined, and have no geometrical outline except in some very exceptional case.

"The present opposition has given full confirmation to my theories: The canals that I have seen were diffuse and wide except a few that were unquestionably formed by the outlines of lakes. As far as I am concerned this opposition has dealt a mortal blow to the marvelous canals with which during the last thirty years some observers have covered the planet against all sane geometrical conclusions.

"Those that may wish additional information on this subject I refer to what I wrote in 1901 (Bulletin de la Société astronomique de France), which was reprinted in the second volume of the work of M. C. Flammarion, "La planète Mars," page 534. During all the years that have passed I have seen no reason to retract or modify one word of what I then wrote."

The second communication is in French from C. M. Antoniadi, who, writing from Paris, December 27, 1909, under the title "On the Nature of the Canals of Mars," says:

"The observations that I have been able to make this year at the Observatory at Meudon, thanks to the kindness of M. Deslandres, its director, have shown that Mars is covered like the moon with markings very irregular in form and color. This conclusion agrees for the rest with the results obtained at Meudon by M. Millochau (1898-1903).

"In a letter of September 23, 1909, I called the attention of the editor of the Astronomische Nachrichten to the fact that the Henry objective of 0.83 metre (32.7 inches) at Meudon shows 'no trace whatever of the geometrical network on Mars, while it distinguishes details incomparably finer' than the straight-lined 'canals.' A note published five days later (in Athenæ, Sept. 28, 1909), gave it as my conclusion that a geometrical network does not exist on Mars.

"As M. Deslandres kindly allowed me to continue my observations until the end of November, I was in a condition to study the surface of Mars with the great equatorial under favorable conditions. The conclusions of this work, in as far as they concern the 'canals,' may be expressed in the following terms:

"1. When the image is calm, the aspect of the planet Mars is natural, like that of the moon;

"2. The geometrical forms present themselves very furtively in dancing images; and

"3. The regions of the planet that are called 'continental' are covered with an innumerable number of grayish, irregular, varicolored markings, whose sporadic groupings give place in small instruments to Schiaparelli's system of 'canals.'

"In this way the 'canals' of the illustrious Italian astronomer really have an objective source; and this is why they can be photographed. But, far from looking upon them as true canals, we ought to consider them simply as natural, irregular and discontinuous markings which divide up the surface of Mars.

"These conclusions from the Observatory at Meudon confirm the theories of Maunder (1894-1895), Cerulli (1898-1900), and André (1909)."

Ernest Hello*

Ernest Hello! Who is he? Thousands of his countrymen have never read his pages; to the foreigner he is almost entirely unknown. Yet few figures of the nineteenth century are so striking, few writers better deserve to have their names preserved. Joseph Serre in his "Ernest Hello" has painted an admirable full length portrait of this extraordinary man, bold of outline, rich in coloring and detail, glowing with life where light and shade harmoniously blend. Ernest Renan, who did as much to ruin the faith of his countrymen in the nineteenth century as Voltaire in the eighteenth and with the same insincerity of method, was a child five years old in Tréguier, not many miles away, when Ernest Hello was born at Lorient in 1828. Like Renan he was a Breton. If in the former, Taine's influence-theory of the race, the moment and the environment seems at fault, in the latter it is admirably fulfilled.

*Ernest Hello, Par Joseph Serre. P. Féron-Vrau, 3 et 5, Rue Bayard, Paris, VIIIe.

Hello had the ruddy convictions, the sturdy independence of his Celtic stock. The fighting blood of searovers coursed in his veins. He had the sublime Faith of the Land of Armor. He possessed in his character and in his intellectual make-up something of the tough grain of those granite-ribbed shores, thunder-beaten by the sea. He had the brooding melancholy of that home of the Druids and the idealism of the dream-haunted Celt. He was the son of a distinguished judge and of a lady dowered with the high-bred refinement of the olden time. Studies in which he outstripped every rival paved the way for a dazzling career. He chose the bar, but relinquished it almost immediately. His colleagues in some discussion had decided that a lawyer might defend a case the injustice of which was known to him. This was too much for the chivalrous Hello. The law-courts never saw him again.

At Hello's side a noble woman fought. For over thirty years, from the day on which she became the delicate and awkward philosopher's bride, Zoé Berthier was his good angel. In his doubts, in his fightings with all that he loathed, injustice, sham, hypocrisy, worldliness, untruth, she ever had the word to cheer, holding in her brave hands the torch of Faith steady and undimmed. If Hello wrote and fought, if his words flash flame and fire we owe it to his wife whose devotion kept alive the spark of genius in the fragile vase, which without her care it might have consumed.

"A letter, a book, a battle," some one said of Sir Philip Sidney, "how little to justify his prodigious fame!" With greater truth, we might reecho almost the same words of our hero. A short-lived journal, "Le Croisé," whose first pages won the admiration of the Curé of Ars, a Hercules strangled in its cradle, articles scattered in magazines, a few books, "L'Homme," "Les Plateaux de la Balance," "Renan, l'Allemagne et l'Athéisme au XIXe Siècle," "Paroles de Dieu," but simplicity, originality, grandeur are stamped on every page.

The life of Hello, whom Lamartine called the Christian Plato, is uneventful. Still that life was intense. Hello is a deep, original thinker, and his thought is eminently Catholic, first in his Faith, then because he is so universal; because he is a philosopher not of a sect or a school, but one whose system is all-embracing in its sympathies, sweeping into its broad circumference all things true and fair, Faith and Science, Religion and Art.

He realized the spaciousness of Catholicism. To have pointed them out even to a narrow circle will be his glory. For him, Catholicism, as its name implies, is universal in its aims, its sympathies and range. Among the religious, philosophical, moral and social systems in the world, Catholicism alone is in stable equilibrium. The stars in its firmament illuminate the problems of man's destiny, the Creator's authority, the creature's liberty, the fall of our race, its redemption, its weakness and its glories. Other systems are incomplete. There is a hitch somewhere. Rationalism unduly exalts human reason. Protestantism exaggerates the human will to the detriment of the authority of God. Socialism considers one partner, the State; the individual is forgotten. Science catalogues the stars, but does not know how to read in their letters of fire the name of Him who made them. In Catholicism alone, Science and Faith, the natural and the supernatural, the finite and the infinite, God and man, earth and heaven meet and blend perfectly. Such was Catholicism to Hello. A splendid conception!

Hello united to profound thought unusual brilliancy of style. Read his literary profession of faith: "Style is the explosion of our whole being; it is our creation. We do not create ideas, we create our style. Our style is our personal signature affixed to our idea. It constitutes our armorial bearings, our arms; it is our heraldic device, our seal, our crest struck on the glowing iron, stamped on the molten metal." The sovereign quality of Hello's life was sincerity, candor, the usual mould of his thought, the sublime; in his style both are welded and fused. "Electricity," he cries, "the effort of matter to become spirit!" "When (in the Scriptures)" he says again, "the poor man's name is mentioned, God is not far!" "He whom we seek," he tells us, "is He who is. He is the One Necessary Being, and the feverish unrest which drags us on all the pathways and byways of life is but the realization of His absence and the hunger of the soul. The loftiest mountain-peaks conquered and scaled reveal Him not, in the new horizons they unfold, to the traveler's straining eyes. The virgin snows mantling the topmost crests of the Himalayas, those inaccessible snows no hand has touched, no eye admired, even they have not seen the beauty of His Face. Oh! had they seen it, they would have become a stream of fire."

Recalling the legend of the sunken City of Is whose mysterious bells toll under the waters, Renan had the audacity to say that bells sounded in his heart "calling to sacred rites the faithful who no longer hear." Those rites, alas! were unhallowed, the altar desecrated and empty. But solemn, deep toned cathedral bells pealed in Ernest Hello's heart. With Faith, Hope and Love vibrating in every note, they summon us still to the Temple of Truth.

The Effect of the Separation on Protestantism in France

NICE-CIMIEZ, JANUARY 14, 1910.

A short while before the separation of the Church and State in France, the Rev. Merle d'Aubigné, the grandson of the notorious writer of the "History of the Reformation," preached in New York a sermon in which he urged the "separation" as a means of destroying French "Romanism." In fact, he appears to have been sent to America to create sympathy for the plot of Waldeck Rousseau, Clemenceau, and Briand. The plot succeeded, but what is the result for the Protestant element, always small in France? The Journal des Débats of January 12, in a short editorial, tells the story. The result, says the Débats, for the Protestant churches has been schism and deficit. They were united before the separation, now they are divided into three factions, the Evangelicals, the Liberals, and the third party of nondescripts. Only the Lutheran Church, very small, and faithful to the "Confession of Augsburg," remains one. The financial statement for 1908 gives the expenses of these sects as 1,986,977 francs, including the expenses of the faculties of theology in Paris and in Montauban. This heavy charge leaves a deficit of 160,000 francs, increasing every year since the Separation, and which will increase enormously after the year 1911, when certain pensions now paid to the ministers will cease. In 1905 the State helped those churches to the amount of 1,686,550. Since then their expenses have increased 303,427; and they see bankruptcy staring them in the face.

The French Protestants now find it hard to get ministers. The number of the students for the ministry has decreased. In 1905 there were 55 students in Paris, now there are only 22 there; and in Montauban there are only 20. Parents no longer encourage their sons to become ministers, for on account of the deficit no proper salaries can be paid; and the obligation of the "pastors" to take up frequent collections diminishes their authority and hampers their ministry. As the Briand bill renders legacies or donations to churches illegal, there is no hope from that quarter. Thus the Calvinists of France and Merle d'Aubigné who helped the separation, are reaping what they sowed. This is not the first time that one has been hoist by his own petard, or the maker of a gallows the first to hang from it.

Perhaps this is a typical small parish in the South of France, and your readers would like to read how things are done since the Separation. The church here has one of the prettiest sites in the world, on a hill overlooking Nice and the Mediterranean Sea, and dates from the days of Charlemagne. The other morning, with my cassock slung over my left arm like a folded overcoat, I walked the quarter of a mile that intervenes between my hotel and the church to say Mass. Sauntering along in the early morning, about eight o'clock, I was overtaken by a small crowd of boys and a man. The boys were going to school. The man was evidently their teacher. The boys were good and polite. I cannot say the same for the man. He was of medium size and slight build; bearded, dark skinned, almost as dark as the skin of the mummies in the Capuchin Convent in Rome; dull eyed and morose looking. I did not know the way to the church, so I said to him: "Can you please tell me the way to the little Catholic church here?" His answer was a sharp look, a scowl, and a small snarl very like that which a woman's lap dog makes when you come near his mistress; the snarl said "no." Of course he lied, but he saw I was a priest and I suppose he feared that some of the boys would tell that he had been talking with a curé. After a little tramp they all entered the "secular school," and I continued my walk to the church. I had seen a specimen of the miserly paid, half starved teachers of the government schools, whose love for a few francs a year makes cowards and semi-renegades even of the best of them.

At the church I met two round faced pleasant abbés, the rector and his vicar; and as we had mutual acquaintances, one of them knew the Sulpician Vigouroux, the great Scripture scholar, we became immediately friends. I have said Mass there often since. I saw the children gathered in the church for instruction in Catechism; and I read the bishop's rule, printed and posted on the door of the building, requiring on the part of the children faithful attendance at the Catechism instructions for two years before receiving first Communion. On Sunday, after nine o'clock Mass, the children were gathered around the Crib, which is kept in the church at Christmas time much longer than with us in America, and one of the priests was teaching the boys and girls the meaning of the Crib and ended his instruction by reciting prayers. Were all the children there that should be there? No! The attendance depends on the good will of the parents; and many of the parents are lukewarm, while some of them have little religion.

There is no better clergy in the world than the French clergy of to-day; and while in the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries there were reasons in France for not respecting many of the clergy, there is no such reason now. The clergy of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries in France in zeal, self-sacrifice and intelligence are not surpassed and hardly equaled by any clergy in the world.

"How do you get along here, Monsieur le Curé?" "Ah," said he, with a shrug of the shoulders, "we do our best and trust in divine Providence. The people are beginning to be more generous, and sympathy for us is growing." "But how is it that I see so many pictures of St. Francis of Assisi around here; and it is stated that this is a Franciscan monastery?" "So it is," he replied. "We are Franciscans; but as the government will not permit us to wear our dress we have to appear as secular abbés." And there I was, before the brown-robed frati of Assisi dressed as secular. Pardon me, reader, but I very nearly exploded when I spoke to them of their miserably petty government that violates, by so-called laws, all the elementary principles of honor and justice when religion is in question; a government that prates of liberty and yet imitates Nero in despotism; that puts notices on the lamp-posts of Paris to be gentle and kind to horses, while it uses the lash on priests and nuns! They are scourged at the pillar like their Master.

Cardinal Satolli's Funeral

ROME, JANUARY 11, 1910.

The number and rank of those who attended the funeral of the late Cardinal Satolli made it a truly imposing demonstration. By very special permission of His Holiness it took place in the Basilica of St. John Lateran, the Pope's own cathedral as Bishop of Rome, of which the lamented Prince of the Church was arch-priest. Cardinal Satolli's great and varied activity made him one of the best known members of the Sacred College. Pope Leo XIII found in him an energetic and valued assistant in introducing the reform in studies to which the great pontiff devoted himself, but the part taken by the deceased Cardinal in the election of Pope Pius X is less generally known. When Cardinal Sarto's name was so prominent on the list of candidates that the outcome could almost be foreseen, he simply could not bring himself to accept the dignity. It was then that Cardinal Satolli went to him privately and insisted that he should sacrifice his personal feelings to the manifest will of God and thus won from him the promise that if elected, he would accept the decision of the conclave.

An important Constitution de Episcopis, now in process of publication, will form part of the forthcoming revised edition of canon law.

An official notice in the latest issue of the "Gerarchia Ecclesiastica," the official annual of the Holy See, directs all who in any way form part of the papal household, as domestic prelates for example, to send their addresses to the office for publication every month of November; otherwise their names will be dropped from the lists.

We learn from the same source that there are now in the Catholic world fourteen patriarchal sees, eight being of the Latin and six of the Oriental Rites; 185 resident Latin archbishops and 19 Orientals; 748 resident Latin bishops and 52 Orientals; 610 titular sees and 23 nullius in dioceseos. There are seven apostolic delegations, 151 vicariates apostolic and 63 apostolic prefectures. During the present pontificate six dioceses have been raised to archdioceses, and 18 dioceses, 14 vicariates and nine prefectures have been created. L'EREMITA.

Anti-Christian Influences in Brazil

I. FREEMASONRY.

During the years in which the Catholic press of Brazil has been waging war on Freemasonry, the courage and constancy of the Bi-Hebdomadario Catholico of Rio Janeiro have been especially in evidence. That one may be at once a Catholic and a Mason is unfortunately an assertion that will not down among Brazilians, and its influence sadly hampers Catholic activity and organization in the country. All in vain is reference made to facts known to all, which clearly prove the anti-Catholic tendencies of masonry; even the official program of the body in Rio Janeiro—its opposition to Christian schools and religious instruction, its enmity to religious orders and congregations, its interference with the Christian-social movement among Catholics here, do not open the eyes of "Catholic" Masons. The old catchword of "religious toleration" safeguards masonry and its anti-Christian endeavor.

Some time ago a correspondent from Paiz asked the question: Whence arises the danger threatening Catholicism through Freemasonry? Don Carlos de Laet, editor of the Bi-Hebdomadario, made answer: "Formerly one might not suggest aught of opposition between Catholicism and Freemasonry without being reproached with fanaticism, and out-of-date ultramontanism. But happily in our day it is entirely possible to draw proof of the bitterness of this opposition from masonic sources. In a recent issue of the official Revista Maçônica (March, 1909) one of the leaders of the Masonic body in Brazil emphatically declares that no Catholic can be a good Mason, and protests against the admission of a Catholic to the lodge's mysteries. The Catholic Church, so this leader affirms, for twenty centuries has terrorized humanity, drawing its strength from ignorance and superstition." Dr. de Laet, in further answer, makes reference to the Bulletin des convocations et ordres du jour of the Grand Orient in France. "When one finds," he quotes from this document, "that Jesus has never lived, that reference to such a person was first introduced into the Scriptures by a certain Bar-Jehouda, one hundred years after the pretended crucifixion, that all Jews, Christian as well as non-Christian, were well aware of the deception, is not his duty clear? No man of honor may have part in a living lie; his whole energy must be directed to crush out the lie and replace it by the living truth."

To show that he does not theorize merely, Dr. de Laet refers to some facts of recent occurrence which should impress even those who are as blind as the "Catholic" Freemasons. He calls their attention to the case of Dr. Furtado Menezes of Minas Geraes, a Catholic candidate for the Chamber of Deputies, whose election was nullified through Masonic influence, though it had been fully approved by the returning board; he refers to high-handed disturbance of the May devotions in Therezina by the Masons, and the cruel attack made by their partisans on the pastor of the church, who owes his life to the energetic action of an army officer; he recalls the ovation with which they welcomed Anatole France on his recent trip to Brazil—and to many incidents of similar offense to Catholics. "Everywhere," he concludes, "the anti-Christian influence of the body is at work and the struggle is on. Surely it is time for those who profess to follow Christ and to be enrolled under His banner, the cross, to make good their profession and to leave the camp of the enemy."

A recent mandate of the Secretary of the Interior, Dr. Estevan Pinto, directed to the teacher in charge of the school of Estiva (Municip. Porto Alegre) makes interesting reading in this connection. We quote the order as well as our commentary from the Vozes de Petropolis of September, 1909 (No. 3): "We recommend you," so runs the mandate, "to remove from your school-rooms all religious pictures and emblems, and to cease touching upon religious topics in your instructions to the pupils, since these things do not belong to our system of school-training." Against this action of the Secretary energetic protest was raised by the Central Directory of the district. The action was all the more unjust, it was affirmed, since the larger number of the public classes were held in the home of the Professor or in buildings leased by him at his own expense. During the regular class hours the building may be considered a "public building," but out of these hours no official has a right to enter into the building to inquire what is being done. Despite this, so the protest goes on, the Professor is not permitted to impart religious instruction to his pupils, though this is done out of the ordinary school time, though it is done in his own house and at the request of the children's parents. One hundred and fifty-three heads of families in the town of Xopotó formulated a similar protest, in which they declared their intention "not merely to object to the action, but as a manner of reparation for the scandalous procedure we shall procure two crucifixes which we shall cause to be hung in the schoolrooms of this district as a symbol of our Catholic faith and as a protection for our children against the impiety of the day."

One might suppose that a congress of learned men, convened to discuss matters of science, would find no place on its program for the consideration of purely politico-religious questions. Such seems not to have been the case in the first gathering of the "Congresso Brasileiro de Geographia," which was in session September 7-16, in the "Monroe-Palacio" in Rio de Janeiro. After the reading of the papers prepared for the meeting, the sole woman delegate present startled the body by bringing up the following question: "I move that the Congress call the attention of the civil authority to the constitutional provision which declares 'lay-teaching' (non-religious instruction) to be the sole instruction which the Indians, in the interests of our republican institutions, may receive." A spirited debate followed the general surprise caused by the motion, though the President of the Congress, Marquez de Paranaguá, had met the woman's interpellation with the threat: "If political and religious questions come into discussion among us I shall leave the chair." The Catholic delegates present made manful efforts to have the motion set aside, but to no avail—it was finally accepted by a vote of 35 to 28. The Vozes de Petropolis closes its account with the quiet sarcasm: "We promise to inform our readers when the thirty-five spirited defenders of the motion will have gone out among the Indians to carry to them the beneficial help of state lay-teaching."

Dr. Cassio de Rezente published lately in the Jornal de Commercio of Rio de Janeiro some interesting statistics regarding the ravages of tuberculosis in the capital city during the past fifty years. Within that period 107,032 deaths in the city were due to the disease, making an average yearly death-rate in its case of 2.18. The records show a constantly increasing number of deaths year after year from the "white plague," though the relative percentage of deaths to population, because of rapid growth of the city, has fallen off quite two-thirds. The effects of the scourge are realized the better when one compares its fatalities with those of other diseases. The deaths due to tuberculosis exceed those following any other form of sickness taken by itself—and even the sum of the deaths caused by several taken together. In the years 1868-1908, 93,046 died of tuberculosis, whilst the total of the deaths resulting from typhus, grippe, diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles and pest, was 63,911; yellow fever and small-pox together numbered 82,145 victims.

Novena of St. Geneviève in Paris

JANUARY 9, 1910.

Although scepticism and irreligion are openly taught in the Government schools in France (their so-called neutrality being a myth that the recent letter of the French bishops has thoroughly unveiled), certain religious beliefs and practices, the heritage of generations, are deeply rooted even among the working classes of Paris. Apart from the thorough-going Catholics, belonging to all classes of society, who are, even now, making a brave fight against the evil influences that are undermining the faith of their countrymen, there exists a large percentage of respectable, quiet folk, chiefly among the working classes and well-to-do bourgeois, who are neither zealous Catholics nor rampant Anti-Clericals. Peace-loving and narrow-minded, they are much swayed by the opinion of "le Gouvernement," in whose service many of them are employed; they have no great love for the curés, whom they look upon as the enemies of that same government, but certain days of the year appeal to their dormant religious feelings, and the nine days of the novena of St. Geneviève are among these important dates.

The novena begins on January 3, the feast day of the patroness of Paris, and from that day to the 11th an uninterrupted rush of pilgrims flows towards the Church of St. Etienne du Mont, where St. Geneviève's, now alas, empty tomb, attracts them. Many of these pilgrims are unversed in historical lore, but they all know the story of the Shepherdess of Nanterre, Geneviève, who twice saved Paris from destruction, once by preventing the ferocious king of the Huns, Attila, from entering the city, and another time by providing food for its famished inhabitants. Puvis de Chavannes' famous frescoes have put the story in a poetical form that appeals to their imagination. These frescoes adorn the Panthéon, once the Church of St. Geneviève; but even more suggestive to our mind than the meeting between Geneviève and Attila is the fresco that represents the saint, an old woman wrapped in a white veil, watching over the slumbering city. The idea holds good even now, and we can still imagine Geneviève, from the heights above, praying for the restless, sceptical, frivolous Paris of to-day, threatened as it is by enemies more harmful to its children's souls than war and famine.

Devotion to St. Geneviève has always been characteristic of the Parisians. After her happy death in 512, the saint was buried in a fine basilica dedicated to the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, that stood on the eminence still called "la Montagne Ste-Geneviève." In 857, the church was burnt by the Norman invaders; it was restored in 1185 and continued to exist until the reign of Louis XV, who replaced it by the new Church of Ste-Geneviève, afterwards called the Panthéon.

In the olden days, when the king lay dangerously ill, when the country was afflicted by famine, pestilence or war, the relics of the gentle saint, who had so lovingly cared for Paris, were borne in procession through the streets by men walking barefooted, "with the greatest devotion," says Madame de Sevigné, who witnessed the procession in 1675. A picture by Largillière represents the procession of 1694; the members of the Government, magistrates, clergy, corporations of workmen, religious orders, and all classes of the population. It is related that the women of the people used to throw themselves on the châsse, weeping and praying aloud, their arms full of clothes, that they insisted should touch the reliquary.

One of the first acts of the Revolutionary Government was to desecrate the new church. The relics of the saint were burnt on the "place de Grève" at night, because it was feared that the sacrilegious act might exasperate the people, and to the Panthéon, as they called St. Geneviève's, were brought the bodies of Mirabeau, Marat, Voltaire and Rousseau. The first two, after a brief stay in the temple "dedicated to great men," were contemptuously dragged forth and thrown into some unknown cemetery; they ceased to be heroes when their friends ceased to be in power. Voltaire's gorgeous funeral procession, on July 12, 1791, was sorely disturbed by a violent thunder storm that drenched the allegorical personages who, clad as Greek and Romans, escorted the body. After the Revolution, the Pantheon again became a church, but it has now been desecrated for the second time and only the frescoes of de Chavannes remind the twentieth century visitor that during nearly a thousand years, the patroness of Paris was honored on the spot. Yet Geneviève's memory is, in reality, more closely connected with the heathen-looking edifice that covers the site of her medieval basilica than with the picturesque Church of St Etienne du Mont, where her novena takes place. Here are preserved the fragments of her tomb,

LITERATURE

HUYSMANS

The road of the Beautiful is not the least traveled of those that lead to Rome. How many have been led to God by the contemplation of art consecrated to the service of truth! Think of Winckelmann, Schlegel, Chateaubriand—and of Joris Karl Huysmans, whose conversion the famous Danish convert, Jørgensen, has so beautifully described in his latest work, "Joris Karl Huysmans." (Mainz, Kirchheim, 1909. Kultur und Katholizismus, Bd. IX.)

Huysmans belonged to the school of Zola. He was a realist and decadent in the worst sense these words can bear. His earlier works are sinks of filth and brutishness. They belong to the class that demoralize a nation by mocking at the sacredness of marriage and championing conjugal infidelity. "A Rebours" (1884) reflects a soul at war with God and disgusted with itself and with all about it—the story of a decadent. "I have lost all courage," he cries out in despair; "life disgusts me!—Lord, have mercy on the despairing Christian, the wretched man, who would fain believe, the slave on the galley of life, who has embarked alone in the night under a sky no longer lit up by the cheering lights of the old hope." But Huysmans was to sink deeper still before the final rescue came. He sought healing for his torn soul in the mystical aberrations of the Orient. In "Là-bas" (In the Depths) he describes this phase of his career. Into ghastlier depths man can scarcely descend. Only two ways of escape were open to him—a bullet through his brain or return to God. The husks of the swine could be endured no longer. Dozens of his associates had chosen the former way. Huysmans, almost against his will, followed the latter and was saved.

Neither her sublimity nor her truth brought him back to the Church, but the contemplation of her beauty, which is, in the last analysis, the reflex of her truth—splendor veritatis. "It is said of him," writes Jørgensen, "that he entered the Church through her painted windows. So much is true—he worshipped truth as the source of beauty; truth manifested itself to him by the splendor of its beauty."

In order to distract himself, Huysmans had visited a church for the first time in many years. It was St. Sulpice. There he heard the Dies Iræ, the De Profundis, the versicles and psalms of the Office of the Dead, "which fall on the soul like so many shovelfuls of earth on a coffin." During Holy Week he wandered about the churches of Paris, and the majestic solemnity of the liturgy moved the innermost depths of his being. The beauty of Catholic worship haunted him by day and by night. He could not rid himself of its magic influence. When night fell on the great city, he would seek refuge from the garish light of the streets in the semi-darkness of some Gothic church, "one of those merciful churches of the Middle Ages, one of those damp, blackened chapels, which are still full of chants, beautiful paintings and the scent of old incense and extinguished candles." Here was his Father's House at last, and in the little confessional in the corner the prodigal received the kiss of forgiveness, the robe of innocence, the shoes and the ring. "An unusual way to God," says Jørgensen, "but surely a way none the less."

From a worshiper of occult science and Oriental mysticism, Huysmans became a follower of the great Christian ascetics and mystics ("La Cathédrale," "L'Oblat," "Ste. Lydwine de Schiedam"). He lived in the Middle Ages, the moyen âge énorme et délicat, whose "white soul" he was forever evoking.

A Knight of God. By EDITH MARY POWER. St. Louis: B. Herder. The Woman Who Never Did Wrong. By KATHERINE E. CONWAY. Boston: Thomas J. Flynn & Co.

The first of these two novels is a tale of the "spacious days of Elizabeth," so spacious for Catholics that they were given barely room enough to hang themselves in. The recusant, the priest-hunter, the torture and the prison-house of Old England are not new topics for the Catholic writer of fiction. Fifty years ago, they were his stock-in-trade. But, we do things better now. "The Knight of God" is an absorbing story. The scene is laid in Yorkshire, and the hero is that rarest of things—in books if not in real life—a human saint. He is one of those thrice blest whose "loves in higher love endure." The story gives the reader not a few honest thrills, and a plenty of honest pathos, the note of which is never forced. It is almost ungracious to criticize anything in so sterling a Catholic book, the best of its kind that has ever come under our notice, but will the author pay more attention to the articulation of her long sentences? While they are not so bad as other long sentences we have met—sentences which would appear to have come into existence through the fortuitous concurrence of clauses—they are, nevertheless, now and then a trifle disjointed.

Miss Conway has a versatile pen. Having given us books of travel, poetry, biography, essays, anthology, decorum, sociology, piety, with two or three novels, she now supplements these fine achievements with a slender volume of short stories, nine in number; they are all short and sweet, and vibrant, as are all of Miss Conway's books, with the note of Catholicity. It is superfluous to say that these stories are interesting. Miss Conway is never dull.

Abraham Lincoln, the People's Leader in the Struggle for National Existence. By GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM, Litt.D. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25 net.

This volume is taken up with the Emancipator's administration. Fifteen pages bring us to 1846, when Lincoln entered Congress as a Whig, and two score pages trace his course from 1846 to 1861. The boy, the husband, the father, is kept in the background; the leader, as a model of civic virtues, is set before us. Compromise is necessarily a palliative rather than a cure. The compromises on slavery in the Constitution served the purpose for thirty years; the Missouri Compromise did duty for an equal length of time; and it was thought that the Compromise of 1850 might last at least as long. Each of these had been presented and accepted as a final solution of the burning question.

The overwhelming defeat of the Whigs in 1852 seemed to have given to the victors the impression that all opposition, if not destroyed, was crushed beyond hope of recovery. Yet the triumph was more apparent than real, for though they had secured four-fifths of the electoral vote, they had obtained a majority of only 215,000 of the popular vote. The election of 1852 warranted the introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska bill (p. 17), which annulled the Congressional compromises and opened up the whole question afresh. In 1854 twenty representatives held their seats in virtue of the slave population; on its final passage the Kansas-Nebraska bill mustered a majority of only thirteen. The success of this measure caused the formation of a political party which went back to Thomas Jefferson for its name and for its stand on slavery.

It was made up of heterogeneous elements united only upon one ground, namely, opposition to the further extension of slavery. Abolitionists, Free-Soil Democrats, Whigs and (what made many Catholics fear the whole organization) "Know-nothings," united on the one plank. Lincoln's first cabinet (p. 60) depicted the party in miniature. It had no "family likeness," but it had a surplus of "family jars." Lincoln's infinite patience and tact were in constant exercise.

The President's saddest hours, we believe, were not when he witnessed the strife among his secretaries, nor when he counted from the White House the Confederate campfires across the Potomac, nor even when he almost heard the gallop of Jubal Early's cavalry in the streets of Washington. His saddest hours were in 1864, when prominent party leaders like Greeley and Sumner openly opposed his renomination on the ground that he could not carry the election. At the Radical Republican convention in Cleveland, Ohio, Lincoln was passed over and John C. Frémont was nominated. A "Union" convention in Baltimore named Lincoln for a second term; no "Republican" convention did as much. The leaders of his party were not with him. We tremble to think of what might have befallen the republic had General Ben. Butler been captured and, according to President Davis' orders (p. 119), had been "reserved for execution." Here and there are interspersed a few letters from President Lincoln's pen. That of October 13, 1862 (p. 125), seems to be typical; it is the honest, straightforward speech of man to man. Mutual confidence is the foundation of harmonious effort.

The great war wrought a radical and substantial change in the Constitution. The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions of 1798, though discarded from President Jackson's political creed, had been reaffirmed in the Democratic platform of 1856. Would it have been preferable to "let the erring sisters depart in peace," as somebody expressed it? Whatever the answer, the great and good man who led the republic in the time of its greatest danger did his duty as it was given to him to see it; he was faithful to his trust, "with malice toward none and charity for all." Though we may regret that William H. Seward's friendliness towards Catholics was not helpful to his candidacy in 1860, still we may rejoice that the successful nominee gave, during his administration, an example of forbearance, perseverance and conscientious performance of duty.

The Doctrine of Atonement, by F. RIVIÈRE, D.D.; translated by CAPPADELTA. St. Louis: B. Herder. 2 vols., $3.75.

The Catholic explanation of Redemption by vicarious satisfaction has been attacked by Protestant historians as utterly devoid of traditional basis, or at least as a mere Pauline speculation. Dr. Rivière's historical essay was a very timely refutation of such attacks, and its English edition cannot but be welcome. The author brings together and compares all the passages in Holy Writ and in the Fathers, bearing on the subject, examines critically their value, and usually summarizes at the end the result of his investigations in a few lines. In the Introduction a general outline of the Catholic teaching on the Atonement is given, followed by a sketch of its explanation through vicarious satisfaction. In the first part: "Atonement in Scripture," the author reviews the usual texts from the Old Testament; but as the Jews never considered them as prophecies of redemption, he concludes that the doctrine of the Atonement is entirely Christian in its origin. The teaching of St. Paul is next examined and shown to contain all the elements of the present Catholic doctrine. Chapter VI sets forth the "Gospel Data," and proves that Christ foretold the atoning value of His voluntary death in Mark X 45, Matt. XX 28, and in the discourse at the Last Supper. These investigations into the Scripture data are perhaps the most interesting and instructive part of the work. The subject of the second part is "The Atonement among the Greek Fathers." Though our redemption did not receive exhaustive treatment by the Greek Fathers, and though some of them inclined to a mystical explanation by anakephalaiosis, nevertheless all assent, and many even emphasize, the fact that Christ underwent death as an act of free self-oblation in our place. The Latin Fathers, from Tertullian to Gregory the Great, who are considered in The Third Part, being less prone to speculation, embodied the Scriptural teaching in precise and sometimes really legal formulas, but they added nothing to the teachings of the Greeks. The Fathers then clearly stated the fact of our redemption through Christ's vicarious self-oblation and suggested the first theological explanations. It was the privilege of St. Anselm distinctly to formulate the theory of satisfaction, and of the schoolmen to develop it. This development and the attacks upon it by Abelard and others, are described in chapters 17 to 20. The fifth part is an historical essay on that peculiar opinion, held by some of the Fathers, that Christ paid by His death a ransom to the devil, tracing its origin, development and final discrediting. In a few concluding paragraphs the result of the whole inquiry is summed up: if we reduce the doctrine of the Atonement to its essence, i. e. a certain real, objective and salutary efficaciousness of our Saviour's death, then we must say, that it was taught from the very earliest times. The metaphysical explanation varied, and was fully developed by the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages.

The whole work is a very valuable contribution to English theological literature, and we cannot but wish that all the volumes of that valuable series, "Etudes d'histoire des dogmes et d'ancienne littérature Ecclésiastique" will soon find translators as able as this first one.

ROBERT KEEL, S.J.

Salviamo la Patria! Studi Critici Sociali per il REV. PROF. GEDEONE DE VINCENTIIS, Missionario negli Stati Uniti d'America. Roma: Tipografia Pontificia nell' Istituto Pio IX.

When we reflect upon the armies of Italian emigrants that have flocked to our hospitable shores, we confess to a feeling of relief and comfort at the sight of those welcome words, "missionario negli Stati Uniti," for they are a proof that though the expatriated Italians come as strangers to a strange land, their better opportunities for improving their temporal condition are not to entail a sacrifice of their spiritual interests. The able author's latest work was occasioned by a volume from the pen of Prof. G. Ferreri, of the Royal Roman University, after his visit to the United States. So forcibly impressed was the distinguished Roman professor by his visit to a country full of healthy activity and youthful enthusiasm, that upon his return to the land of sunshine and sirocco he fell straightway into doleful speculations on the contrasts that had struck him, and then duly spread those speculations on the pages of a book. We gather from his pronouncements and from the keen-edged comments of his critic that neither was ever a subject of the now defunct kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Prof. Ferreri groans over the decay of university studies in Italy, bewails the degeneracy of the Italian youth, and waxes wrathfully eloquent over priestly obscurantism. But for these three evils, Italy could be another America! Where is Dr. Brown-Sequard's discovery? Rev. Prof. de Vincentiis vaults fearlessly into the arena of polemics and drives home blow after blow, each one accompanied by a quotation from Dante. The criticism contains several flattering references to our government and our good qualities which, we trust, may always be deserved. The learned writer's position as chaplain in an exclusive private school affords him the leisure for literary work of which we expect further choice fruits.

The Lamp, as is to be expected, deals largely with Anglican matters and in a way that can hurt no Anglican, however sensitive. It draws a moral from the Layman's Missionary movement, and also from the Thompson-Banister case in England, and describes the first celebration of Christmas by the Graymoor Community inside the Catholic Church. Various items taken from other magazines and reviews add to its interest.

The Catholic Who's Who and Year Book 1910. Edited by SIR F. C. BURNAND. London: Burns & Oates.

The usefulness of this yearly compilation is beyond question. But "in successful Annuals, as in successful men, the tendency in growing years is to become unwieldy in bulk." Five hundred names have been added to the edition of 1909 without any appreciable increase in bulk or loss of attractiveness. This has been attained by completely resetting and rearranging the pages of the former issue and by the use of an increased number of abbreviations. In the American additions slight inaccuracies are noticeable, quite unavoidable, perhaps in a work of this character. Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, mentioned in the sketch of Justice Edward Douglass White, is not a Jesuit College, but in charge of Secular clergy. Mrs. James M. Tiernan is of Salisbury, North, not New, Carolina, and the Revolutionary General's name was Artemas not Artemus Ward, the pen name of the noted American humorist, Charles Farrar Browne. We fear that a last year's notice of "Who's Who" in a former number of AMERICA is responsible for the error of putting Justice Joseph McKenna in the Cleveland Cabinet instead of McKinley's. Our own occasional errors teach us the need of forbearance in pointing out the mistakes of others.

Round the World, Vol. VII, New York, Benziger Brothers, more than sustains the high standard of this most interesting and instructive series. Hunting, climbing and canoeing; curious trees, furs and floating mines; German folk lore and lore of all kinds gleaned from the Arctic to the tropics in East and West, provide a most attractive and healthful menu for the reader. And for those who cannot or do not care to read, there are a hundred illustrations, among them a number of the most striking pictures we have seen in any book of the season. The bird-taming pictures, snapped by the fowler with one hand while the bird was perched on the other or feeding from his mouth are marvelous feats of photography. The publishers deserve much credit for the enterprise and workmanship displayed in this and the preceding volumes.

International Incidents. By L. OPPENHEIM, M.A., LL.D., Whewell Professor of International Law in the University of Cambridge. Cambridge: University Press; New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Here are a hundred cases to be solved according to the principles of international law. Classical cases such as the detention of Napoleon on St. Helena, Queen Christina while on French soil ordering an execution, and Captain Wilkes, of the San Jacinto, are combined with smuggling, violations of neutrality, riots and flags of truce. The varied assortment of incidents takes the student into the nooks and corners of what is called the comity of nations expressed in legal terminology. Professor Oppenheim and the University of Cambridge are a sufficient proof of excellence in the work.

The Marine World Chart of Nicholas Carnerius. A critical study with facsimile. By EDWARD L. STEVENSON.

This work is of the greatest importance in clearing up the geographical uncertainties connected with early American history. Father Fischer's discovery ten years ago of Martin Weldermütter's charts marked a new departure in the knowledge of early geography, and called forth many valuable contributions.

The maps of the two Reinel's were the foundation of a history of early discovery in Brazil, a work showing careful research. The Portuguese historians of the sixteenth century gave Brazilian topics very imperfect treatment, owing to their scanty knowledge of places and their location. The "Marine World Chart" will dispel many of the doubts which have hitherto veiled that most interesting period, when adventurers, not only from Portugal but from many other European countries, flocked to Brazil. We trust that various accounts thus far unpublished may be brought out in conjunction with this chart, for they would furnish together a clear and correct history of early Portuguese discovery and colonization in South America.

Why Men Do Not Believe; or the Principal Causes of Infidelity. By N. J. LAFORET. New York: Pustet & Co.

The Causes and Cure of Unbelief. By CARDINAL GIBBONS. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons.

Some mischievous Puck must have woven his spells over the machinery that turned out the second of these two books. We have reproduced the inscripti on the cover. The fly-leaf contains a different announcement, ascribing the authorship to N. J. Laforet, and adding, "Revised, Enlarged and Edited by Cardinal Gibbons, with a chapter by Most Rev. P. J. Ryan, D.D., LL.D." Of course the cover title is more prominent, and this fact makes its mistake all the more mischievous. We have received the assurance, however, from private sources, that this mistake is not that of the publishers. Messrs. Kenedy & Sons, one of the firms engaged to sell the book under the second title, disown responsibility for the misleading title, and we have received from them the following copy of a letter from his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons:—

January 26, 1910.

P. J. KENEDY & SONS,
5 Barclay St., New York City.
Gentlemen:—

I am in receipt of your letter of the 24th inst., and in reply beg to say that having received a copy of the book you refer to, and having noticed that the title on the cover gives me as the author of same, I immediately wrote to Father Downing, calling his attention to the fact, and requesting him to have it changed immediately.

As it is evident, I am not the author of the work, and Father Downing was authorized to connect my name with the publication, as is stated on the inside title-page.

The circular sent out by Father Downing is certainly misleading, and I will immediately call his attention to it.

Sincerely,

J. CARDINAL GIBBONS.

P. S.—All further inquiries regarding this matter must be addressed to the Rev. D. J. Downing, C.M., St. Vincent's Mission House, Springfield, Mass.

Katherine E. Conway's "Story of a Beautiful Childhood," Boston: The C. M. Clark Publishing Co., is pieced together for the most part from extracts compiled out of a gifted boy's youthful journals. When Master Joseph Astley Gallagher died at the age of fifteen there disappeared a very promising writer, and one who gave evidences of noble character and of a useful and brilliant career. The critic might find fault with the publication of such a pathetic little history, as "too brutal an assault upon the feelings," were it not that it contains the inspiring lesson of the boy's fine courage in the face of suffering and defeat. Father Finn must experience the chief consolation of a writer's toil when he reads that this bright little patient found his stories of college life a source of interest and pleasure.

Trammelings and other Stories. By GEORGIANA PELL CURTIS. St. Louis: B. Herder, 1909. $1.50.

This volume is a collection of stories which have appeared already in Catholic magazines. They are well told and, in general, the local color seems properly applied. Nevertheless we do not think Hincmar of Rheims spoke modern French. The author may have such knowledge of his cathedral as to justify her in styling it "glorious," though we suspect she had in mind the present thirteenth century church. "The curé saying vespers" and "the organ-loft with a mighty instrument thundering during compline" sin, we think, in more ways than one. We think, too, that the publisher should have made it a point almost of honor to provide with accents the French phrases with which the book abounds, and the more so, when we consider its price.

Terry's "Mexico" has met with such acceptance by the Mexican Government that copies are to be distributed in the various government departments, and also sent to all Mexican legations and consulates. President Diaz and S. Limantour, Minister of Finance, were especially pleased with the book.

A new collection of John Boyle O'Reilly's poems is in course of preparation by his daughter Miss Eliza Boyle O'Reilly. The interesting scrap of news is gleaned from the following letter of J. I. C. C. (Joseph I. C. Clarke), sent to the New York Times Saturday Review of Books, under date of January 26, 1910.

"It has been a great pleasure to me to note the wide acceptance given to my suggestion three weeks back that a select volume of the poems of John Boyle O'Reilly be put within reach of his admirers. The suggestion of Mr. Barrett of Scranton that I would be the person to grapple with the task was gratifying, to be sure, but the later suggestion that one of O'Reilly's daughters should take it up seems to me the very best for many reasons, the matter of copyright among others. Miss O'Reilly is herself the author of a book of delicate verse bearing the title "My Candles," published in 1903, and is in every way competent to make the needed selection."

The Catholic Standard and Times of Philadelphia presents to its readers, with thanks for their support and interest in the past, the sixth issue of "The Catholic Standard and Times Almanac," as an everyday book of reference for 1910. It will prove a very useful hand book to the Catholic clergy and laity of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, and will be of service to many Catholics elsewhere, who will find therein fuller and even more accurate information than the General Directory contains concerning the clergy, the parishes and the educational work of that most prosperous Archdiocese.

Reviews and Magazines

La Civiltà Cattolica begins the new year with a survey of Italy's social condition, and an earnest appeal for united, vigorous, truly Catholic action. The picture set before the reader is gloomy enough. The ruin wrought by corrupt and corrupting journalism and by the ardent inculcation of every form of impiety will not be made good by mere politics or commerce or industry or art. The lasting and common danger to Italy, and other countries as well, is the apostasy of the nations, whence follows as a consequence from the overthrow of conscience a lowering of the standard of public and private morals. And those in the seats of the mighty who have brought about this moral debasement are not aroused from their false security and fatal repose to a realization of the futility of their half measure for the restoration of a social and economic equilibrium. Something similar to a renewal of the invasions of the barbarians is in process of formation against the social and political order as now established. The sky is already black with the clouds of the coming conflict. The measure of the Church's success will depend upon united Catholic action. The reason why this united action in Italy must be distinctively Catholic is that the country does not present outside the Catholic fold any considerable body of men professing even the general principles of morality as taught by Christ. The line is there sharply defined: "Who is not with Me is against Me."—The English Poor Law, with some of its monstrosities which make the lot of the English poor so hard, is handled in detail in the course of a lengthy review.—What Catholics have accomplished in Holland, where they now constitute about one-third of the population, shows what Catholic union can achieve even against the prevailing public sentiment. During the past sixty years, they have risen from a humiliating position not worth noticing politically, to an importance which is second to none in public affairs. They have also shown prodigious generosity in contributing both means and missionaries to the Church's work.

Pierre Castillon, in Etudes for December 20, writes a scathing criticism of the French novelist, Marcel Prévost, whose literary work has brought him fame and wealth and a seat in the French Academy. His style is clear, precise, easy, but colorless, lacking the personal note and spontaneity. His characters are devoid of power and originality. He has but one type, the man or woman in the grip of guilty passion; one end in view, to picture certain phases of crime which no amount of delicate, pathological analysis can render acceptable to the self-respecting reader. In his language and phraseology he shows a certain reserve; in theme and scenes and events little or none. The most famous of his books deals with crimes which should be probed only behind closed doors in the police courts.

Yet Mr. Prévost poses as a moralist. Brought up a Catholic, he is still haunted by the ghosts of old ideals and old beliefs. So in his most characteristic novels, the psychological evolution of sentiment and emotion is intimately connected with considerations of the moral order. He is a pessimist. Of society, of marriage, of man, of woman especially he has but a poor idea. Mentally, morally, according to him, woman is on an inferior plane. Many of his heroines are openly vicious; the few who are virtuous are stupid. This strange teacher makes capital of the phenomenon of remorse. Many of his characters come from Catholic schools and surroundings and seem to have some spark of the Faith left. Their remorse is worked up just for so much theatrical effect and no more.

Digging deeper into his subject, the writer of this fine sketch asks the question: "Can Art claim to be perfectly autonomous?" "Art for Art's sake; Art has nothing to do with morality; it is indifferent to it, because of an other order." There is a sophistry here. The solution of the problem does not depend upon an abstract consideration of the relations between the good and the beautiful. Abstract theorizing set aside, all must admit that to entice to good or evil is to do either good or evil, hence to come into contact with morality. Say if you like that a scene, a description, a book is an indifferent act, still they are influences for good or evil. How many lives are righted or ruined by a single book! In his novels Mr. Prévost treacherously plays the moralist, but he seems to be too much in sympathy with the very crimes and vices which he condemns.

IN MISSION FIELDS

T. W. Marshall's "Christian Missions" was a wonderful book when it appeared in 1862, for it contained an array of facts and figures such as had never before been brought together on evangelizing the heathen. His delightful personality so pervaded the volume that to read a page of it was like enjoying a chat with the clever author. The book is still full of charm and sparkle, but it is so hopelessly, irretrievably, behind the times and out of date that we must regretfully stow it away among the antiques.

What is the mission world like today? If we are limited to the English tongue, we shall find only a vague, incomplete, unsatisfactory answer to the question, for the missionary and his labors receive little attention from our writers. And yet some are prone to marvel over the plentiful lack of zeal for foreign missions, so conspicuous in this country.

A part, at least, of the field, and a highly important part it is, has been carefully gone over in "The Catholic Church in China from 1860 to 1907," by the Rev. Bertram Wolferstan, S.J. (St. Louis, Mo.: B. Herder. Price $3.00 net.) If we miss Marshall's pleasantries and telling thrusts, we meet his scrupulous care in quoting authorities for every point advanced. Taken at its best, the Chinese Empire must be put down as a barren field, fertile only in hardships; but the present day difficulties have not extinguished the mission spirit any more than they frightened away the heroes of the seventeenth century.

If there be any good in militant controversy, the chapters in Part First on married missionaries and the Bible in the vernacular furnish us with enough non-Catholic testimony for a whole park of artillery.

Part Second has to do with China and the Christian nations. Education, commerce and social intercourse as studied and judged from the Chinese standpoint afford abundant if not always gratifying information.

Our eyes instinctively turn to Part Third, where our missions are described with considerable detail with the lights and shadows, the hopes and disappointments, that attend the missionary. Statistics make dry reading as a rule, but when they give the returns in conversions and baptisms for the labors and privations of apostolic men, they have an interest for any Catholic. These are given in an appendix.

A mission map of the Celestial Empire is not the least valuable feature. It shows us nine missions in charge of the Franciscans, as many directed by the Priests of the Foreign Missions of Paris, and seven controlled by the Lazarists, while the Augustinians, Dominicans, Jesuits and other institutes bring the whole number up to forty-one centres of Catholic missionary effort. A very complete bibliography and an alphabetical index are a fitting close to a work of more than passing interest.

LIBRARY NEWS AND NOTES

An exhibit of rare musical books and manuscripts recently opened in the Museum of the Newberry Library, Chicago, illustrates how prominent a part has been taken by the Catholic Church and by Catholics in the development of music. The most conspicuous objects in the exhibit are a number of massive Spanish manuscript antiphonaries, hymnals, and other service-books, mostly dating from the seventeenth century. These books, which were recently acquired by the Newberry Library from a dealer in Gibraltar, belonged to old monasteries in Spain, and several include the office of St. Francis, whose vignette is shown in some of the miniatures that adorn the carefully written pages. A thirteenth-century manuscript, on exhibition at the Newberry Library, shows the peculiar characters or neumes in which the chant was written. Then a red line was drawn to represent F and dots were made above and below it. The next step was to draw a saffron line to represent C, and finally a staff of four or five lines was utilized to show the musical intervals. These stages can be followed in the interesting manuscripts on exhibition.

Aside from the liturgy the share of Catholics in the development of music is shown by a number of works upon musical theory. One is a history of music, written by Martini, a Franciscan friar (1706-1784), who dedicated it to Maria Barbara, Queen of Spain; another is a similar work by Gerbert, prince abbot of the Benedictine abbey of St. Blaise (1720-1793). The portrait of Palestrina, father of church music, as he has been called, looks calmly out upon us from the frontispiece of a memoir of him by Baini. Near at hand is a small ancient tome, bound in vellum wrinkled yellow with age, being a work on musical theory written by Aiguino Bresciano, a Franciscan friar.

Next to it is the thick folio of Father Kircher, the learned Jesuit (1602-1680), opened at a drawing intended to illustrate the angles at which sound is reflected from the walls of a room. Under sacred song we have two volumes of compositions by Francesco Soto, a friend of St. Philip Neri. Andrea di Modena, a Recollect friar, has written an extremely rare work on harmony, which is here shown. The monk and the friar even though the chanting of the Office consumed several hours of their day, have found time to write and illuminate exquisite manuscripts, and have enriched musical science with works of enduring value. Sir George Grove, in his "Dictionary of Music," says of Abbot Gerbert that his "Sacred Song and Music" has since its publication "formed the foundation of all musical scholarship."

An interesting piece is Peri's "Euridice," the first (extant) opera to be publicly performed. This opera was composed for the nuptials of Henry IV of Navarre and Maria de' Medici. It was represented at Florence in 1600, the date of the volume before us. The libretto was written by Rinuccini, a Florentine poet of the day.

A curious manuscript, written in musical characters of unfamiliar shape, is a book of compositions for the lute, composed, written and illuminated by Capriola, a Brescian gentleman of the sixteenth century. The illuminations are pastoral scenes in color, representing divers animals, satyrs, shepherds and shepherdesses. M. Land, a Dutch expert on such matters, has written a description of this volume in which he tells us that it was the custom of the time for gentlemen of musical talent to compose such books for dedication to their lady friends, who held the best kind of a copyright upon the performance of these pieces by possessing the only copy of the music.

The musical library of the late Theodore Thomas has been presented to the Newberry Library by Mrs. Thomas; and the scores, some of them embodying the results of years of study, and marked by Mr. Thomas for performance by the orchestra, have been carefully bound by the library, just as they were left by the distinguished conductor.

A number of these scores are on exhibition and attract the attention of the professional musician. Other items of interest in the exhibit are: a copy of the first American musical magazine, issued by Andrew Law in 1792; a quaint treatise on curing the bite of the tarantula by means of music; a service book for vespers in the Russian Church; and several works showing musical compositions by American Indians.

The occasion of this exhibition was the recent convention of the National Music Teachers' Association during the last week in December. Among the papers read were "Some General Observations About the Management for Church Music," by Waldo S. Pratt; "Plain Song," by Canon C. W. Douglas; "A Plea for Distinctive Church Music," by Walter H. Hall. The capella choir of Northwestern University had a concert in which compositions by medieval and early composers were sung. Dean Lutkin, the director of this choir, although a Methodist, is very catholic in his appreciation of good music. W. S. M.

EDUCATION

The position of the Catholic Church regarding the higher education of women needs no explanation and no defence. What clearer evidence is desired of her purpose to foster every effort made to open to women the fullest opportunity of intellectual development than the Church's encouragement of the female teaching orders in the admirable institutions they control and direct? True, the Church never loses sight of the essential element in education. It will have naught to do with a training which forgets that the development of the religious nature in the creature is an all-important aim of the educator. And when the Church recognizes that the tendency of the teachings imparted in this or that school or academy or college is destructive of Christian principles and moral righteousness, it must condemn those teachings, and it must refuse to permit its children to put themselves into the dangers which contact with the life of such institutions supposes. One is not surprised, therefore, that the Church looks with more than disfavor at the courses of instruction which obtain in the advanced schools for women especially advertised in America to-day. "The friends of higher education for women," says an editorial note introducing an article in the current Cosmopolitan, "believe that their crusade means a new civilization, and, indeed a new Christianity. Whatever the point of view of the reader, it will be admitted by all that herewith is presented a startling account of teaching, which, reaching the coming generation through the mind of educated American womanhood, means the overthrow of both sacred and secular tradition, and the reconstruction of society." Fortunately the establishments in which sacred tradition is to be overthrown in order that a new Christianity may prevail are not the only schools of advanced training open to Catholic women. Trinity, Holy Cross and St. Elizabeth's in the East, and in the West, Mt. St. Joseph, Dubuque, St. Mary's of the Woods, and Notre Dame, Indiana, are well-known institutions which offer to women excellent facilities for such training. It is to be hoped that with the evidence of the dangerous tendencies of non-Catholic schools of like grade clear before them, Catholic parents will be slow to neglect their own institutions while entrusting their daughters to the vicious influence of the so-called new Christianity, it were better, perhaps, to say, of the new paganism that is boldly flaunted before us.

Commenting in this column last week on the report of the Educational section of the London, England, County Council, reference was made to paternalistic features of school administration new to us in America. The novelty will cease soon if certain ideas of School Superintendent Maxwell of New York City be adopted. In Mr. Maxwell's annual report, presented some days ago to the Board of Education, it was recommended that arrangements be made to supply simple, wholesome food at cost price to children in all public schools; that nurses be employed in connection with all classes for defective children; that open-air class rooms for anemic children and those suffering from nervous disorders be established; that summer evening schools be formed to teach English and civics to immigrants; that a department of hygiene, consisting of physicians and nurses, be clothed with the power not only to discover physical defects, but, when necessary, to compel parents by legal process to supply appropriate remedial treatment, and that special classes be organized for children suffering from serious defects of speech, such as stuttering.

The Mungret Alumni Association held its annual reunion at the Grunwald Hotel, New Orleans, January 27. The members are the graduates of Mungret College, Limerick, Ireland, who are now residing in the United States. Mungret College was founded in 1882 by Rev. William Ronan, S.J., his main purpose being to educate students for foreign missions. Mungret also received lay students, and both had the honor of winning more successes in the Royal Irish University than any other college except the Catholic University of Dublin. Of its first graduates in 1886 seven came to America to enter the priesthood, and on each year following it has sent out from six to ten students to missions in every quarter of the globe. Belonging to different religious orders, but chiefly to the secular priesthood, they are now laboring in Australia, China, India, Japan, the Philippines, Asia Minor, Egypt, Great Britain, South America and in every section of the United States. The Alumni who met in New Orleans were chiefly from the Southern States, where the Association was established at Spring Hill College, Ala., in 1907, on the initiative of Rev. J. Coyle, D.D., of Birmingham, Ala., and Rev. P. Turner, of Pensacola, Fla., who were elected president and secretary respectively. Rev. J. W. Nicholson, D.D., of Houston, Texas, is the new president, Dr. Turner, of Pensacola, secretary-treasurer, and Rev. P. Cronin, S.J., of New Orleans, historian. The Alumni present in New Orleans subscribed several hundred dollars to erect a suitable memorial to the late Father Ronan, the founder of Mungret, and also to enlarge the Study Hall and Library of the apostolic students. Dr. Turner invites communications from every Mungret man in America.

New York's chapter of the Alumni Association of Georgetown University had the most numerous attended banquet it has yet held, at the Manhattan Hotel, on January 25. The President of the University, Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., in his remarks stated that the continuation of football at the University depended on the proposed reform of the rules. If it was to remain as a mere commercial sport with all its present brutality the faculty would have no more of it; but if it became again a gentleman's game, then Georgetown would have a team with old-time strength and enthusiasm. Mr. John G. Agar spoke in behalf of the proposed memorial to Archbishop Carroll, and William M. Byrne advocated the alliance of the alumni of all the Jesuit colleges of the country so that the members could take the place of leadership their training fitted them to have in the social and economic reforms called for by the evils of the day. Dr. Thomas S. O'Brien, president of the Alumni of St. Francis Xavier's College, seconded the latter proposition and promised hearty cooperation from the organization he represented.

The following public lectures in the winter course of the Catholic University will be delivered in McMahon Hall, Washington, D. C., Feb. 10: "The Rise of the Temperance Movement," Hon. William H. DeLacy, LL.D.; Feb. 17, "What Temperance Means for the Child," Hon. William H. DeLacy, LL.D.; Feb. 24, "Life and Works of Dante," Right Rev. Monsignor Thomas J. Shahan, D.D.; March 3, "Dante as a Philosopher," Rev. William Turner, D.D.; March 10, "The Celtic Sources of the Divina Commedia," Joseph Dunn, Ph.D.

The New York Branch of the Alumni Association of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., held its fifth annual reunion in New York on January 26. The Very Rev. Joseph F. Hanselman, S.J., former President of the College, was the guest of honor. The local association has now one hundred members, all of whom received their degree in course at Holy Cross. Mr. Thomas B. Lawler is the president of the New York Alumni.

SCIENCE

Three expeditions are preparing for the South Pole. Captain Bartlett, who commanded the Roosevelt under Peary, will lead the American; Captain Scott, the English; and Dr. Charcot, the French. This rivalry increases greatly popular interest in the matter. The British Government is contributing $100,000 to the expenses of the English expedition.

Dr. Bidlinger, of the Imperial Observatory of Wilhelmshaven, has devised a duplex compass for airships, as, owing to the excessive motion, the single needle has proved insufficient to direct a true course. The new device indicates truly and independently of any motion of its carriage the horizontal intensity of the earth's magnetism at any point.

Count Zeppelin is under contract with the German Airship Company for operating air lines between Hamburg, Leipzig, Munich, Mannheim, Stuttgart and Cologne, to deliver by next April a monstrous lighter-than-air machine to be known as the Zeppelin IV. The frame work will be constructed of the new lighter-than-aluminum metal, electron, and will have a capacity of 20,000 cubic meters of gas. Like the other Zeppelin ships it will be propelled by two motors. Accommodations will be provided for 40 passengers.

The Department of Agriculture, Washington, announces that its "respiration calorimeter" has been fully perfected, and that experiments will soon be made to determine fully the relative amounts of nutrition in different food stuffs. The experimentation will be conducted by Dr. A. G. True, assisted by Dr. Lane-worthy, nutrition expert of the Department.

Dr. Joseph E. Pogue, in charge of the division of mineralogy in the United States National Museum, describes a remarkable specimen of pyrite, commonly known as fool's gold, found in the Snetisham district near Juneau, Alaska. The pyrite has its usual form, i. e., cubical, but what is very striking is that there are in it more than 130 well-defined cubical crystals of gold. These are imbedded in the pyrite crystals, are from one-third to one-half their size, and have an independent crystallization.

Official figures from France show that the sterilizing of water by ozone from electric apparatus, which is claimed to be the only sure method, costs no more than two-tenths of a centime for three cubic feet. This new method of rendering water free from harmful bacteria has been adopted at the Paris reservoir.

Meats are now being cured by electricity in far less time than was required by the older methods. The meat is placed in large wooden vats and the pickle poured upon it. An alternating current of 35 amperes at a pressure of 35 volts is passed through the liquid. The alternations prevent electro-chemical decomposition, and the effect of the current seems to be to force the brine through the meats and so to hasten the curing. The method is said to be economical.

A second gramme of radium has just been isolated at Joachimstahl, Bohemia, and the Austrian state bureau announces it for sale. The present value of radium is $2,375,000 an ounce; the value of a gramme, therefore, is $84,821.

As yet no pure radium has been exported by the Austrian monopoly, as no sure means of packing it has yet been devised. Scientists are now working on a method of checking the dangerous emanations.

The Radium Institute of America, recently begun in New York, announces the free treatment of deserving poor as one of its features. A clinic connected with one of the principal hospitals in every large state will eventually be established. The expense, owing to the cost of radium, will be enormous. This several wealthy men have undertaken to defray.

Professor H. Wehner advances a new theory. He maintains that areas of seismic and volcanic activity move slowly to the west. Assuming within the earth's crust, and disengaged from it by a layer of molten mass, a solid nucleus rotating about the same axis as the shell but with a less velocity, he calculates that it thus makes one revolution to the west in 953 years. The revolving nucleus, he further assumes, is studded with projections, which pressing upon weaker portions of the crust cause a fracture in the crust and volcanic eruptions.

The efforts Thomas A. Edison has long been making, to perfect for the propulsion of railway cars a storage battery lighter than that heretofore in use, have been crowned with success. The entire practicability of the invention is attested by the foremost electrical engineers.

Joseph Brucker, the daring German aeronaut, fixes the date of his start from Teneriffe for a flight to the United States for May 15th, 1910. The balloon is now under construction at Hamburg. It will carry 5000 cubic feet of gas and be propelled by two 50 H. P. motors. Its carrying capacity will be about 1000 pounds.

ECONOMICS.

More than half the imports under the new tariff come in free of duty. The average of free goods for four fall months, September to December, 1909, the new tariff having gone into effect during August, was 52.48 per cent. of the total value imported. The value of such goods for the whole year 1909 was within a small fraction of 700 million dollars. In 1821 only 3.96 per cent. of the imports were free. With 1833 came a change in the tariff, and the proportion rose to 24.21 per cent., and the year following it was 45.67 per cent. After tariff revision in 1844 it dropped to 17.31 per cent., and reached 8.93 per cent. in 1851. From this it gradually rose to about 20 per cent during the war, but from 1867 to 1872 it hardly averaged 5 per cent. In 1873 the free list was enlarged and the proportion was about 30 per cent. to 1889. In 1890 sugar was made free, and in 1892 55.79 per cent. of imports were free. The proportion fell in 1899 to 43.72 per cent. and remained at about that figure up to the new tariff. It must be remarked that the figures for the years preceding the new tariff represent only imports for consumption; the percentage for the four months following it represent general imports.

The trade of the United States with its over-sea possessions amounted to 172 million dollars during the year just ended. Moreover, Alaska sent us 18 million dollars in gold. The trade with Porto Rico was 52½ millions; with Hawaii, 61 millions; with the Philippines, 27 millions; and with Alaska, 31 millions. The trade was divided in each case almost evenly between imports and exports.

The highest dam in the world is the Shoshone dam in Wyoming. If it were also the longest Wyoming would be quite satisfied. Unfortunately it is only 80 feet wide at the base and 200 feet long on the top. But then it is 108 feet thick at the base and 328.4 feet high. Its base-length is about equal to the frontage of the Tribune Building, and if this were put beside it, the vane would be only 13.6 feet above its parapet. It will make a reservoir of more than ten square miles in area, from which 130,000 acres of land will be irrigated.

SOCIOLOGY

To appreciate what has been done in safeguarding the purity of food, one has but to consider what people used to eat unsuspectingly a little more than fifty years ago. An article in the Quarterly Review for March, 1855 gives us the result of some investigations. Diseased meat came regularly to the London market. Three insurance offices used to insure graziers against loss from disease. When the loss was paid the animals became the property of the companies. These slaughtered them in their own establishments and sent the carcasses to their own salesmen, who sold them to sausage makers and piemen. Tea and coffee were not only adulterated, but even manufactured. In manipulating the former sand, tea dust, used tea leaves, turmeric French chalk, leaves of the sloe, the hawthorn and the bay, copperas, black lead and Prussian blue were used. For the latter tradesmen employed chicory, mangold wurtzel, carrots, pars ips, wheat, beans, acorns, lupins, dog biscuit, burnt sugar, red earth, horse chestnuts, and horses' and bullocks' livers baked dry and ground to powder. Green pickles and preserves nearly always contained acetate or some other salt of copper; while children's candies were colored with chrome yellow, vermilion, Brunswick green and Prussian blue. All these are poisons, their chemical names being chromate of lead, sulphide of mercury, oxychloride of copper and ferro-cyanide of iron. We can easily conceive the fate of any tradesman who would dare to expose such wares to-day.

It is announced in the Survey that the West Side Neighborhood House, on West Fiftieth Street, built some ten years ago by John D. Rockefeller for settlement work, has been closed, on account of difficulty in obtaining suitable workers and a board of managers willing to be responsible for the carrying on of the establishment.

In the opening address at the National Conference on Uniform Legislation President Taft dwelt on the need of action by the state legislatures to counteract the pressure now put on Congress and the United States Courts to make what belongs to the individual states matter of Federal legislation and action. The Conference of State Governors, meeting at the same time, took the same line of argument. Senator Root proposed an annual national conference of state representatives authorized to enter into agreements subject to the approval of Congress, to be afterwards ratified by the State legislatures.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

With a public meeting in Carnegie Hall, on the evening of February 2, at which several distinguished laymen spoke, and a movement to build a new community house was auspiciously begun, the celebration of the golden jubilee of the Paulist Congregation was concluded. The various religious ceremonials during the previous week were carried out with imposing detail. On Tuesday the solemn Mass was celebrated by Archbishop Farley in presence of His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons. The Cardinal made a brief but happy and sympathetic address, and the sermon, which reviewed the life of Father Hecker and the founding of the community, was delivered by the Rev. Walter Elliott, C.S.P. On Wednesday His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate, Archbishop Falconio, presided at the services. Each evening during the celebration there was solemn Vespers, at which the preachers were Bishop Hickey of Rochester, Rev. Thomas F. Burke, C.S.P., Right Rev. Mgr. Joseph F. Mooney, V.G., Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., and Rev. E. G. Fitzgerald, O.P. Under the auspices of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, the poor of the parish were given a feast during the week in commemoration of the jubilee.

Last week Mgr. Bruchési, Archbishop of Montreal, received a cablegram from Lord Strathcona, offering the use of his residence in Dorchester Street West, during the Eucharistic Congress to be held in Montreal next September. His Grace may use the house for himself or for his guests. The residence contains many rare art treasures and is sumptuously furnished. The Duke and Duchess of York were the guests of Lord Strathcona there during their visit to Montreal. All the recent Governors-General of Canada have also stayed there as guests. Mgr. Bruchési is just now visiting several Archbishops and Bishops of the United States to interest them in the coming Eucharistic Congress and to lecture on this subject. He will go as far as Baltimore, where he will confer with Cardinal Gibbons.

At the Good Shepherd Convent, Boston, Mass., there was a three-days' celebration, January 24-26, in honor of Blessed John Eudes, founder of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd. Each day of the Triduum had its solemn high Mass and an appropriate sermon. The celebrants were the Rev. Thomas I. Gasson, S.J., President of Boston College, the Rev. James Hayes, C.S.S.R., Rector of the Mission Church, and the Right Rev. Mgr. George J. Patterson, V.G. The sermons were preached by the Right Rev. Mgr. Denis O'Callaghan, D.D., of South Boston, the Rev. Peter J. Corr,

C.S.S.R., and the Rev. Francis L. Kensel, C.S.S.R.

Bishop Valdespina of Sonora, on January 22, dedicated, in the village of Pitahaya, near Guaymas, Mexico, a church for the use of the Yaqui Indians. Governor Torres, a number of army officers and all the Yaqui chiefs were present. When peace was made by the Mexican Government with the Yaquis a year ago, one of the stipulations was that a church should be provided for the exclusive use of the Indians. The dedication took place on the first anniversary of the signing of this treaty.

The Director of the Retreats for Laymen, Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., announces the following schedule for 1910: Retreats at Keyser Island, South Norwalk, Conn., begin on these Fridays: February 11, March 11, March 18, April 8, April 15, April 22, April 29, May 6, May 13, May 20, May 27, June 3, June 10. From the middle of June to the middle of September retreats will be given, beginning on Friday each week, at Fordham University. For further information address Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., at 801 West 181st Street, New York City.

Very Rev. E. R. Dyer, S.S., President of St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, contradicts the report that the present site of that institution is to be sold and a new location secured.

On Sunday evening, February 20, the Catholic Oratorio Society will render Antonin Dvorak's "Saint Ludmila" at Carnegie Hall.

Archbishop Messmer is seriously ill at the Franciscan Hospital, Milwaukee.

Bishop Maes of Covington, Kentucky, celebrated the silver jubilee of his episcopacy on January 25, when he received many congratulations and gifts from his friends.

Very Rev. Eugene H. Porcile of the Fathers of Mercy has resigned, owing to ill health, his office of Superior-General of that congregation, to which he was elected last June, and will return to Brooklyn.

Archbishop Bourne of Westminster announces that the first of the proposed annual Catholic Congresses in England will be held this year in Yorkshire.

The will of Miss Mary L. McLaughlin, of Hagerstown, Md., was admitted to probate on January 25. By its provisions $10,000 is left to Catholic institutions, including $2,000 for the erection of an altar in St. Mary's Church, Hagerstown.

A scholarship in Boston College, valued at $1,500, has been founded by the people of St. Leo's parish, Dorchester, in honor of their former pastor, Rev. Francis J. Butler.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Twelfth Night," New Theatre.—Had the histrionic interpretation of Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night" at the New Theatre equalled its scenic setting the performance would have been ideal. Its staging was as near perfect as imagination could desire and its pictorial effectiveness beyond cavi. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon the management for an achievement in this regard which has rarely been equalled on the modern stage. The result would also make it worth the while even as a mere artistic event in the theatrical world. It was not simply lavish and liberal, but becoming, i. e., in perfect keeping with the spirit and text of one of Shakespeare's most picturesque and delicate romantic dramas. To say that the New Theatre Company did not achieve the same point of excellence in its interpretation of "Twelfth Night" need not be regarded as adverse criticism. It would be asking more than present conditions justify warrant of a new organization which is only beginning its journey on a long and difficult road towards a standard now lost to the theatre since the ephemeral successes of the star system lured managers into the easiest way of filling their coffers and of beguiling the public by the sop of sensationalism. In the New Theatre's interpretation of "Twelfth Night" we actually witness a promise which has long been absent from the stage, viz.: the presentation of a Shakespearean play where a fair level of excellence is attained and sustained. The entire cast is good, with no inferiorities, and in the major parts interpretations which, if they do not excel, are above the ordinary. Matheson Lang as Orsino delivered his lines with intelligence, and though not quite as intense as a hapless and yearning lover should be, gave a dignified and sympathetic delineation. Miss Russell was not, however, as happy in the rôle of Viola. She missed its tender dignity and pathetic sweetness, and indulged at times in a flippancy which was radically out of place. Viola, upon whose damask cheek concealment feeds like a worm in the bud and who pines in thought, in no instance capers like a jaunty boy. Perhaps the best interpretation in a Shakespearean spirit was Ferdinand Gottschalk's Sir Andrew Aguecheek. In reading and action there was neither exaggeration—too often a temptation in such a part—nor the restraint which seemed to mar the characterization of Sir Toby Belch by Louis Calvert and Malvolio by Oswald

Yorke. Mr. Calvert's Sir Toby lacked the spontaneity and the upbubbling animal spirits of this other Falstaff, and Mr. Yorke's Malvolio fell between the two stools of fearing to over or underdo his part. The exaggerated egotism of Malvolio, which has its pathetic side, shrank into the merely comic and in consequence entirely lost the sympathy due to it. Notwithstanding these shortcomings, Sir Toby and Malvolio fared well in their respective delineations, as indeed did all the other characters in the cast. The performance on the whole was highly creditable, deserving both public applause and appreciation.

"The Arcadians," Liberty Theatre.—At last we have a musical comedy in New York worthy of the name. It recalls the days of the musical operettas of Gilbert and Sullivan in so much as it is free from the horse-play, vulgar jokes, syncopated jingles and immodest costumes of the senseless and distasteful productions that the public have supported for the past fifteen years. The plot is simple, clear and intelligent; the jokes clean and humorous; the dancing graceful and modest; the singing above the average, while the music leaves little to be desired in this type of comic opera.

"The Inferior Sex," Daly's Theatre.—A shallow comedy, obviously designed for Miss Maxine Elliot. While not original in its idea it is clever enough to be spasmodically amusing. It is the old story of the reformation and conquest of a woman-hater rehearsed amidst surroundings of an ancient design with the usual denouement. Miss Elliot lends charm and grace to a piece void of human characteristics.

"A Lucky Star," Hudson Theatre.—A stereotyped piece which displays Mr. Collier's monotonous ability as a comedian. The plot is porous and aged in the realms of theatricalism, but affords abundant opportunity for outworn jokes and situations lacking ingenuity or originality. A young man finds that he has rented a motor boat belonging to two fair ladies, who have just inherited it from their uncle, to take a trip up the dykes of Holland. They then propose to accompany him on the journey, and when he finds that he cannot obtain his aunt as a chaperon he advertises in the papers, the result of which is the appearance of a young lady who takes the position and in the end marries the hero. The outcome is palpable from the start, and while Mr. Collier's comic power is well set off, the play is hardly more than an elaboration of a vaudeville sketch of the better type.

OBITUARY

The Rev. William G. R. Mullan, S.J., died in Baltimore, on January 25. Three days more and he would have completed his fiftieth year, as he was born January 28, 1860. His early training was at the Immaculate Conception School and at Loyola College, Baltimore. The promise of a bright and useful career which he gave as a youth was fulfilled during the thirty-three years of his life as a member of the Society of Jesus. Entering the novitiate at Frederick, Md., on February 8, 1877, he began his studies there, and from 1880 to 1883 made his course of philosophy at Woodstock. For several years he held the professor's chair at Fordham and Georgetown, and he returned to Woodstock for his course of theology in 1888. Shortly after his ordination he was appointed vice-president and prefect of studies at Fordham. On the completion of his third year of probation at Frederick in 1895, he again became prefect at Fordham College, where he remained for two years. A year as professor of rhetoric at Holy Cross College followed, after which he was promoted to the presidency of Boston College in 1898. In 1903 he took charge of the studies in Georgetown University, and for the third time he returned to Fordham, first as professor of philosophy and then as vice-president and director of studies. It was from this office Father Mullan was called to Baltimore and made Rector of Loyola College. After a few months the symptoms of the malady to which he finally succumbed became manifest. He spent the last two years in St. Agnes' Hospital, Baltimore. Father Mullan possessed a rare combination of good sense, ripe scholarship and gentleness of disposition. His brother, the Rev. Elder Mullan, now in Rome, is Secretary for the English Assistancy of the Society of Jesus.

The Rev. Michael Klinsing, C.P., died at the Mercy Hospital, Chicago, on January 24, after a week's illness. He was born November 21, 1856, in Germany, and came to America at an early age. In 1873 he entered the novitiate of the Passionists in Pittsburg and was ordained seven years later. In addition to his missionary labors, Father Michael ministered for many years in Pittsburg; more recently and at the time of his death he was pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Chicago, and second consultant of the Provincial of the Passionist Congregation in the United States.

Rev. Mother Bruno (Sophia Weber), Provincial of the Southern Province of the Sisters of St. Francis, died in Philadelphia, her native city, on January 17.

She became a religious thirty-seven years ago and labored at various houses of her community in Pennsylvania and Maryland. She was chosen Provincial six years ago.

Rev. J. W. Hoey, pastor of Baltic, Conn., died on January 25, of pneumonia. He was born in Wilsonville, Conn., March 18, 1867, and after graduating at Holy Cross College, made his theological studies with the Sulpicians in Montreal, and in Baltimore, where he was ordained on December 22, 1894. He had been pastor at Baltic since November 11, 1901, and was specially noted for his zeal in the cause of Catholic education.

Rev. Henry Stuckenberg, one of Cincinnati's pioneer priests, died on January 24, of pneumonia. He was born in Oldenburg, Germany, in 1835, and came to this country when a young man. For more than thirty years he was pastor of St. Mary's Church, Cincinnati.

AN OPEN LETTER

To the Publisher of McClure's Magazine,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR:

In the January number of your magazine for the current year, on page 327, appears an article entitled "The Ferrer Trial—An Account of the Court Martial and Execution of Ferrer, the Spanish Radical—By Perceval Gibbon." This article is so false in both what it states and what it conceals, and is so permeated with a spirit of hostility to the Catholic Church, that we feel called upon to protest on behalf of the American Federation of Catholic Societies against your action in publishing it.

Your magazine has a wide circulation, both among Catholics and non-Catholics, and the public has a right to assume that articles treating of such events as the Ferrer trial will at least aim at fairness. We are at a loss to understand how your editor could have permitted Mr. Gibbon's article to appear. The impression conveyed by it is that Ferrer was a harmless enthusiast, actuated in the main by a noble-hearted purpose to reform intolerable abuses of Church and State in Spain. His private immoralities are glossed over; the circumstances of his trial are stated with such an artful suppression of some facts and such an insistence upon some others as to convey a false impression, which the author must have known to be false if he was at all familiar with what he was writing about.

If you will take pains to examine the record of the trial, you will find that it was held openly before a Court Martial convened under lawful military authority, in a district of Spain lately the scene of outrage, arson and the worst forms of mob violence, for the trial of participants and ring-leaders of the movement; and in a court room containing one hundred to one hundred and fifty spectators, several of them newspaper men, as the photographs show, after an examination of fifteen witnesses, three of whom swore that they saw Ferrer taking part in the riots, the others all agreeing that he incited his followers to anarchy and bloodshed. The documents found in his quarters leave no room for doubt about this.

No sooner was he executed than, by a concerted movement, influences hostile to the Catholic Church throughout the world sought, by misrepresentation, to convey the impression that the Church's influence had caused the Spanish authorities to commit a judicial murder. So far were they successful that in Rome, Paris, London, and even in our own country, indignation meetings were held and strenuous resolutions were adopted denouncing this supposed iniquity. So successful was this nefarious plot that even such an organization as the American Federation of Labor, a large proportion of whose members are Catholics, permitted itself to adopt resolutions denouncing the action of the Spanish government.

While these events are greatly to be deplored and should teach a lesson to the public to withhold its judgment until the cooler, calmer second thought, based upon an actual knowledge of all the facts, can regulate and subdue passion and prejudice, we think it much more to be deplored that, when all of the facts are known, or can easily be ascertained, a popular magazine like yours should lend its columns to such a treacherous, false, deceiving article as that which Mr. Gibbon has contributed and you have disseminated.

We should be glad to acquit you of conscious blame for the wrong you have done to the greatest conservative influence now existing in the world, to which we owe allegiance as the center of truth and the supernatural expositor of justice and right, but to do so we must assume that you have been guilty of a carelessness difficult to understand. When the article came to your editor he could readily have ascertained that the Church had nothing whatsoever to do with the trial and execution of Ferrer; that, on the contrary, the sympathies of the Pope were extended even to this wretched enemy, and following the example of his Divine Master, he would, if possible, have obtained mercy for him.

The editor could easily have ascertained the circumstances that made the declaration of martial law in Barcelona absolutely necessary for the Spanish government. He could easily have ascertained that, instead of being a hurried and unfair trial, conducted in secrecy, it was open, fair and deliberate. But he did none of these things, or if he did, the measure of your culpability is even greater than we think it to be.

We are the representatives of many hundreds of thousands of American Catholics, a large proportion of whom either advertise in or read your magazine. We do not wish to appeal to the lower motive of self-interest in demanding of you a correction or an apology for Mr. Gibbon's article; we prefer to appeal to your sense of self-respect in requiring a categorical correction of this article and an expression of regret that it has been published.

Yours respectfully,

PERSONAL

At Woonsocket, R. I., recently, Mr. and Mrs. Antonio Girard celebrated their golden wedding anniversary. At the Mass in St. Louis' Church the music was rendered by an orchestra made up of nine grandchildren led by a tenth, and forty-five more composed the choir that sang. The venerable couple, who are seventy-five and sixty-seven years old respectively were married in Nashua, N. H., fifty years ago, and twelve of their thirteen children are living.

Mr. and Mrs. John G. Goedken, pioneer residents of Petersburg, Iowa, have six daughters among the Sisters of St. Francis of Dubuque.

In recognition of his long and successful work as a priest and defender of the Faith, the Pope has elevated the Rev. Dr. Henry A. Brann, rector of St. Agnes' Church, this city, to the dignity of a domestic prelate.

Papal Briefs have been received conferring the dignity of domestic prelate on the Rev. George Bornemann, of St. Paul's Church, Reading, Penn., and the Rev. Luke V. McCabe, D.D., LL.D., of St. Charles' Seminary, Philadelphia.

CHRONICLE

Tariff Relations.—As already stated in a previous issue of AMERICA, the Tariff commission decided that no obstacle existed to trade under the minimum schedule with the United Kingdom, Italy, Russia, Spain, Switzerland and Turkey. To these have since been added Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, the Netherlands, Egypt, Persia, and lastly Germany. With Germany now enrolled among the European countries giving a fair exchange in tariff favors, three-fourths to four-fifths of our European trade will be conducted after March 1 on the minimum schedule basis. France seems still inclined to hold aloof and reject the offer of a fair bargain. Austria-Hungary, Portugal, Servia, Roumania and Greece are the only European countries now standing with France, and the acceptance by most of them of the minimum schedule is confidently expected.

High Cost of Living.—A statement issued by the Central Labor Union of the Federation of Labor sets forth that 2,000,000 persons are now refraining from the use of meat to show their opposition to high prices. Nevertheless, the prices of meat, poultry, fish, and most vegetables are higher than ever. Detectives are watching the operations of cold storage plants, seizures of stale eggs are being made by the Federal authorities in New York, mass meetings held to voice the popular protest, while official investigations of various kinds are under way to find out the reason for present conditions. The hope is generally expressed that the inquiry into the high cost of living which the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives is preparing to undertake, will not be confined to the effects of the tariff on the prices of commodities. Most of the articles, of the advanced cost of which the public is complaining, such as meat, butter, eggs, milk and flour, are not affected by the tariff.

Damages for Union Boycott.—A case that has been hard fought between the unions and the anti-boycott league for years was decided when a verdict under the Sherman law was rendered in the United States Court against the Hatters' organization at Danbury, Conn. The jury fixed the actual damages at $74,000 for a boycott by union men against the hat manufacturers in 1902 and 1903. As the suit was brought under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law triple damages can be recovered.

Defense of the Panama Canal.—The President and Secretary of War have decided that Major-General Leonard Wood should be placed at the head of the board of officers that will this winter make a special study of the Panama Canal zone and report a general plan for the protection of the canal from attack in time of war or from injury or destruction by the maliciously disposed in time of peace. The appointment of General Wood is due to the fact that he is to become Chief of Staff in April and will have before him from time to time many important questions connected with the Panama Canal Zone. The board that has been named already by the Secretary of War consists of General Crozier, Chief of Ordinance; General Bliss, Assistant Chief of Staff; General Murray, Chief of Coast Artillery; General Wotherspon and General Marshall, Chief Engineers, with Commander Harry F. Knapp, U. S. N., and Commander William J. Maxwell, U. S. N., named by the Secretary of the Navy. The board was to leave for the Isthmus the first week in February and spend the whole month there.

Miscellaneous.—The committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the House of Representatives is trying to work out some plan to reduce the big postal deficit. Strong opposition has developed against the proposed increase of postage on second-class mail matter. Representative Murdock, who is chairman of the sub-committee in charge of second-class postage matters, is reported as saying that at present the express companies get all the lucrative business over the short hauls and the Government gets the business over the long hauls, upon which money is lost. The Government carries second-class matter in bulk from New York to San Francisco at the rate of one dollar a hundred pounds, while for the same distance the express rate is three dollars a hundred pounds.—The steamship Kentucky, on her way to the Pacific, foundered off Hatteras, and through use of the wireless the Alamo took off the captain and crew of forty-six men. Within five minutes after the first word of the desperate plight of the Kentucky was received in Washington, the machinery of the revenue cutter service and the Navy Department had been set in motion to aid her.—William Marconi, the inventor of wireless telegraphy, arrived in New York on his way to Cape Breton to superintend the completion of the new power station which is to replace that destroyed by fire last year.—The death roll from mine explosions has recently received large additions. In a mine of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company at Primero, Colo., an explosion on January 29 entrapped 149 miners, eighty of whom were suffocated. The cause of the explosion was unknown. At Drakesboro, Ky., on February 1, an explosion occurred in the Browder State mine, killing ten miners and injuring seventeen. The third disaster of recent date happened on February 2 in a coal mine at Las Esperanzas, Mexico, where sixty-eight miners, mostly Mexicans and Japanese, were killed. This mine was one of those recently visited by a commission and pronounced safe. To these fatalities is to be added the loss of eleven miners at the Ernest mine, near Indiana, Pa., on February 5.—W. E. Purcell was appointed U. S. Senator by Governor Burke of North Dakota to succeed Senator Fountain L. Thompson, resigned. North Dakota's new Senator has been prominent in the Democratic politics of his State for many years. He is fifty-three years of age and a leading member of the North Dakota bar.—The Interstate Bridge Commission in its report to the New York Legislature recommended the selection of a site for a bridge over the Hudson River from One Hundred and Seventy-ninth street, New York, to a point opposite on the New Jersey shore at the foot of the Palisades. The span will be about 1400 feet in length. This will connect the New York park system with the new Palisades park.

The Fairbanks Incident.—In regard to the Fairbanks incident in Rome, the following sane editorial observation in the New York Times, of February 8, is very complete as an explanation: "The Pope does not invite any one to visit him in the Vatican. He dwells in lonely state hedged in by tradition. The etiquette of the Papal palace is inviolate. There is nothing personal in the Pope's refusal to see any visitor to Rome. There are countless rejections of applicants. In each case the specific reason for the refusal is more or less conjectural, but invariably the rigid rules of Vatican etiquette have not been complied with."

New Code for Porto Rico.—President Taft sent to Congress a special message, in which he advocated the adoption of a new code of laws for Porto Rico, and said that a bill to carry his recommendations into effect had been drafted. In the President's bill any resident of Porto Rico is eligible to become a citizen of the United States if he was a citizen of Porto Rico before April 12, 1900. Only citizens of the United States may hold office in Porto Rico. The Administration measure amends and supplements the Foraker act, which is the organic law of the island. The bill provides for the establishment of two new executive departments of the Porto Rican administration. In place of the present Executive Council there is to be substituted a Senate of thirteen members, eight of whom are to be appointed by the President and five elected by the people. The House of Delegates will be known as the House of Representatives.

Colonel Roosevelt's Itinerary.—The Smithsonian African scientific expedition which left the United States last March, headed by Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, reached Nimule, Uganda Protectorate, on February 4. All the members were in excellent health. The present objective point of the expedition is Gondokoro, whence the party will embark for Bar-el-Jebel, the most southern tributary of the Nile, on the way to Khartoum. Colonel Roosevelt expects to speak in Paris on April 15, at the University of Berlin on May 1, and soon afterward before the Nobel Prize Committee at Christiania. Mr. Roosevelt received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1906. He will arrive in England on May 15 and deliver a lecture at Oxford University. He plans to return to New York about the middle of June.

Civic Reform in Montreal.—The civic elections for Montreal took place on the first of this month. A committee of citizens had drawn up a list of reform candidates, who were nearly all elected. At first there had been a Protestant candidate for the mayoralty but his name was withdrawn before the nomination in deference to the Catholic majority who naturally preferred that the Eucharistic Congress next September should be welcomed by a Catholic mayor. There were two Catholic candidates for this office: Dr. Guerin, an Irish Canadian physician, who had been a minister in the Quebec cabinet, and Senator Casgrain, who stood for the large French Canadian element. Dr. Guerin, the choice of the Citizen's Reform Committee, was elected by a majority of 12,684 out of a total vote of 45,740. The four comptrollers, all nominees of the Committee, were elected by large majorities. All the Committee's candidates for aldermen, except two, were elected. This success of the reform movement—a success which far exceeded the most sanguine expectations—is due in great measure to the influence of M. Henri Bourassa's new daily paper, Le Devoir, which, though yet in its first month, has already reached a circulation of fifty thousand. The editor of this paper exhorted his French Canadian compatriots not to abuse their power by excluding Mr. Wanklyn, an English-speaking candidate for the controllership, but to grant to the minority their proper representation; and Mr. Wanklyn himself, after his election, publicly attributed his victory to the stand taken by Le Devoir. So just was the French Canadian vote in general that the Star, the day after the elections, had a big headline with these words: "French Canadians teach the English population a lesson never to be forgotten." The Archbishop of Montreal, in a pastoral letter, the gist of which was given in AMERICA (Vol. II, p. 434), earnestly invited the women who have a right to vote in municipal elections to use this right. About eight thousand women voted. Their vote defeated a Masonic candidate for aldermanic honors.

The Paris Flood.—Despatches from Paris say that, although the level of the Seine was continually falling, the situation was still disquieting at many points, especially in the Vitry district, where the embankment of the Orléans railway prevented the water from returning to the river's bed. The streets of Paris are free from flood and are being rapidly repaired and cleared of rubbish. On the other hand, several recent subsidences were reported on February 3, one occurring in front of the Ministry of War. Train service is becoming pretty regular. Many manufactories have resumed work. But there are still a quarter of a million persons in Paris and its immediate neighborhood who are receiving clothes and food. In several quarters gas and electric power are reorganized, but it will be many days before telegraph, telephone and other public services operate regularly. Hospitals and other places of refuge are always crowded. The gravest question is how to help the shelterless and homeless victims of the inundation. Another great difficulty is to find work for the throngs who apply for it, because many factories cannot yet reopen their doors. Relief contributions from crowned heads amount now approximately to fifty-five thousand dollars.—Several prominent royalist and Catholic writers have severely criticised the results of modern engineering. They contrast the stability of the ancient bridges, like the Pont Royal and the Pont Neuf, with the later structures such as the Pont de l'Alma and the Pont des Arts, the safety of which was in doubt at the height of the flood. They declare that not a single ancient sewer broke under the pressure of the waters, while the modern labyrinth cracked and gave way in many places. M. Frédéric Masson, of the French Academy, predicts that once the city is dried and scoured out the engineers will sketch plans which will merely afford opportunity for political jobbers and corrupt contractors to make colossal fortunes. M. Charles Bos asserts that Paris is the victim of the false science of the engineers. Their modern constructions proved much feebler and showed less honest workmanship than those of the modest engineers who labored under the Valois kings and the Bourbons.

Paris Relief Fund.—On February 4, foreign contributions to the Paris relief fund amounted to $700,000. At that date the English contributions exceeded those from the United States by $80,000. Ambassador Bacon cabled that the distress of the victims, including thousands of workmen, was likely to be prolonged, and that additional contributions would be a splendid form of charity. The gratitude of the French people for the assistance rendered by the United States, the Ambassador said, was universal and sincere.—The Canadian Parliament has voted $50,000 to the fund.

The Irish Forecast.—The group of Independent Nationalist Members have been named "O'Brienites" incorrectly, as several of them have had no connection with Mr. O'Brien. They were elected because of dissatisfaction in the constituencies with the undue interference of the national Executive and with the Budget as affecting Ireland. They have all declared their adhesion to a united party but demand as a condition thereto "free, open and full deliberation as to the methods by which the Irish cause should be won." Mr. O'Brien demands a policy of conciliation towards all classes and sections, and Mr. Healy insists that the Budget must be changed in as far as it discriminates against the land and industries of Ireland. Mr. Asquith's careful abstention from specifically defining "full self-government," is viewed with suspicion, but it is admitted that Mr. Redmond has the power to obtain a satisfactory declaration. London Truth says Home Rule must now, as in the days of Gladstone, "become the dominant political issue; but this time neither the Cabinet nor the Liberal Party are likely to be seriously divided on the subject. The 'needs must' argument will convert the waverers and stimulate the lukewarm." It is reported that Winston Churchill has asked for and will be given the Chief Secretaryship of Ireland, as he is anxious to have the distinction of setting the Irish question. If this report is true, the Home Rule Bill is likely to be thorough, as Mr. Churchill was the chief author and promoter of the measure that pacified the Transvaal and unified South Africa. Meanwhile London Unionist papers are discussing the advisability of a Nationalist-Unionist alliance on the basis of Home Rule and Tariff Reform. The election has made it clear that there is no such opposition to Irish self-government in England as there was in the time of Gladstone. It was made a Protestant vs. Catholic question to excite animosity, and in Liverpool was combined with the maintenance of the King's Oath, which the Unionists agreed and the Liberals declined to subscribe to. Messrs. Gwynn, Healy and others believe that the next Parliament will not last a year and that Home Rule will be the main question in the new election.

Tariff Agreement with Germany Assured.—After months of negotiation between Germany and the United States the tariff war which loomed black upon the horizon has been averted. Both nations have made concessions limiting original demands, and in the agreement which has been accepted both gain substantial advantages. Following the compromise accepted by German and American conferees, Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg sent to the Reichstag the following communication regarding the German-American tariff agreement: "The American Government has declared that the livestock question is withdrawn wholly from the negotiations on condition that the unlimited enjoyment of Germany's conventional tariff be conceded. It further agrees that the advantages of the American minimum tariff shall be extended unrestrictedly to Germany after March 31; that the customs administrative regulations shall be applied to German goods in a friendly and conciliatory spirit, and that the present agreement respecting the labeling of wines shall remain in force." On February 5 the Reichstag passed without debate and unamended the bill approving the Government's agreement with the United States. The vote would have been unanimous on all three readings but for a few extreme Conservatives. The Federal Council had previously agreed to the measure. In introducing the bill Vice-Chancellor Delbrueck assured the Reichstag that Germany's excellent relations with the United States guarantee a conciliatory and broad-minded observance of the agreement.

Catholic Affairs in the Austrian Empire.—The Reichspost announces that the eighth general Catholic Congress of the Austrian peoples will meet in Innsbruck, the capital of Tyrol, in September of this year. The unfortunate incidents which rendered impossible the meeting planned for Vienna during September of last year will not have influence in this preeminently Catholic province of the Emperor's domain, and accordingly the efforts of the central committee of Brixen to secure the meeting have been approved. The enthusiasm manifested by the Tyrolese in their jubilee celebration of last year argue well for a successful carrying out of the program already being prepared for the Congress.—To prepare for the new conditions arising from the proclamation of a constitution for their land a representative assembly of 200 delegates from Bosnia and Herzegovina met recently in Sarajewo to establish a Catholic Union. The articles of association are modeled after the constitution of the German Centrum. The Union, always professing devoted loyalty to the interests of the Empire and to the family of Francis Joseph, will endeavor to safeguard the well-being of Croatia in the developments of its new internal relations with the empire. Non-Croats are admitted to its membership, if they be in sympathy with the policy of the Union.

Indian Princes Counsel Government.—Last August the Viceroy of India addressed the native princes, asking their views as to the best means to root out sedition. Most of them declared their states to be free from it. They recommended stricter press laws and the surveillance of suspected agitators. The Maharajahs of Bikanir and Kashmir advised a closer exchange of information and an offensive campaign against sedition. Others urged the more speedy punishment of offenders. All professed themselves ready to cooperate in every way with the Government.—Shams-ul-Alam, an inspector of the Criminal Investigation Department, who has been engaged in unravelling conspiracies to murder, was shot by a young Bengali on the staircase of the High Court, Calcutta, on January 24. The murderer told those who arrested him to do with him what they pleased; he had done his duty.—The next day the Viceroy opened the new council in state. Alluding to the assassination he declared the Government's resolution to bridle the revolutionary press. Accordingly a bill has been introduced requiring all printers to deposit with the Government a sum varying from $160 to $1600, which will be forfeited in case the depositor be found guilty of misconduct.—A party from the British gunboat Fox destroyed 1350 rifles and 160,000 rounds of ammunition en route for Afghanistan, at Jask on the Persian Gulf.—The Indian and Home Governments are in consultation regarding the stopping of this traffic, and negotiations have been opened with the French Government with the view to check it at Muscat, where the French have treaty rights.—Kichaka-vadd, the killing of Kichaka, apparently a classical drama, has been played throughout the Deccan and in Bombay since 1907 to crowded houses. It is really an allegory perfectly intelligible to the natives. The hero of the play represents India. Kichaka is the Viceroy, his following are the English. All are killed off with the greatest ease amidst enthusiastic native applause.—The Rana of Barwani has just been invested with the government of his state. He declares he will tolerate no political opinion inconsistent with his own loyalty and devotion to the British crown and rule.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Apples of Discord Among the Fathers

Hardly had the government under the Constitution been established when James Madison introduced in the House of Representatives a measure "for the encouragement and protection of manufacturers." This was unpopular in the South, where the production of raw materials was almost the only industry. Another proposal was to levy a tax on imported slaves. An understanding was soon reached, however, in virtue of which the project of taxing imported slaves was permanently abandoned in exchange for votes for Madison's bill. Thus in the first session of the first Congress we find the now familiar practice of trading votes to secure the success of one measure at the expense of others.

After the establishment of the government, the Anti-Federalists undertook to limit the meaning of the Constitution and to restrict its application. The Federalists, on the other hand, aimed at reading into the Constitution whatever might widen its scope or strengthen the central government. Jefferson, the leader of the "Republicans," as the Anti-Federalists now began to call themselves, wished to starch the Constitution; Hamilton, the leader of the Federalists, wished to stretch it.

Within a month after Washington's inauguration, the Anti-Federalists were reminded by a Boston paper of the advantages of union. In May, 1789, two escaped slaves were apprehended in Massachusetts, where no slavery existed, and in virtue of Art. IV, Section II of the Constitution, were restored to their owners. The first Congress confirmed the exclusion of slavery from the territory bounded by the Great Lakes, the Mississippi and the Ohio, and also accepted North Carolina's cession of what afterward became Tennessee, with the ceding State's proviso that "no regulations made or to be made by Congress shall tend to emancipate slaves." This was the first step in Congress towards dividing North and South into free States and slave States; for, although slavery existed north of Maryland and Delaware, it was an institution of trifling importance and doomed to die a natural death.

As early as 1790, the Abolition Society of Pennsylvania, whose president was the venerable Benjamin Franklin, petitioned Congress to do what it could under the Constitution to promote "mercy and justice" toward the negro. The danger to that peculiar domestic institution was scented at once. So wild and furious were the words that expressed the sentiments of the representatives of the slave interests that the matter was speedily smoothed over and consigned to temporary oblivion.

Just a few days before the battle of Lexington some gentlemen of Philadelphia formed a "Society for the Relief of Freed Negroes Unlawfully held in Bondage."

There was ample reason for their action. It had become a common practice to pounce upon some of the free negroes of the colony, and there were thousands of them, hurry them into the neighboring slave colonies and there offer them for sale. After nine years of inactivity the society took new life in 1784 and began a long and useful career on a broader platform, for the same year which saw the Ordinance of 1787 become a law, saw also the society for protecting kidnaped free negroes transformed into the Abolition Society of Pennsylvania.

Three vital issues, therefore, which were to test the stability of the republic through generations to come, were brought to public notice before the second presidential election. These issues were slavery, a protective tariff, and the interpretation of the Constitution. It took seventy-five years to settle the first; one hundred and twenty years have not sufficed to settle either of the other two.

Washington having consented to serve for a second term, there was no thought of putting up an opposition candidate; but political leaders were greatly at variance in their choice of a candidate for the vice-presidency. Alexander Hamilton, a born leader, was a firm believer in statecraft and in the advantages of administration patronage. Why let this precious source of power go to waste? In his appointments, therefore, he made careful provision for his favorites, and his favorites were those who could help him in an emergency. He warmly supported John Adams.

George Clinton was the great political "boss" in New York. Through the help of the brilliant but unscrupulous Aaron Burr, he had received a technical majority for Governor of New York in 1792, having already held the office until the people were tired of him. He was put forward by the Republicans as their choice for second place.

In the meantime, North Carolina and Rhode Island had ratified the Constitution and Vermont and Kentucky had been admitted to the sisterhood of States, thus increasing the number of electoral votes to one hundred and thirty-two. The electors again showed their confidence in Washington by a unanimous vote. For vice-president, Adams received twenty-seven majority over Clinton. Nine of the fifteen States had chosen their electors through their legislatures. Though defeated in the Electoral College, the Republicans were successful in winning a majority in the next House of Representatives.

In Washington's second term, his proclamation of neutrality in the war between Great Britain and France was highly offensive to sympathizers with France, who were, generally speaking, Republicans. In Philadelphia, the seat of government, ten thousand people threatened, day after day, to drag the President out of his house and force him to declare for France or to resign. The public press accused the administration of having joined the league of kings against liberty; the President was accused of preserving "the seclusion of a monk and the supercilious distance of a tyrant." Tom Paine, who is still idolized by some Americans, addressed to President Washington an open letter the tenor of which is gathered from a single sentence: "And as for you, sir, treacherous in private friendship (for so you have been to me, and that in the hour of danger), and a hypocrite in public life, the world will be puzzled to decide whether you are an apostate or an impostor; whether you have abandoned good principles or whether you ever had any."

The repeated violations of American neutrality by both Great Britain and France and the depredations of Algerine pirates showed the need of an American navy, for not a warship of any kind flew the Stars and Stripes. In the Act of Congress of 1794 establishing an armed sea-force, explicit mention was made of only the pirates, but the vessels built under it were used against the French. Ten days before retiring from the presidency, Washington signed the commission of Captain John Barry, making him ranking captain of the naval establishment. This determination had been reached on June 4, 1794, as was duly expressed in Barry's commission. The frigate, United States, to which Barry had been assigned and which had been built under his personal direction, was launched in May, 1797, and did good service until sunk by the Confederates in Norfolk Navy Yard during the war between the States.

Washington, who, to use his own words, had been assailed in "such exaggerated and indecent terms as could scarcely be applied to a notorious defaulter or a common pickpocket," gladly laid down the burden of office and returning to Mount Vernon, left John Adams to battle with adverse political currents and storms.

Anticlericalism in Italy.

The editorial on "Why Italy is Anticlerical" in AMERICA of December 18, raises a question which has perplexed many Catholic minds. Things are, thank God, not so bad as in France, and many educated and intelligent Italians, some of whom were themselves more or less anticlerical, have assured me that Italy can never by any possibility fall into such a state of things as exists on the other side of the Alps. Let us hope so. And yet, there actually is much anticlericalism in Italy and one cannot but ask why it should be so. Italy holds the Mother See of Christendom, and certainly its last three saintly occupants, whose pontificates more than cover two generations, have not dimmed its lustre nor brought it into disrepute. What, then, has caused the present situation? The first and most obvious answer is that there is no one single cause, but there are a number of influences which have worked together. And, secondly, there is the reassuring fact that many signs point to better things. There is doubtless trouble ahead, and it is true that Anticlericalism is very much alive, but it is equally true that wholesome antidotes are already at work.

Amongst the causes which have aided the antireligious propaganda there is first the matter of national unity. National pride, desire to become a first-rate power, besides loading the country with taxes under which the people groan, has set many in opposition to the Church because the gratification of national ambition has seemed bound up with the question of the robbery of the Pope's temporal possessions and the Church has been represented as the enemy of patriotism. As is well known, the Latin mind once turned against religion does not usually stop with half-way indifferentism, as in Northern nations, but becomes violently hostile.

It seems to the onlooker as if Italy should not be a land of poverty. She has wonderful agricultural resources and within the last twenty years or so a great development of industrial activity has taken place in the North. New factories are in constant evidence as one journeys by railway from the northern frontier toward Rome. But in spite of all this there is much grinding misery amongst the poor, and the Socialists, by their promises of bread and prosperity for all, have poisoned the minds of many. Socialists know that the Church stands for honest regard for the rights of private ownership, and so Socialism is always anticlerical. This desire for material well-being and the lie that the Church is in league with the oppressors have done great harm amongst the peasantry. The Masonic lodges, the Socialists and the Anarchists work together, and it is quite evident that these enemies of religion and social order are well organized; for the word has but to go forth from headquarters in Paris to bring concerted action in many countries, including Italy, as was evident recently in the absurd attempt to make Ferrer seem a martyr to the cause of human progress. However, without minimizing the evil at all, but frankly acknowledging that it exists, it is well to remember, too, that not humility but clamor is the dominant characteristic of revolutionary and disturbing elements, whose noise sometimes gives them a factitious importance. They have, after all, against them, in Italy as in other countries, the solid wall of the mass of quiet, law-abiding citizens whose sturdy devotion to settled order counts for much.

The article of December 18 suggests one reason for Italy's anticlericalism that is not without its force, viz., the evident lack of a thorough knowledge of their religion which Italians who emigrate to this country often show. A traditional Catholic in these days needs more than simply his family or national tradition to hold fast to the love and the loyalty which Mother Church should have from us all. In countries where the faithful were surrounded and perhaps outnumbered by unbelievers, the need of careful instruction of all the people has been recognized fully. But in a Catholic country, like Italy, is it altogether surprising that where "all the dwellers in the little village were Catholics, the air was Catholic, the spirit was Catholic," a great deal was taken for granted by the clergy and a thorough and complete instruction in the Faith not always insisted on? The simple duties of religion and the precepts of the moral law were 'known, was not that enough? But the old order changes; whatever may have been the case once, such instruction is certainly vitally necessary now. The Italian Catholic of to-day has no surrounding Protestant population to whom he must be ready to give a reason for the faith that is in him; but he has what is far worse, the party of the Anticlericals—Socialists, Anarchists, Freemasons—hating Christ and His religion with a bitter hatred and determined to instil the venom of their hate and their false accusations against the Church into the rising generation.

But that burning fire of zeal, St. Malachy's "Ignis Ardens," our present Holy Father, has seen this need. He has ordered the careful teaching of the catechism and the careful searching out of those who, by mischance or oversight, failed to get necessary instruction in childhood. During a visit of some months in Italy in 1908, I saw many evidences of the renewed zeal which the Holy Father has awakened. I remember one Sunday afternoon in May dropping into a small parish church in the country and finding the parish priest instructing a group of perhaps two dozen young men and women between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, young people who had been discovered by a careful visitation of the parish and who were being given an intelligent grasp of their religion during their preparation for their First Communion. It was not an isolated case, and such work is bound to tell in the near future.

But there is one active cause of Anticlericalism which should have an especial interest for all English-speaking Catholics, because it is produced with the aid of English and American gold. There are, in many Italian cities and towns, colonies of English-speaking residents who find it agreeable for one reason or another to make more or less permanent homes there. Being, almost entirely, people of leisure, they are inclined to give some of their time and money to philanthropic and religious work, and this is, in itself and in the abstract, certainly very commendable. But, as a matter of fact, these enterprises—since the only poor, practically, who can be objects of this zeal are the poor Italians—become, though ostensibly philanthropic, really proselytizing agencies, material aid being offered as the bribe for apostasy from the Catholic Faith. We have seen such attempts in England, Ireland and America, and efficient Catholic organization has been necessary to counteract them.

In Florence, which has the largest and richest English-speaking colony, the evil has become very acute. These good people in their mistaken zeal can never, of course, make genuine Protestants of those whose misery they relieve; they simply, when successful in undermining their Catholic faith, turn their beneficiaries into irreligious Anticlericals. So much harm was done by this Protestant propaganda that a society was formed a few years ago, under the authority of the Archbishop, the Society Pro Fide. Of course the English-speaking Catholics in Florence who can come to its aid are few in numbers compared with their Protestant compatriots who lavish money on the proselytizing agencies. But much has been accomplished already and aid is very much needed to continue the work. It is thought that many who remember with pleasure their visits, or perhaps a long sojourn, in that beautiful land, might be glad to contribute to save these poor Italian children from the loss of their faith. The society uses its funds to place poor children, in danger of being put into Protestant Homes, into Catholic institutions; it helps the free dispensaries conducted by the Sisters of Charity so that the sick poor need not go to the dispensaries where attending Protestant religious services is a condition of relief; it aids boys' clubs, free evening classes in which English is taught, and fresh-air excursions of sick children to the seaside in summer. It is a most necessary work, for all these activities are used by the propagandists to destroy Catholic faith, especially in children. The society is particularly in need of funds at the present time and the treasurer of the Society, John M. Egerton, Esq., Villa Lucente, San Domenico, Florence, Italy, or the writer of this article, will gladly receive and forward any gifts for this good work of neutralizing the effects of the mistaken zeal of those who would add to the numbers of Italy's Anticlericals.

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE.

Father Tabb: the Teacher

II.

Teacher may be counted a humble title to give to a man to whom was conceded the first rank among the poets of his day. It would perhaps sound better to certain ears to say that Father Tabb was, for more than a quarter of a century, professor of English at St. Charles' College. But the plain, unvarnished truth is that he was a simple teacher of English grammar. He remained a teacher of grammar to the end. He was a fine Greek scholar and taught that language now and again with manifest delight to himself and much profit to his pupils. But his heart was in his English class, nor did he aspire to anything higher. His "Bone Rules" for that science, dedicated to his beloved pupils, "past, present and future, imperfect and perfect," give some clue to his method. No one without actual attendance could appreciate what his class really was.

The true teacher, like Quintilian's orator, et nascitur et fit. Father Tabb was a born teacher; he made himself a great teacher. He went to class to teach; his students, to learn. There was a tacit agreement, offensive and defensive, to that effect. Occasionally indeed one of the principals was guilty of a breach of compact, for all men, and especially all students, are human. At such times the master rebuked the delinquent rather with the eye than with the tongue. Surprise and disappointment were eloquently, if voicelessly, expressed. And the defaulter felt himself oppressed with a sense of self-condemnation akin to that which is said to come upon the traitor brought face to face with his guilt.

At St. Charles' in the early eighties every class lasted for a full hour. That was the "consecrated" length of a valid session. Any deviation from that rule was tantamount to an apostasy from all that was venerable in educational traditions. Now, a full hour, with its sixty mortal minutes, is the nightmare of every dull teacher and the pitfall of every spirited boy. Father Tabb was never at odds with time. Up to a certain point he was a rigorous routinist. Rather more than half the session was devoted to the task especially assigned to the day. Not a moment was lost. By a spontaneous and most cordial agreement every pupil made ready to account for his lesson accurately, adequately and with dispatch, so as not to abbreviate the good time that was sure to follow.

Under the poet-teacher it was no drudgery to study grammar. He was gifted with personality, and came to class bubbling with good nature. His methods were unique and of endless variety. He riveted the attention of the pupil and held it to the close, never suffering even the most phlegmatic to dream that he was having anything but the best possible time. Nor was the task to be conned and then forgotten. The teacher shrewdly realized that his students were not all intellect but were irrevocably wedded to the things of sense. He accordingly appealed to their senses; he went to the blackboard and with a few deft strokes drew a picture which illustrated the principle or embalmed in the memory the fact which he desired to impress. Now he would perpetrate a pun, and now throw out a vox memorialis which gave to the point under discussion a place among the permanent possessions of the mind.

Though the study of the elements of English with such a preceptor was a distinct delight, still to turn from grammar to literature under such leading was like passing from the class-room to the theatre. As age creeps on, one is led to wonder which half of the class was more profitable. Syntax we know, and should know it, had we never seen Father Tabb. But what of the fruit of those rare half-hours spent with him in the company of the Muses? They linger and haunt us still. It is now almost thirty years since he opened his heart and showed us the large place which he had given to Edgar Allan Poe. Like a true disciple he knew his master—prose and poetry. We listened with awe to his reading of the "Black Cat." We ran with him through the full gamut of "The Bells," from their riotous roar down to the softest tintinnabulations. And even the most apathetic was forced furtively to wipe away a tear at realizing the full sadness of the untimely taking-off of that "rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore."

For Shelley and Keats he entertained a reverence almost equal to that which he cherished for their American contemporary. Several classes were given to the study of "The Cloud," its wonderful imagery and exquisite diction were pointed out in great detail. Towards the end of one session the teacher went to the corner of the class-room, crouched, and began to recite "The Skylark." The students were transfixed. When he had finished, he was on tiptoe at the opposite corner of the room, breathless as if eager to follow the bird in its flight. Instinctively the class broke out in applause. He modestly suppressed our enthusiasm with the remark: "Gentlemen, did you see that 'Skylark' soar? Did you hear him sing? If there is a single boy in this class who did not see that lark and hear him sing, I forbid him ever again to open a book of poetry, for it would be a sheer waste of time." Need it be said that most of those present saw the lark and heard him sing?

His mind was admirably stored with the gems of classical literature. Before his ordination he came from the seminary to the college to teach us Greek. Forty minutes of the first class were devoted to grammar and the "Anabasis." He then fell to the reciting of the "Medea," of which he knew long passages by heart. There was nothing ostentatious about this display. He was speaking out of the fulness of his heart, we the while were amazed at his familiarity with Euripides. On one occasion he substituted for our Latin professor. We were reading Livy at the time. Passing over the lesson of the day, he had us turn to the book which relates the sad episode of the death of Virginia. He told the story, bringing out the virtue of the maiden, the desperation of Virginius and the infamy of Appius Claudius, with a depth of feeling which Macaulay but faintly suggests. The spirit with which he declaimed the beautiful legend showed us how keenly he enjoyed the classics of ancient Rome and how familiar he was with the passages of the deepest human interest.

He abhorred the exact sciences. He never admitted that he could add straight. Nor would he venture to give the number of the page of the text-book to which he desired to make reference, but always requested one of the students to discharge that office. "If I die before my ordination and while studying theology," he said to us one day, "I want my epitaph to read as follows:

"Sacred to the memory of John B. Tabb, D.D."

"You are not a Doctor of Divinity yet," ventured one of the boys. "Bless you, no, my son, far from it," was the reply. "D. D. does not mean Doctor of Divinity when it is found on my tombstone; it means, Died of Dogma."

Father Tabb had many of the eccentricities that are said to attend genius. He was rarely in evidence when visitors of distinction came to the house. To one who made special request for him he sent the message: "Tell M. that whatever he thinks of my poetry, he would be rudely disappointed to see the prose." But he loved the society of his students, and those who discovered exceptional gifts found their way straight to his heart. If, in addition, they betrayed some ability for literature or music, they could command him at will. With wonderful intuition he drew out latent talent, and if it were possible to create a love of letters in the soul of his pupil the good priest addressed himself generously and successfully to the task. Those who were the special recipients of his fatherly attention owe him a debt of gratitude which they must beg the Lord to discharge.

Shrewd teacher that he was, he knew how and when to praise the performances of his pupils. If he called for the finest line of the passage of poetry under discussion and received what he asked for, the man who delivered the goods left that class walking on the clouds. In this connection the writer confesses to have long labored under a keen sense of regret. He was conversing one day in the college infirmary with the professor of belles-lettres when Father Tabb happened along and begged his confrere to piece out for him the line of "Hamlet" which had been running through his mind since breakfast: "Unhousel'd, . . . , unanel'd." The priest could offer no relief, but the pupil knew the word and could have said: "Unhousel'd, disappointed, unanel'd." But, as he was not asked, he modestly refrained from doing so. Had he however ventured to assist him in his predicament, the poet would have played Burke to his Sheridan and have "hugged him with the energy of generous admiration." Surely there is a time to speak as well as to be silent. After twenty-seven years the failure to act on that occasion is still regretted as a lost opportunity. He wishes he had spoken.

Out of class he was the soul of good humor. As he passed through the house or grounds, a joke, a pun, or a comic verse was ever on his lips. The supply was at once varied and inexhaustible. He was a marvelous cartoonist. He had the happy faculty of supplementing his drawings with equally striking couplets. It was frequently asserted that he could have made a fortune, had he combined pen and pencil. The writer cannot acquiesce in this contention. Not that Father Tabb lacked either imagination or humor, originality or deftness of touch; but he was likewise blessed with a soul so delicately sensitive that he could never make free with the feelings of others. The successful cartoonist, we fancy, must keep his charitable impulses under perfect control. Father Tabb was not thus master of himself.

An incident will show the good heart of the man. During our somewhat dreary Christmas holidays we were accustomed to entertain ourselves with theatricals—there was no home-going from September to June. Original farces were occasionally produced. The writer, while engaged in preparing one of these, went to Father Tabb and requested him to make a cartoon of one of the students, a good-natured fellow whose outward favor lent itself to the purposes of the pencil, but who was altogether satisfied with what nature had accorded him in the way of physical beauty. Father Tabb readily consented to make the drawing. When the moment came for exhibiting the carefully guarded figure on the stage, the curtain was drawn and behold, instead of the portly outline of the student, we had the long-necked bust of the artist himself. "You may do anything under heaven with me," said he afterwards, "but I would not like to exhibit C—; he may be far more sensitive than we fancy." The little episode was at once instructive and illuminating.

His jokes were always kindly. He was merciful to all but himself. But he could not refrain from perpetrating puns and pleasantries at his own expense. Even his great affliction did not escape. In one of his last sallies, he placed himself highest among the high-flyers:

"There once were two brothers named Wright,
Who rose in aerial flight;
But a poet I know
Much higher could go,
For he soared till he got out of sight."

Father Tabb celebrated his first Mass at midnight on Christmas, 1884. After the Credo he turned to the assembled community and made a brief address couched in chaste English and redolent with the tenderest piety. The students had presented him with a chalice as a slight token of their admiration and love. He referred touchingly to their thoughtfulness and expressed his delight at having the consolation of offering his first Holy Sacrifice in the chapel so dear to him. He then gave voice to the cherished hope that it might be his good fortune to spend his life among his well-beloved pupils and celebrate his last Mass within the same consecrated walls. His prayer was heard.

The Religious Battle in France

The denunciation by the French bishops of the atheistical books used in the Government schools has had effects deeper and more far-reaching than were at first expected. The education question has become, for the time being, the chief platform upon which clericals and anticlericals measure their strength; the principal Catholic speakers of modern France have thrown upon the subject the light of their experience and the weight of their influence.

It wants now only four months to the general elections, and our present "incoherent and mischievous legislators," as a leading Catholic paper styles them, are about to retire from politics. The last months of life of the present Chamber will be marked by a memorable encounter, in which the souls of the little children of France are the prize; and, while their defenders are fighting their battles within the Palais législatif, the children themselves and their parents are bravely doing their best to carry out the instructions of the bishops. The "Associations des pères de famille," that band together the fathers of families, gain ground daily and assume more important proportions than were at first intended. Their members have grasped the fact that it is not enough for them to denounce evil teaching and to claim for their children the neutrality that is prescribed by law but does not really exist; they push their demands further. The Anticlerical party makes no secret that its object is to destroy, if possible, the free schools and obtain the monopoly of teaching in the country; it becomes urgent, therefore, to meet it on the same ground. The Association of the pères de famille, at Pouancé, in Maine et Loire, founded under the inspiration of an able and energetic Catholic, M. de la Guillouinière, may be quoted as an example of the tone that must be adopted by similar associations. Its members do not merely insist upon neutrality being observed on religious matters; they demand liberty of teaching and a just division of public money between the Government and the free schools, according to the number of the pupils.

The education question seems now to be the one common ground upon which the French Catholics, divided as they are on politics, can meet in union of thought and aims. "A magnificent field of battle opens before the Catholics," says La Croix. "This question gives them a splendid motive for union." Those who realize how their unfortunate divisions have so far hampered the action of the French Catholics, will appreciate the value of the opportunity that is now given them of uniting their forces on a subject that touches their dearest interests, independently of politics. The struggle that is carried on in many an obscure village between the peasant children and their teachers is full of pathos; in La Manche, many schools are deserted because the teachers decline to put away the prohibited books; in Saintonge, so steady was the resistance of the pupils that the Government inspector, at a meeting of the school teachers, advised them to be conciliating and to withdraw the evil books; in Savoy the same policy of conciliation is practised, as the teachers fear a general exodus of children, who are ready to leave the Government schools unless they obtain satisfaction.

A number of newspaper articles have been published that point out the errors contained in the books used by the Government teachers and thus is fully justified the timely interference of the French Episcopacy. A priest of Annecy, the Abbé Pernoud, has written a volume on the subject. He quotes one by one the historical fallacies that are taught, under official patronage. The Church is represented as promoting the oppression of the lower orders; Jeanne d'Arc is a visionary, Luther "a pious monk," who enlightened the minds of his contemporaries; Voltaire, an apostle of tolerance, "who is justly dear to modern France." These same books teach that the Catholic religion was once the official religion of the country; this meant that "those who did not practise it were persecuted; now the Government ignores the existence of religion, but it does not persecute!!" Other passages from these books were quoted by M. Barrès in the French chambers, on January 18. Children of ten, belonging to the working classes, learn passages like the following: "We used to be ignorant and slaves to prejudice; now, thanks to our teachers, we can commune with the thinkers and philosophers of all times and of all countries."

M. Grousseau, a brilliant Catholic orator, who took a leading part in the debate in the chamber, quoted another passage from a "revue" which is read by forty thousand French school teachers. It says: "Man is an ephemeral form of matter"; "materialism brings calmness to troubled minds . . . real thinkers do not accept any set belief on the subject of God, the origin of the world or the destiny of man. Only suppositions are possible on these questions."

It is on the subject of the French Revolution, more especially, that the official school books teem with historical errors. The "immortal principles of 1789," grossly misinterpreted, are the basis of modern French politics, and everything that touches upon the Revolution is treated with reverence. The Vendean peasants who were driven to take up arms by the oppressive tyranny of the revolutionary government, are represented as "fanatics, whose actions were prompted by their priests; they were refused absolution if they did not fight against the Republic." The "fête de la Raison," called by Taine, by no means a clerical writer, a "solemn farce," is alluded to with respect, and even the names of the Republican months are mentioned with enthusiasm.

The debate in the chambers on the subject of education brought to the front the principal Catholic orators. MM. Barrès, Grousseau, Piou, de Mun, Abbé Gayraud, and their brilliant and logical speeches scored a distinct success, at any rate in public opinion.

The Catholic newspapers rightly point out the connection that exists between the irreligious teaching that for years past has been poisoning the minds of the young and the increase of crime among boys and young men. They quote statistics that are startling and these are fully confirmed by the testimony of specialists who have made a careful study of the subject. The greater proportion of these youthful criminals, whose number has increased so fearfully within the last few years, are not illiterate; thus, in 1906 there were only 330 illiterate, while there were 2,702 educated youthful criminals. These facts alone prove the terrible and far-reaching effects of a teaching that, by destroying all supernatural beliefs and motives, lets loose the worst passions. The empty, high-flown moral principles that are taught in the Government schools are no check upon the evil instincts that lie in the hearts of men, and the policy that aims at unchristianizing a country is fraught with danger to the life and property of its inhabitants.

It is difficult for the citizens of a free land to realize the tyranny that the Masonic Government of France exercises over its subordinates. It requires no small courage on the part of the fathers of the little ones, whose souls are at stake, to make a stand against its oppression, and their attitude in the present struggle is a distinctly hopeful symptom. It proves that the voice of their ecclesiastical pastors still appeals to the working classes, who were generally regarded as having strayed beyond the limits of the Church's influence; it also proves that the spiritual welfare of their children touches them to the quick and impels them to take a line of action at variance with their instinctive submission or apathy when "le Gouvernement" is concerned.

The Morality of Modern Socialism

A recent study made by the Rev. John J. Ming, S.J., of the moral aspects and tendencies of modern Socialism is very opportune. The reading public is fairly familiar with Socialism's designs on capital and economics, but is not so well acquainted with its radical views of man's nature, obligations and destiny and the fundamental tenets of Christian Ethics. Father Ming, however, has long been a professor of philosophy and has learned how much of history can be traced to those hidden springs of human action, the principles of conduct which guide and dominate men's lives. He has, therefore, "searched the very foundations which socialist philosophers have laid for morality and scrutinized the views which they hold on law, sanction, obligation, conscience and motives of right action." He has studied "the evil they find in the present civilization, the family and the State, what remedies and reforms they advise, to what ultimate form of society they look forward, and what duties they regard as essential to social life. The outcome of his investigation is far from reassuring.

Socialists claim indeed that their system will not only not relax morals, but bring about the consummation of morality and hasten the last stage of its evolution. But Father Ming's study of the means which the acknowledged exponents of its doctrines intend to employ to effect this moral transformation has opened his eyes to some startling revelations. Socialism, he finds, plans to overthrow the entire theistic basis of morality. "They (the Socialists) most fiercely attack religion and especially Christianity, impugning its very foundations and proposing measures for its complete suppression." They deny the existence of God, the spirituality of the soul, the freedom of the will, the future life of reward. Religion they regard as "absurd superstition," the Church and Christianity as human institutions which have for their end "the oppression and exploitation of the working classes." The Catholic Church, in particular, excites their most relentless hatred; nor do they ever take the trouble to study its dogmas and practices, its history and character in authentic sources.

Socialistic philosophy, the author assures us, is frankly and avowedly materialistic. Denying the essential difference between right and wrong, it has but one norm for judging good and evil and that is the shifting demands of social expediency. Moral law and sanction, moral obligation and responsibility have no place in the system; where they do exist they are rather the result of physical coercion, mere passing phases of evolution, destined to cease altogether in society's final and perfect stage of development. Monogamous marriage, parental society, and even the State, must eventually give way in the reconstruction of social conditions which will come with the triumph of Socialism, and in their place will be established free love, care of children by public officials and at public expense, and a cooperative commonwealth.

Such in brief are the more important conclusions to which Father Ming has been led by his study of Socialism; conclusions which are the more valuable because based on numerous citations from the acknowledged exponents of socialistic ideas. It was obviously impossible to make his inductions absolutely comprehensive. He does not contend, therefore, that all Socialists are as radical as those from whose writings he quotes; but he does amply establish his contention as to the general character and tendency of Socialism. Individuals may or may not assent to this or that part of the system; but the system as a whole, the system as understood by its founders and recognized leaders is what Father Ming has shown it to be.

Canada's Proposed Navy

On February 3, the great debate on the proposed Canadian navy began at Ottawa. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was in good form, reviewed Canada's attitude toward imperial defence since 1902. That year at the Imperial Conference, when the British Secretary of the Navy proposed that Canada should contribute to the expenses of the imperial navy, the Canadian Government refused to do so, but acknowledged that it ought to assist the Empire by contributing to the defence of the Dominion. Since that time the Canadian nation has always felt that if she was "daughter in her mother's house," she must be "mistress in her own." While cooperating loyally with Great Britain, Canada means to maintain complete control of her resources. A direct money contribution to the British navy would be contrary to Imperial and Canadian principles.

To those who say that the Canadian Navy would be subject to the British Admiralty in time of war, Sir Wilfrid replied that the proposed navy could not take part in any war without the permission of the Canadian Parliament. Mr. R. L. Borden, leader of the Opposition, went even farther than the Premier. He first asked how it came to pass that, after preaching in 1891 and 1892 the independence of Canada and hatred of militarism, Sir Wilfrid now holds the opposite view. Mr. Borden next advocated direct contributions to the defence of the Empire. When the metropolis is attacked Canada must also be at war. The integrity of the Empire must be safeguarded at any cost. Therefore the Imperial fleet must be under one head. Clause 18 of the Naval Bill is worthless, since the Governor-General-in-Council can refuse to send ships. Such a refusal would be tantamount to a declaration of independence. The policy of the Cabinet is ineffectual, it is too slow. The fleet would not be ready before five years.

In conclusion Mr. Borden proposed a long amendment to the original motion. The practical clauses of this amendment hold that so expensive and permanent a measure should first be submitted to the popular vote, and that the people should be asked if they approve, not a small local navy, which would have to be supported by large battleships from Australia and New Zealand, but a direct contribution of money sufficient to build or buy two Dreadnoughts of the latest pattern. Mr. Monk, leader of the opposition in the Province of Quebec, said that the ministerialists were trying to deceive the people by pretending that this naval bill was just an ordinary measure, while in reality it is a measure which completely revolutionizes Canadian politics. By means of this bill the Imperialists are carrying out their long cherished plan of destroying colonial autonomy. Clause 18 of the bill, providing for a meeting of Parliament to discuss the despatch of the fleet beyond Canadian waters, is deceptive; for it omits to say that the King can assume command of the fleet at any time.

Alluding to Earl Grey's recent Imperialistic address before the Women's Council at Quebec, Mr. Monk reminded the Governor-General that such manœuvres are beneath the dignity of His Majesty's representative. He went on to ask if Canadians would be obliged to take part in even the unjust wars of the Empire. Then he showed that there was no ingratitude in his criticism of England's treatment of Canada in the past. Canada had done more for England than England had for Canada.

Though Canadians refused in 1775 to join the American Revolution, yet England was on the point of surrendering all Canada to the United States in 1782. England sacrificed Canada in the Maine boundary question and recently in the Alaska award by the supreme British court. Mr. Monk concluded by moving an amendment to the effect that Parliament has no right to vote such a law without consulting the people. Whatever be the merits of the question—the needs of Great Britain, the security of the Empire, the necessity of a fleet, the effectiveness of the proposed measure—Parliament has not received from the people the moral right to entangle Canadians in a new policy which will ultimately affect the autonomy of Canada, her relations with the outside world, the security of her commerce and industry, the resources of her people and the lives and civic conditions of her children.

LEWIS DRUMMOND, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Serbs of Bosnia

BELGRAVE, DECEMBER 9, 1909.

What claim, it is asked, has Serbia to the lands of Bosnia and Herzegovina? We answer: The claim of the first resuscitated portion of the great Serb Empire torn asunder and held in subjection by Turkey and Austria, to extend a helping hand to the others; the claim of an independent kingdom to protect less fortunate brethren striving for freedom; the claim of historical, racial and lingual identity. An identity of religion need not be put forward since the Catholic Serbs of Bosnia and Croatia have thrown in their lot with the Orthodox for the preservation of their nationality threatened by the encroachment of Austrian and Magyar. The vicissitudes of Bosnia's destiny in the past, its temporary subjugations by various rulers can no more militate against its right to autonomy than eradicate the Serb character of its inhabitants. The Belgians, who have passed successively under Spanish, German and French rule, are intensely Belgian to-day when they possess a prosperous and independent state.

Servia, let it be noted, has not asked for reunion of the debatable provinces to her own little kingdom. But she asked for their autonomy, which was doubtless tantamount to such reunion in the opinion of those who deny that the Serb element is so strong, and yet take measures to counteract its unitive tendency. If Bosnia and Herzegovina were, as is stated, integral parts of the Croatian Empire, and as such, subject to Hapsburg rule, why did Austria demand permission to occupy them in 1878, and why did she pay an enormous indemnity to Turkey at the time of the annexation? Above all, why did she draft a greater army into Bosnia and Herzegovina than England ever needed to subdue Ireland, or to maintain peace in India? Her diplomatic action itself was an acknowledgment that she had not, in thirty years, obtained the good-will of the population.

Austria has not yet taken to heart the bitter lessons of her usurpations. Her occupation of Servia, from 1717 to 1739, was short-lived. So was that of Dalmatia, 1794-1806. The Vienna Congress of 1815 gave her again Dalmatia, Istria and the Trentino, which broke loose in 1858 and 1866. The same fate awaits her with Bosnia and Herzegovina. Austria has not the knack of assimilation and her conquering spirit breeds opposition. It is true that a deputation of Bosnians asked for reunion with Austria, just as the last Irish parliament asked for legislative union with England. Weak elements are everywhere to be found, who for material considerations are ready to adopt any creed or political opinion; but this deputation did not represent a people who, after driving out the Moslems, defended under the heroic Hadji Loya their hard won liberty against Austrian aggression.

The declaration of certain witnesses in the treason trial at Agram that they never knew they were Serb until Belgrade agitators inspired them to assert it, should, in justice, be accompanied by the declarations of the majority of the prisoners who confessed their sentiments of Serb solidarity, innate, traditional, and, until the Austrian occupation, undisputed.

The whole history of the annexation is in itself Austria's worst indictment and as such has been judged by the sane minds of England and America.

The development of the Serb peoples being the chief obstacle to German expansion towards the South, a systematic campaign was entered upon to crush the race and assure German predominance. While a commercial war was forced on the kingdom of Serbia, insidious attempts were made to break up the Serbo-Croat coalition in Croatia. But an admirable fortitude, and a stubborn adherence to fraternal ties defeated Austria in either case. The Serb national instinct became daily more strongly defined and the Serb element steadily gained ground. Cultural relations between the Balkan Slavs could not be viewed with equanimity in Vienna. Ban Peyatchevitch was replaced by Ban Rakotsky, who in turn retired discomfited.

Austria, in the beginning of 1908, had this vision on her southern boundaries: Serbia, Bulgaria and Montenegro living in friendship; a customs tariff union between Serbia and Bulgaria that meant Serbia's economical independence; complete reconciliation of the Croatian, Dalmat, and Bosnian Serbs; finally, intellectual relations of the most vital and harmonious kind between all Balkan Slavs. These were the halcyon days of the Southern Slav movement towards cultural union. Austria set herself to stem the evolution. Her categorical demand for the abolition of the Serbo-Bulgar customs union was rendered effectual by the fascinating guerdon of a royal crown offered to an ambitious scion of Coburg. Ferdinand withdrew Bulgaria from the ranks of the Southern Slavs. After seeking various pretexts for hostility he ended by almost threatening to make war on Serbia!

Next, a mysterious conspiracy was discovered in Montenegro, and a state spy—who will afterwards figure in the trial of the "rebel" Serbs at Agram—swore at Cetinje that the conspiracy against the aged Prince Nicola was hatched at the Court of Serbia and financed by the Servian Government. Diplomatic relations were broken off between Serbia and Montenegro, and Austria rubbed her hands in glee. Success was hers so far, but there remained still the Serbo-Croat coalition in Croatia with its ramifications in Bosnia. No insidious methods availed here and Austria was forced to resort to open terrorism. A series of arrests began, for the ostensible defence of the mighty Dual Empire menaced by the Serb propaganda of her tiny neighbor. Human tools are not easily found for infamous purposes and Austria had to employ again the informer, Nastitch, the same who first won fame by his libellous pamphlet, "The Jesuits in Bosnia," and then, from an ardent Slav patriot, became the denouncer of every decent Serb with whom he had once spoken.

After compassing the ruin of innocent men in Montenegro, he continued his career of perjury in Croatia; but the fable of the great Serb propaganda carried no weight with Europe, and Austria, conscious that her act of robbery may be tolerated but would not be condoned, had no resource but to violate flagrantly the treaty of Berlin. Bosnia and Herzegovina were seized in the night, nefariously, disloyally. Surely Serbia's alleged "appetite" for provinces where dwell Serbs and Serbo-Croats is less reprehensible than Austria's appetite for all Slav lands beginning with Poland, but not ending with Bosnia. A recent article in the military Danzer-Zeitung of Vienna advocated the immediate invasion of Serbia since it is "inevitable at some date." This augurs ill for peace in the Balkans. Can the world wonder if a race which is being cynically dismembered clamors for help? It is the same race that, in fighting bravely for its own existence, preserved Western Europe from the hordes of Mahomet. As soon as it succumbed they were under the walls of Vienna, to be repulsed by another Slav race, rewarded by betrayal and partition.

One word more. It is scarcely generous to taunt Serbia with her dynastical misfortunes. The Government of Vienna was the first to recognize the present occupant of Serbia's throne as lawful king. Scarcely were the royal victims of a murderous clique cold in death than it was made known to the people of Serbia that a counter revolution would bring an invasion of foreign troops. "We will have no more disturbance on our frontier," was the watchword, tantamount to approval of successful assassination. But the Serb cause cannot be injured in fair and serious minds by the dilatoriness of Serbia's monarch in meting justice to criminals, no more than the shortcomings of—say—Belgium's monarch, can affect the prestige of an intelligent and virtuous people. The time is gone by when nations were personified in their sovereigns and judged accordingly. Any dynastical vicissitudes in Serbia—and these are diligently fostered by a neighbor eager to seize an opportunity if the moment be suitable—cannot justify Austria's usurpation of Bosnia.

Neither Turkey, absorbed in her internal transformation, nor Serbia, weakened and isolated, could oppose the annexation; but Europe was aroused, and Europe is vigilant. The march to the Ægean will not be the "military stroll" that Austria counted upon. Europe has but postponed the day of reckoning.

Political Outlook in Spain

ROQUETAS, SPAIN, JANUARY 17, 1910.

The situation in Spain remains unchanged. The impression grows stronger that at the first serious crisis the Moret cabinet will fall. The Cortes remains closed, and as yet there has been no final statement as to whether or not the present deputies will be dismissed and a general election declared. With the present representatives recognized, the Government will have a minority of votes in the Cortes; by a new general election there is a strong probability that the majority of the Right may be lessened, or even overcome, as the recent Municipal elections brought victory to the Liberals, Republicans and Socialists. This result was due to the lack of union among the conservative forces.

The united protest of the bishops of Spain against the reopening of the neutral or lay schools will probably go unheeded. The Minister of Public Instruction has expressed his views as favoring the reopening of these schools. In fact, the charge is made that, in some places, these schools are being quietly reopened with the Government's connivance. While Catholic societies have added their voice to the protests of the bishops, little heed will probably be paid to this demand. Moret and the Liberals were helped into power by the Republican forces, to whose clubs these schools generally belong. As the Catholic parties are hostile to the Liberal Ministry, it seems improbable that Moret will anger the Radical forces, whose support he needs, by refusing them the permission to re-open their schools, even though it is known that the doctrines taught are atheistical and anarchistic.

An event which is causing widespread comment is the recent public protest in Madrid of some four or five hundred officers of the Army against the general policy of the present Liberal Government in regard to army affairs. The event is significant of the fact that the army as a class is hostile to the Liberal cabinet and the dangerous revolutionary forces which are supporting it. To those Spanish editors who are taking a pessimistic view of affairs in Spain, and who are busy predicting a revolution in the no distant future, this public protest of such a large number of the men commanding the troops of Spain, should give new evidence that, though the most pessimistic editorial fears should prove true, the army as a class will not be found allied with the Radical forces.

The monarchical press is advocating the awarding of the Grand Cross of Beneficence (Le Gran Cruz de Beneficencia) to Queen Victoria for her personal untiring charity towards the wounded soldiers of the war in Africa.

Paul Bourget's Latest Play, "La Barricade"

JANUARY 18, 1910.

It rarely happens that a useful and healthy moral lesson may be gathered from the plays that are represented in the Paris theatres. As a rule, these plays are either grossly immoral or else their false and perverse ideas and theories are veiled under Gallic wit and brightness. In either case, they are calculated to do more harm than good. Paul Bourget's last play, "la Barricade," touches deeper chords and awakens more serious thoughts; it is suggested by the social problems that, in France as elsewhere, are to the fore at the present moment, hence its timely interest and the curiosity that it has excited, even more in literary and political circles than among the ordinary playgoers, who merely seek amusement.

Paul Bourget is, on the whole, better known to fame as a novelist than as a dramatic author, and his undoubted talent makes the gradual transformation of his ideas and doctrines interesting to the general public. He exercises considerable influence in the literary world and his evolution towards Catholic and conservative ideals is of importance; not that M. Bourget was ever an openly immoral or revolutionary writer, but each one of his books, within the last few years reveals a more serious turn of thought and a more earnest desire to grapple with the moral problems that haunt the minds of his contemporaries.

All M. Bourget's works are remarkable for their subtle analysis of character, their delicate word-painting, their charm and elegance of style; but his later productions: "L'Etape," "Le Divorce," "L'Emigré," go deeper and touch on more poignant questions. He is no longer content with drawing delightful pictures of social life, flavored by witty remarks and pervaded by a charming and somewhat sceptical philosophy; he grapples with the problems that bring pain and confusion to so many souls and he does so in a healthy and reverent spirit. No clerical preacher could have made his hearers realize the suffering and sin of divorce more clearly than M. Bourget in his powerful and pathetic novel, where the cause of religion is identified with that of social order and the claims of the innocent children of divorced parents are put forward under the veil of fiction. Politically, M. Bourget is now a royalist; his convictions in this respect are not the outcome of education and tradition; they are the natural consequence of a long course of reasoning, as he is ready to confess when the opportunity offers.

In "La Barricade" he touches upon the burning and complex question of the relative rights and duties of workmen and their employers; hence the keen interest with which this play was received and the animated discussions that it has already given rise to in Paris, one of M. Bourget's warmest admirers being that well-known Catholic orator and writer, Count Albert de Mun. The plan of the drama is simple enough; M. Breschard, a rich widower, is the head of a large furniture factory; he is an active, hard working, able, just and humane employer. His morality is questionable; he has led astray one of his workwomen, Louise, the heroine of the play; but he offers to marry her, an offer which she rejects as she prefers to remain in her own class. M. Breschard is no tyrant, twentieth century employers rarely are; his social error consists in ignoring the tremendous forces that are arrayed against "those who possess." He does not illuse the men who work under him and, beyond his evil doing with regard to Louise, the heroine of the play, he is, taking things all in all, a just master. But either from habit, from ignorance or from a certain hardly recognized feeling of contempt, he is deaf and blind to the evolution that has taken place among the working classes, and this sin of omission becomes, under present circumstances, a source of danger to all.

M. Bourget has drawn the manufacturer, Breschard, with carefully restrained sympathy; he evidently regards him as the personification of a particular class of men, into whose minds he wishes to infuse new lights and whose dormant energies he wishes to awaken. No less symbolic is the old workman, Gaucheron, old fashioned in his loyalty to his employer, who manfully resists the advances of the strikers, but who is an isolated unit, whereas the others form a multitude closely banded together. Langouët represents the modern workman, just as Gaucheron symbolizes his old fashioned prototype; his revolt against the authority of his employer is intensified by his love for Louise, and she in the end prefers the revolutionary workman to her wealthy bourgeois lover, another example of the secret power of class sympathy. In the last act, Breschard satisfies the claims of justice by expelling Langouët, who has preached rebellion among his fellow workers, and satisfies the claims of humanity by giving him, anonymously, sufficient money to make a fresh start on his own account.

The interest of the piece does not lie so much in the dramatic scenes that it brings before the eyes of the spectator as in the subtle sense and meaning that pervades the whole play; hence its success, hence also the close, almost painful attention with which night after night a crowded audience follows the developments of the drama.

The papers have naturally taken up the subject. Count Albert de Mun, the Catholic champion, was present at the first performance and confesses that he came away overwhelmed by emotion; M. Pataud, the revolutionary leader, "King Pataud," as he has been surnamed, also went to see it; he recognized M. Bourget's meaning and aim, but scoffs at what he considers a futile attempt to infuse new life and energy into a worn out bourgeoisie. In different letters written to the papers, M. Bourget openly confesses that such indeed is the aim and object of "La Barricade," and his reflections on the subject are judicious.

A dramatic author, he justly remarks, is not a religious preacher, nor can he attempt to write a treatise on political economy; he gives a picture of what takes place in real life and his object and theories may be gathered, not from a stray sentence, but from his work taken as a whole.

M. Bourget does not believe in equality; social differences must and will always exist; the rivalry of the different classes cannot be avoided; but, if rightly understood, the struggle between the employers and employees may bring in its train certain developments that are conducive to general welfare. "Social classes," he says, "are like nations; they have no right to keep what they have not sufficient energy to defend . . . When I urge the upper classes to defend themselves, I mean that they must prove themselves superior to the others by their intelligence and activity . . . I believe in the inequality of social conditions, and I urge the members of the "bourgeoisie" to develop and increase their moral worth."

These ideas are developed in the course of the drama, but, although he is no friend to anarchy, M. Bourget points out the tremendous force of the syndicates that at the present time band workmen together, and he shows, through the example of the typical M. Breschard, that it is folly to ignore facts that are real, if unpleasant. He still believes in an awakening of energy among the upper classes, those who "possess," and this belief is the leading idea of his play. He also indicates, with his usual subtlety, the conditions that should accompany this revival. The employers must ally their forces to those of men, like Gaucheron, who are, as yet, free from a revolutionary spirit. With regard to the others, of whom Langouët is the type, they must be just and strong and, when the battle is over, more merciful even than just. Above all, they must give an example of morality. Breschard is made to acknowledge his evil doing with regard to Louise, and he offers her the only reparation in his power.

There are other characters in M. Bourget's drama that are bits of real life: thus, Breschard's son, a dreamy utopist, whom stern realities awakened from his impossible theories; Thubœuf, the organizer of strikes, is the man whose career consists in arousing the passions of the ignorant workmen, whose uncultured minds are influenced by his fine speeches; he is an anarchist without convictions. In a letter to the Matin, M. Bourget, after summing up the ideas that we have just set forth, ends by a declaration that, coming from so influential a writer, has its value. In the inevitable social struggle that is going on under our eyes he recognizes that the interference of a superior power, that of the Church, can alone bring an element of order and justice into the conflict, and that our twentieth century society will be a prey to hopeless anarchy as long as it ignores "the words of eternal life." Like François Coppée and many others, M. Bourget is another example of a cultured, modern, French man of letters, who has, by a gradual evolution, come over to Rome.

Echoes from Rome

ROME, JANUARY 19, 1910.

In the monastic silence of San Anselmo on the Aventine, the pontifical commission named by the Pope in 1907 is at work on the colossal undertaking of the revision of the Vulgate. On January 14, Dom Gasquet gave an informal talk on the work in hand to the members of the British School. As the object is a revision of St. Jerome's work in the fourth century, the first step was so to print the text of the Clementine edition as to leave two-thirds of each page blank for the revisers' notes and references. Next a catalogue of all the manuscript Latin Bibles to be found in European libraries was prepared. The fifteen collaborators, now engaged on different parts of the work that have been laid out, will work together when the actual collation of texts shall have been reached. All this requires time, labor and money. Dom Gasquet thinks that ten years and $60,000 will be required to complete the undertaking.

The preparatory congregation on the heroicity of the virtues of the Venerable Marguerite Bourgeoys, held on January 18, was the first of the series of meetings of the Sacred Congregation of Rites for this year. To this Congregation belong all questions affecting the liturgy and the exclusive office of passing upon the merits of the faithful who have died in the repute of extraordinary virtue. Twenty-one meetings are scheduled for this year. The Congregation has under consideration three hundred and twenty-one causes of beatification and canonization, of which ten are from Asia, five from Africa, ten from North America, thirteen from South America, and two from Australia. The others are from Europe. The causes that are likely to be taken up first are those of Blessed Chanel, protomartyr of Oceania and Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque.

The suburbicarian See of Frascati, held by the lamented Cardinal Satolli, will probably remain vacant for some time, for the five sees in the immediate vicinity of Rome, hitherto held by Cardinals employed at the papal court, are to undergo an important change, of which I shall speak in detail when circumstances permit.

L'EREMITA.

A correspondent from Munich sends us the following interesting note:

In the new edition of his bulky text-book on the "History of Dogma," Harnack has something to say regarding Modernism. After an excellent sketch of the system in general, he continues: "Even though the Modernist's assumption regarding 'perfectibility' were admitted, to hold the Catholic Church to be the exclusive guardian of the development theory is to me, after the experience of the last four centuries, the mark of a misguided zeal seeking to fill the gaping crevices and serious breaks which the student of history discovers in his investigations. Such a course has never yet led to great achievements in the field of dogmatic history. Eventually one may add, its devotees will make clear to all who reject the claims of Protestantism, the right underlying these claims. Meanwhile, and surely this is strictly within his competency, the Pope declares that the teachers of Modernism are not Catholics. They belong to us, despite all their efforts." These last words of the German scholar ought to be effective with the Modernists, who proclaim their loyalty to Catholic faith.

The present Pope has increased the hierarchy by the creation so far of fifteen Prefectures Apostolic; sixteen Vicariates Apostolic; two Prelatures Nullius; eighteen Bishops, and eight Archbishops.

Cardinal Andrieu of Bordeaux denies that he has paid the fine recently imposed on him by the French courts for his denunciation of the operation of the separation laws. He says he has not only not paid the fine but that he has not given anyone authority to do so; that his sentiments in regard to the urgent separation laws are unchanged and that he does not know any Catholic of Bordeaux who would by paying the fine, presume to interfere in a question so closely affecting the rights and liberties of the Church. It is suspected that the Government caused the fine to be paid to hush the case up.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Ferrer Demonstration

As the facts about Ferrer become known, the Cook North Pole story begins to lose the record for successful deception. The newspapers which were so ardent in his defense seem to feel that the less said about him the better. The liberal ministry, which, according to the French press despatches, was going to vindicate his memory, has avoided every occasion of compromising itself with his sympathizers. This reluctance to stand for his anarchistic movement appeared very clearly in their attitude to the demonstration that took place in Barcelona on Sunday, January 16. The military tribunal, subsequently to the execution of Ferrer, had passed sentence of death on about a dozen of the ringleaders of last fall. The common talk was that they would surely be liberated by the present Moret government. The latter, though, hesitates to reverse the sentence of the court martial without very substantial grounds. Nothing less than a popular and universal condemnation of the verdict would make them do it and dare the resentment of the military element. Hence it seems that those who wish to befriend both the condemned and the government promoted the idea of this demonstration. They obtained the necessary leave, and it came off peacefully. They say that the question was debated in the City Council, whether the authorities should grace the occasion in their official capacity, but that it was voted down. The demonstration started with about four thousand, counting, of course, women and children, and when it reached the Governor's palace the mass had not grown to the hundred thousand as they expected and the newspapers stated. This goes to show that even here the masses are cooling, not only because of the soothing agency of time, but most especially because the stern facts of the life of the "gentle educator" are becoming known in spite of the conspiracy to conceal them.

Bartoli's Waldensian Revival

The arrival in this country of George Bartoli of Modena, who was, until 1908, a priest and a member of the Society of Jesus, is the signal for a press propaganda in his behalf as a distinguished convert from errors which were adroitly concealed from him, all through his career as a student, and later as a professor and publicist, until his eyes were at last opened in his maturer years.

According to the newspaper statements which have appeared from time to time in the last few months, it first occurred to him to doubt about the correctness of his theological views when he was attempting to refute some publication (the name of which is not given) of the Anglican Bishop of Bombay, and discovered for the first time that Saint Cyprian, whom he had been taught to regard as a staunch defender of the unity of the Church, was not so at all; but that, on the contrary, his writings had been misquoted, interpolated and falsified in order to make him appear as its defender. His press agents do not know that the disputed texts of St. Cyprian are commonly treated in text books of Catholic theology. The priest who claims that they have been concealed from him is either romancing or confessing ignorance. It was in India Bartoli discovered his doubts, and so warped and distorted had his views become during his usual four years' Jesuit Seminary course that it took him twelve years, living all this time as a Jesuit, to review these same theological studies, and to arrive at the truth which he now believes he has found in the doctrine of the Waldenses. It is in the interests of the Waldensian Church that he has come to this country to lecture and evangelize.

Father Bartoli passed twenty-nine years of his life among the Jesuits; of this time about twelve years were spent in the Novitiate and in scholastic preparation for the priesthood. Most of the remaining seventeen years he lived partly at Scutari, Albania, and partly at Mangalore, British East Indies, teaching the elementary studies which are usually taught in Mission colleges or schools. About 1904, after suffering from sun-stroke and an attack of typhoid fever, he returned to Rome and, although not a member of the editorial staff of the Civiltà Cattolica, he remained for a while in their residence, spending his time in writing stories for that periodical, one of which, the "Biography of a Superman," attracted some attention, although it did not run beyond the first edition. It would appear that his sun-stroke had made him restless and intractable, and he could no longer adjust himself to the observances of a Jesuit community. In 1905 he left Rome for Dublin, where he attempted to act as correspondent of the Civiltà Cattolica, but his contributions were not accepted, as he did not seem capable of regarding the country or its people seriously. Returning to Rome, and unwilling to comply with the rules of the Order, he was, for some time, in a dubious position, regarded by some as a Modernist, although protesting strenuously that he had nothing to do with Modernism, and that he was determined to re-enter his religious order.

When refused re-admission by the Jesuits, he made a tour of Italy, preaching against the Romanism of the Vatican and the Jesuits, though still claiming to be a Catholic. The newspapers, even La Tribuna, Il Giornale d'Italia, and L'Avanti, ignored him, and he failed to find either pulpit or audience for his teaching. Next he attempted to found a new order called the "Guards of Christ" in order to unite all the weeds from the Pope's garden, clerics, friars and laymen. He announced the foundation of a Theological and Biblical Institute in Rome, appealed to the Americans there for funds, but received no response and nothing more has been heard of the foundation. Lately he has been advocating Waldensian views, not because they are Protestant, but because they are, according to him, of Italian origin, and peculiarly suitable for Italians, although their founder was a Frenchman, and the first members of the sect were known as "The Poor Men of Lyons." The Liberal or Anti-Clerical papers, which, as a rule, are glad to chronicle any clerical scandal, have paid no heed to his pretensions.

A Sad Blunder

In its issue of February 2, the Evening Post had an article supposed to be appropriate to the day. The writer passed with an easy transition from the ground-hog to the Blessed Virgin Mary, from ground-hog day to Candlemas. Of course he meant no harm. The Evening Post would not for an instant wound the susceptibilities of the least of its readers. The writer and the editor view, we must presume, with the same good-humored tolerance, the ground-hog superstition and the Christian, and take an equal interest in both as relics of a darker age. But one who writes for the public ought to know his public. There is no question here of mere susceptibilities. The editorial staff of every paper in New York ought to be aware of the hundreds of thousands within the limits of the city who, though they ignore the ground-hog, hold the Blessed Virgin's place in the economy of salvation, as a part of their faith, and celebrate her feasts with loving devotion.

The article was still more offensive when it went on to tell flippantly how the Feast of Candlemas has its origin in the Roman Lupercalia. The proof of this wild assertion is twofold. It used to be celebrated at the time of the Lupercalia, in the middle of February, and lighted candles are carried in procession, as torches were borne by the Romans. Unfortunately for the Evening Post the feast is not of Roman origin at all. It came to Rome from the Eastern Church with its date fixed. It had to occur, according to the rules of the Levitical law, forty days after the birth of Christ, and since in the beginning His birth and His Epiphany were celebrated simultaneously on January 6, this date was necessarily February 14, Lupercalia or no Lupercalia. As for the arguments drawn in this and similar cases, from the use of lights, watching, processions, flowers, lustral water, etc., they are utterly worthless. These have been used in worship by all nations in all ages, because they have commended themselves to all men as by their nature eminently fitted to express the sentiments of worshipping souls. It may, however, interest the Evening Post to learn that the procession with candles on Candlemas day was not introduced into the Church till long after the Lupercalia were dead and forgotten.

Negro and Indian Missions

The annual appeal for the great work of evangelizing the Indian and Negro races of the country has been issued by the Commission for the Negro and Indian Missions. Catholics are reminded that seldom has a Church had at its doors a greater opportunity for spreading the Gospel of Christ than has to-day the Church of America. Seven millions of the Negro race are awaiting missionaries to preach to them, and Brothers and Nuns to teach their children. It is all important that Catholics should, at least, support the workers who are already in the field and continue the work of the churches and schools. Those who possess the Faith are reminded that the Catholic Church alone can give the Colored People that definite religion, that clear and peremptory moral teaching, that firm, yet gentle moral discipline of which they stand in need. An illustration of what the Church can do with the colored people is afforded by comparing two considerable sections of Maryland, each of which has a very numerous colored population, the one almost wholly Catholic, the other almost wholly Protestant. "Among the Catholic Negroes," says the circular, "infractions of the law are almost wholly unknown, the jails are empty, the judges very rarely have a prisoner brought before them; in the Protestant district the very reverse is the case, crimes and numerous misdemeanors showing that Protestantism is not strong enough to control the evil tendencies of the Negro population." Even non-Catholics who are aware of this striking contrast wonder that these facts are not pointed to as proof of the Church's influence with the Negro and of the helplessness of Protestantism. As for the Indians in the United States, they have fared far worse than their brothers in other parts of the American hemisphere. Almost one-third of them are still heathens.

Recruits are needed to aid the Church of America in the performance of her full duty. "Many a young woman," says the appeal, "spends at home, in the school-room, in the office or in the shop, those powers which God intended her to use in His service for the salvation of souls." The Sisterhoods that have charge of schools, hospitals and asylums, would gladly welcome them to their ranks. Young men with the signs of a vocation are invited to join the Brothers and priests who labor faithfully and unostentatiously amid the hardships and privations of their missionary life. The vast sums of money contributed for missions by those who see in the outlay merely another means of procuring the moral, social and political uplift of their fellow men, should prompt Catholics, through love for those whom Christ has redeemed, to contribute according to their means for the spread of religious truth and the salvation of souls. Wealthy Catholics in supporting these missions have an opportunity to acquit themselves of the responsibility God imposed when he endowed them with riches; the many who, though not wealthy, spend money freely and even with sinful extravagance, should remember the claims of charity; the good Catholic poor can always be relied on to continue their aid to these missions to the Indians and Negroes. The appeal bears the signature of Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Ryan and Archbishop Farley.

Paris Apaches

The Paris flood has brought into sinister activity a class of wanton murderers whose crimes of late years have earned for them the generic name of Apaches. Like his Indian prototype, the Paris Apache delights in killing. He belongs to an underworld that is in a state of war with organized and peaceful society, and especially with the Paris police, a most worthy body of men, among whom graft, neglect of duty and abuse of power are practically unknown. Unfortunately of late years the Parisian anarchist has been petted by George Sorel and other preachers of violence, who have persuaded the Apache that he has rights against society. The consequence is that the police, dreading reproof from the strong revolutionary party, have hitherto refrained from even legitimate self-defence. On January 8 a young criminal of twenty-four murdered one policeman and badly wounded others before an agent of law and order ventured to use his sabre and put the Apache out of condition to do any more harm.

The funeral of the murdered policeman was attended by the Prefect of Police, the Presidents of the Senate and the Chamber, the Prime Minister, M. Briand, the President of the Court of Cassation, the Prefect of the Seine, the Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honor, the Military Governor of Paris, a great number of distinguished members of the bar, municipal councillors, and delegations of the Republican Guards and of the firemen's corps. These dignitaries walked behind the hearse from the headquarters of the municipal police force to the Cathedral of Notre Dame. M. Briand and the presidents of the Senate and Chamber entered the Cathedral, but did not remain for the service. However, the elaborateness of this public funeral in honor of a mere policeman shows that Parisians are awakening to the inestimable value of their incorruptible police. The body was buried in the municipal vault reserved for the "victims of duty." M. Lépine, the prefect of police, delivered at the cemetery a brief address in which he dwelt earnestly upon the number of policemen who have lately succumbed to the knives or revolvers of the Apaches. "Paris is a place of refuge," he said, "for too many bandits, and for these the laws are too tender. When will French society decide to defend itself?" He exhorted the murdered policeman's comrades patiently to await the time when public opinion would come to its senses and realize that drastic measures are necessary to check so dangerous an element. Prefect Lépine's speech made a great impression. Meanwhile, he himself has given orders that the police shall use their weapons whenever there is need for self-defence, and several Apaches have been summarily shot to death while looting houses during the recent flood.

These facts prove how misleading are those vaudeville sketches of so-called Apache life in Paris which are attracting such crowds in New York. They soften the bloodthirsty features of the real Apache, fling a certain acrobatic grace over his dissolute loves and follies, and thus provoke among unthinking sightseers an indulgent tolerance for assassins disguised as rather smart fellows. Success here means lengthened engagements for the provincial circuits, and, unless the public realizes that the Apache is essentially a cutthroat, we shall have the whole country laughing good-humoredly at the antics of a type of men and women who are really bestial.

The Bishops of Quimper and Bordeaux recently issued circular letters on the duties of the clergy in the present political situation. As the two prelates give practically the same advice, it will be sufficient to quote the former, who says: "Our right to enlighten the consciences of fathers and mothers is now being contested, and our schools will perhaps soon be closed. Let us have confidence all the same, and while making use of the means with which the law provides us, let us offer no truce in the battle which we are fighting in defence of the Christian faith of French children. The most urgent duty of the present hour is union with this object in view. The year 1910 is the year of the general elections to the Chamber of Deputies. The rôle of the priest is not to take part directly in the struggle, but to advise the faithful, and to remind them that they are called upon to come to an understanding with other Catholics and to vote as Catholics; that over and above political parties there is the Church, whose essential rights must be safeguarded, and Christian teaching, for which complete liberty should be claimed. All the faithful without distinction should offer up prayers in order that the electors may understand and do their duty. Let us pray for France and pray for the diocese."

LITERATURE

The Relations of the United States with Spain. Diplomacy. By FRENCH ENSOR CHADWICK, REAR ADMIRAL, U. S. N. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Our persuasion is that the absolutely fair and strictly impartial historian has not been born. As long as men are men, they are, to some extent, swayed by feeling, and feeling affects, if it does not destroy, that judicial equipoise so essential in the writer who would portray events in the light of their true, undisguised causes. Yet, a diligent perusal of this masterly contribution to our knowledge of United States history brings the conviction that the author has displayed an earnest and, in general, well-sustained effort to attain to the historian's ideal.

Irreconcilable antagonism exists between certain chemical elements, between certain members of the brute creation, and between certain social and ethnic conditions. Proximity means discord; distance makes for peace. Spite fences are between neighbors. The last place in which we may expect to find frankness is in diplomacy, where everyone, fearing to be outwitted, strives to outwit his opponent. Rear Admiral Chadwick, therefore, in carefully going over Hispano-American diplomatic relations for a hundred and thirty-five years, gives us a chronicle of skilful thrusts and parries, feints and pieces of bluster, buncombe and cunning wiles. Little that is lovable, high-minded, noble, is at home in diplomacy.

It is pitiful to think that President Washington, harassed as he was with so many governmental difficulties, should have to strive against the treachery of false friends in high official station and the treasonable action of a military officer when all his attention was demanded by the projected treaty with Spain (p. 39). Spanish gold and American greed were on the point of separating Kentucky and Tennessee from the Union. The disingenuous shiftiness of Jefferson and Madison (pp. 61, ff.) cost the country Texas, humiliated the administration abroad, and failed to secure even the color of a title to West Florida.

Jefferson's ingrained dislike for a navy, except some insignificant little tubs mounting one gun apiece, is severely scored (p. 106). At the door of that dislike are laid the British outrages on our shipping, the Embargo, the War of 1812 and the Mexican War. With Jefferson a navy was a "ruinous folly." The overtures of France to the South American revolutionists, looking towards setting up a Bourbon king in the La Plata country in 1819 must have hastened the ripening of the Monroe Doctrine, which has been an American principle of action since its enunciation in 1823.

From the time of President John Quincy Adams down to the last year of Buchanan's administration the project of acquiring Cuba for the Union, or at least of preventing its independence, was repeatedly mooted in both official and unofficial circles. The one objection to its independence was slavery, which had been abolished in the South American colonies as fast as they could obtain their independence. Abolition in nearby Cuba was too great a menace to the slave interests of the United States. But perhaps the most astounding official document in our archives is the Ostend manifesto, signed by three of our representatives abroad, among whom was the future President Buchanan, which advised the forcible seizure of the island (p. 262) if Spain could not be induced to dispose of it for money.

During all the trouble there is no denying that American sympathies were largely with the Cubans and against the Spaniards, though a more intimate acquaintance with the merits of the case might have made the general opinion less one-sided. We could wish that the Admiral had given more elaborate treatment to all the mitigating and aggravating circumstances that immediately preceded the President's message which was so closely followed by a declaration of war. Perhaps it is too soon to express such a wish or to expect its fulfilment.

The status of Cuba is by no means settled on a firm basis. The active formation of a distinctively colored political party is not a reassuring sign. Even as we write we learn that several editors have been incarcerated for maligning President Gómez. Admiral Chadwick's book is a distinct contribution to our knowledge of partisan politics in our own country and of the subtle, sinuous course of our diplomacy abroad.

Papers and Essays. By MOST REV. JOHN HEALY, D.D., M.R.I.A. St. Louis: B. Herder.

The Archbishop of Tuam has a wide reputation for rich and varied scholarship. In 1884 he became known to the general public by two essays in which he took issue with Cardinal Newman on the subject of biblical inspiration and showed himself well qualified to cope with so formidable an antagonist. This book has been compiled, on the occasion of his recent episcopal jubilee, by the Catholic Truth Society of Ireland, of which Dr. Healy is president. It contains some forty contributions, historical, biographical, archeological and educational, all directed "to the Glory of God and the honor of Ireland."

One is first impressed with the vast amount of interesting information the writer is able to impart on every subject he touches. Whether he discusses the ancient shrines, schools or manuscripts of Ireland, the poetry of Tennyson or the subtleties of Scotus, he has always some new thought or fact that adds to the knowledge and holds the interest of the reader. His picture of the Irish monks going forth "peregrinari pro Christo," inundating the Continent to found churches, monasteries and schools and preach Christ by their words and lives, and his sketch of the travails and triumphs of the Irish Church thrill with pathos and power. Clearness of thought and expression are especially noticeable when he treats of metaphysics and archeology.

The enlightened patriotism that inspired "Ireland's Saints and Scholars" impels the author to vindicate his country's claims to the motherhood not only of Duns Scotus but of St. Cuthbert, apostle of Northumbria, and of the monastic founder of Cambridge University. His demonstration of Scotus' Irish birth is characteristic of his historical method. His proofs are drawn not only from a study of all that was written about Scotus but of all that Scotus himself had written, a stupendous task which merited the pleasure he must have derived from the recent discovery of an entry in the Franciscan catalogue of 1381 declaring specifically that Scotus belonged to the Franciscan province of Ireland. But Dr. Healy demolishes Cardinal Moran's contention that St. Boniface was an Irishman.

In his story of St. Livinus, Apostle of Brabant, an incident escapes him that he surely would have seized on, as it gives evidence of Irish scholarship as early as the seventh century. When the people of Ghent learned that a stranger who was praying at the tomb of St. Bavon, their city's patron, was an Irishman, they asked him to write a Latin inscription for their founder's monument. Livinus wrote forthwith a classic ode which is still recited in the Belgian office of St. Bavon, in gratitude for which Ghent has adopted "St. Lievin" as their second patron and given his name to their diocesan seminary. Dr. Healy's demonstration that St. Livinus and many other comparatively unknown Irish saints were great apostles of Christianity is another proof of Mrs. Green's contention in "The Making of Ireland and Its Undoing," that Ireland's story is only beginning to be written.

Other notable essays are "The Priest in Politics" and a sympathetic appreciation of Dr. Brownson's works, both of which lay down definitely the relation of the Church and its ministers to civil society.

L'Art, la Religion et la Renaissance, by J. C. BROUSSOLLE. Paris: P. Tequi.

The author has been lecturing on Art at the Catholic Institute of Paris for a score of years, and during that time he has published more than a dozen volumes on various phases of his subject. At least one of these, "The Youth of Perugino and the beginnings of the Umbrian School" was crowned by the French Academy. "L'Art, la Religion et la Renaissance" is a study of the dogma and piety of the Italian Renaissance period as witnessed to by the Christian art of Italy during that time. The period covered by the study reaches from Fra Angelico to Giulio Romano, from 1400 to 1550, the age of the Old Masters, and includes Raphael in painting, Bramante in architecture, Donatello in sculpture, and Michael Angelo in all of these. The book is not so much on art as on art in the service of religion.

We find nothing here about colors, canvas, chisels or hemi-demi-semiquavers. There is nothing about technique. You look at the paintings (and it is almost limited to paintings), and ask yourself how far the Christianity of those times succeeded in expressing the mind of the Church on the canvas. One lecture is on Christ, another on His Mother, another on the Eucharist. The best and the weakest is on the Primacy of St. Peter. As an apology for the Primacy, it is a failure: the author seems never to have heard of the distinction between precedence and jurisdiction. But it more than redeems itself when it begins to portray "the divinity of the Papacy, the mystical survival of Christ in the person of the Pope, who continues his salvific power for the safety of the world."

There are eight chapters in all. They are a restatement of as many lectures given at the Catholic Institute. That the writer is a strong lover of the Old Masters and their works is everywhere apparent, but there is an admirable repression of enthusiasm. He is always saying something and in plain language. The four indices, of authors cited, of artists referred to, of illustrations, and of the matter in general, greatly enhance the value of the book. L. K.

A Year's Sermons, by PULPIT PREACHERS OF OUR OWN DAY. Fourth Series. New York: Joseph F. Wagner. Price $1.50.

We doubt whether in any other country the spoken word is of as much importance as it is in ours. We are so accustomed to addresses and speeches and lectures on every conceivable subject that, however exalted the theme, it runs the risk of falling flat and fruitless unless presented in a way that appeals and convinces. As the divine message leaves the sacred orator no leeway in laying down the number and kind of the truths that it contains, for they come to us with a God-given accuracy, upon the preacher falls the labor of presenting them in a way that may have the merit of novelty without sacrificing what God has taught. There is a reason, therefore, why volumes of carefully chosen sermons may be multiplied with a distinct advantage to priest and people. Each sermon in the book is preceded by a succinct synopsis which in itself gives one a good grasp on the subject treated. Three sermons which, in our opinion, are particularly well thought out and timely, are "Socialism and Christianity," by Bishop Bellord; "Religious Shallowness," by the Rev. J. H. Stapleton, and "True Conversion," by the Rev. H. G. Hughes.

St. Vincent de Paul and the Vincentians in Ireland, Scotland and England, A. D. 1638-1909, by the REV. PATRICK BOYLE, C.M. New York: Benziger Bros. Price $1.25 net.

The Church in America recognizes its great indebtedness to St. Vincent de Paul for the good that the various organizations founded by him have accomplished. The present volume emphasizes a characteristic of him as of every apostolic man, a zealous, worldwide activity in religious work. Primarily, it is devoted to the Vincentians of the British Isles, of whom it gives us details which make us hunger for more, but it also gives us a glance at the distant and widely scattered mission fields in which his spirit still labors.

We can picture to ourselves in some vague way the immense difficulties with which he had to struggle in establishing his Sisters of Charity (p. 124), for theirs was a life until then unknown in the Church. It is no exaggeration to say that ancient custom is more potent than any statutory provision, and against the persuasion of centuries St. Vincent de Paul had to contend. Humanly speaking, he was bound to fail. The Saint's reasons (p. 141) for having separate organizations for the Ladies' Association of Charity and the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, as we know the men's association, have been justified time out of mind.

A selection of letters to Irish Vincentians from their revered founder gives us an intimate acquaintance with his apostolic spirit. Ten brief sketches of prominent Irish Vincentians of the last century show that the same spirit continues in his Congregation. An appendix of official documents and a bibliography complete the volume.

A Pulpit Commentary on Catholic Teaching. A Complete Exposition of Catholic Doctrine, Discipline and Cult in Original Discourses by PULPIT PREACHERS OF OUR OWN DAY, Vol. III, The Means of Grace. New York: Joseph F. Wagner. Price $2.00.

Pope Pius X has put his finger on the crying need of the day when he has enlarged upon the importance of solid Catholic teaching. It may be more gratifying to the speaker even if less helpful to the congregation to make a great splurge in the pulpit and finish amid the clash of cymbals and the bray of the trumpet; but famished souls will remain unfed. How very generally definite religious teaching has vanished from non-Catholic pulpits is a fact of common knowledge, for it is easier to tickle the ear of the hearer with rhetorical claptrap than to teach him the ways and will of God. But those of the household of faith, looking to the Church as their directly commissioned teacher in faith and morals, listen in a condition of spiritual receptivity to the Sunday sermon. One decided advantage of setting before the faithful the truths of faith and canons of practice in an orderly way is that topics of great, though not of every day, importance in a parish, will now and then be treated in the pulpit. The sermons on Holy Orders and the Religious Life are cases in point. The pastor of souls who has the leisure and opportunity to map out by himself all his pulpit work is singularly blessed,—if he exists. He will find in the labors of his brethren in the ministry helps and suggestions to make his own work more fruitful by following a plan that embraces all states of life, all spiritual conditions. The sermons on Penance and the series on the Sacrament of Marriage deserve special mention for their full treatment of subjects so important.

A Spiritual Canticle of the Soul, by ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS. Translated by DAVID LEWIS, revised by BENEDICT ZIMMERMAN, O.C.D. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.95 net.

The path of the true reformer has never been strewn with roses. St. John of the Cross had a special mission to restore or revive the spirit and observances of the religious life. Small wonder, then, that the spirit of the world cloaked in the ample folds of the mantle of religion found a way to incarcerate the reformer. The "Spiritual Canticle of the Soul" was composed during his imprisonment. With barely enough daylight at midday to read the Divine Office, this holy companion and guide of St. Teresa found himself illuminated with a heavenly light which banished the darkness of his dungeon. As self-constituted reformers fly into excesses of word and action when their plans fall through, so a steadfast reliance upon God even in times of the direst adversity is a characteristic of the reformer whose call to the work is from on high. There is no suggestion of gloom and despondency in St. John's "Canticle." All is brightness, hope, reliance on God. Though intended primarily for contemplatives, there is no world-weary soul that cannot find refreshment and help in this volume from the pen of the supernaturally enlightened doctor of mystical theology.

The announcement that Mr. Frank Duaneck has finished his paintings for the cathedral in Covington, Ky., recalls one of the quarrels in Whistler's "Gentle Art of Making Enemies." It seems Whistler was accused on one occasion by some of his unfriendly critics of exhibiting a collection of etchings anonymously and contrary to the rules governing the exhibit. Mr. Whistler waited grimly until his detractors had committed themselves unmistakably, and then it transpired, to their confusion, that the etchings were the work of Mr. Duaneck.

Reviews and Magazines

Baron F. Von Hügel's picture of the late Father Tyrrell during the last twelve years of his life is the leading feature of The Hibbard Journal. Although drawn with sympathy and affection, it is not on the whole a flattering portrait, if we regard it as that of a man who is described as the possessor of "deep religiousness and delicate spirituality." The intimate disclosures of Baron Von Hügel reveal in his friend a sensitive soul wounded by opposition and not above acting upon ensuing motives of resentment, even to the extent of dishonesty. The sensitiveness of Father Tyrrell was doubtless a main source of the many fine traits of character which made him a magnetic personality and an attractive writer. But sensitiveness is a quality with corresponding drawbacks, and these seem to have been allowed somewhat undisciplined growth in the case of the erring apologist. Baron Von Hügel's article is followed by a "friend's impressions" of George Tyrrell, the friend being an Anglican rector, the Rev. Charles E. Osborne, M.A. According to the latter Tyrrell was early influenced in two very different respects by Newman and the famous "Father Dolling." In his latter days this writer claims that Tyrrell "came, more and more, to feel sympathetically, in regard to some things even admiringly," towards the Anglican Church.

In the same number there is an instructive paper, entitled "Divorçons!" by an "Evangelical Layman," in which we are told that the latitude of doctrine in the Anglican Church is an absurdity, that the Low Church party represents the true Anglican Church and would be better off dissociated from all High Churchmen. Therefore the writer hails disestablishment not merely in Wales, but elsewhere also; but he draws the line at disendowment.

In the Survey of January 22 Dr. Woods Hutchinson gives an interesting report on the sanitary conditions under which the shirt-waist workers carry on their trade. He undertook the investigation at the request of the Associated Charities. He begins, however, with the assumption that the community has a right to know these conditions, from which he takes a long step to the assumption that the Associated Charities have a right to investigate them. The community may be taken either as a social unit or as a collection of individuals. As the latter it has no greater right in the matter than the individuals of which it is composed, and an individual has no right to know his neighbor's business. As a social unit it has the right to know everything useful to enable it to discharge fully its obligations of promoting the common good, and the good of each individual in harmony with the common good. But the activity of every social organization belongs to the governing authority. No individual, no association of individuals, has the right to intrude into it. Moreover there is great danger in the assumption by individuals or private societies of functions belonging to public authority. As the act is lawless in its nature (we use the term in a purely philosophic sense), it is far more likely to run to tyrannical excess than that of legitimate authority. This is seen every day in the abuses flowing from secret organizations of various kinds, the usurpations of the press, from trusts, and even from trades unions. Dr. Hutchinson, therefore, should not be surprised at the unwillingness of the municipal authorities to help him; but he should be surprised, and agreeably so, that only one employer told his agents that the matter was none of their business. Moreover, the editor of the Survey ought to know that a man's natural rights are not lessened by the fact that he can speak only broken English. Otherwise the article is useful and interesting.

In Scribner's, though the place of honor is given to Mr. Roosevelt's hunting, two articles stand out as worthy of notice. The first unquestionably is an appreciation of Frederick Remington by Royal Cortissoz, who follows him in his development from the illustrator into the artist, and fixes upon his absolute truth as his first quality. The second is an article by Henry J. Finck on "The Progressive Pacific Coast." It is full of interest concerning this wonderful part of our country. On the other hand, the author allows a somewhat shallow sentiment to move him occasionally, for instance, touching the project of making the Hetch-Hetchy Valley a water reservoir for San Francisco. If it is necessary, or even useful as such, romantic notions should not stand in the way. Again Mr. Finck objects to the name of Washington's great mountain, and thinks it ought to be called Mount Tacoma instead of Mount Ranier. His reason is that the latter was the name of an English admiral. If that be reason sufficient then Mount Baker and Mount Hood must lose their names, and Port Orford and Whidby Island, Discovery Island and Hood's Canal and many another. The names of these places are the history of the discovery of the country, while Tacoma—what does it commemorate but the silly rivalry of two towns and a certain arrogance of a railway company? Some of his illustrations are rather ancient for an up-to-date article. "Rebuilt Market Street" in San Francisco is about eighteen months old; "Great Northern Docks," Seattle, shows both the Dakota and the Minnesota, though one of the sisters was cast away on the Japanese coast about two years ago. We think Mr. Finck's Portland friends will be indignant when they see Mount Hood put down as only 7,000 feet high.

In commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Cardinal McCloskey, which occurs on March 20, Archbishop Farley, who was the Cardinal's secretary for twelve years, is preparing a history of His Eminence's life. It will include much heretofore unpublished data concerning the men and events of the era during which the first American Cardinal lived.

LIBRARY NEWS AND NOTES

A literary hoax has recently been put upon the public, learned and unlearned, in a little book entitled "The Old Librarian's Almanack by Philobiblos: A Very Rare Pamphlet First Published in New Haven, Connecticut, in 1773 and Now Reprinted for the First Time." (The Librarian's Series, Edited by John Cotton Dana and Henry W. Kent, Number One. The Elm Tree Press, Woodstock, Vermont, 1909.) A preface to this supposed reprint, signed by Edmund Lester Pearson, purports to give various details regarding the history of the original almanac, now said to be in the library of the Newburyport Antiquarian Society, and the frontispiece is apparently a facsimile of the original title-page.

The critical journals of the country, East and West, have gravely taken this publication upon its face value and have unhesitatingly accepted all that is said of it in the learned preface; whereas anyone who will attempt to verify any of the statements there made will soon discover that the writer has been careful to name none but imaginary persons, libraries, books and auction sales. One and all the interesting items of information vouchsafed to aid the cataloguer in correctly describing this precious volume are carefully and, we must admit, cleverly invented. The supposed frontispiece is pretty well done but unfortunately it shows the printer to be B. Mecom, the place to be New Haven, and the date to be 1773—an impossible combination. B. Mecom, a nephew of Benjamin Franklin, was a printer of New Haven until 1767, when he went to Philadelphia and operated his business there until 1774. We know positively that he was in Philadelphia in 1770 from a petition given in Evans' "American Bibliography" under that date, which begins: "Philadelphia, September 11, 1770. Sir, be pleased to permit me to inform you that I have been in this city a few months more than two years." Thomas, in his standard and reliable work, "History of Printing in America," says that Mecom "removed from Connecticut and opened a printing house in Philadelphia in 1768. . . . Afterwards he was in the printing house of Goddard in Philadelphia and in 1774"—just after the time when he is shown as printing our Almanack in New Haven—"he left this city and was employed by Isaac Collins at Burlington, New Jersey, where he closed his typographical career." So much for the facsimile title, designed to deceive, if possible, even the elect.

"The Old Librarian's Almanack" contains, besides the usual astronomical matter, quaint reflexions and remarks of an antique flavor upon reading, books and the proper duties of a librarian. Contrary to modern ways of thinking, the librarian should do nothing but read, and should be very careful how he lets anybody else read. Women would better be excluded altogether from the sacred precincts of the library. Extracts from this old almanac have appeared, the editor tells us, in the columns of the Boston Evening Transcript. Inasmuch as Mr. Pearson edits the column in the Wednesday issue of that newspaper entitled "The Librarian," the probability is that he composed these quaint maxims himself and has had many a good laugh since at the success of his recipe for putting them up. But what, may be asked, ever possessed Mr. Pearson, or the editors of the series, or all three of them, to play this practical joke upon their literary colleagues?

Some years ago Mr. Dana, the librarian of the Newark Free Public Library, stated in a paper contributed to a professional periodical, that the so-called critical journals do not review critically, and he claimed that most of their reviews are merely puffs of the publications noticed. May it not be that he, as editor of the present series, has used the present fake volume as a trap in which to catch these unwary journals? They have been caught, surely enough, and it will be interesting to see them try to wriggle out of the net set for them. How the editors will free themselves of the charge that they have deceived the public, not only in the book but in the circular advertising the series, will be another interesting spectacle.

The Library of Congress, which was once, what its name implies, merely the working library of our national legislature, is fast becoming what it should be, the National Library of the United States of America. It is to-day the third largest library in the world, ranking after the British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale. A few years ago the Library of Congress began to enlarge the field of its usefulness by lending out books to other libraries. The books so lent are always works called for by specialists or investigators who cannot get them from the local library where they are working. The conditions of loan are simple: the borrowing library assumes responsibility for the book while in its possession and does not permit it to leave the building, and the reader pays cost of transportation both ways.

During the past year the Library of Congress sent out 1023 volumes to 119 institutions, which were located in forty of the States of the Union, in Canada and in Cuba. Forty-nine of these borrowers were colleges and universities; the rest were normal and other schools, public and state libraries, historical and scientific institutions. The character of books called for may be inferred from the fact that 38 per cent of the books asked for could not be supplied by the Library of Congress, mainly because they were not in the library. Considering the extent of the library this fact implies extreme rarity in many of the works called for, and it also means that the inquirers are most of them pursuing lines of research out of the ordinary field of printed literature.

Students and readers who frequent public libraries in search of first-hand information are referred more and more by librarians to the publications of the Federal Government. The term Congressional document was once a synonym for all that is dusty, dry and useless in the way of printed matter; to-day it connotes scientific, historical and sociological works of the highest value. What is perhaps of more interest to the average reader, moreover, is the fact that many of the Government publications are readable and interesting; they are often illustrated with plates of remarkable beauty; and some of these works, which contain narratives of travel or describe the manners and customs, beliefs and traditions of the American aborigines, are as entertaining as such books usually are. Aided by an excellent series of indexes to the Government documents, prepared in the Document Office at Washington, the librarian—and the reader, after he has been initiated—can readily find any work by a given author or may run down information of the highest importance to him in his studies.

The scientist will naturally find most to interest him in the works issued by the Smithsonian Institution, the National Museum and the Geological Survey; the student of American history and of folk lore will turn to the beautifully printed publication of the Bureau of American Ethnology, embodying investigations into Indian life; the former will find a multitude of practical suggestions and directions in the leaflets of the Department of Agriculture, many of them to be had from the Department for the asking. The teacher and the student of social science will be most concerned with the bulletins of the Bureau of Education and of the Department of Labor. The business man may not realize how valuable it may be to him to glance over the Consular reports giving notes of industry in foreign countries and furnishing the latest news of legislation affecting the conduct of business and commerce in those countries.

EDUCATION

An interesting point is discussed by Ernest Martin Hopkins, Secretary of Dartmouth College, in the current Educational Review. In his paper, "Critical Period for the American College," he seems fully awake to the danger facing the college strictly so called through the pushing upward of secondary school work and the reaching downward of university courses until the essential college purpose of general culture is threatened with elimination. Unquestionably the evolution which has brought about the change in the honorable position held by the college in the educational field during the two centuries and a half from its founding is largely due to the elective system, which permitted students entering college to specialize to the extent of preparation for the professional schools and the graduate schools.

The immediate effect of such a concession was commonly a failure to give the undergraduate student that general enrichment of life, that general cultivation which he will not get when he enters the special field of his life work, and which it is the special function of the college to impart. No wonder that in the resultant confusion of our educational organizations the leaders in educational work in this country recognize grave danger to the old-time concept of the college and its work. And they recognize as well the irreparable loss that would accrue to systematized educational work were the distinctive purpose of college training to be lost sight of among us, or were it allowed to be merged in any way into the scholarly research and professional training characteristic of the university curriculum.

University methods will never achieve the desired results of a college training, and it is therefore a fair conclusion that the university should not dictate the life and policy of the college. Mr. Hopkins finds a reason of the narrowing of the college horizon in the fact that a change has come "in the manner of men in college professorships a generation ago and now—a change emphasized in the columns of every paper and magazine which comments upon educational subjects." Quoting President Pritchett, in the Atlantic Monthly for December, 1908, he says: "The old-time college teacher was a man who had, above all else, intellectual enthusiasm and intellectual sympathy; his learning touched many fields, and all with sympathetic and friendly spirit, and his work consisted largely of bringing into the lives, and into the intellectual appreciation of his students, his own sense of learning and of civilization and of social relations. For this work there was needed, not primarily a man of research, but a man of large comprehension, of wide interests, of keen sympathies and of discriminating touch."

To-day, Mr. Hopkins affirms, the future college teacher specializes for a degree in fixed graduate work, usually a doctorate of philosophy, which is in no sense an adaptation to the needs of the college teacher. And the futility of his work in relation to his future career lies in this, says the author of the article we are considering, that it ignores breadth of knowledge while it seeks depth; it disregards the general in its search for the particular; it forms the habit of acquisition of knowledge without regard to its dissemination, and it makes for research rather than culture." Hence Mr. Hopkins pleads warmly for a change in the now prevalent ideas regarding the training of college teachers, arguing very properly that if we are to retain the college as a place for general culture the question of the sources of supply from which instructors are to be sought becomes a matter of vital concern.

A novelty in college experience is announced from Cleveland. For the first time probably, in this country, a play by college students has had a run of a full week. Every evening last week the members of the dramatic club attached to St. Ignatius College presented the historical drama "Athol," founded on incidents in the career of the Roman Emperor Antoninus Pius and written by Rev. Jos. Husslein, S.J., of the college faculty. A local correspondent sends an account of the notable success achieved by all responsible for the play. The staging, costuming and excellent ability of the young men taking part in the production, he writes, were only a partial reason of the success; the play itself has merit above the ordinary. And he notes the gratification generally expressed that a departure of the kind has been attempted and that the author's effort to add a dignified and artistic attraction to the repertoire of college clubs has merited the complimentary notices bestowed on his work by the press critics of Cleveland.

The Law Department which the St. Louis University opened a short time ago will graduate its first class this June. Some of the members of this class attended the last Missouri State Bar examination, and considerable interest was attached to their relative standing as compared with the students of older schools. A local daily, anticipating official results, announced that a Harvard man had won first, a Washington man second, and three Virginia men were in the next positions. But the official announcement, published in the same daily to-day (Monday, January 31), shows that a St. Louis University student was first of all the contestants.

SCIENCE

A magnetic survey of Africa has been partially finished by scientists sent out by the Carnegie Institution of Washington, D. C. Two men, amid many perils and hardships, traveled through Rhodesia, Portuguese East Africa, German East Africa, Uganda and the British Protectorate. Dr. J. C. Beattie, of the South African College at Cape Town, and Professor J. T. Morrison, of Victoria College, did the work under the direction of Dr. L. A. Bauer, the head of the department of terrestrial magnetism of the Carnegie Institution. The Carnegie Institution of Washington was founded by Mr. Andrew Carnegie, in 1902, when he gave a board of trustees $10,000,000 in registered bonds, yielding 5 per cent. annual interest, to encourage in the most liberal manner investigation, research and discovery for the improvement of mankind. Mr. Carnegie added $2,000,000 to his gift in 1907.

Professor B. Paul Besson communicated an interesting paper to the Academie des Sciences, in which he gives the result of his observations on the effect of the moon's motion on the radio-activity of the air. Different authors indicate a variability in the radio-activity of air, and Besson concludes that this is due to emanations from the ground. In the case of radio-active waters he noticed that with a fall of pressure the activity increased; so, too, for radio-active charged earths. Other variations not attributable to changes of pressure were noticed, which he suspects are due to the motion of the earth's crust, due to lunar attraction. He concludes that at constant barometric pressure the activity is highest when the moon is passing the meridian.

The following are a few data regarding comet 1910a: Length, 9,000,000 miles; mean orbital speed, 1,000,000 miles an hour; distance from the sun in perihelion, 4,000,000 miles. Professor Maunder judges its path to be parabolic. If so, it will never be seen again. Its spectrum shows the sodium lines and the third cyanogen bands.

The electric arc and the so-called gas cutting-burners make ordinary safes no longer burglar-proof. Hitherto this emergency has been only partially met by increasing the thickness of the plates of safes and vaults. A German engineer meets it entirely by a new form of safe. This has a double wall. The outer one, of concrete or stone, is stationary; the inner one, of chilled steel, rotates by means of an electric motor. During business hours it is at rest and the accumulators which drive the motor are charged from an outside circuit. When the safe is locked the rotation is started by a switch from outside, but this switch cannot stop it again. This is done by a time switch within the safe. The safe rotates at a speed of three feet a second; thus the direction of a cutting-flame on a definite spot of the surface is impossible.

Paul Gambert has found a new fluorescent substance in a derivative of physostigmine. It has a light bluish hue when in solution, but when examined by reflected light assumes a deep ruby-red color.

Electricity was used successfully as an anesthetic in Hartford, Conn., lately. During the operation the patient was blindfolded that he might not see the surgeons at work. He declared that he felt absolutely no pain during the operation, and no bad effects followed the application of the electric current.

SOCIOLOGY

The Fortnightly Review for January has two articles that present a gloomy view of certain aspects of industrial and social life in England. Contending for what he calls the Tory program, "Every man his own landlord"—the transference of the land to tenants and town-workers—the writer shows that England produces per acre from a more fertile soil one-fifth less than Germany in breadstuffs; one-fourth in potatoes, cattle, hogs and fowl, and one-seventh in timber; that while Germany produces sugar enough to supply all and tobacco for half its population, England raises none and excels only in pasture and sheep, which are comparatively unremunerative. Even her vegetables, dairy produce, eggs, fruit, etc., are largely imported. Her people are dependent on the American Beef Trust, which, it is stated, controls Argentina, for their meat, and on the American Leather Trust for their shoes, and "unless we recreate our agriculture these isles will be at the mercy of a handful of foreign speculators." Moreover, the efficiency of agricultural laborers has depreciated in England because the best go to the towns; in Ireland because they emigrate. The best city workers are country-bred, but "the second generation is of lower physique" and the third lower still. Physical deterioration has been caused in the country by "underbreeding, elimination of the fittest and propagation of the unfittest;" in the towns by living in polluted air on artificial and largely unwholesome food from the cradle to the grave. Hence "the British race has become stunted, narrow-chested, flat footed, rotten-toothed and chronic anemia is a national malady."

Another article shows that an average of 10,000 persons are annually imprisoned for debt by the English county courts; that the number has been steadily increasing during the last decade, and that such debtors have to work and, though kept apart, are otherwise treated as criminal prisoners. They are usually of the working class, as merchants and shopkeepers can escape under the Bankruptcy Act. The debtor is usually seized while at work, his means of payment is cut off, and his relatives are blackmailed for the amount. This is one of the grievances of the Labor Party.

Three men, Douglas, Filvus and Grahamslaw, were brought up in a London police court lately for obtaining money under false pretences. They published a magazine, Profit and Pleasure, in which from time to time they advertised prize competitions. One of these was to cut out and put together a number of pieces of paper, which made up a profile of Lord Charles Beresford. £100 was the prize for forming the picture, and £150 for naming the person represented. 13,000 solutions were sent in, which the clerks put in the waste paper basket after taking the names and addresses of the senders, who were each informed they had won a cash prize, but to qualify for it they must send a year's subscription to Profit and Pleasure, 3s. 6d. £4,500 was thus obtained. Then the announcement was made that the number of those entitled to share in the prizes was so great, £50 would be added to them and a decisive contest held among the winners. Lord Charles Beresford had to serve again, but he was cut up into smaller bits than before. A list of prize-winners was published, but of these many complained that they had not received the sums due them. Lord Roberts was the subject of a later competition held in the same way.

The National Civic Federation finished its late conference in Washington with a series of resolutions calling for uniform state legislation in various matters. Of these we have already indicated some. Among the others are labor laws, reform of legal procedure, food inspection, the sale of drugs and narcotics, the regulation of medical practice, taxation so as to avoid the double taxation of any citizen, the execution and probate of wills and the conveyance of real estate.

Desiring to increase its usefulness, the directors of Mercy Hospital, Baltimore, have undertaken the building of an addition that has long been demanded. This section will be five stories in height and will contain several wards, many private rooms, a new chapel and the heating equipment. The cost is estimated at $200,000. "The Mercy Hospital," says the Baltimore Sun "is an institution that stands high among Baltimore's agencies for good, and to which the people owe a debt of gratitude."

ECONOMICS.

More tonnage enters New York to-day than any other port. Antwerp is next to New York, and London, which ten years ago stood in the first place now comes third. The registered tonnage passing yearly through the principal ports, as nearly as can be ascertained, is as follows:

New York, 12,154,780 registered tons; Antwerp, 11,211,803 registered tons; London, 11,160,367 registered tons; Hamburg, 10,888,553 registered tons; Hong Kong, 9,941,261 registered tons; Liverpool, 8,167,419 registered tons; Montevideo, 7,725,534 registered tons; Marseilles, 6,736,603 registered tons; Kobe, 5,497,877 registered tons; Buenos Aires, 5,119,291 registered tons. The great steamers which, leaving different European ports, converge on New York, give it this pre-eminence.

The Erie Railway, with a main line one thousand miles in length and a large amount of single track, has carried during the last five years 125,000,000 passengers without a single fatal accident. The average journey of each was six miles; hence, the work done is expressed by the term 750,000,000 passenger-miles, which may be interpreted either as 750,000,000 passengers carried one mile, or one passenger carried 750,000,000 miles. In the latter sense it would represent a passenger carried to the planet Venus and back almost seventy-three times, or a daily round trip to the moon every business day for twenty-six years and two months.

Dr. Simon N. Patten, head of the Department of Economics, University of Pennsylvania, holds the cause of the advance in prices to be the extravagant manner of living, which turns incomes, especially those of the salaried class into unproductive channels. Money which formerly went into savings banks and aided production, is now employed in buying over and over again the products. Thus the demand is going further and further beyond the supply. Moreover, as Mr. Nearing, an instructor in the same department says, the readiness to buy on the part of the public is a constant incitement to sellers to raise prices.

The Census Department of Canada estimates the population of the Dominion by provinces on March 31, 1909, as follows:—Maritime Provinces, 1,037,112; Quebec, 2,088,461; Ontario, 2,619,025; Manitoba, 446,268; Saskatchewan, 341,521; Alberta, 273,859; British Columbia, 289,516; unorganized districts, 58,309; a total of 7,154,071. Since that date 150,000 immigrants have entered the country, bringing the total population up to upwards of 7,300,000—2,000,000 more than in 1901. Australia, the next largest dependency, has not yet 5,000,000.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Advance sheets of the "Catholic Directory" for 1910, sent out by the M. H. Wiltzius Co., of Milwaukee and New York, show that in the Continental United States the figures of the diocesan returns give an increase of 111,576 Catholics over those of 1909, the total Catholic population being set down as 14,347,027. Adding to this the Catholics of the Philippines, Porto Rico and Hawaii, we have a grand total of 22,587,079 now under the American flag.

The Catholic population of the leading States in the Union is as follows: New York, 2,722,647; Pennsylvania, 1,494,766; Illinois, 1,443,752; Massachusetts, 1,373,772; Ohio, 619,265; Louisiana, 557,431; Wisconsin, 532,217; New Jersey, 496,000; Michigan, 489,451; Missouri, 452,703; Minnesota, 427,627; California, 391,500; Connecticut, 370,000; Texas, 283,917; Iowa, 242,009; Rhode Island, 242,000; Indiana, 218,758; Kentucky, 194,296.

There are 16,550 priests in the United States, 4,276 being members of religious orders. A gain of 457 is shown. The hierarchy of the United States consists of one apostolic delegate, one cardinal, 13 archbishops and 88 bishops. There are 8,849 churches with resident priests and 4,355 mission churches. The total number of churches is 13,204, a gain of 366 over last year.

Chicago has 187 churches. There are in the Boroughs of Manhattan, Richmond and the Bronx, alone, 150; Brooklyn has 110; Philadelphia, 99; St. Louis, 83 and Pittsburgh, 68. There are 61 in Boston and the same number in Cleveland. Buffalo has 56, Baltimore 47 and Cincinnati 46.

In the field of education the totals show 83 seminaries, with 6,182 seminarians; 217 colleges for boys, 709 academies for girls, and 289 orphan asylums in which 51,541 orphans are cared for. The total number of charitable institutions is 1,125. There are 4,845 parochial schools, with an attendance of 1,237,251, a gain of 142 schools and 39,338 children. Counting the children in parochial schools, colleges, academies, orphan asylums and other institutions, the total number is 1,450,448, a gain of 53,101.

There are 322 Catholic papers and periodicals published in twelve different languages.

The Catholic population of Canada, according to the Directory, is 2,538,374, while Cuba has 1,824,897.

The "Gerarchia Cattolica" for 1910 has been issued from the Vatican press and shows that there are now eighteen vacancies in the College of Cardinals, the number of Cardinals being only fifty-two in place of the full quota of seventy. The archbishoprics of the world of both those of the Oriental and Latin rites number 201; the bishoprics number 748 for the Latin rite and 52 for the Greek. During the year only one new see was erected, that of Rockport, Illinois. Three new pontifical colleges are recorded: the international pontifical college of the Capuchin Minorites, the pontifical college "Angelic" of the Dominicans and the Pontifical Biblical institute directed by the Rev. Father Fonck, S.J.

In a statement printed in most of the Catholic papers last week, giving figures from the advance sheets of the "Catholic Directory" for 1910, it is said that "Chicago has more churches than any other city in the Union. There are 187, . . . while New York proper, that is Manhattan and the Bronx, has 138." Most Gothamites, remembering the strenuous efforts to call all Cook County, Illinois, "Chicago," will be set wondering over this novel Milwaukee idea of "New York proper." There is a local hallucination here that "New York proper" is made up of the five Boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, Brooklyn, Richmond and Queens, which the "people of the State of New York, by the grace of God free and independent, in Senate and Assembly" enacted should form the legal entity known as the City of New York. Within its limits there are now 190 regularly established parish churches, not counting sub-missions or chapels. Chicago, therefore, has not caught up.

The Catholic Converts League held its annual meeting and election of officers at the Catholic Club, in this city, January 31. About three hundred members were present. The yearly reports were of the usual character. The membership is above five hundred. The monthly meetings have been held with good attendance. Mr. Henry R. Sargent, for years a member of the Protestant Episcopal order of the Holy Cross, gave a short address explaining conditions in the Protestant Episcopal Church. In it are two general classes, the Unitarian, cutting loose from all dogma, and what is called the Catholic. In this are some who have made up their minds to resist Roman claims to the end. They are partisans, and not always honest partisans, who get angry and abusive when they hear of what they call perversions. But there is a very large number anxious about their state, recognizing that Rome may be the true goal to which God is leading them, and praying for light. These are most kindly disposed towards those entering the Church. They had been most generous and sympathetic towards him, and should be treated kindly and courteously. We Catholics can help them in many ways, especially with our prayers.

On February 3 the Most Rev. Paul Bruchési, Archbishop of Montreal, called upon the editorial staff of AMERICA, and said that he had visited Boston, Mass.; Providence and Woonsocket, R. I.; Baltimore, Md., and Washington, D. C., and that everywhere both prelates and priests had given him the greatest encouragement in promoting the success of the Montreal Eucharistic Congress next September. This will be the first time the International Eucharistic Congress will meet on this continent, and this will be its twenty-first meeting. Among the visitors expected from Europe will be a special delegate from the Holy Father, two other cardinals and about ten bishops. Bishop Heylen, of Namur, is sure to come as permanent president. Among the many bishops expected from this country are Bishop Maes, of Covington, Ky., president of the American Eucharistic Congress, and the Most Rev. John M. Farley, Archbishop of New York. During his short stay in this city Mgr. Bruchési was the guest of the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament, at the rectory of the Church of St. Jean Baptiste, in East 76th Street. His Grace returned to Montreal on February 4.

Bishop Hartley, of Columbus, has followed the good old custom of issuing a Lenten pastoral to his people. In it he admonishes them against the prevalent spirit of worldliness, the neglect of the sacred surroundings of home life, the importance of Christian marriage and the fostering of vocations to the religious life.

On February 1, the Rev. William McDermott, of the Holy Name Church, Columbus, offered the prayer at the opening of the Ohio Senate, the first time in its history that a priest has so officiated.

Bishop Schwebach, of La Crosse, on January 27, dedicated St. Paul's Chapel for Catholic students at the University of Wisconsin. The building, which is on the campus, cost $60,000, and contains a reading room, and other apartments for social meetings. It is for the exclusive use of Catholic students.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Just a Wife." Belasco Theatre.—The theme of "Just a Wife" is by no means pleasant, but it is handled in a decorous manner with a conclusion that is sound and logical once the premise is granted. It is in the premise, however, that the radical improbability lies. There is no explanation why John Emerson, the millionaire, did not at the outset marry the woman, who is described as of such superior ability and character as to be an important factor in moulding and inspiring him to a dominant and triumphant success in his business career. There would have been no dramatic situation had this, the probable thing, happened. But granted the improbability, i. e., that this woman is his mistress and not his wife and the rest follows. He has married a young woman whom he does not love, merely as a business move, viz. to rehabilitate himself in the public eye and to even up his scandalous relations with his mistress. The young wife has married him on her part that she may be rescued from the narrow poverty in which the fallen fortunes of her family have placed her. She is a wife in name only, her husband giving her what she has bargained for, namely, the comforts and luxuries she has coveted. The husband is of the aggressive commercial type, his business and financial career being the sole interest of his life; and all women are but mere instruments to this end. He finds that his mistress has now become a detriment to him, and he determines to break off the relation. He goes to his wife's house in the country, where she has lived in seclusion for six years, and then she learns that she has sold herself to her own unhappiness, and that the mere comforts and luxuries which her marriage has brought her are not the true realizations of life. John Emerson's mistress follows him thither in jealous rage only to be repulsed by him. Meantime he finds that he is beginning to learn to love his wife, but not as she would have him love her; she demands his love not as a mere incident in his career, but as the controlling force in his life. She dismisses him, telling him that when he has come to realize that marital love is the supreme test of his happiness, and that when he is prepared to subordinate his financial career to its influence, he will find her ready to meet him on grounds of reconciliation. The theme of "Just a Wife," as may readily be seen, is not agreeable,

"Mrs. Dot," Lyceum.—With so much of the local stage given constantly to the display of theatrical vulgarity and filth, that a play is at once clean, decent and amusing, ought to be an immediate passport for it to public favor. All the latter qualifications can be accorded W. Somerset Maugham's "Mrs. Dot," one of those thinly-spun little comedies, made in London, and in which Miss Billie Burke assumes the title role. The story is that of the young widow of a rich brewer who sets out to marry an impoverished clubman and prospective peer. The dialogue that details her success, is full of epigrammatic turns and bits of cynical philosophy in a cleverly kept up, breezy atmosphere of innocent fun. The sustaining company is good, the settings artistic and the costumes handsome.

"Alias Jimmy Valentine," Wallack's Theatre.—Melodrama of the old school, with here and there a touch of the modern used to advantage. In this type of play criticism should be tempered with consideration for the effectiveness of the exaggerated incidents and thrilling scenes which are more or less essential. The story is that of a youthful burglar, reformed—as is usual in plays—for the love of a woman. He is relentlessly pursued by a detective for an old crime of safe robbing, despite the fact that for three years he has led an honest life. The detective has contrived numerous schemes to trap the reformed crook and finally succeeds in detecting him in the act of opening a vault, by the delicate sense of feeling the combination out with his fingers, in which the little daughter of the bank's president has been accidentally locked. In the end the detective's heart is softened by the pleading of the banker's eldest daughter for the freedom of her betrothed, so he departs to leave them in peace and happiness. The play is, perhaps, a true picture of the modern prison system* and of the injustice and grafting practiced by the minions of the law. It is an apt argument that it is possible for a man who has been dishonest to reform and still succeed. As a melodrama it is cleverly constructed and affords abundant opportunity for some good acting of a sensational and artificial type which will please and "thrill" the average public.

"The Watcher," Comedy Theatre.—In spite of its many crudities and glaring inconsistencies the play has a certain dramatic force. It is, moreover, carried beyond its merits by excellent acting, though even this cannot redeem it for its fundamental absurdity. It is a "spiritualistic" play, whose entire action depends upon the influence of a dead mother's spirit over her children, one of whom, a son, has become a drunkard and degenerate; the other, the daughter, entertains a firm belief in her dead mother's invisible presence as a guiding influence in their lives. It is the apparition of the mother's spirit that finally brings about the solution of their troubles and of their domestic unhappiness. The play is a sad jumble of extravagances and contradictions. The evident purpose is to show that the dead still influence human living, but the author has so wofully ravelled the theme into an inextricable tangle of spiritism, telepathy, and what not, that it becomes an impossible snarl, defying both patience and intelligence.

CHARLES McDUGALL.

PERSONAL

The Right Rev. Bishop Neil McNeil, of St. George's, Newfoundland, who has been appointed Archbishop of Vancouver, is a Nova Scotian, a son of the late Malcolm McNeil, of Hillsborough, Inverness. His grandparents came from Bara, Scotland, and Kilkenny, so that the new Archbishop is one of the few who can legitimately claim to be Scotch-Irish. He was born at Hillsborough. November 21, 1851, received his primary education there and afterwards entered St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish. In 1873 he was sent to the College of the Propaganda in Rome, where he remained for six years. He was ordained in April, 1879, in the Lateran Basilica, by Cardinal Patrizi, and in the same year received the degree of Doctor in Philosophy and Theology. He returned to Nova Scotia in 1880, and joined the teaching staff of St. Francis Xavier's. In the following year he accepted the editorship of the Aurora newspaper. From 1884 to 1891 he was rector of the College. He was consecrated Bishop of St. George's in St. Ninian's Cathedral, Antigonish, October 25, 1895.

W. E. Purcell, of Wahpeton, North Dakota, who on February 1 was sworn in as United States Senator from that State, in succession to F. L. Thompson, resigned, is a Catholic. His only other colleague of the Faith in the Senate is Senator Carter, of Montana.

The Rev. John J. Lawler, pastor of St. Paul's Cathedral, has been appointed auxiliary bishop of the archdiocese of St. Paul by His Holiness Pius X.

* Under a decision of the District Court of Omaha, Neb., $50,000 specifically bequeathed for the project, and $35,000 from the residue of the estate of the late John A. Creighton, after this and other specific bequests are provided for, will go to establishing and maintaining a home for poor working girls.

OBITUARY

Rev. John F. G. Pahls, S.J., died on February 5, in the Jesuit house of St. Stanislaus, Cleveland, Ohio. Father Pahls was born in Cincinnati in 1847, and at the age of twenty-two entered the Missouri Province of the Society of Jesus. His studies in philosophy and theology were made principally at Woodstock, Md., with an intervening period spent in teaching in the St. Louis University. After his ordination in 1882 he filled responsible positions in the novitiate at Florissant, St. Louis University and St. Ignatius College, Chicago. From the last named place he went to Omaha in 1894, as President of the Creighton University, leaving this office four years later with shattered health. After a year of forced inaction he was made treasurer of Detroit College, where he remained until last summer, when ill health once more obliged him to retire from active duty, and he went to Cleveland in the hope of recovering. Father Pahls was a man of distinguished presence and courtly manners, but was little known by the public at large on account of his retiring disposition. He was a pulpit orator of uncommon eloquence until the afflictions of his latter years made this priestly duty an impossible task.

The Rev. Michael A. Griffin, pastor of the Church of Our Lady of Hope, Springfield, Mass., died on February 1. Father Griffin's health was undermined by his arduous labors in the new parish to which he was appointed in 1906. The Church of Our Lady of Hope was dedicated November 21, 1907. The deceased priest was graduated from the College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, in 1888, and received his first appointment as curate at the Church of the Sacred Heart, Springfield. The Rev. John F. Griffin, of the Holy Rosary Church, Holyoke, is his brother.

Announcement is made of the death, at Kilmallock, Ireland, of Bridget Turner, wife of Patrick Turner and mother of the Rev. William Turner, D.D., of the Catholic University of America; the Rev. Denis Turner, C.S.S.R., Limerick, Ireland; the Rev. John Turner, D.D., New York, and the Rev. Patrick Turner, of Pensacola, Florida. Mrs. Turner had three daughters among the Sisters of Charity, New York, one of whom, Sister Mary Rosaire, survives him. There was a solemn Mass for the repose of her soul at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, New York City, on February 7.

Rev. Thomas P. Hodnett, one of the veteran priests of the archdiocese, died in Chicago, on January 29, aged sixty-five years. He was rector of the church of the Immaculate Conception. Father Hodnett was born in Glen, County Limerick, Ireland, and was ordained September 30, 1876, at St. Francis' Seminary, near Milwaukee. He ministered in several parishes in Wisconsin before his assignment to a Chicago charge twenty-eight years ago. In the various Irish National movements of recent years he was actively prominent.

Miss Kathleen Don Leavy, who had written both prose and verse for Catholic publications for a number of years, and edited The Don Leavy Magazine, in Richmond, Va., died on January 12.

The Rev. Walker S. Caughy, pastor of St. Stephen's Church, Washington, D. C., was buried from the church of which he had been in charge for fourteen years on February 5. Father Caughy was formerly pastor at Laurel, Md. He was an alumnus of Loyola College, Baltimore.

State Senator Thomas S. Walsh died in Springfield, Mass., on February 4. He was born in Hartford, Conn., in 1859, and removed to Springfield in 1873. Before his election in the Senate he served two years as Representative in the State Legislature. Two of his sisters are members of the Sisters of Providence in Holyoke.

The Right Rev. Gilbert L. Benton, Vicar-General of the diocese of Harrisburg, died suddenly on February 5. Mgr. Benton was pastor of the Church of St. James, Steelton, Pa. He was fifty-two years old.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

Amateur—May a Catholic club or literary society with propriety, give a presentation of "The Servant in the House"? Opinion is divided on the subject; some claim that the drama is far above the standard of ordinary plays, from the moral standpoint, while others maintain that the very conception of the work is blasphemous. An answer will settle the controversy.

[ANSWER—"The Servant in the House" attacks religion as an institution and preaches Humanitarianism. Its chief character is intended for Christ not as The God-man, but simply as a human preacher of altruism. It represents the Church as a decayed institution, the source of moral miasma. It is true that the special church attacked in the play is the Anglican, but in the author's intent the Anglican Church is typical of all Churches. It would clearly be unbecoming for a Catholic club or literary society to produce such a play; all the more so as it inculcates its doctrine in an alluring and insidious way. Dramatically it is a strong play, but morally false and anti-religious.—Ed. AMERICA.]

IN MISSION FIELDS

At the civic meeting held in Carnegie Hall, on the evening of February 2, to close the Paulist jubilee, Judge Thomas C. O'Sullivan, whose subject was "Reflections of a Paulist Parishioner," paid an earnest tribute to the work done by the women of St. Paul's, the parish of the original New York foundation. "There was one woman," he said, "in the early days, a Mrs. Murphy, who used to come down regularly from Eighty-fourth Street to attend the early Mass at the Paulist Church. A few days ago former President Roosevelt, during his hunt in the African jungle, met a white woman. She was not a huntress, and still she was a huntress of souls, and she is a daughter of that Mrs. Murphy, and her name in religion is Mother Mary Paul."

MR. ROOSEVELT'S VISIT TO UGANDA.

Mother Mary Paul, as the readers of AMERICA will remember, wrote some time ago to say how much pleasure the perusal of the paper gave her in the wilds of far off Africa. The Society of the Propagation of the Faith has just received the following letter from her describing Mr. Roosevelt's recent visit to her at the Mission at Uganda:

"The great man has been to see us! How long I have waited to say this. Yesterday he arrived at Entebbe, and to a telegram inviting him to lunch here the reply came: 'With pleasure, Kermit and I accept the invitation to dinner.' The Bishop, attended by the priests and Prince Joseph, with a great throng of our people, turned out to greet Colonel Roosevelt. We had two bands, and one of them walked sixty-five miles to be here. Up the road came the four runners who had been sent to watch for the rickshaws. Breathlessly they came with the message, and on top of it the rickshaws with the provincial governor and Colonel Roosevelt. Introductions followed and to my remark how kind it was for him to come he replied, 'Kind? Why pitchforks wouldn't have kept me away. In fact, I would have been afraid to go back to the States if I hadn't come to see you.'

"To the sweep of a lively march we all walked to the convent, where Mr. Roosevelt charmingly and so naturally spoke of men and things that we were ready listeners. I will only mention the matters near home, and that later. He was delighted with the convent and the work of the children, and commented on the modesty and good manners of the women. The queen sister, who ranks next to the king, was here with several of the princesses to meet him. He was gracious enough to raise his hat and shake hands with these our great ladies, as he did with Prince Joseph, when bidding them goodbye. The Baganda who witnessed this were beside themselves with joy to see the gracious act of 'this man of kindness.' He was deeply interested in the process of bark-cloth making and our other industries. He visited the St. Elizabeth's Infirmary and the school where he saw the children at their tasks. I know he was sincere in his praise when he said several times that he wished Mrs. Roosevelt could be here with them to see this model school in the heart of Africa. The children sang the 'Star Spangled Banner.' Perhaps it was the tears in my own eyes which made me think they were in his. Kermit thought it wonderfully fine, as they both thought the two bands which the Fathers here taught the boys to play so well.

"I do not know what most holy nuns will think when they hear that I was invited to the luncheon and seated beside Mr. Roosevelt and opposite Kermit. I was their countrywoman. Did I feel embarrassed? No one could with Colonel Roosevelt, for he is simple and kind and puts one at one's ease. I forgot to tell you of whom he spoke. He said the Paulist Fathers were ever his staunchest friends in temperance work and he always relied on their sincerity. He spoke of Dr. Wall, who had such influence with the police and who worked so faithfully for their good. Monsignor Denis O'Connell, Archbishop Keane and others were mentioned. He asked me if I knew Maurice Francis Egan, and I told him how the latter had on one occasion visited our school and insisted on my sitting down to rest and he taught the eighty-four little colored children for me the whole hot afternoon. He is to call on His Grace Archbishop Farley to give him his impressions of our efforts here. At luncheon I told him how, when my dear old mother wanted to rebuke us for finding fault with things, she would remark, 'It is fit for a president.' How little then did I dream that I should ever be so near one. When you sent us a box some months ago I saved a can of tomatoes and whoever sent them would have rejoiced to-day could they have seen the glad surprise on the faces of Colonel Roosevelt and Kermit when the American tomatoes in Africa were served up.

"Mr. Knowles invited us to a tea party at his place, but the Bishop looked serious. Colonel Roosevelt in his most strenuous manner pleaded with the Bishop to grant this favor, and so to-morrow the Sisters will be at luncheon with our 'great American,' the king and his court. and in the afternoon all the Kampala folk will come to the reception. The Bishop, Fathers and my Sisters are simply charmed with

Mr. Roosevelt, and if there be in Uganda a woman prouder of her country and its incomparable representative than I, just let me see her, please. I did not fail to say to him how his broad and generous spirit of toleration had made him dear to American Catholics. His reply was characteristic: 'I try to be decent and I do detest religious intolerance. Some of my dearest friends are Catholics.'

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Representative F. Burton Harrison of New York made a speech in Congress, on January 8, in which he defended the good name of Belgium against the charges contained in the reported atrocities in the Congo Free State. "I have taken occasion to say," he stated, "that I believe that the reported atrocities in the Congo Free State were due mainly to the actions of one native tribe fighting another, and that the Belgians, instead of being responsible for any of these outrages, had done a great deal to put a stop to them. Notably was this the case in the extermination of the Arab slave trade by the late King Leopold, a seemingly impossible task successfully carried out at his private expense. I have also had occasion to express my firm conviction that the agitation directed against the Belgians in Great Britain was due to a desire on the part of the latter country to appropriate to itself the vast territories of the Congo Free State, both on account of the natural resources there and because that territory offered to the British the best opportunity for the construction of the Cape to Cairo Railway. Under these circumstances, I felt called upon to enter an earnest protest against the action of our Department of State in presenting its note of last year to the Belgian Government. Secretary Root was led by the British into an attempt to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for them."

A correspondent having asked the New Music Review to explain what was the purport of the "Motu proprio" of Pope Pius X on church music, the editor gives, in the February number, an abbreviation of the document and adds:

"Our correspondent will find in this condensed form of the Motu proprio the general purport of the Pope's legislation. We might add that the ancient tradition in regard to the employment of male choristers is the same as in the Greek and Anglican Churches. Singers are regarded as belonging to one of the orders of the ministry. They correspond to the Levites of the Temple, and like acolytes, crucifers, servers at the altar, etc., cannot give place to girls and women. In previous issues of this paper we have occasionally referred to the fact that the Motu proprio has been more or less misunderstood by the public in general. The popular idea is that by it modern music has been virtually banished from Roman churches, and plain song substituted for all other forms of composition. The truth of the matter is that the Pope's rulings are not unduly restrictive. Gregorian music is prescribed for some parts of the liturgy, but not for all. Modern music is neither banished nor restricted provided it conforms to liturgical laws, and is not reminiscent of the opera and of secular entertainments.

"Furthermore, it is a great mistake to look upon the Motu proprio as something new, sprung upon the Church by Pope Pius as a high-handed, novel, and startling piece of legislation. The Pope has proclaimed nothing new. In fact, he states very clearly in the introduction to the Motu proprio, that the prescriptions are set forth in the ecclesiastical canons, in the ordinances of the General and Provincial Councils, in the rules which have at various times emanated from the Sacred Roman Congregations, and from the Sovereign Pontiffs who were his predecessors.

"And it is in our opinion a great mistake to suppose that the Motu proprio has no connection with the cause of sacred music outside the Roman Church. A large part of the instruction has a distinct bearing upon the musical worship of the Almighty in all churches. It is a much-needed rebuke, and a most telling one, to those who through ignorance, or through wilfulness, "profane the sanctuary" by the performance of music that is essentially secular, worldly, and designed for the entertainment of man rather than for the worship of the Deity. Intended primarily for the Roman Church, it possesses a general significance that should appeal to every ecclesiastical musician."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

I fully endorse the opinions of many other priests appearing in your columns as to the continuing excellency of your paper. Its solidity of judgment and fairness in dealing with the questions of the day make it an indispensable visitor. I learn more from your résumé of happenings in America and countries abroad than from the perusal of daily papers, no matter how well edited. Vivat, crescat, floreat, AMERICA.—*Rev. Henry B. CHRONICLE

President Taft's Position.—President Taft, in a long speech at the Lincoln Day dinner of the Republican Club of New York, made it appear that he has not changed his mind since he took office, and that he stands to-day for the things he stood for when elected and which were embodied in the Republican platform. Reviewing the acts of his administration Mr. Taft maintained that the Republican party had substantially kept its pledges to the country. He made an elaborate defense of the tariff bill and declared it was the best customs bill ever passed. Though "nothing was expressly said in the platform that the revision of the tariff was to be a downward revision," duties were reduced twelve per cent. and receipts increased. The most significant feature of the new customs bill, he claimed, is that "it indicates on the part of the Republican party the adoption of a policy to change from an increase in duties to a reduction of them and to effect an increase of revenues at the same time." He declared himself opposed to the Senate amendment to the Postal Savings law, which provides for the deposit of moneys in local banks. "The great advantage of a postal savings bank," he said, "is the encouragement of thrift of those whose fears of the solvency of any depository except those controlled by the Government tempts them away from saving." He believed that the Interstate Commerce Act should be amended to give railroads the right to make traffic agreements, subject to the approval of the Commission, and that the rules of Federal courts regarding injunctions should be more accurately defined. He also favored the proposed Statehood law for New Mexico and Arizona, which makes Congress and the President arbiters of the fitness of their State constitutions. He indorsed the movement inaugurated by the Administration for the conservation of natural resources; the River and Harbor Bill, which has just been reported by the House Committee, and the plan for continuing contracts and regular appropriations for the projects recommended in the bill until they are completed. As to the trusts, the President advocated on the part of the great business concerns the policy with respect to their competitors of "live and let live," and that they shall not use the bigness of their concerns to eliminate smaller concerns from competition and thus control output and fix prices. Greater Federal power over interstate commerce was needed, and he believed the right of the Federal Government to grant incorporation to suspected illegal trusts was constitutional and if enforced would furnish a solution of present difficulties.

Concerning the coming Congressional election he said: "If the other measures to which I have referred are enacted into law and the party pledges of the Republican party are performed, there is no reason why the party should not receive renewed approval by the electors of the country." He declared that the increase in the cost of living is no way due to the tariff, but largely to the increased production of gold, although possibly in some cases to combinations in restraint of trade. His final word was a word of warning to Wall Street: "It rests with the National Government to enforce the law, and if the enforcement of the law is not consistent with the present method of carrying on business, then it does not speak well for the present method of conducting business, and they must be changed to conform to the law."

Campaign Against High Prices.—The investigation by the Senate into the increased cost of living will be made by a committee of seven Senators to be appointed by the Vice-President, five of whom will be Republicans. The resolution defining the power of the committee and giving the scope of the investigation was adopted by the Senate and insures an exhaustive inquiry into all phases of the problem of higher prices.

The inquiry is to cover the increased cost of living since 1900, including wages, salaries and earnings and their increase relative to the increase in the cost of living. Increased prices of such articles as meat, grain, provisions, rents, cotton, wool, clothing, lumber, coal, oil, iron, brick and cement are to be considered, and a report is to be made on the price to the producer, the wholesaler or jobber, the retailer and the consumer. The cost of the production and distribution of these articles is to be looked into and special attention given to the prices of food products on the farms, their wholesale prices at the trade centres, and their retail prices in the larger cities, with a comparative statement showing the cost of production on the farm.

The committee is further authorized to submit a report with suitable recommendations for action by Congress as to whether "such articles have been increased in price by reason of the increased production of gold throughout the world and the expansion of the currency of the United States, or by the tariff, or by other legislation by Congress, or by any monopoly, combination or conspiracy to control, regulate or restrain interstate or foreign commerce in the supply, distribution or sale of such articles."

Ex-President Roosevelt's Homecoming.—A great welcome in the form of a national reception is promised for the homecoming of former President Theodore Roosevelt who expects to return to America between June 15 and 21. President Taft is anxious to honor his predecessor and it is thought that he will either cancel his Alaskan trip, scheduled for this summer, or postpone it to a later date, that he may attend the reception and be the first to greet the former Chief Magistrate. The reception will be national in its scope and entirely non-political. A committee representative of every part of the Union will be organized which will have final charge of all arrangements for the reception. A special committee of the New York Republican Club will be in charge.

Testimonial to Peary.—A check for $10,000 was presented to Commander Robert E. Peary at a public demonstration given to the explorer in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in honor of his discovery of the North Pole. The presentation was made by Governor Hughes in behalf of the Civic Forum and the citizens who had arranged the demonstration. A telegram from President Taft expressed the hope that "Congress will take some substantial notice of the great achievement of Commander Peary, which has reflected such credit on American enterprise, persistence, courage and endurance." The Commander announced that he would deposit the gift to start a fund for an expedition into the Antarctic. The directors of the National Geographic Society accepted an invitation to join the Peary Arctic Club in sending an expedition in search of the South Pole, provided sufficient funds could be raised.

New Grand Seminary in Canada.—The announcement has been recently made that a new Grand Seminary is to be erected in the Archdiocese of Toronto for the final training of aspirants to the priesthood. Hitherto there have been in all Canada only two theological seminaries more or less suited to English-speaking candidates: the Ottawa diocesan seminary with twenty-two students, and Assumption College, Sandwich, in the diocese of London, Ont., a combination college and seminary with seventeen theological students. It had long been felt by the English-speaking Catholics of Canada that there was need of a large and well appointed theological seminary for their own especial use. The initial expenses were estimated at $250,000, and this financial problem is now in a great measure solved by Mr. Eugene O'Keefe, of Toronto, who has long been noted for his charities, and who now makes a donation of $150,000 for this purpose. The raising of the additional $100,000 required will of course be comparatively easy. Mr. O'Keefe's only stipulations are that the seminary shall be called St. Augustine's and shall remain the property of the Archdiocese of Toronto. The ground for this seminary, it is said, has already been secured in Toronto.

Manitoba and Alberta Legislatures.—Two Canadian legislatures opened on February 10. Sir Daniel McMillan, Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, solemnly opened the third session of the twelfth parliament of that province and read the speech from the throne in the Legislative Chamber at Winnipeg. This document begins with congratulations to the people and "gratitude to a Divine Providence" for the abundant harvest, the good prices, the capital attracted to the province, the development of industrial enterprises, and the arrival from other countries of desirable settlers. The speech reports, further, that the system of government telephones, inaugurated a few years ago by Premier Roblin, produces a substantial revenue and will be more and more extended throughout rural districts. The public accounts are said to be in a satisfactory state, though the details will not be known till the speech has stood the fire of debate.—At Edmonton, the capital of Alberta, Lieutenant-Governor Bulyea of that province opened with the usual ceremonies the first session of the second legislative assembly. His speech from the throne notes that "in a year marked all over the globe by notable and terrible manifestations of the powers of nature in flood, fire, windstorm, he cannot refrain from asking the members of the Legislature to render thanks to the divine power for freedom from suffering which Alberta has to so notable an extent enjoyed." Owing to the increasing number of settlers, railway expansion absorbs a great deal of the Cabinet's time. Alberta being rich in mines, technical instruction in mining is recommended during school age.

British Politics.—The King will open Parliament February 21. Many rumors are circulating with regard to pressure being brought to bear by the Nationalists and the Labor Party to compel the Government to a certain line of action; but nothing probably will be known for certain regarding its plans until the King's speech is read. —A large number of labor exchanges were opened on February 1. For the moment they are bringing Mr. Churchill considerable popularity. Hitherto their business has consisted chiefly in registering the unemployed, as applications from employees come in very slowly. The trades-unions look on them with suspicion as a means that may be used to lessen their power.

Ireland and the Liberals.—At a meeting of the Irish Party in Dublin, Mr. Redmond laid down the conditions on which he would support the Liberal policy. The Liberals must insist on Mr. Asquith's pre-election declaration, that they would not hold office unless they could secure the safeguards necessary for legislative utility, that is, the Upper House must be deprived of the power of blocking Home Rule. Failing in this, the Liberals must go to the country with Home Rule as an immediate policy. Should Mr. Redmond get sufficient guarantees in this matter and on the nature of the promised autonomy his party will support the Budget. The Independent Nationalists will probably follow the same policy. Mr. Healy has denied that he and Mr. O'Brien intend to move an amendment to the budget; their acceptance of it would depend on the consideration offered. Meantime Mr. O'Brien is establishing a daily paper, the Cork Free Press, which will advocate a strong Home Rule and land purchase policy, and a conciliatory attitude towards all parties, an "all-for-Ireland" program. As his friends prevail in Cork County and the Independents had a heavier aggregate poll than their opponents, his influence will be considerable especially in view of the overtures that Unionist writers are making for Irish support of Tariff Reform.

Indian Affairs.—The Moslem League has just ended its annual session at Delhi. It expressed great devotion to the Imperial Government, but at the same time demanded most vehemently the redress of native wrongs in South Africa. As AMERICA foresaw, this question is becoming one of the most important with Indians of all races and creeds.—Another Afghan convoy of arms and ammunition has been captured on the Persian coast. Three Afghans were killed.—Mr. S. M. Mitra, an Indian favorable to the Government, lecturing in London on present difficulties, pointed out that the average Indian knows nothing of constitutions and cabinets. For him three persons are the whole Government of India: the Bara Lat, the Chota Lat, the Janghi Lat, i. e., the Viceroy, the Lieutenant Governor and the Commander-in-Chief.

New South Wales Coal Strike.—Mr. Bowling, President of the Northern Miners Federation, has been sentenced to a year's hard labor for conspiracy. Three other leaders have received eight months' hard labor.

Suffrage Reform in Prussia.—As already announced in our Chronicle, the opening of what promises to be a most interesting debate on electoral reform in the Prussian Landtag had been set for February 11. As that date approached the efforts of the Liberal leaders to arouse the people to public manifestations in favor of universal, secret and direct suffrage met with varying success, with the result that the members of the Landtag were quite at a loss to forecast the outcome at the opening of the session. One point alone appeared clear, the present conservative stand of the Prussian Ministry in favor of the hitherto prevailing system of partial, public and indirect voting seemed hopeless, but what extent of change was to follow the clamor for reform no one might say. All the representatives agreed, however, that the consideration of the question, involving as it does an amendment of the constitution, will be debated long and bitterly. On February 11 the parliament house was crowded when Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg appeared in the tribune to explain, in his character of Minister-President of Prussia, the proposals agreed upon by the Government. His appearance was the signal of an unseemly outbreak on the part of a small group, made up of five of the Social Democratic party, whose insulting outcries made it impossible for the Chancellor to begin his speech. The resulting storm was quelled with difficulty by the presiding officer of the house, who was forced to threaten a change in the order of the day and an application of drastic measures to secure attention for the speaker. The defense of the existing suffrage system by the Chancellor was based on the evil results to the Parliamentary system, which would, he claimed, inevitably follow the changes demanded by the Advanced Liberals in the franchise. The existing franchise, he insisted, is far better than its reputation and a change along the lines proposed will effectually make for intellectual decadence in our system. The broadening of the limits, he warned the parliament, will open the way to the dominancy of Socialists and to consequent retrogression from the prosperity which the state has enjoyed under the same policy of conservative statesmanship. The speech of the Chancellor, which lasted an hour and a half, was rather a thoughtful philosophic disquisition on the development of government by the people than an oratorical display of party principles. The impression made on his hearers was varied; the Liberal members showed keen disappointment, the Conservatives wildly applauded the stand taken by Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg in defense of Bureaucracy when he affirmed the impossibility of abandoning Prussia's historic course in regard to electoral franchise, the Centrum was silent, and all await with keen apprehension the further development of the debate.

Political Situation in the Austrian Empire.—By resolution unanimously agreed to by representatives of all German parties of the Empire, who met in Vienna last week under the presidency of Dr. Karl Lueger of the Christian Socialist movement, it was agreed to push the laws safeguarding the use of the German language throughout the Empire. The action of the delegates is evidence that the Christian Socialists will have a controlling lead in the Reichsrath.—The Landtag of Bohemia, which met on February 3, has already been dissolved. All attempts to have the body move smoothly, nay, even to organize properly, proved futile. The old difficulty of the use of obstructive weapons is the explanation of the unfortunate state of affairs. Neither the German members nor the Czechs have that confidence in the policy of their opponents which will permit them to agree to make obstruction impossible. What influence the dissolution of the Landtag will have on conditions existing in the imperial Reichsrath and on the proposed remodelling of the Bienenrath cabinet in Vienna remains conjectural.—In Hungary, following the recent vote of lack of confidence in his cabinet, Graf Khuen-Hedervary, the premier, proposed to the Emperor-King as a solution of the crisis that a coalition cabinet be formed in which Graf Andrassy and Franz Kossuth, leaders of prominent party wings, should have office. To this end Graf Khuen at the same time presented his own resignation. Emperor Francis Joseph refused to heed the proposal and urged the premier to continue in his difficult position.

Paris Flood.—The Seine, which had begun to rise again last week because of continued rain and snowfalls, reached its high-water mark of the flood of 1882 and then rose slightly beyond that, but at the end of last week ceased rising and soon began to fall steadily. The report on Monday last was that the Paris pneumatic clocks, which are operated by compressed air, and which stopped at fifty-three minutes past ten o'clock in the morning of January 20, were started for the first time on February 14. On Thursday, the 17th inst., the Government introduced a bill authorizing banks to lend, for five years without interest, to small merchants and manufacturers ruined by the flood, one hundred million francs.

The concert at the Opéra Comique last Monday realized between four and five thousand dollars. The performers were all Americans. The list of patronesses, headed by Mrs. Bacon, wife of the American Ambassador, included many prominent American women residing in Paris.

French Steamship Wrecked.—The French Transatlantic Company's steamship, The General Chanzy, crashed at full speed during the night of February 9 on treacherous reefs near the Island of Minorca, off the Mediterranean coast of Spain. Captain Cayol, one of the most careful officers of the line, who was in charge, in his long experience had never before met with an accident. He was soon to retire from the service. The General Chanzy sailed from Marseilles at noon on the 9th and was due at Algiers on the afternoon of the next day; but during the first night of the passage the vessel was caught in one of the wildest storms the Mediterranean has witnessed in the last forty years, and apparently became unmanageable. The hull split in two and the ship foundered in a moment. The only known survivor of the wreck is a passenger named Marcel Badez, who was cast upon the deserted shore, where he remained unconscious the rest of the night. On the morning of February 10, having partially recovered his senses, he wandered about all day, and early next day reached Ciudadela, a seaport on the west coast of Minorca, where he gave the first information of the catastrophe to the French consul and the Spanish authorities. A rescue expedition was immediately sent out to Llosa, where the accident occurred, but nothing was found except small pieces of wreckage, many corpses floating near the shore, and the two hundred sacks of mail for Algeria. The number of victims is 158, of whom 88 were passengers and 70 formed the crew.

Discontent in Porto Rico.—The House of Delegates has protested vigorously against the contemplated modification of the law governing Porto Rican affairs. The measure embodying the proposed changes is from the pen of Secretary of War Dickinson, as a result of his recent tour of the island, and is already before Congress. It includes restrictions on naturalization, the appointment of all judicial officers and eight of the thirteen members of the Senate by the President of the United States, upon whose will the Governor of Porto Rico is to hold office without any fixed term. The President is also clothed with extraordinary powers to suspend or annul any law passed by the Porto Rican Legislature until the end of the next succeeding session of Congress.

Political Changes in Spain.—The fall of the Moret ministry, which was composed of heterogeneous elements all more or less opposed to the Conservatives, has been followed by a cabinet headed by Señor Canalejas, which is more united in sentiment and much more hostile to the Conservatives and the Church.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Our South American Neighbors

Up to a few years ago the people of the United States really knew less about their neighbors living in the ten republics of South America than they did about the Eskimo, the Hottentots or the Australian blacks. The reason is simple. We are a sensation-loving nation; we were curious about the savages in little-known wilds and eagerly read the stories of explorers like Stanley, Du Chaillu and Dr. Nansen.

In the South American countries we were not interested. We knew the people were white and civilized, and had lost the glamor of barbarism. We did no business with them, and had they all turned into monarchies, or undergone some other fundamental change, always providing it were not sensational enough for newspaper scare-heads, we should hardly have known, and we certainly should not have cared.

The first nine years of the new century have taught us more about them than the whole of the old. Most men now know that they constitute the next great market for the world's trade, and even our self-centred selves are beginning to be interested. Lately we have had magazine and newspaper articles in abundance all chanting the praises of this newly-discovered and wonderful field.

American business men are inquiring, sending out salesmen, establishing agencies and our trade seems in a fair way to prosper in that direction at last. Europe had grasped half a century ago what we are just now finding out. Her business houses have firmly established themselves and their products by continued, steady, intelligent efforts. Ours have fallen into disrepute through long periods in which we ignored the existence of South America, alternating with short stretches of feverish activity, resulting in broken engagements when our home market picked up and doing much more harm than good.

In spite of drawbacks which have made the United States a joke as an exporting country, the superior excellence of our goods in many cases makes the South American buyer run many risks to obtain our articles, a fact proved by the immense profits of the very few American houses which he knows he can trust to fill his orders properly, carefully and as promptly as our defective steamer service will let them.

As a result our trade is growing steadily and surely, and it will increase faster as the men sent out by our manufacturers succeed in convincing the principals that the field is large and well worth going after in earnest.

This is not a statistical article. Whoever is genuinely interested cannot do better than consult the admirable special reports of the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, and the monthly "Bulletin" of the Bureau of American Republics which is doing wonders in bringing about closer international relations. My purpose is to furnish information which no Government publication can give precisely, because it is an official document, but which is nevertheless essential to a definite understanding of the present situation and future possibilities of South America. Magazine writers have usually presented a rose-colored picture quite as false as the opposite extreme.

I shall deal with the people themselves, their character, their tastes, their attainments, their national relations, their sentiments and opinions towards ourselves, keeping in mind that a knowledge of the actual facts must precede any real progress towards closer relations.

To begin with, the division into ten Republics—I omit the three Guianas, mere colonial reflections of their European owners—separates the people into as many groups, for the South American is nothing if not patriotic. A good example are the Paraguayans, whose country is hemmed in by stronger neighbors, its male population scanty after almost complete extermination during the wars under Lopez, its laws hopeless dead letters, its offices a prey to spoilers, life and property far from secure and revolutions constant—they would scorn the idea of annexation to Argentina, rich, powerful and well governed, as part of which Paraguay would advance more in ten years than as a separate country in fifty. "No Señor, somos Paraguayos!" No sir, we are Paraguayans!

A like spirit burns strong in Bolivia and in Uruguay, both of which would be very much better off as provinces of their powerful neighbors. In spite of themselves, however, these three small states would long ago have ceased to exist if they did not serve a useful purpose as "buffers" between the larger countries. Boundary disputes and other bones of contention have produced a state of politics as complicated, on a smaller scale, as that of Europe. Sentiment perhaps plays a greater part there than across the Atlantic. The Latin pride is easily offended, and national insults remain long unforgiven. The only deep-rooted sentiment of friendship among the ten sisters is the old traditional alliance between Argentina and Peru, dating from the days of the fight for independence. On the other hand several well defined antipathies exist, notably between Chile and Peru, and between Argentina and Brazil. The four countries just named are undoubtedly the leaders, the others being far in the rear. By taking them up one by one, adding a brief paragraph on Uruguay and ending with a few words about the lesser states, we shall perhaps give a fair idea, in proper perspective of the national forces at work shaping South American destinies.

If asked to state the actual leader of the ten republics most people would be inclined to name Brazil. It is true that it is the largest, larger even than our own United States, and it has more than twice the population of any of the others: but it is not the foremost. That honor belongs to Argentina, second in size and population, but well in advance as regards government, education, import trade, and civilization generally.

ARGENTINA.

The Argentine Republic regards herself as a sort of "big sister" to the smaller countries, and claims, not unreasonably a position in the Southern Continent similar to that of ours in the north. The title is fiercely resented by Chile, indolently denied by Brazil, and admitted by all the rest either gratefully or grudgingly. Her foreign relations were greatly simplified a few years ago, when the vexed question of her long Chilean boundary, for years a festering sore in the flesh of both countries, was finally settled by Great Britain acting as referee. The two nations signed a Treaty of Peace and Arbitration, which allowed them to curtail excessive expenses for army and navy, and devote their full attention to peaceful progress. The importance of this alliance now being cemented by a commercial treaty cannot be overestimated: it is beyond question the strongest possible guarantee of international peace in South America.

With Brazil, Argentina's relations are unfortunately not always cordial. There is an animosity inherited from the overseas ancestors of each and strengthened by other factors, that will always prevent the establishment of complete mutual confidence. The keen rivalry between the two capitals Buenos Aires and Rio de Janeiro, is only typical of the national feeling that may lead to the gravest results. If the Baron do Rio Branco, Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs, is elected to the Presidency of his country, as now seems probable, his well-known abilities may be made to serve his acknowledged dislike of Argentina, and, barring foreign intervention, a disastrous war is not impossible.

In such case, upon Chile remaining neutral, depends the salvation of Argentina. Unaided, she believes that her scant seven millions could cope with the nineteen million Brazilians. Argentine arms earned an unfading glory in the wars of independence. Indeed, most of the other republics owe their freedom to the prowess of Belgrano, Las Heras and the immortal San Martin, the Argentine Washington, who carried the blue and white banner triumphant from the Atlantic to the Pacific, by a march through Andean passes acclaimed a greater feat of arms than the Alpine exploit of the great Napoleon. The descendants of those revolutionary heroes have not lost their fighting ability. The mountains and prairies of Argentina nurture a race of splendid soldiers, and not without reason is she proud of both army and navy.

Should Brazilian diplomacy succeed in breaking off her treaty with Chile, however, no amount of bravery could save her, assailed on the north by one enemy, along her two thousand miles of mountain frontier by the other and at sea and along her shores by their combined forces. Fortunately the immense European investments in Argentina make foreign intervention almost certain if needed to prevent war. British capital alone is interested there to the enormous extent of £300,000,000—nearly one and one-half billion dollars.

The Argentines are justly proud of their country. It embraces the climate of Italy and that of Iceland: huge tropical forests, immense prairies giving pasturage for thousands of herds, vast stretches of wheat land so fertile that a crop-failure has not been known in forty years; and a mountain country taking in the eastern slope of the mighty Andes for two thousand miles. Is it to be wondered at that they are inclined to resent our attitude of superiority, our ignorance of themselves, the dictatorial methods of our merchants? They have inherited their distrust of the Saxon and their haughty pride from Spanish ancestry along with many finer qualities. To them the Monroe Doctrine conveys the insinuation that they are not fit to manage their own affairs, and indicates a desire on our part for overmastering influence in South American matters, in which they see the cloven hoof of future annexation. However absurd these notions may seem to us they are perfectly natural from the Argentine's point of view, and will be very difficult to remove.

Notwithstanding the natural warm-hearted impulsiveness which gives such a charm to his character, makes him ready and willing to respond loyally when he is treated fairly and as an equal, those who gain his complete confidence and liking—and among foreigners they are the rare exceptions—find innate in the Argentine the Latin quality of true courtesy based on consideration for others, joined with a genuine depth of feeling that is a revelation to us cold-blooded northerners. This side of his nature is never seen by the casual observer. Although scrupulously polite to all he meets, his intimate social and home life, especially that of the best families, is jealously guarded by a reserve which few but his countrymen are ever permitted to penetrate. That home life is in the great majority of cases an admirable one and to her who presides over it all who know it must pay a spontaneous tribute. The world over, there is none more faithful, more lovable, none entirely devoted to husband and children, than the Argentine wife and mother.

In their tastes the people are artistic to a high degree and in schooling, thanks to government and private efforts, far ahead of their neighbors. Facilities are numerous, and none forego the fullest advantages of education. The training of the boy is supplemented by compulsory military service, which transforms the rawest of countrymen into a healthy, active and fairly intelligent citizen.

BRAZIL.

Unlike all her sisters, Brazil is of Portuguese and not of Spanish origin, in consequence of the famous "Bull of Partition" which allotted to Portugal all new world discoveries made east of Longitude 50° W. She has kept the language of her colonizers, and to-day her sympathies and prejudices are those of Portugal. There is consequently a wide gulf between herself and her sisters of Spanish descent, which will never admit of a union with any of them closer than a mere political alliance for material benefit. The instructive and perhaps unreasonable dislike of the Spanish American for the Brazilian is intensified by another fundamental difference between the two resulting from the disastrous heritage of African slavery handed down to Brazil by her former owner. The descendants of the Spanish conquerors have kept their white blood singularly clear. Miscegenation was, of course, inevitable, but its results are the lower classes of half-breed natives: in the ruling element the integrity of the white race is almost without a stain, and where there is an admixture, it is with the vigorous aborigine and entirely free from tincture of negro blood.

In Brazil, on the contrary, partly owing to the habits and ideas of the early Portuguese, partly to the comparative lack of immigration, the touch of the brush is present in ninety-five per cent. of the civilized population, a truly startling proportion. The negroid race has all the weaknesses of both parent stocks of which the evil influence is felt in every branch of the social system. Considering this fact it is not wonderful that the country lags behind her smaller competitor: rather is it remarkable that in less than half a century of republican rule her advance is so considerable as to compare with what the others have achieved in twice the time. It is no small thing to have evolved cities such as Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo, to have held together and made a formidable political factor of a country so vast and so loosely bound together, and finally to have produced a statesman of the calibre of Rio Branco.

The character of the people is a complex one; the upper classes have more than a fair share of pride, ambition, courtesy, jealousy of foreigners, strong likes and dislikes, and an indolence born of their tropical home; moreover, they are not above venality and they show a lack of frankness traceable probably to their mixed ancestry. Their attainments are high, but the better caste forms a much smaller proportion than is the case in Argentina and Chile; an overwhelming percentage of the people are underpaid, overtaxed and uneducated negroes. With regard to ourselves, their racial distrust is kept in the background by a sentiment of friendship for the largest consumer of their principal natural products, which plays a prominent part in our commercial relations.

CHILE.

The people of Chile are the logical product of their sterile mountain country, far removed from European civilization, whose climate is mostly bracing and severe. There is indeed rich agricultural land in the south, and still lower, fine timber, but both are very limited and the entire northern half of the country is sheer, barren, rainless desert. The Andean chain from Peru to the Straits of Magellan, runs practically along the west coast, and the Argentine boundary is the topmost ridge. Consequently Chilean territory consists of a ninety-mile strip of mountain slopes and foothills with a few valleys between, for its entire length of nearly three thousand miles.

Until the Transandine Railway was built Chile was cut off by the difficulties of communication through the Straits from the civilization and refinement of Europe to which Argentina enjoyed comparatively quick and frequent access; she was therefore compelled to rely very largely on her own resources. The fertile country lying well to the south, and the remainder consisting mainly of high altitudes, the winters are much more severe than those of her eastern neighbor.

The national offspring of this combination of circumstances is a race, lacking, perhaps in a high degree, polish, but strong, brave and essentially manly. The Chilean is a natural fighter and a born sailor. Military and naval service is enforced and the army and navy are maintained at a high pitch of efficiency. In frequent wars, mainly with her traditional foe, Peru, the Chilean fighting man has well earned his reputation for endurance and wild, reckless courage. These qualities have their drawbacks: the country is poor, and it follows that the working classes are on a much lower plane than in the richer state of Argentina. In time of peace they are rough and turbulent, requiring to be kept in order with an iron hand, which is frequently applied with a sublime disregard for the lives of the Rotos (the Chilean laborers, literally "broken men"). The nation's mineral wealth, although very great, lies largely in her beds of nitrate, and, if the recent German discovery of a substitute extracted from the air, is practical, it cannot but work irreparable havoc, which may be partly atoned for by the petroleum just found near Punta Arenas.

Chile's foreign difficulties have been relieved as much as those of Argentina by the boundary settlement and treaty. Her chief opponent now is her old enemy, Peru, but the latter is so completely at her mercy as to have been unable to resist the snatching away of the province of Tacna, a few months ago, in direct violation of the treaty of peace signed after the last bloody war. In the series of conflicts Peru has always had the sympathies of the United States, and the Chileans therefore nurse a long standing grudge against us, made heavier by the two famous international incidents of the Spanish bombardment and the cruiser Baltimore.

Millennium of a Great Abbey

I

It is just a thousand years since the establishment of the Abbey and Congregation of Cluny gave a new and stronger impulse to the diverse activities of the great order that had been built on the Rule of St. Benedict. It was the fashion until recently to sneer at the pre-reformation monks as lazy and ignorant, but modern historians have been gradually unmasking the conspiracy against historic truth. Montalembert's "Monks of the West," Newman's "St. Benedict and Benedictine Schools," Green, Döllinger and others had broken the crust if not the substance of partizan tradition; in recent years Gasquet and Gairdner have proved in detail that, far from being ignorant or indolent, the monks were the preservers and fosterers of knowledge, the promoters of arts and industries and the pioneers of modern civilization. But hoary falsehoods are not readily supplanted; it takes some time for truth to find its way through the channels of popular information.

A recent writer in the Independent moralizing and dogmatizing on the ruins of Cluny, reechoes the old misrepresentations, apparently unconscious of the existence of reliable sources or the results of modern research. The abbey and monastic buildings of Cluny are indeed gone, torn down by sacrilegious hands, but the heirs of its labors and aspirations are still with us to celebrate the millenium of its spirit if not of its walls, in unison with the Church that inspired its being ten centuries ago. Its true story forms one of the most instructive chapters in ecclesiastical history.

In 910 William the Pious, Duke of Aquitaine, founded and richly endowed an abbey at Cluny near Mâcon, France, and placed it in charge of St. Berno, who in his Abbey of Gigny had put in practice the stricter methods of government advocated a century before by St. Benedict of Aniane. The Benedictine monasteries that had been spreading all over Europe for five centuries, were hitherto autonomous, each governed by an elected abbot and traditional custom and bound together only by the observance of a common rule. All alike chanted the divine office in choir, labored with their hands, taught, wrote, studied, copied manuscripts and preached the Gospel by word and example. Their story was everywhere the same. They commenced by draining marshes and felling trees and Christianizing the neighboring inhabitants; then as villages rose and grew into cities, the huts of the pioneer monks developed into abbeys, schools, academies and universities.

The rule of St. Benedict which prescribed to his monks the education of children, was the germ out of which rose the famous schools of Fulda, Verviers, Hirschau, St. Maur, Corbié, Luxeuil, Jarrow and York; the universities of Paris, Tour, Lyons, Bologna, Cambridge, three of Oxford's colleges (Trinity, Christchurch and Worcester) and many other great monastic nurseries of scholars, missionaries and martyrs. There lay and cleric were taught the seven liberal arts and, contrary to a prevalent opinion, common schools, of which the English grammar schools are a survival, were established for the people. Another rule of St. Benedict, enjoining incessant labor, had a highly educating and civilizing effect upon the people, who learned from the example and instruction of the monks in the extensive works connected with the monastery, the more practical science of agriculture, trades and utilitarian crafts, the secrets of organization and true principles of government, and thus improved their social, material and, ultimately, their political condition. It is true to say that the Benedictines in conjunction with the Celtic monks, whom they gradually absorbed, evangelized and civilized the Teutonic nations, built up the libraries and schools and preserved or founded the arts and literature of Christendom. Their far-reaching influence can be gathered from the fact that in 1300 there were 37,000 monasteries, from Rome to Norway, from Britain to Jerusalem, engaged in their manifold variety of labor.

When the great pioneer work was over, the easier circumstances and more prosperous condition of the monks and the encroachments of the state conduced to laxity; it was to prevent this, exclude lay influence and, by adapting the spirit of St. Benedict to new conditions, to restore the primitive fervor that St. Berno bent all his energies at Cluny. He elaborated the Founder's ideal on points not sufficiently provided for in the original rule, established a stricter uniformity of discipline and safeguarded its preservation by increasing the authority of the abbot, making all dependent houses subject to the control of Cluny and prescribing that every monk in such houses, no matter how distant, should spend some time within its walls.

In the next two centuries nine great abbots, six of them canonized saints, impressed their spirit on the thousands of monks who went forth to teach and preach and write for the glory of God. In the time of Peter the Venerable some 2,000 monasteries in every part of Europe were either directly subject to Cluny or accepted its rule and discipline. These were all centres of revival, reform and benevolent initiative, so that their influence was felt in every direction, permeating and purifying both civil and religious life. Up to 1300 the Benedictine Order had produced 24 Popes, 200 cardinals, 22,000 bishops and 1,500 canonized saints. Its members were chiefly of the people but 97 royal personages had left their thrones to enter its ranks. The consolidation and spiritual renovation of Cluny greatly augmented its numbers, and the more perfect organization and wiser concentration and conservation of forces made for increased efficiency.

The all-embracing and well-directed activities of the Cluny Benedictines effected, as Döllinger expresses it, "a reanimation of monastic spirit that spread itself over the whole Church" and gave birth to the great popes, theologians, philosophers, poets, statesmen, architects, scientists and saints of the thirteenth, the greatest of centuries. They were potent apostles of peace. "The Truce of God" which gradually abolished the feuds of the Middle Ages, was first proclaimed by St. Odilo, the fifth Abbot of Cluny; it was adopted in France, England and Germany where it was made a law through Cluniac influence; and it was a Cluniac pope, Urban II, who in the Council of Clermont promulgated it to the Christian world.

Yet the Independent writer can find neither greatness nor scholarship in Cluny. He mistakes a portion of a ruined cloister in which the French Government houses 300 students, for the great abbey, which with all its buildings covered twenty-five acres, and he questions whether technological students at a $120 pension are not a more economic investment than praying monks. He is unaware that in the days of St. Hugh and Peter the Venerable Cluny had a far larger number of youths learning a greater variety of trades, and taught, fed and housed them free. Manual labor is mentioned by Döllinger as a special characteristic of Cluny, and it was applied to every kind of workmanship, writing, painting, sculpture, architecture, moulding in wax, carving of wood and bone, work in stained glass and in gold, iron and brass. The abbey church of Cluny, built by St. Hugh during the sixty years of his rule, was not only the largest in Christendom before the building of St. Peter's but the finest in architecture, painting and interior adornment.

So far from being "never noted for scholarship," Cluny was called the "custodian and fosterer of learning in France." It was a workshop where chronicles and treatises were written and the manuscripts of not only the Scriptures and the Fathers but the pagan Classics were collected, preserved and multiplied. The output of its scriptoria was circulated among the subordinate monasteries, each of which transcribed the original before passing it on to the next. Its library was for centuries the richest in France, a storehouse of a vast number of most valuable manuscripts. Not many indeed remain, for most of them were destroyed or scattered by the Huguenots, who sacked the monastery in 1592. Nearly all the remainder were burnt in 1790 by the revolutionary mob; the scattered remnants have been since collected and are now treasured in the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris. The revolutionists also destroyed the great abbey with its conventual buildings and tore down the magnificent church which for eight hundred years had been the glory of Europe. A few years later Napoleon rejected contemptuously an invitation to visit Cluny, saying he would not go among such Vandals. Only one tower and a part of a transept escaped the fury of the fanatics. A public road is running through the nave and another portion is occupied by a government stud. Thus have the much vaunted Huguenots, the brave revolutionists and enlightened republicans contributed to art and learning in France.

M. KENNY, S.J.

Marie Jamet's Answer

The duty of society towards the aged and friendless poor, and what can be done to assuage their unhappy lot, is indeed a most serious problem, one which is becoming of more and more importance and perplexity from year to year. It came into existence with the advent of pauperism, a direct product, as far as the English speaking world is concerned, of the suppression of the monastic houses, local hospitals, parish and trade guilds, by Henry VIII and his immediate successors.

In these latter days Charles Booth, Louis Brandeis,

R. W. Child, and a host of other students of social economics, have studied the problem, and earnestly endeavored to answer the question: "What shall we do with the old?" In the meanwhile a wage earner, a simple and uneducated girl, undertook to solve the problem, and answered the question, at least in such a way, that thousands of the derelicts of old age were and are given permanent homes and loving care.

Marie Jamet of St. Servan in Brittany, earning her daily bread by needlework, was moved through pity to share her meagre earnings with the friendless and aged poor of her native town. In this good work she was associated with another needlewoman, Virginie Tredaniel, an orphan girl of scarcely sixteen, two years her junior. These devoted young women, almost children, began their noble project by caring for an invalid blind woman of seventy, taking her into their room, spending their savings on her, and doing for her everything love and compassion would suggest. Shortly after this humble beginning of a noble work, which was destined to attain huge dimensions, a servant, Jeanne Jugan, joined them, together with a good woman of sixty years of age, Fanchon Auber. One had saved from her wages about twelve hundred dollars, and the other also had a small sum of money, and in addition, a little furniture, which they gave to the cause.

This small band of earnest women lived together in an attic, giving up a corner of it to the aged blind woman, their first case, and shortly after found room for another subject. For more than ten months they lived in this way, having a common purse, and only interrupting their labors to attend to the wants of their two old patients; and then it was that the thought came to them to extend their charity, so they rented a ground floor room, in which they placed twelve helpless old women. Shortly afterward they found that it was very hard work to make a livelihood for themselves and their protégés, and also give the time their aged charges demanded, such as washing and dressing them, putting them to bed, cooking their meals, and doing all that loving daughters ought to do for their infirm mothers, hence they gave up work, and instead, went about the streets, to the rich and the poor alike, asking for help.

Their progress at first was somewhat slow; moreover, they suffered greatly from the ridicule and contempt of comfortable and conservative persons, and had great difficulty in overcoming the obstacles placed in their way by those who doubted the feasibility of their project; they, however, never doubted, and in the end their faith, self-sacrifice and devotion were rewarded by the establishment of one house after another in the different cities of France, filled with worthy old women. At the same time they found other working girls like themselves ready to join them in serving the aged and friendless poor. Before very long Marie Jamet saw that the work she and her companions were doing would not be complete until they extended their hospitality to men as well as to women. Thinking out a way to do this, she opened the doors, and in a little while she had as many men as women among her old people.

After twelve houses of the Little Sisters of the Poor were established, and Marie saw the happy result of her labors, and that of her band of faithful helpers, she was led, through her great spirit of charity, to make foundations outside of France. In 1851 she instituted the first house in England, in 1852 the first in Germany, in 1853 in Belgium, in 1862 in Scotland, in 1863 in Spain, in 1868 in Ireland, United States, Africa and Italy; in 1882 in India, in 1884 in Australia and Portugal, in 1885 in South America, in 1887 in Canada, in 1888 in Ceylon, and so on from year to year, until at the time of her death in 1894, there were two hundred and sixty-six homes for the aged poor, in various parts of the world, giving shelter, food and every possible comfort to more than forty thousand old men and women, and this without distinction of creed or nationality; and in addition, there had passed through their doors over one hundred and twenty thousand others—destitute old people of both sexes.

Since the sweet and compassionate soul of Marie Jamet passed into the presence of its Creator on the 19th of September, 1894, the good work she began has gone on apace, and to-day, in this country alone, there are fifty homes with more than nine thousand inmates, and in every separate home there prevails a family spirit, the same that was born at St. Servan sixty-nine years ago, which makes the old folks feel that they are not strangers living on the charity of others, but that the house is their own home, to which they have every right and title.

And this is Marie Jamet's Answer to the question: "What shall we do with the Old?" CARYL COLEMAN.

Seals, Salmon and Science

In 1893 the parties to the Behring Sea dispute appeared before the arbitrators in Paris. On one side was the United States; on the other, nominally Great Britain, really British Columbia, most insignificant of the Canadian provinces. The United States was beaten. It had to pay nearly five hundred thousand dollars damages for the unlawful seizure of British Columbian fishing-schooners; and when its counsel claimed the seals as American property since they are the marine analogues of honey-bees, British Columbia, peeping from behind its mother's skirts, burst into uncontrolled laughter. The tribunal took the same view. Seals were not the honey-bees of the sea. In those days men walked the streets of Victoria in glory. The iniquitous San Juan business had been avenged; and the little western colony had done what the mother-land had tried again and again, only to fail, beaten Uncle Sam at his own business of horse-trading, alias arbitration.

We used to be told that modesty and polite deference to one's elders would pay in the long run. The notion has been pushed aside for a good many years by the blustering, bullying maxim: "Do others, or you will be done by them"; but it does not follow that it was wrong, as we shall see. Certainly a modest deference would have been more becoming in British Columbia than her pertness in this matter. She is very young compared with Uncle Sam. In insisting on her technical rights she had done him no small injury. Often, too, she had gone beyond her technical rights, and Uncle Sam was morally certain that the schooners he had given back and paid damages for, had taken many a seal within the three-mile limit, perhaps on the very beaches of the sacred Pribilof Islands; for her sealers were in many things akin to the old pirates. How much better would she have done if with upward side-long glance and hands behind her back she had said demurely: "Yes, Uncle Sam, it shall be as you say. Since you wish it, seals shall henceforth be to me as honey-bees, their islands shall be hives, the swelling water-ridges of the Pacific shall be their thymy hillsides and deep between shall be their meadows of clover, and the broad belt of tropic calm shall be their garden of sweets." For now comes the moral.

The seal-fisheries are almost dead, and even at their best they benefited but few. As a source of wealth, employment and trade, they were not to be compared with the salmon-fisheries; and in these the position of the parties is reversed. British Columbia has fostered the industry. At her great hatching establishments on the Fraser River the fish are born and nurtured until in millions they seek the sea. And when the time comes for them to return to the stream of their birth, the American fishermen are the pirates, swooping down upon them as they pass through the narrow passes of the San Juan Archipelago and the lower waters of the Gulf of Georgia, capturing the best and leaving only a paltry remnant for the British Columbian fishers. What a delight it would be now for British Columbia could she come with radiant face and sparkling eye and say: "Uncle, do you remember the story of the seals that became bees? I have some salmon that are bees, too. I bring them up at my nurseries that are equivalently the hives, and send them down to the sea. But when they are returning your wicked boys cut them off so that only a few stragglers get back. Please tell your boys that salmon are bees no less than seals and are not to be molested in their homeward flight. And thus, dear Uncle, 'the whirligig of time brings in its revenges.'"

But the opportunity was lost. To save her fish British Columbia must have recourse to Science. We would recommend the use of suggestion greatly in vogue at present. Let every pool in the nurseries have its phonograph with its sound transmitters in the water, and let each phonograph at intervals, but especially at meal times, play sweetly and softly, "Rule Britannia" and "The Maple Leaf Forever." Occasionally let an imitation dog-fish or shark be rushed through the pools to the tune of "Yankee Doodle" violent with the shriekings of fifes. When the fish go down to the sea, they should meet at every mile of the river's course the phonographs with patriotic airs, and at every fourth or fifth the dog-fish or shark and "Yankee Doodle." Then when the time comes for their return, let them be met at the entrance of the straits of Fuca. On the Vancouver Island side let there be beautiful steamers with splendid orchestras playing "Rule Britannia" and "The Maple Leaf Forever"; on the Washington side hideous tug-boats dashing hither and thither shrieking "Yankee Doodle" from the most ear-splitting steam calliopes that can be devised. Thus old ideas will be aroused; "Rule Britannia" and "The Maple Leaf Forever" associated with the thought of peace and dinner, and "Yankee Doodle" associated with the thought of dog-fish and being dined upon. If scientific suggestion be worth anything, the salmon would all flock to the Canadian side of the straits, and it would be the Piper of Hamelin over again. The long procession of fish would follow the music through British waters safely to the Fraser River; and the American fishermen would not get a single one; and there would be another triumph of modern experimental psychology. *

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Father Tabb: the Poet.

III.

The temptation is to write of the man rather than of his poetry. His unique personality arises before the mind's eye and the words which clamor for utterance cleave to the performer rather than to his performance. Oft did he lift us up to the upper air, but never by a creation of his own fancy. He read to us from many masters, but not one word from his own effusions. Modesty was his darling virtue, and no pupil of his ever suspected from aught he said or did that his teacher was well along the high road to fame. His divine gift could not indeed be hidden; nor could he help breaking into numbers. But what he submitted to us were his lighter conceits, local hits, quips and quiddities, none of which ever found their way into print, and many of which should not have been cast upon an indiscriminate and indiscriminating world.

But poet he was, born and cultivated, and refined ad unguem. He lived heart to heart and soul to soul with beauty and music, with goodness and truth. To him nature revealed her myriad harmonies, and he held sweet communion with her visible forms. He glanced from earth to heaven and pierced the veil to groundlings impenetrable. The snow-flake, the rain-drop, the leaf and the lily, spoke to him in language at once mystic and audible. Fancy-free, he made his modest flight, not like the lark, but like the humbler songster that flits from flower to flower and wings from grove to grove. He ventured no sustained flight. Whether this came from the realization of his own limitations, or from sheer necessity—he was a slave to duty—we need not undertake to decide. It is, however, our most secure conviction that he gave forth without effort, and without ulterior desire, the native promptings of his pregnant soul. It were, therefore, idle to compare him with geniuses of longer, if not loftier, range. He essayed nothing of the kind. His aim and ambition is clearly set forth in the lines which he places first among his Later Lyrics:

"whose notes do beat
The vaulty heaven so high above our heads,"

"O little bird, I'd be
A poet like to thee,
Singing my native song—
Brief to the ear, but long
To love and memory."

Others might sing of arms and the hero, of the rise of nations and the fall of states; 'twas his to peal forth in brief bird-notes the tuneful echoes of his restless spirit—echoes which haunt the memory and embalm themselves in the heart.

Brevity was his passion. He was a niggard in the use of words. No miser was ever more jealous of his coin. And no man ever loved the dear old English tongue with a more passionate or truer devotion. Every syllable, every letter, was forced to do its best work, and, as it passed through the alembic of his gifted mind, it revealed capabilities unknown to the multitude. He aimed at compressing the greatest volume of thought into the smallest possible compass. And if we stop to enjoy all that his verses express and a tithe of what they suggest, we will find that he has given us full scriptural measure "pressed down, and shaken together, and running over." In this respect he has, on the authority of a competent over-ocean critic, achieved greatness. Measure, if you can, the suggestive power of this couplet:

"All men the painter Youth engage;
And some, the famous sculptor, Age."

Here we may note in passing two characteristics of Father Tabb's poetry: his passion for brevity and his love of contrast. But we are speaking of the suggestive possibilities of his verse; and these are limited only by the capacity of the reader. The writer invited three several admirers to tell what precise spark this piece of hammered steel gave forth as it struck against the flint of their fancy. One, the most matter-of-fact, said: "I think he means that great numbers die while they are yet young, and only a comparative few reach old age."

"Nothing more?"

"Nothing that I can see."

He of the broader vision replied: "The verses suggest to me that weakness of human vanity so well known to the photographer; for all love to be pictured as they were in the bloom of youth, while few desire to gaze upon the image of their decrepitude."

The last, himself blessed with a slight poetic vein, declared: "I see the gay painter with the magic brush coloring the cheek of youth with tints of buoyancy and exuberant life; and, the colors faded, the pitiless Sculptor with envious chisel carving deeper and deeper the lines of care, and with deft blows bending the once noble and comely form towards Mother-earth." The couplet suggests that at least. But what worlds were not expanded before the mind that gave them birth!

What strikes even the most casual admirer of Father Tabb is the wonderful variety of subjects upon which he touches; and he touches nothing that he does not adorn. Apropos of this reference to Goldsmith, the writer recalls a reflection made by the poet when we were reading together "The Deserted Village." Goldsmith, he declared, had the rare gift of placing the homeliest and most commonplace things in poetic setting. Under his magic touch, the kitchen clock and the broken chair become a beauty and joy. Was not the admirer unconsciously describing his own transforming touch? Is there anything less poetic than a fagot? Yet listen as it falls under the eye of genius:

"If thou art fit to feed
A dying flame,
Supply the present need;
And God when sinks the light
Will give thy soul good-night."

The man who can apostrophize a harmless, necessary fagot, in language so sweet, has the afflatus in generous measure. When his fancy broods over higher things, his thoughts come to us like fragrance from the meadows of heaven. Under his muse, inanimate nature takes on life and beauty; and the abstract becomes concrete and personal.

Father Tabb's poesy was colored by his experiences. The year spent at sea had left upon him an impress of the ocean. He revelled in the poetry of Israel, and the imagery of her incomparable bards frequently finds its way into his exquisite numbers. For him, fancy is "A boat unmoored, wherein a dreamer lies,

The slumbrous waves low-lisping of a land
Where Love, forever with unclouded eyes, Goes wed with wandering Music, hand in hand."

Out of the sanctified union of love and music came his chaste verses, pure as diamonds from the virginal earth. Nor must we judge that he was forever singing of flowers and birds, of trees and winds and clouds. Man and his Maker were likewise the subjects of his song, for he was priest as well as poet; yea, a priest first, and then a poet. The chastity of his calling is delicately mirrored forth in the quatrain which he entitles Woman:

"Shall she come down and on our level stand,
Nay; God forbid it! May a mother's eyes—
Love's earliest home, the heaven of Babyhood—
Forever bend above us as we rise!"

Beautiful thought, worthy of the man whose chiefest love is in the God of the sanctuary, and whose love for woman is consecrated by that filial piety so much eulogized in the inspired word!

Our poet loved solitude. His cell, like that of the great Alcuin, was "the sweet dwelling of his soul." The adjacent forest lured him, and he revelled in its varied glories. It is Aristotle who says that the man who loves solitude is either an angel or a devil. Nor is this a meaningless conceit; for in solitude the soul comes back upon itself and from its mysterious depths brings forth things good or evil. Read and re-read his poems, study the children of his Muse, and you will judge graciously of the womb in which they were conceived. He was oft alone with the spirit of light:

"Like to the brook that all night long
Sings, as at noon, a bubbling song
To Sleep's unheeding ear,
The Poet to himself must sing
When none but God is listening
The lullaby to hear."

If the poet was alone, he was alone with God, and he that holds such converse has a message for the race. The forms of beauty which rioted in his restless brain found adequate and perfect expression. Those who saw him at the piano rapt in mystic thought as one in ecstasy, could hardly help feeling that he was wrestling with intuitions too refined for utterance. The poet alone understands the poet. In prison Father Tabb met a kindred spirit and learned to know him as only companions in misery learn to know each other. There he found that Lanier's Muse was dumb at times and unresponsive. It was at such times that the sweet sound of the flute called him back to earth and the things of sense, and to that gracious instrument the priest addresses these words:

"When palsied at the pool of Thought
The poet's words were found,
Thy voice the healing angel brought
To touch them into sound."

Although rarely or never an apostate from poetic rule, he was exceedingly averse to being tied down by mere measure. For this reason he conceived a mild disgust for the sonnet. The structure was too complex, and he strenuously objected to being limited and allowed fourteen lines wherein to embody the thoughts that were crystalizing in his brain. Only after repeated urgings on the part of one of his fellow professors would he submit to the perpetration of such poetic abomination. And so, in sheer desperation and to be rid of the annoying opportunity, he tried his hand; and with what success, his admirers have reason to know. It would be difficult to find a group of sonnets more superb than those which came from the pen of the gifted Virginian. All lovers of Shelley have long admired, and no true lover of the beautiful language can refuse to admire, these lines:

"Shelley, the ceaseless music of thy soul
Breathes in the cloud, and in the skylark's song,
That float as an embodied dream along
The dewy lids of morning. In the dole
That haunts the west wind, in the joyous roll
Of Arethusan fountains, or among
The wastes where Ozymandias, the strong,
Lies in colossal ruin, thy control
Speaks in the wedded rhyme. Thy spirit gave
A fragrance to all nature, and a tone
To inexpressive silence. Each apart—
Earth, Air and Ocean—claims thee as its own,
The twain that bred thee, and the parting wave
That clasped thee, like an overflowing heart."

The man who could embody his thought in language so rich ought to live. Will he live? For the good name of English poetry, we hope and pray that time will deal favorably with him; for among so much that is beautiful, there is not a word nor the shadow of a suggestion of what is wanton. This is no great encomium for a priest, but it is the finest encomium which can be paid to a poet. Father Tabb always edifies. He points to a brighter world and leads the way. But will he live? Let himself give the answer:

"Their noonday never knows What names immortal are;
'Tis night alone that shows
How star surpasseth star."

Whether immortal or not, one thing is beyond peradventure: the memory of John B. Tabb will be held in love and benediction till his last disciple leaves the earth; for envy herself cannot deny that he was a great teacher and a most amiable man. It is with a painful realization of their inadequacy that a grateful pupil places these few lilies over the ashes of his ancient master. And, as they wither, may some defter hand weave a wreath of laurels and cast it on his grave.

Archbishop Bourne has set the date of June 28 for the consecration of the new Cathedral, of Westminster, the extension of which is now complete but for the mosaic over the main entrance. Up to September of last year the cost had been £252,523.

The Pope has sent a kindly and generous letter to the Archbishop of Paris expressing his sympathy with the sufferers from the recent floods, and enclosing a gift of $6,000 on the relief fund.

CORRESPONDENCE

Some Features of the Recent Floods in Paris

JANUARY 31, 1910.

To the American readers who have followed the accounts of the recent floods in and about Paris, it may safely be said that, for once, the newspapers have exaggerated nothing: neither the weird aspect of the submerged city nor the dramatic episodes that took place daily during a week of horror, nor the acts of devotion and charity that brightened the atmosphere of terror and of pain.

The flood, the like of which had not been witnessed for three hundred years, reached its maximum on January 28, a dismal and dreary day, when a leaden sky and downpours of rain added to the general gloom. Never, since the tragic days of the siege and the Commune, in 1870-71, the "city of light," as lovers of Paris call it, passed through so severe an ordeal. Almost from the first, the trains, telephones and telegraphs ceased to work, electric light failed in many quarters and the capital of France found itself in an incredibly short space of time cut off from the provinces. Then, as the Seine rose higher and higher, flooding streets, avenues, public and private buildings, all intercourse between the opposite banks of the river became almost impossible; on one particular day, only two bridges were available and the access to these became every hour more difficult.

It was curious to mark the varying moods of the people during a period of acute tension. At first, the light-hearted Parisians were amused rather than alarmed at the unusual aspect of the river. The quays were thronged with men, women and children of all ranks of society, who spent hours watching with an interest, unmingled so far with fear, the rush of yellow water. Even at night, when the theatres closed, women of the world, closely muffled in furs, drove in their motor cars to one or other of the bridges to watch the Seine under its new aspect. Then, by degrees, when, one after another, the streets and squares filled with water, when in the low lying suburbs of Grenelle and Javel people had to fly for their lives, when in the wealthy quarters, old-fashioned "hotels," that had been threatened by fire and revolution, but never by water, were slowly taken possession of by the stealthy, creeping flood, then curiosity changed into terror. It became evident, even to the most careless and optimistic Parisians, that the flood was assuming the proportion of a national catastrophe and that an appalling misfortune had fallen upon thousands of families. The papers have enlarged upon the aspects of Paris during the remarkable week; they described how the avenues that extend on the banks of the Seine seemed to form a part of the river, how boats moved to and fro in the streets and carried provisions to the imprisoned inhabitants; but more striking and impressive than the outward features of the calamity was the outburst of charity and devotion that it called forth.

As usual in similar cases the Church was active in relieving distress: the Archbishop was indefatigable in his visits to the stricken suburbs: his kindness of manner and the substantial help he brought with him, will long be remembered. The district of Grenelle was one of those that suffered most severely: Mgr. Amette came there on January 29, at an early hour and visited the different houses where the refugees, chiefly workmen and their families, had been housed. One rough man, after watching the prelate's gentle and attentive manner as he inquired into the different cases, turned to his comrades: "Where," he exclaimed, "are our deputies? there is no fear that they will come to see us now that we are in trouble, as you do, Monsieur l'Archevêque," he added, taking off his cap. Then this worthy citizen, whose opinion of his political chiefs was evidently not a flattering one, launched into a loud denunciation of their selfishness and indifference, couched in language more forcible than polite. The association known as "la Croix Rouge," which is both wealthy and efficient, did wonders. Soup kitchens provided food for the refugees and in the suburb of Grenelle alone, two thousand people were fed daily by the white robed "infirmières," with the red cross badge, many of whom bear the greatest names in France. The meals given to the refugees were plentiful and excellent, and the gentle, cordial, encouraging words that accompanied the service added flavor to the gift. Close by one of these kitchens is a large room, used in ordinary times, as a "Patronage." Here a lady, Mlle. de R., whose life is devoted to charity, receives on Sundays and Thursdays young girls and children, on whom she exercises an extraordinarily happy influence. Last week, the "patronage" became a refuge for the homeless inhabitants of the submerged suburb: mattresses were laid on the ground and to whole families was extended a primitive, but warmly cordial welcome. Most of the sufferers came from Javel, a suburb adjoining Grenelle, that lies close to the Seine and is inhabited chiefly by rag pickers, chiffonniers, whose miserable homes were among the first to be invaded by the river. They flocked to the "patronage" in groups, wet, draggled, downcast, toddling children clinging to their mothers' skirts, men carrying bundles containing the poor possessions saved from the wreckage. It was an intensely pathetic sight; the silent suffering of these men, suddenly sent adrift chilled one's heart; the natural buoyancy of the Parisian was quenched for the time being, no words either of complaint or explanation passed their lips and at first they seemed hardly aware of the tender sympathy of their hostesses.

On the following day, the ice was broken and the cordial influences that surrounded them brought out the better feelings of the outcasts: "I shall never allow anything to be said against clericals again," said one, "and shall become one myself." Although no words of religion were unduly pressed upon them, the atmosphere of the place, the holy pictures and statues that lined the walls told their own tale and when evening came, one of the gentlewomen who assisted Mlle. de R. in her hospitable duties, proposed to say an Our Father and Hail Mary aloud. A willing assent was given and all present joined in the prayer. Next day, their kind hostess proposed to distribute medals blessed by the Pope to all who desired them; every rough, grimy hand was stretched out eagerly: "I, too, should like to have a medal for my little girl," said the policeman, who kept guard at the door of the "Patronage."

During the two worst days of the flood, the 28th and 29th, when the rain fell in torrents and the water came nearer to the "patronage," the time hung heavy on the hands of the refugees. Their kind hostess provided for their amusement: cards and dominoes were given to the men, games to the children and to the women needle work that kept them occupied. Occasionally Mlle. de R. related to them some anecdote, trait of history or reminiscence of travel; they sat round her on the floor, chairs being scarce, and these rough men, rag-pickers or coal-heavers, and women scarcely less uncivilized hung on her every word. With a quickness of perception that is their birth-right, they grasped the drift of all she said, they understood, with curious rapidity the point of each story and their questions, answers or observations proved once more that the Parisian workman has a natural facility for entering into subjects far removed from the sphere in which he moves. It is this adaptability that makes him an easy prey to those who, for their own evil purposes, work on his feelings. Here, the influence may one day bring forth unexpected fruit! Gazing on the attentive listeners, with wide open eyes and respectful demeanor, we found it difficult to believe that these were the same men who are too often led away by Socialistic leaders, men who denounce the clericals and insult the curés, who preach war against the rich and build up barricades in the streets of Paris. Who knows if these dreary days of January, 1910 may not mark in the lives of some among them a beginning of better things.

Sceptical and careless as they seem, they have a child-like simplicity that is often pathetic. One of the refugees, although lame and old, insisted on going back to visit his submerged home as soon as the flood seemed to decrease. The object of his journey, neither an easy nor a safe one, was to find out whether his pet canary was alive. In the hurry of his departure he hung up the cage as high as possible and had the delight of finding his pet alive. Others touched us by their courtesy towards the women and children to whom they willingly gave the best places; others again brought Mlle. de R. loaves of bread: "Will you give these," they said, "to those who are worse off than we are." An old woman bringing a well worn cloak: "It has been of use to me," she said, "but now I want it to be of use to others," and she left it in Mlle. de R.'s hands.

Results of the British Elections

LONDON, JANUARY 29, 1910.

The election returns are now nearly complete. The last elections will have taken place and detailed figures will be in your possession by cable by the time this letter reaches you. But the few returns still outstanding to-day cannot alter the general situation. The essential fact is that the Government will have a nominal majority of a little over a hundred instead of a majority of 350 given to Mr. Asquith at the elections of 1906.

I say a "nominal majority." In 1906 Mr. Asquith's cabinet secured a majority of 271 seats exclusively of the Irish Nationalist members. But the present general election gives him a majority that includes 82 or 83 Nationalists. Even if we leave out of account the fact that nine of them are elected on an anti-Budget program, the Nationalists are at most allies, not followers, of the Government. If on any important question they differ with Mr. Asquith and go into the opposition lobby the Cabinet's majority disappears and the Government is defeated by some sixty votes.

The Irish party thus dominates the whole position. One result is that already some prominent Conservatives are talking seriously of the question whether it would not be good policy for Mr. Balfour to throw over his Orange following and come to terms with Mr. Redmond. This development may not come immediately but it is a probability of the future. The record of sixty years of British policy shows that many great reforms are originally proposed by the Liberals, and after having been at first declared impossible by the Conservatives are finally accepted and carried by them. The successive extensions of the franchise; the introduction of Free Education; the establishment of local government by County Councils in England and Ireland, are cases in point.

When the Lords forced the appeal to the country and the whole Liberal press declared that England was on the verge of civil war, and the people seething with indignation at the interference of the Peers with the prerogative of the House of Commons, I assured you in more than one letter, that most people were indifferent on the subject. Instead of sweeping the country, the Liberals have secured the narrowest and most unstable of majorities. More than one of the Liberal candidates confesses that denunciations of the Peers produced little effect on the electors. "We lost time 'barking up the wrong tree' when we talked on the Lords," says one of them. What enabled Mr. Asquith's friends to hold any ground at the elections was the fear of dear food inducing the electors to vote against Tariff Reform.

For Catholics the most welcome result of the elections is that the new situation makes it certain that the Government will not be able to carry any hostile legislation against our schools. Mr. Asquith in his Albert Hall speech promised the Nonconformists a new education Bill and declared that the Government stood on this question precisely where it did four years ago. Several of his colleagues are pledged to support the Nonconformist campaign against denominational education. It was Mr. Lloyd-George who at the Free Church Council meeting of 1903 moved: "That this Council, being deeply convinced of the injustice of teaching sectarian dogmas at the public expense, suggests to the education authorities that they should refuse to give money out of the rates to support sectarian schools."

And only last year Mr. Runciman, now at the head of the Education Department, was present at the celebration of Dr. Clifford's jubilee as a Nonconformist pastor. Dr. Clifford is the very impersonation of the Nonconformist campaign against the Catholic schools. Yet the Minister of Education, Mr. Runciman, said: "I am not here as representing the Baptist Union or any other Nonconformist body but as representing the State. . . . On the education question we have been repulsed not defeated. Dr. Clifford is not prepared to lay down the sword, and where he leads we are prepared to follow."

However much Mr. Asquith and his colleagues may desire to redeem their pledges to the Nonconformists, they are powerless to legislate in the face of eighty Nationalist votes. The schools are safe so far as this goes, but not from the harrying and persecution invented by Mr. Runciman. As head of the Education Department he can vary a large number of regulations of detail. Let me give an instance. In more than one great centre our schools are threatened with an order to provide increased space for each scholar in the school buildings. Under the law not one penny of public money is given us for buildings. We have to provide and keep them in repair. In Liverpool if the order is enforced the Catholics will either have to raise £100,000 (half a million of dollars) for school extension, or see some thousands of children transferred from our schools to the undenominational schools. The undenominational schools can fulfil the new requirements with the help of public money drawn from the rates. Thus to insist on larger schoolrooms is an easy method of penalising and embarrassing the Catholics.

This is only one of Mr. Runciman's weapons. It is to be hoped that at an early date the Irish party will raise a protest in Parliament against his proceedings. At the recent elections they vigorously supported him and others who are equally hostile to Catholic education. They issued a general mandate to the Irish electors in Great Britain to vote for Liberal candidates on the ground of Mr. Asquith having spoken favorably of Home Rule in his election manifesto at the Albert Hall gathering. Irish Catholics who hesitated to vote for Liberal candidates on the ground of their doubtful or unsatisfactory replies to the test question on education proposed by the Bishops, were told that they need not fear for the schools as the Irish party would protect them. It is true that many Irish Catholic voters nevertheless polled for the Conservative candidates and at some of the later contests the Irish vote ran still more strongly in this direction on account of the unsatisfactory explanations and restrictions of Mr. Asquith's Home Rule pledge given by some of his colleagues. But the final result was that the Catholic vote in Great Britain was sadly divided. In several places it was sufficiently united to secure the defeat of candidates of the Nonconformist militant type, the undenominationalists and the secularists. But in others enemies of Catholic education owed the security of their seats to the Irish vote.

The Nemesis of this division is that it is now plain that had the Irish leaders not interfered, but allowed the Irish Catholic voters in England to vote freely and unitedly against the enemies of Catholic education, parties would have been still more evenly balanced in the House of Commons and Mr. Redmond would have been a more absolute master of the situation. The action of the Irish party was no doubt controlled by the group of its members, who, forgetting Mr. Parnell's statesmanlike doctrine of party independence, hold that the best hope for Ireland lies in making the Irish party practically a wing of the Liberal organization. In their new zeal for Mr. Asquith some of these gentlemen actually referred to Mr. Birrell's Education Bill of 1906 as a kind of charter for the Catholic schools, and dwelt in their speeches on the grievances of the Nonconformists.

Like the Catholic vote our Catholic press was also divided. One paper mixed up its defence of the schools with openly partisan Toryism. Most of the others subordinated the School Question to that of Home Rule, and one of them made scandalous attacks on priests who had only carried out the orders of their Bishops, and put the facts bearing on the education question plainly before their people in order to guide them in their decision as to which candidate to support. As I looked through the Catholic papers each week end during the election campaign I often wished we had a paper here like AMERICA—Catholic and not partisan.

In England old prejudices handicap a Catholic candidate for the House of Commons. It is easier for a Jew or a Freethinker to obtain a seat. It is therefore satisfactory to note that nine Catholics have so far been returned for English constituencies, a small group, but larger than has sat in any House of Commons since Reformation days. Of the nine five are Conservatives, two Liberals, one a Labor member and one a Nationalist. But on the Education question all will vote with the Irish, giving a Catholic education vote of some ninety-two members—enough to put Mr. Asquith in a minority, and force a change of government.

Several distinctly anti-Catholic candidates have been rejected. Amongst these are the militant Orangeman, Mr. Sloan of Belfast, who lately appeared as a chairman at anti-convent meetings, and the Rev. Silas Hocking, author of the "Woman of Babylon" and other anti-Catholic novels in which a Jesuit usually figures as the villain and an imprisoned nun as a victimized heroine.

Fake Journalism

The New York Evening Post would doubtless resent a classification among the fake journals of the Metropolis. It prints every day at the head of its editorial columns the reminder—for self-guidance no doubt—that “the design of this paper is to diffuse among the people correct information on all interesting subjects . . . and to cultivate a taste for sound literature.” What constitutes sound literature or how a taste for it may be cultivated are questions for discussion. Everyone knows, however, what is meant by correct information.

A recent Saturday issue of the Post had a catchy article entitled “Shelf of Fakers’ Writings—Boston Public Library Puts Dr. Cook’s Works Where They Will Have Company Annius, Du Halde, Psalmanazar, Mandeville, Lawson, and Others Included.” To find Du Halde linked with Dr. Cook and a motley company of more or less celebrated impostors is, to say the least, startling. His writings we have never seen mentioned save with respect. Glancing through the article in the Post we read: “There have been many minor incursions by fakers more or less clever. Du Halde’s lengthy discourse on China rings apparently true. The whole was taken from stories told by returning missionaries. Du Halde had never wandered more than a day’s journey from Paris.”

A man may give correct information about Boston, and never wander beyond the limits of Manhattan, but he should be sure that the source of his information is trustworthy. Du Halde’s “Description Géographique Historique . . . de l’empire de la Chine” was the first book written by a European which treated the history of China with exactness and detail. It has been translated into many languages and is always cited as a standard authority. An English translation appeared in 1736.

Du Halde was also the successor of Legobien in giving to the world the “Lettres Edifiantes,” which he edited with great ability and of which numerous editions and translations have been issued. Both these works of Du Halde are among the references given in the really remarkable article on China written for “The Catholic Encyclopedia” by the celebrated Orientalist, Henri Cordier. From this it is clear that Du Halde is not a faker. Nor is he on the shelf of Fakers’ Writings in the Boston Public Library, because there is no such shelf, as the following answer to our inquiry shows:

“BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY, FEB. 5.

“DEAR SIR:

“I beg to acknowledge your favor of February 4. We have no ‘Shelf of Fakers’ Writings’ at the Boston Public Library. . . . We do not attempt to determine the value of travellers’ tales or to put a valuation upon what any book contains. To do that is manifestly beyond our power.

“Very truly yours,

“HORACE G. WADLIN,

“Librarian.”

The writer in the Post has made good a claim to a place on his imaginary “Fakers’ Shelf.”

The Emmanuel Movement

What is the Emmanuel movement in the Episcopal Church? Its physical side presents no difficulty. We comprehend the care of nervous patients or the amelioration of their condition by suggestion and similar means working through the imagination. What is more difficult to grasp is its spiritual side; how a church claims such a therapeutic as its function. In explaining this some take the ground that the gift of healing belongs to the Church; others, that the Church has a peculiar power over the intellect and will. It would be worth while to show how inconsistent with a right notion of the power of the Church and its ministry the practice of the Emmanuel movement is, were it not that its practitioners seem to lose sight altogether of the supernatural. The account they give of their work does not show them doing anything beyond the power of any so-called mental healer. They subordinate themselves entirely to physicians, a very proper thing to do, though it implies a certain abandonment of their professional claims; but whether this subordination is a part of their system or only a prudent means to preclude opposition, is not clear. This, however, is clear, that the movement makes for the natural against the supernatural and tends to the destruction of Christian dogma. It shuts out sin, sacraments and grace, and puts forward the unregenerate human will as sufficient for man’s salvation. It therefore will draw its followers farther and farther from Christianity.

Preying on the Dead

A real grievance due to the tyrannical exercise of authority is made public by the indignant citizens of Marcos Juárez, in the Argentine Republic. In that city, the town council happens to be controlled by Freemasons, who have made use of their legislative powers to frame an ordinance which is simply a blast of persecution. Although all creeds are tolerated in Argentina the Roman Catholic religion is the "religion of State" and is guaranteed by the Constitution. For this reason, the President of the republic, whoever or whatever he may be, proposes names to the Holy See for any vacancy that may occur in the hierarchy. The government also makes appropriations for the support of religion. In the face of such constitutional guarantees, the councilmen of Marcos Juárez have advertised their broadmindedness, freedom from prejudice and respect for religion by levying a tax of two hundred pesos ($193.00, U. S. gold) on every corpse brought into a church for a funeral service. If the prayers for the dead are recited over the body at the church door, without any service within the sacred edifice, a tax of only fifty pesos ($48.25, U. S. gold) is levied. In that country, what we call a house funeral is a thing unknown. The bodies of those who die in the Catholic communion, whether mighty or lowly, rich or poor, old or young, are invariably conveyed to the church. The town council, therefore, has aimed a blow at a pious custom in general use. The Catholic citizens have petitioned the government for relief on the grounds of the unconstitutionality of the measure. It seems strange that in any civilized country any body of lawmakers should be so degraded as to formulate such a measure and placard the town with it. Even though the ordinance should be annulled by the higher authorities, the cryptic councilmen have given a glaring proof of their hostility not only to the faith as a system but to those who find strength and consolation in its religious observances. As Argentina is now in the midst of a presidential campaign, the hateful ordinance may be taken as a sign of the conscious power and irreligious tendency of the Masonic fraternity in that country.

What Vestments Shall We Wear?

The proper form and colors of vestments is being discussed in the Ecclesiastical Review by two writers in favor of at least modified Gothic form and old-world tints, against the form we are accustomed to and aniline dyes. They represent a school long in existence in Germany and England, and are strong in art and esthetics. We fear the faithful are largely Philistines. Moreover, the Latin races are not likely to submit gladly even in this matter to the Teuton. There is, in these advocates of reform, what seems like exaggeration. French court abbés of prerevolutionary times may have been inclined to tight-fitting cassock, with sweeping trails; but it is not clear how the cutting down of chasubles is to be connected with such vanity; and to attribute this to an imitating of the ladies' tailor-made gowns of the period, is to say something difficult of proof. The tailor-made gown, as we understand it, is a very modern invention. One glancing through a book on dress will see the ladies of those days affecting widespread skirts, and clinging gowns coming in only after the Revolution. As to the sweeping trail, it is something recognized by Rome as belonging to the costume of ecclesiastics of certain station. The old cry of "fiddle-shape" and "violin-case" vestments will not move those devotees to French forms; and the stout old pastor would probably look as clumsy in the voluminous Gothic as in the modern chasuble, while the youthful form of the assistant is as graceful in the latter as it would be in the former. If the Holy See so ordains, priests will all exchange our aniline-dyed, fiddle-shaped vestments for modified Gothic of subdued, esthetic hue. But many will do so with heavy hearts and there will be heavy hearts, too, among their people. It is hard to part with old friends, and the modern form and the bright colors have many to love them. For, after all, as Andrew Lang, singing in "The Galleries" the charms of the two schools of art, confesses:

"You still must win the public vote,
"Philistia!"

But should the day of the decree ever come, we shall not follow the advice of one advocate of the Gothic form, to go for our new vestments to the Benedictine monastery on the "Isle of Calday near England," because the so-called Benedictines of the Isle of Calday, South Wales, are a Church of England community, and not sons of St. Benedict at all.

The Fairbanks incident is closed. His fiasco in Rome was as sad an experience for him as his cocktail scandal at home. Archbishop Ireland promptly set public opinion right on the Pope's attitude to the sectarian politician, and the further explanation of Archbishop Farley and of the Apostolic Delegate at Washington said all that could be said in the matter except perhaps what Mr. Brisbane added in the Evening Journal of February 15, that all the Italians that could be made Methodists in a thousand years in Rome would not fill a taxicab.

Bartoli has fallen flat. The newspapers do not take him seriously. The Italian press treated him as a charlatan. It was too much to expect our American reporters to warm up to the Waldensian exploit. Had he come as a Christian Scientist, an Emmanuelite, a Doukhobor, or a Holy Roller, he might have expected some attention; but the Waldenses are a trifle too long sepulchred for resurrection, and would not stand an equal chance with the cold storage foods now under legal scrutiny.

The Literary Digest has shown the cloven foot. It has permitted an unknown slanderer to defile its pages with a series of manifest and wanton falsehoods about the morality of laity and clergy in South America. A few months ago the editors sent around a cringing letter to say that some Protestants considered them too Catholic in their selection of articles. Now, we shall expect another catch-penny circular to show how impartial they are. Why do Catholics take the Digest? It is cheap and common and occasionally coarse in its choice of extracts. We have reason to know that as a rule intelligent Catholics have dropped it during the past years. A prominent Catholic firm used to advertise in its columns frequently; but since its faux pas about Joan of Arc, the returns on their advertisement fell off by 90 per cent. Now they are patronizing other mediums which employ well-bred editors who, though occasionally incorrect on subjects of interest to Catholics, are always polite, never offensive.

The Protestant Bishop of London complained in a charge to his clergy in 1866: "There are amongst us churches in which the ornaments about the Communion Table, the vestments, the attitudes and conduct of the clergy, make it difficult for any stranger to know whether he is in an Anglican or a Roman Catholic place of worship." Now the stranger's difficulty commences on the outside: the architecture, crosses and pictured windows are faithful copies of Catholic models; and when the guileless man goes in, as not infrequently happens in New York, he finds altars, crucifixes, confessionals, and such statuary as is said to have elicited the exclamation: "When did the saints turn Protestant?" To such imitators of the externals of Catholic worship, two Acts of Parliament of 1643 and 1644, cited in the current Irish Ecclesiastical Record, should prove instructive reading. These Acts ordain under heavy penalties "that all representations of any of the persons of the Trinity, or of any Angell, or Saint, in or about any Church or Chappell, or in any open place, shall be utterly demolished; and that no such shall hereafter be set up"; likewise, "that all Copes, Surplisses, superstitious Vestments, Roods, Fonts, Tapers, Candlesticks, Crucifixes, Crosses, Images, Rayls, Altars and organs shall be utterly defaced." It would greatly convenience Catholics and subserve honesty if the children of Parliament would observe the injunctions of their parent.

The first great volcanic eruption in the republic of Costa Rica during the past sixty years took place in Mount Poas, distant nineteen miles from the capital, San José. The volcano belched forth great boulders like a charge of Titanic shrapnel. Eighty lives were lost. Fears are entertained that consequent seismic disturbances may destroy or injure some part of the Panama Canal works.

LITERATURE

Southern Rhodesia. By PERCY F. HONE. London: George Bell & Sons. Price, 10s. 6d. net.

This volume, as the author's note informs us, is an attempt to record the administrative and industrial development of Southern Rhodesia since its occupation by the British South Africa Company. Southern Rhodesia is that part of the chartered company's territory lying south of the Zambesi, and is subdivided into the two regions of Mashonaland and Matabeleland. Though it is smaller in extent than the northern section of the country, it is by far the more thickly populated and settled of the two, besides being the theatre of more stirring events within the last twenty years.

The author treats of many facts and many questions, and we venture to think his book is the best, if not the only one of its kind, for providing information for intending visitors and settlers. He shows how the country has passed through various stages of wilful waste and woful want until, at length, it seems to have emerged from its prolonged schooling of bitter experience into a state of reasonable satisfaction with the present and of healthy optimism with regard to the future.

The chapters on transport make entertaining reading. At a time when there were no railways and when, owing to rinderpest, practically all the oxen had been killed off, the situation was saved by the donkeys. It may be imagined how eagerly, under such circumstances, the colonists awaited the extension of the railway. In the rainy season coaches and wagons had often to wait for days on a river bank until the waters had subsided. Yet perhaps travellers in such a predicament were better off than Xenophon and his ten thousand Greeks, who were prepared to march up to the source of a river in order to effect a passage.

Though the gold area, which extends over most of the country, has been by no means completely prospected, and though the mining industry may therefore go on developing for a long time to come, yet, as the author points out, the future of Rhodesia will ultimately depend upon its agriculture. Its maize-growing capacity is extraordinarily great, and if a remedy be found for the wheat-rust, it may eventually rival Canada as a wheat producing country.

Unlike Canada, Rhodesia is not yet a poor-man's country. Farmers, it is true, are already making comfortable profits, and a Rhodesian farmer who has known country life in Canada will not be anxious to return; but then an initial capital of £500 is rather a modest outlay for a successful agriculturist in Rhodesia.

Referring to conditions in the Rocky Mountains and in Manitoba, Mr. Hone says: "This life of stern discipline and toil, though it offers a splendid school for building up a great nation, is not attractive to those who have the capital to seek a more romantic existence, especially when this is found in a tropical country with a temperate climate, in a land abounding in wild game, where the supply of native labor enables a man to make a living free from excessive manual toil; a country, too, where there is always a chance of winning or losing a fortune, and above all, a land undeveloped, boundless in its unknown resources and possibilities . . . where history is being made, and whose whole political, industrial and commercial destiny will be shaped by its early influences."

Both the early and the still outstanding differences between the settlers and the company are explained at considerable length, and the author shows how the work of adjustment was indefinitely delayed by the death of Cecil Rhodes, whose commanding personality compelled the confidence and embodied the aspirations of both contending parties.

J. KENDAL, S.J.

Bishop de Mazenod, his inner life and virtues. By the VERY REV. FATHER EUGENE BAFFIE, O.M.I. London: R. & T. Washbourne. New York, Cincinnati, Chicago: Benziger Bros.

As the title of this book indicates, it is not a chronological record of the venerable founder of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate. Most of the remarkable events in the seventy-nine years of Bishop Mazenod's life are, indeed, to be found scattered through the twenty-one chapters on his "endeavor to be perfect," "his spirit of piety," "his love of poverty and the poor," etc.; but in order to find them one must read the whole book, as there is no alphabetical index of proper names. The original work was written in French. The present English translation is very well done by an English-speaking Oblate now living in Dublin. The introduction by the translator gives a short biography of a dozen pages which adds greatly to the value of the book. The translator remarks: "It would not be fair to say that this excellent and edifying book presents us with a holy man 'chopped up into virtues,' as Cardinal Newman observed in reference to certain Lives of the Saints. Nevertheless, it leaves room for the mention in a little space of the salient outward facts in the career of Bishop de Mazenod, or at least in his early life." Father Baffie's work is a storehouse of instruction and example not only for all religious but for all ecclesiastics as well, and for those of the laity who value an interior life. Eugene de Mazenod was in his twenty-sixth year, a handsome and popular young nobleman, when his early and continued piety developed into the resolution to study for the priesthood. "Is it true, Eugene, that you wish to be a priest?" said his grand-uncle to him one day in 1802. "Certainly, uncle," replied the boy. "What!" said the venerable ecclesiastic, who had been the Vicar-General of Mgr. de Belsunce, Bishop of Marseilles. "How can you think of such a thing? Don't you know you are the last of our family? Is our name to die out?" Eugene answered as quick as thought: "Uncle, don't you think it would be a great honor for our family to end by a priest?"

One distinctive merit of this anecdotic and interesting inner life of a great priest, an exemplary bishop, and a wise and practical founder of a religious congregation which is doing noble missionary work, is that the narrative is thoroughly human. The author does not hide, nor even minimize, the defects of Bishop de Mazenod. He admits that he was quick-tempered, impulsive, and apparently, though not really, autocratic.

Charlotte Grace O'Brien: Selections with a Memoir. By STEPHEN GWYNN. Dublin: Maunsell & Co. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Gwynn apologizes unnecessarily for the imperfections of his work. His frankness in disclosing the domestic deficiencies of his grandfather, William Smith O'Brien, is excessive, and, we think, misleading, but the same quality enables him to give a full and charming picture of the patriot's daughter. It was said of the father that he was too much Smith, too little O'Brien; in the daughter O'Brien predominated. Original, independent, impetuous and altogether lovable, she held and ardently advocated views at variance with those of her family and class without ever losing a friend; while by identifying herself with the people and their interests—she was a Land Leaguer, a Parnellite, and even a Separatist—she won a devotion that had not been extended to her family since her ancestor, the Tanist of Thomond, bartered his Faith for English favor. Her personal characteristics, revealed on every page of her correspondence and in her nephew's deft delineations, will win the heart of the reader. She loved horses, dogs, flowers, children and the open air, and traversed the country in a pony cart, canopied by an aged umbrella, which she slit in front and thus converted into "a tent, window, and window-frame," through which she surveyed the ever-varying and, to her, unmatched beauties of Irish scenery. Her unconventional ways and her warm sympathies constantly led her into adventures that make delightful reading, but she was much more than an eccentric woman. "She was the lifelong champion, friend and servant of the poor." She had been influenced as a child by Paddy Keily, her father's man-of-all-work, who worked discreetly, but taught her by nature stories and fairy legend "to see and think and feel more successfully than any other teacher of her childhood." She grew up with "a passionate love for her country and her race and a sense of kinship with its poorest people."

This found expression in a way that brought her name prominently before the American public. Finding, in 1881, the arrangements of a Queenstown liner for emigrant girls lacking in decency, she at once "tumbled into the fight" to reform the steerage system of the entire passenger service, and never flagged till she had bent Parliament and the ship companies to her will. Her interest in emigrant girls brought her to the United States, where the then Bishop Ireland, Boyle O'Reilly and Cardinal McCloskey greatly aided her, and she made friends everywhere. It was partly at her initiative that Father John J. Riordan was appointed chaplain of Castle Garden and the Mission of the Rosary established, in 1883. Her comments on American life are frequent but flatteringly appreciative.

Her American visit strongly influenced her conversion, a few years later, to the faith of her ancestors. "In America the great witness for Christian moral life as against divorce is the Catholic Church, and here in Ireland, where faith is a living power, morality is strongest. . . . I went into convent after convent and saw the saintly faces; everywhere I saw the intense reality of Catholic faith, of laymen and priests, shown in self-denial and works for God and man. . . . Worship in their churches is so devotional it makes the spiritual exercises of Protestant congregations seem hardly worship at all." It was the sight of the Foynes villagers praying at the deathbed of a child that finally determined her to examine the grounds of faith. Aubrey de Vere lent her books and Father Russell, S.J., received her into the Church. Thereafter, though her interest in the Irish language, industrial and political movements continued, her religion was the absorbing element of her life.

Her poems show true poetic power, if occasional contempt of technique, but the prose selections have all her own originality and charm. Her "Catholic Letter" to Standish O'Grady attains sublimity; though it thrills with Catholic feeling her Protestant nephew finds in it "the true accent of greatness." Its burden is that, by their fidelity to their religion and its duties, the Irish have attained the fulness of the Beatitudes: "'Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.' Stand at a Catholic death-bed in Ireland. 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.' Go abroad into the nations and see the children of God—monks and nuns, priests and laypeople—conquering the earth for Christ. 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' Who ever really knew our people who had not first 'seen God'?"

The reader of this exquisite book will not wonder at Boyle O'Reilly's tribute to its subject: "I admire and esteem her almost above anyone I have ever known." M. K.

La France de Louis XIII, par NOËL AYMÈS. Paris: Nouvelle Librairie Nationale.

This is a volume of a series, "Les Idées Claires," edited by its author. As a study of a period, it glances at everything that went to make up the period: the Protestant political organization, a state within the state, the nobility, the army, the bourgeoisie, the clergy, the people of the country and town, the administration of justice, the financial system, literature, art, manners, the Thirty Years' War, trade and the colonies, and Richelieu. If it gives only a glance at so many of them, it is because in a small book of 331 pages anything more is impossible. In great measure, however, it is an apology for Richelieu. Catholics generally look askance at his policy during the Thirty Years' War, holding it rather scandalous in the Minister of France to have supported the Protestants. The author endeavors to show that Richelieu's policy was not only the best for the temporal greatness of his country, which could rise to the first place only on the ruins of the Hapsburgs, but also for its spiritual restoration. To have supported the Catholic side in Germany would have thrown the Huguenots into the arms of the Protestants as enemies of France. To support the Protestants, on the contrary, attached them to the crown, and therefore prevented an intimate association with their coreligionists, whence became possible their extinction and Catholic unity on one side of the Rhine and religious divisions on the other. The theory, if not altogether convincing, is worth considering. The author's sneering tone in speaking of the annulling of the marriage of Henry IV with Margaret of Valois, to which he gives eight lines, are unworthy of him and the general tone of his work. His account of the childhood and education of Louis XIII is sympathetic, and moves the reader to pity. English readers will be astonished at seeing an entire chapter of fifty pages given to Corneille, or rather to an analysis of his chief works. An English writer on the Elizabethan period would never dream of presenting to educated readers a literary analysis of "Hamlet," "King Lear" and "Macbeth." Can it be that educated Frenchmen to-day do not know their great dramatist? The chapter on Descartes is unsatisfactory; it attempts too much and says too little. But on the whole, the book is an interesting and useful one to the student of history, opening up views, often original, which he may follow up leisurely in his own way and at his own time. It contains a good bibliography.

The Education of the Will. By JULES PAYOT, Litt. Ph.D. Translated by SMITH ELY JELLIFFE, M.D., Ph.D.

The author considers his subject under two aspects; the Theoretical and the Practical: and divides his book accordingly into two sections. I. The Theoretical.—It is much to be regretted that M. Payot's use of technical terms is decidedly loose, so loose, in fact, that even a careful examination fails to reveal what precisely the author holds with regard to the very theme of his book. Nowhere does he define "education," "will," "man," or "soul;" his nearest approach to a definition being a somewhat vague description of these entities. This is all the more regrettable considering that the tone of the book is rather polemical; and M. Payot's language lets us know neither our opponents, nor the weapons with which we are contending against them.

It would appear, however, that M. Payot's views, when stripped of much verbiage, may readily be reconciled with the tenets of Scholastic Philosophy regarding the nature and function of the Will, though several passages might be alleged which at first sight would seem to contain principles somewhat heterodox. It may be that the influence said to be exercised upon the will by the passions and by certain pathological states are somewhat exaggerated; still, the author seems to hold, first, that there is such a soul-faculty as the will, and secondly, that in its operation this faculty is free. He speaks of himself as a "determinist" of a mild type, when condemning the theory of an antecedently determined will as enunciated by Kant, Schopenhauer and Spencer; but by "determinism" he seems to mean simply that the will must embrace its object sub ratione boni; and he explicitly denies that will is antecedently determined "ad unum prae aliis."

While M. Payot's theory may be explained into orthodoxy, still as a clear and connected statement of the Philosophy of the Will, this part of the book is by no means to be commended.

II. The Practical.—In his treatment of this aspect of the subject, M. Payot displays to advantage the qualities of clearness and conciseness so lamentably wanting in his discussion of the Theory. The result is an essay of considerable value. This second section might well be called "On the natural means of preserving chastity." Chastity, he looks upon as synonymous with mastery of self, the proof of true manhood, the triumph of will-power and the highest perfection to which the education of the will can be carried. "The Church is right in considering chastity as the supreme guarantee of the energy of the will—an energy which in turn guarantees for the priest the possibility of all other sacrifices."

M. Payot may or may not be a Catholic; but his description of the temptations and dangers which assail the ordinary young man, and of the means to be used in overcoming and avoiding them, are fully in keeping with the spirit of the Church. However, there is one rift in the lute: when detailing the methods of strengthening the will against vice, M. Payot leaves the supernatural quite out of the reckoning. Still, it may be urged, that since M. Payot is dealing ex professo only with the natural means of educating the will, the supernatural does not fall within the compass of his argument.

Two remarks in this second section call for criticism. The first occurs on p. 303, and involves a direct contradiction of the author's main contention. Again, on p. 335, we are confronted with the startling information that it is hardly possible to observe chastity with absolute success. Still, when one remembers that the writer has rejected religion and the supernatural as necessary aids to morality, his confession of human helplessness is doubtless sincere and, from his point of view, truthful.

The Confessions of Saint Augustine, Bishop of Hippo. As Translated out of the Original Latin by EDWARD BOUVERIE PUSEY, D.D., and edited by TEMPLE SCOTT, with an Introduction by ALICE MEYNELL. London: Chatto & Windus.

Thackeray wrote that "even dull autobiographies are pleasant to read." We are all very curious about one another, and it is strange that we are, because our curiosity ordinarily has very little to feed on. The common intercourse of life is a mask rather than a revelation of intimate spiritual experiences, and one can always yield to a prudent hesitancy before committing himself to the statement that he knows even his closest friend.

Therefore, anything that a man tells us about himself in a deliberately undertaken self-confession is apt to prove of interest. When the man is an intellectual genius and, as in the case of Saint Augustine, combines unusual force of character with more than poetical ideals of human life and conduct, this withdrawing of the veil from the innermost secrets of his heart is more than a mere individual act; it is an epoch in the history of our race. For this reason the Confessions will always be a book of interest. Mrs. Meynell, in her introduction, calls attention to the sincerity of Saint Augustine and of all great men. It is a good point to make in regard to the Confessions; and, if the present reprint will do anything towards introducing more sincerity into the religious atmosphere of an age that confuses hygiene and social economy with religious spirit and obligation, we welcome it with enthusiasm. The book has been artistically prepared. The paper, letter-press and binding make it also a book for frequent use and not for mere display. The illustrations by Maxwell Armfield are delicate color-schemes, but are more decorative than illustrative.

Father Finn's stories present a remarkable instance of enduring popularity. It is some years since Father Finn retired from authorship under the stress of parochial duties. But the annual novel, so essential in ordinary cases to keep an author's name alive and his early books on the market, has not been necessary in the case of the author of "Tom Playfair," who writes that the sale of his books was larger during the past year than in former years.

Reviews and Magazines

The veteran journalist, Francis E. Leupp, writes in the current Atlantic on "The Waning Power of the Press," and gives the following list of causes for the phenomenon noted in his title: "The transfer of both properties and policies from personal to impersonal control; the rise of the cheap magazine; the tendency to specialization in all forms of public instruction; the fierceness of competition in the newspaper business; the demand for large capital, unsettling the former equipoise between counting-room and editorial room; the invasion of newspaper offices by the universal mania of hurry; the development of the news-getting at the expense of the news-interpreting function; the tendency to remold narratives of fact so as to confirm office-made policies; the growing disregard of decency in the choice of news to be specially exploited; and the scant time now spared by men of the world for reading journals of general intelligence." It is interesting to learn that Mr. Leupp believes strongly in a general desire on the part of the public for signed articles. In "La Maestra" Caroline Matthews writes engagingly about a school-teacher's life in Asolo; here, according to her, Church and State seem to hit it off together with remarkable success in the field of elementary education. Raymond M. Alden has an article contrasting recent literature with the old in the changed attitude towards "poetic justice." We suppose it is weakness, rather than lack of judgment which deters him from arriving at certain obvious conclusions. Katherine Tynan has a poem, "Lavender," in the prettiest neo-Celtic manner.

The February Review of Reviews contains the lament of a minister over the remarkable decrease in candidates to the Protestant ministry, instancing particularly the Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian and Episcopal Churches. In the universities law, medicine and dentistry completely outdistance theology, Yale, Harvard, Princeton and Columbia having less than two and one-half per cent. of church candidates. The reasons he assigns are significant. The first is that race suicide prevails in the source of supply. "In the class in which the larger part of the membership of the church is to be found there is a shocking and alarming decrease in the number of children springing therefrom. The decreased number of children in the church of the rich and the cultured (the Episcopal) is an obvious fact. The Presbyterian and Congregational churches . . . have the same melancholy tale to tell." And the pastors are little better than the flock, for "even the ministry itself partakes of the tendency," the average in his own convocation being two children to a family, though he, by exception, had contributed six to swell the percentage. Other reasons for lack of candidates are continual splitting up of churches and "confusion of doctrinal standards." What is "insisted on to-day may be witnessed indifferently to-morrow, disregarded the day after, denied the next week, and laughed out of court at the end of the month." The writer attributes to "many high in the church" indifference to creed, treachery to solemn obligations, weakness in dealing with violators and "juggling," "chicanery" and "casuistry" in "paltering with statements which meant one simple thing when they were enunciated." The candidate asks with Pilate. "What is Truth?" but finds no wisdom "in the multitude of counsellors," who either have no "standards of belief" or have not "any power of maintaining them." They will have to accommodate their views to "the village tyrant and the urban ecclesiastical despot," a difficult task when, as often happens, these two are in conflict. In fine, this Protestant clergyman, unconsciously no doubt, accounts for the decrease of ministers in Protestant Churches by showing that these churches are truly Protestant.

The English Fortnightly for February rings loud with the clash of arms in the political battle waged during January. It contains no fewer than seven papers on questions likely to form subjects of debate in the next Parliament. In the article on "English and American Elections" we are surprised to find Sydney Brooks confessing that Americans show greater moderation of action and temperament in political campaigns than Englishmen. Mr. Brooks is inclined to see some justice in the harsh criticism that, in the conduct of political campaigns in their own country the English "are a nation of rowdies." Among the literary articles is one on Francis Thompson, by Katherine Tynan, in which nothing new about the poet appears, either in criticism or in biographical information. Francis Gribble has a sound and striking article on Victor Hugo, in the course of which he discusses the question "whether Victor Hugo was a great man or a great windbag," and arrives at the conclusion that he was the latter. The writer draws a convincing picture of the blatant Frenchman, posing as a noble and disinterested public preacher of morality and fine sentiment, and living meanwhile a private life governed by barnyard ideals, which, in his own case, he had the hardihood to defend in a spirit of sublime conceit.

Milan recently celebrated the three hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the great Ambrosian Library by its founder, St. Charles Borromeo. It was a library of 30,000 volumes in his time, which seems a small number beside the 250,000 volumes of to-day. His collection of codices and palimpsests was a remarkable one. "He had agents, friends and assistants in all parts of the world," says The Athenæum, "who were on the lookout for treasures to enrich the collection. These, once deposited in the Ambrosiana, were guarded with the utmost vigilance, as is proved by the inscription on the black marble tablet still existing in the vestibule which forbids the removal of any book from the library under pain of excommunication. Of equal importance with the collection of books and MSS. were the works of art brought together by the Cardinal, and among those which he prized most highly were Raphael's cartoon for the fresco of 'The School of Athens,' in the Vatican; the Madonna and Child with St. Anne and the little St. John—a composition founded in part upon Leonardo's cartoon (now in the Diploma Gallery at Burlington House), Luini in his picture having added the figure of St. Joseph; and the beautiful portrait of a woman in profile which modern criticism no longer regards as by Leonardo, but assigns to Ambrogio de Predis. Many other pictures were acquired by the Cardinal for the Ambrosiana, and the collections have gone on increasing since his day. A number of new rooms have now been opened, among them one containing a celebrated fresco by Luini, well known to connoisseurs, but hitherto not always accessible."

"The minister of a Boston church," says the Boston Evening Transcript, "recently reported that he had four hundred families in his parish and an average Sunday morning congregation of fifty people. . . . Another minister with two hundred and thirty-five families reports an attendance of almost three hundred, and another with seven hundred and fifty families under his care seldom faces six hundred people at any one service. . . . A church could be mentioned that reports about a thousand members and a morning congregation of about five hundred. This discrepancy is due to a misleading church roll. It contains the names of several hundred church members who have moved away or disappeared, but whose names are still kept on the roll and reported. Another church has an attendance nearly three times its church membership. This is due to the fact that it appeals to the floating population which refuses to identify itself with the church, though attending the services when inclination and convenience encourage. Sometimes a difference like this is due to a lack of spiritual vitality and of the earnestness which leads to church membership."

What is true of the Protestant churches in Boston is doubtless equally true of all the big cities in the land. It is a proof that Protestantism is fast losing its hold on the one-time church goer. Incidentally it shows how unreliable are Protestant church statistics.

The annual meeting of the United States Catholic Historical Society took place at the Catholic Club, New York, on February 9. The meeting was called for the election of officers and the general transaction of business. The following ticket was presented by the Executive Council and elected for the coming year: President, Charles G. Herbermann, Ph.D., LL.D.; Vice-President, Stephen Farrelly; Treasurer, Richard S. Treacy; Recording Secretary, John E. Cahalan; Corresponding Secretary, Joseph H. Fargis; Librarian, Rev. M. J. Considine; Trustees, Rt. Rev. Mgr. Joseph F. Mooney, V.G.; Rt. Rev. Mgr. James H. McGean; Henry Heide; Thomas S. O'Brien, LL.D.; Thomas F. Woodlock, LL.D., Peter Condon and Thomas F. Meehan; Councillors, Hon. Edward B. Amend, LL.D.; Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J.; Rev. Joseph F. Delany, D.D.; Edward J. Maguire and Andrew J. Shipman.

The "Catholic Who's Who" informs us that Father Russell has been editor of the Irish Monthly since 1873, and that Father Hudson began to edit the Ave Maria in 1875. The careers of these two veteran editors have been remarkable in other respects besides length of years. Perhaps no other living editor has done more than either of these men for the encouragement of Catholic writers and the improvement of Catholic literature.

For the relief of the victims of the earthquake disaster in Italy the Pope received and dispensed the sum of $1,400,000. An illustrated report showing how this relief fund was distributed has been issued from the Vatican, the English translation of which has been prepared by Dom Gasquet.

EDUCATION

Shortly after the breaking of the storm which followed the now famous address of Bishop McFaul, delivered at the commencement exercises of the College of St. Francis Xavier, New York, last June, the Chicago Citizen published an editorial on the stand taken by the Bishop of Trenton. The writer closed a strong defence of Mgr. McFaul's position with these words: "If Bishop McFaul had roused the people of the United States to the dangerous imposition that is being practised upon them by the toleration of these teachers of agnosticism in our public and denominational schools, he has but done his duty as a consecrated sentinel on the watchtower to warn us of the approach of the enemy. It lies with us Christians, Catholic and Protestant, to meet that enemy and defeat him." Action taken by the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance, in session in Chicago last week, is evidence that the spirit prompting the warning rules other than Catholic leaders. The following resolutions, urging an investigation of the public schools and state universities, with a view to determining their influence in religious teaching, were adopted: "We suggest to the churches here represented that they give careful attention to the intermediate schools, both public and private, in which so many of their children are under influences which at this age are bound to be potent and permanent.

"That the churches shall strive with unremitting zeal to strengthen their own colleges and to make them educational places fully equal to the institutions supported by the state; for Christian parents often choose to send their children where they believe there are higher educational standards coupled with a doubtful religious atmosphere, rather than where there is a good evangelical spirit but indifferent educational requirements.

"That the churches owe it to themselves to study conditions at the state universities and as speedily as possible to take such steps as may seem expedient and wise to them and to bring into these schools the influences of the evangelical faith and always in the most tactful and conciliatory spirit."

Still another resolution calls for the churches to cooperate in seeing that the great foundation truths of Christianity are sustained in these schools.

An announcement made in the Fifth Annual Report (1909) of the Education Department of the State of New York will be received with gratification by students of educational methods. The present syllabus of work covering the eight years' course hitherto followed in the elementary schools will expire, according to agreement at the time of its adoption, with the school year ending July 31, 1910, and it has been determined that the syllabus which succeeds the present one shall cover a period of six years instead of eight. The change will be effected mainly through the elimination of all the non-essentials of the present eight-year course, and will be in line with the contention of experienced educators, who have insisted all along that the elementary course was unnecessarily protracted because of the introduction into its grades of work belonging to secondary schools or immediately preparing for these schools. Hereafter the instruction to be imparted in the elementary classes will be measured by what is generally conceded to be the proper training which pupils up to and including the sixth year should receive, irrespective of the course of study such pupils shall pursue thereafter. In other words, the officials in charge of the public schools of New York make practical admission that no small part of the obligatory work hitherto mapped out for children in the eight grades of elementary schools may be dropped without detriment to the interests of the children. That part of the work of the present seventh and eighth grades which is really essential in elementary school training can very readily find place in the revised six-year syllabus once the unnecessary features shall have been eliminated. The change simply means a reverting to the saner methods of earlier days, and when one recalls the fact that in the great State of New York little over one half (54.6) of the pupils beginning the first grade are found on the average to continue through the sixth grade, any arrangement which will assure completeness of elementary work within the specified years will be accounted a desirable change in school programs.

An exhaustive report on the physical condition of the children of the public schools of New York City has been presented to the Board of Education. The report is based upon examinations of pupils made by physicians assigned by the Board of Health to duty in the public schools. About one-half of the total number of children registered in the schools of New York last year were examined, and it is claimed that fully three-fourths of this number needed medical or surgical treatment. Physical defects embracing nearly everything on the calendar of human ailments were found to exist, and defects of vision, of nasal breathing and of hearing were especially noteworthy. Dr. Maxwell, city superintendent of schools, presenting the report, made the claim that physical defects, disease and malnutrition explain the slow educational progress of children, and are to a large extent the cause of the many laggards in the public schools. He asks that the Board of Education employ a corps of physicians and of nurses to look after the pupils, and he further insists that these physicians should have authority to compel negligent or unthinking parents to take better care of the proper physical condition of their children.

The Minister of Education of the German Empire has issued an order which will effect a marked change in the policy hitherto prevailing in the public schools. Hereafter forty-five minutes is to be the maximum time for a subject, and six subjects will be treated during the school day. The shortened hours at school will be made up in home study voluntarily assumed by the pupils. The ministerial order directs that as little homework as possible of an imposed nature is to be required from pupils. "The child derives more benefit," the new regulation explains, "from its play and from the study which it does spontaneously than it does from grinding outside of the class-room over imposed tasks. Self-imposed mental work is of the greatest benefit to the school child, and the attainment of this is possible only when the child has several hours daily of absolute leisure."

The annual report of Andrew S. Draper, Commissioner of Education, gives the school attendance of New York State last year as 1,840,909, an army of pupils greater than the population of Minnesota or Alabama. This includes 1,284,729 children in the common elementary schools, 101,983 in the common high schools, 6,494 in normal schools, 36,287 in universities, colleges and professional schools; 42,802 in academies, 225,000 in other private schools of all grades, and 132,410 in night schools. There are 50,788 teachers in charge of these students, of which number 37,152 are in the common elementary schools.

At the end of 1909 there were 52,407 students at German Universities, of whom 1850 were women. In 1908 the number was 48,730, and ten years ago it was 32,800. There are also 3,314 men and 1,923 women attending courses as guests by permission of the university authorities. Berlin has the largest number of students, 9,242. Munich has 6,537; Leipsic, 4,761; Bonn, 3,652. There are 632 women at the University of Berlin, of whom 476 are in philosophy, 147 in medicine, 6 in law, and 3 in theology.

Shortly before resigning, Premier Moret of Spain, explaining the recent decree reopening those schools which had been closed in Barcelona following the rioting of last summer, distinguishes "free schools" and "Ferrer schools." The former term, used in the decree, covers those schools in which religion was not taught, and does not, he claims, touch the legality of "Ferrer schools." Since it is contended that these latter violate the law against the propagation of anti-military doctrines, the legality of their existence must be first decided by the courts.

ECONOMICS

Some persons of experience, among them Mr. Hill of the Northern Pacific Railway, account for the increase of prices of food by the decrease in production. The growth of cities means an increase of consumers which is not compensated for by a corresponding increase of producers on the land. Moreover, production is no longer so easy. The cattle-ranges are becoming more restricted every day and the fields are losing some of their native fertility. This theory has some support in the report of the Department of Commerce and Labor, which tells us that the receipts of live stock at seven leading interior markets were less in 1909 than in any year since 1904, and the same is true of receipts at the principal Atlantic cities. The receipts of grain show a like falling off. There is, nevertheless, a satisfactory side to all this. It is very possible, as AMERICA pointed out some time ago, that the revival of profitable agriculture will be the solution of many economic and social problems.

The chairman of the Cardiff Chamber of Commerce congratulated his associates on the fact that the export of coal from Cardiff last year was the largest on record, surpassing that of 1907 by 176,000 tons. More than fifty years ago Lord Derby warned the Manchester school against excessive exportation of coal. Some in England are beginning to see that there was some wisdom in the statesman of the old type. It will not be very long before they will be confessing that on this point Lord Derby was right.

The average price of wheat in England last year was 36 s. 11d. a quarter. In 1908 it was 32s. In January, 1909, it opened at this price and rose steadily to 44s. 9d. in August. It then fell rapidly to 31s. 4d. in the middle of October, and on December 31 stood at 33s. 1d.

The reciprocity treaty between France and Canada was promulgated in Paris on February 13.

Bishop McFaul of Trenton has withdrawn his application for a permit to establish a tuberculosis sanatorium on a farm he owns at Hopewell, N. J., because of local opposition. He will seek a site elsewhere.

SOCIOLOGY

The City Improvement League of Montreal has issued a report of its first convention. Some of the objects it proposes to attain are unexceptionable. Montreal must have good water, and, as far as this is possible under modern conditions, an honest government. Others excite our suspicions. Juvenile courts, compulsory education, the housing of the poor are excellent in themselves, but unfortunately they give scope to the activities of faddists; and ecclesiastical superiors, especially pastors, must be wide awake to keep these people in their place, else they will find themselves elbowed out of the way, and will see verified: "while men slept the enemy came and oversowed cockle." Social works undertaken apart from ecclesiastical supervision too often exalt the temporal above the eternal, and benefit the body at the expense of the soul, and separate the faithful from their pastors. But there is worse behind. Let us turn to the report. Professor Carrie Derick spoke on the reduction of infant mortality, and the improvement of the race by ensuring the best possible parentage. We are not told what she said, but the editor, Mr. J. A. Dale, gives us in nearly half a page of footnote his ideas on the subject, which probably do not differ very much from those of the lady. He says that for the whole of Montreal one child in 3.85 died in its first year during 1908. He admits that these figures may be exaggerated, since births are not so exactly recorded as deaths, but then comes his comment: "The figures represent a terrible waste of life and labor, not to mention the useless burden of pain and sorrow. To reduce the birth-rate is to reduce the death-rate, and so doubly blest. What is the use of a high birth-rate if its condition be a high death-rate?" (page 29.) Catholic mothers hold that to be born and baptized is a good compared with which the duration of mortal life is insignificant, for it means eternal life in heaven. Of course, all wish to see infant mortality reduced as far as possible; but we do not want to see male and female professors of eugenics corrupting the morals of the Catholic Canadian women, and we are sure the clergy of Montreal will know how to silence them.

Under the direction of the Rev. W. B. Martin the Institute of Scientific Study has been carried on for several months at Cathedral College, with an average attendance of more than a thousand earnest students attending the various lectures. A series of discourses on social reform, and to indicate the attitude of the Church on Socialism, began on Wednesday evening, February 16, Archbishop Farley presiding, the speaker being the Rev. Dr. W. J.

Kerby, of the Catholic University, who had for his subject "Private Property and Socialism."

Mr. Charles D. Neill, Commissioner of Labor, will be the lecturer on February 23, and will speak on "Organized Labor." The subjects of the subsequent lectures and the speakers are: March 2, the Rev. Dr. Patrick J. Healy, of the Catholic University, "Christian Brotherhood;" March 9, Mr. John Mitchell, President of the National Civic Federation, "Recent Efforts for Industrial Peace;" March 16, the Rev. Dr. Francis P. Duffy, of St. Joseph's Seminary, "The Social Value of Christianity;" March 30, Dr. James J. Walsh, dean of the Medical Department of Fordham University, "What the Twentieth Century Might Learn from the Thirteenth;" April 6, the Rev. John J. Burke, C.S.P., editor of the Catholic World, "Publicity as an Agent in Social Reform;" April 13, Judge Martin I. Keogh, "Limitations of Reform by Law," and April 20, Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock, "The Obligations of Catholic Citizenship." These lectures are free and are given to men exclusively.

The American Guild of St. Luke, the society of Catholic physicians recently organized in this city for the promotion of sound medical ethics, will hold its second meeting at Cathedral College, on the evening of February 16, at 8.30 o'clock. Dr. Charles E. Nammack will then lecture on "The Relation of the Doctor to the Church." It is the purpose of the League to develop in all convenient directions the study among the profession of the ethical, moral and historical facts connected with the practice of medicine.

SCIENCE

In reference to the investigation undertaken by some astronomers as to the transparency of space, of which mention was made in AMERICA of May 8, 1909, E. E. Barnard, of the Yerkes Observatory, in the January number of the Astrophysical Journal, discusses some of his exquisite photographs of regions of the Milky Way, and calls attention to the dark lanes and black holes that are so very conspicuous in some of the pictures. He says:

"If these dark spaces of the sky are due to absorbing matter between us and the stars—and I must confess that their looks tempt one to this belief—such matter must, in many cases, be perfectly opaque, for in certain parts of the sky the stars are apparently entirely blotted out. It is hard to believe in the existence of such matter on such a tremendous scale as is implied by the photographs. As to its nature, if it does exist, it must in some way be related to the nebulae, for we find them in most cases to be intimately connected. Is it an ultimate condition of nebulous matter, or is it something wholly different from the ordinary nebulosity of the sky? . . .

"While at the Lick Observatory, I once showed a plate of this region to Professor Tucker, who had such a large part in the making of the "Cordoba Durchmusterung." He said that this picture made clear an experience in his observing work at Cordoba that had always been a puzzle to him. One night he had set his telescope in the region a little north of Antares and prepared to record the transits of stars as they passed through the field. Presently no stars came into the field of his telescope. After watching for some time he finally concluded that the sky had clouded over, but on looking out he found it perfectly clear. He returned and watched a long time before any stars appeared. His telescope had been pointed to this lane and nothing but blank sky had passed."

PERSONAL

Last week Mgr. Henry A. Brann, Rector of St. Agnes' Church in New York City, was received in private audience by the Pope. Mgr. Brann was the first student of the American College in Rome to be raised to priestly orders. His present visit to Rome is his first since he entered the holy city as a student, now more than fifty years ago. Early last December Mgr. Brann had enjoyed the privilege of private audience with His Holiness, and this second visit was sought in order that he might thank the Holy Father for his elevation to the dignity of Domestic Prelate. Mgr. Brann presented to the Pope copies of the several books he has written.

Mr. James Flaherty, of Philadelphia, Supreme Knight of the Knights of Columbus, and Mr. T. J. McLaughlin, of Newark, National Warden, recently visited Panama to initiate a class of sixty into the Panama Council. Returning by New Orleans, they were entertained by Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Blenk and the New Orleans Councils. At the request of Archbishop Blenk, Mr. Flaherty promised to take immediate steps to introduce the Order in Porto Rico. He is to return to Louisiana in a few weeks to visit all the Councils of the State.

We are happy to learn that the illness of Archbishop Messmer of Milwaukee is not so serious as reported. His Grace has been suffering from a severe attack of bronchial trouble and neuralgia but is rapidly recovering. He hopes to resume work within a short time.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

On January 26 the Sacred Consistorial Congregation issued an important Instruction to all bishops in communion with the Holy See on their periodical visits to the Tomb of Peter and the reports of their dioceses which they are to bring. It has been arranged that in 1911 the bishops of Italy and the adjacent islands will pay their official visit; in 1912, those of Spain, France, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, England, Scotland and Ireland will come; 1913 is for the other European bishops; 1914 is for all American bishops, and in 1915 the remaining members of the hierarchy will appear. In 1916 the Italian bishops are to pay another visit, and so on through the list. But to bishops outside of Europe a visit every ten years will be permitted.

The Instruction consists of six canons containing sixteen paragraphs and a seventh canon which adverts to the Tridentine rule of making the pastoral visitation every year or two. It is thought that the Instruction will be embodied in the new codification of the Canon Law. As an appendix there is a detailed Interrogatory, which consists of one hundred and fifty heads on all that concerns the spiritual and temporal welfare of their dioceses. It is to serve the bishops as the model of their quinquennial report. This Instruction abrogates the practice established by Pope Sixtus V in 1585, and other enactments in 1673 and 1740.

Like the official Bulletin of the Holy See (Acta Apostolicæ Sedis), the Gerarchia Ecclesiastica, a sort of Vatican "Almanach de Gotha," is now in the hands of the Benedictines, who intend to perfect this most important publication. They have sent a circular letter to all the members of the hierarchy, with a request for certain diocesan and personal details which will be introduced into the volume.

It is announced by cable from Rome that the Pope has transferred the Right Rev. Denis O'Donaghue, titular Bishop of Pomario and auxiliary of Indianapolis, to the vacant See of Louisville, Ky., and appointed the Rev. John W. Shaw, now secretary and Chancellor of Bishop Allen, of Mobile, Ala., to be coadjutor to Bishop Forest, of San Antonio, Texas.

Bishop O'Donaghue was born in Daviess County, Indiana, November 30, 1848, and received his early education at St. Meinrad's College and St. Thomas' Seminary, Bardstown, Ky. His theological course was made at the Grand Seminary, Montreal, and he was ordained priest September 6, 1874. He was Chancellor of the Diocese of Vincennes for twenty-one years, and has been rector of St. Patrick's Church, Indianapolis, since 1887. He was consecrated Bishop of Pomario, April 25, 1900.

Father Shaw was born in Mobile, Ala., in 1863, and was sent with his brother to make his studies at Navan, County Meath, Ireland, whence he went to Rome, where he spent six years at the American College. He was ordained there May 21, 1885, and returning to Alabama, went to work at once on the missions near Montgomery. Later he was appointed rector of Mobile Cathedral and was chancellor of the diocese for the past sixteen years.

The vice-rector of the American College, Rev. Father O'Hern, when he sailed for Rome last Saturday, took with him by request of Archbishop Farley, for Pope Pius X, the first medal struck to commemorate the centenary of the founding of the Diocese of New York. The medal is of American gold, three inches in diameter, and weighs eight ounces. It is enclosed in a case of white kidskin, lined with yellow moire silk. On the front cover is stamped in gold the coat of arms of Pius X and on the back cover the arms of Archbishop Farley. Inside the case is an inscription in Latin, which translated reads: "To commemorate the centenary celebration of the founding of the Diocese of New York, 1808-1908." The case holder is enclosed in a white leather purse, shaped like an envelope. A second centenary medal, in silver, and enclosed in a scarlet leather case, was sent to Cardinal Merry del Val, Papal Secretary of State, and a third medal, in bronze, was sent to the American College in Rome.

The Church of England rectors of Thames-side parishes bordering on the course over which the University boat-race is rowed have protested against the date set for this event, Wednesday in Holy Week. The young gentlemen in charge explain why they are not able to fall in with the views of the clergymen, giving reasons which, they say, satisfied the Bishop of London. Lest the clergy should think too hardly of them, they undertake to abstain from the usual boat-race dinner and general celebration to which the night is devoted. How much better it would have been had the clergymen with their bishop humbly petitioned the young gentlemen.

Rev. John A. Ferry, of the diocese of Brooklyn, who has been chaplain of the Tenth Infantry of the regular army since 1903, has been selected by the War Department to carry out a recent order of the Secretary of War, which directs all newly-appointed chaplains to be placed under the tutelage of an experienced chaplain, who is required to give the new appointee daily instruction for a period ranging from three to six months.

The Church of Our Lady of the Blessed Sacrament was dedicated with imposing ceremonies in Philadelphia on February 6. The church is for the use of the colored Catholics of the city. Besides members of the local clergy many visiting priests honored the occasion with their presence. After the Mass Archbishop Ryan gave the episcopal blessing and made a short address. The sermon on the occasion was delivered by the Very Rev. John T. Murphy, Provincial of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost.

Rev. J. R. Heffernan, O.P., has been elected Prior of the Dominican Convent of St. Antoninus, at Newark, N. J. He was formerly Pastor of St. Peter's Church, Memphis, Tenn.

Because of the disasters of the recent floods the Archbishop of Paris has issued a special dispensation from the Lenten regulations.

By the will of the late John J. Ambrose Butler, of Buffalo, N. Y., nearly $20,000 is left to fourteen Catholic charitable institutions of Buffalo and New York.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Romeo and Juliet," Academy of Music.—The applause accorded Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern in this, the first play of their joint repertoire this season, was gratifying evidence of the public appreciation of the greatest of English dramatists, as well of the efforts of the actors who have undertaken to produce his plays upon the modern stage. Miss Marlowe has lost none of her grace and charm, though she carried the ardor of Juliet to an extreme; but her impersonation is, perhaps, the best on the English speaking stage. Romeo appears to be Mr. Sothern's favorite role, and while he rendered his lines intelligently, his characterization lacked the fire of Shakespeare's romantic wooer, who "with love's light wings did o'er perch these walls." The support on the whole was fair, but fell far short of that intelligent interpretation which Shakespeare demands even in his minor characters.

"Madame X," New Amsterdam Theatre.—To lovers of the highly colored artificial melodrama this play will no doubt appeal. It is crude in numerous ways, yet on the whole fairly effective. As a picture of vicious passion, marital infidelity, jealous rage, maternal love and devotion, it is vivid, though decidedly unpleasant. Plays of this type are essentially morbid, and their proper place is the rubbish-heap. To repeat the story here would be an unnecessary recitation of a host of repugnant and harrowing details. The situations resultant from the exaggerated incidents afford abundant opportunity for acting of the sensational type, and are well executed by the company. Miss Dorothy Donnelly gave a lifelike impersonation of the cast-off and degenerate wife. The court scene in the last act is very effective, and the climax is reached with considerable skill on the part of the actors. The various characters would do well either to adhere to the French "monsieur" or the English "mister," not first the one and then the other.

"Mid-Channel," Empire Theatre.—An ugly drama of marital unhappiness, a man and his wife, who have been married some dozen years or more, are constantly quarrelling. They finally separate, and both become unfaithful. A common friend seeks to effect a reconciliation. The husband, however, upon learning of his wife's infidelity, refuses. In the end she commits suicide. There is an attempt to inject a moral in the play. The wife bitterly declares at the end of the third act, that had she children she would have been a different woman. Her complaint is, that in their selfishness, in order that they might not be "encumbered with brats," they had in the very beginning doomed their marriage to failure and this present disaster. This homily is excellent enough in itself, but bears no logical relation to the play, at least it is not obviously developed. Apparently other causes have led to the catastrophe, and race suicide seems to be lugged in to give some sort of an excuse for the series of morbid situations which the playwright has constructed into a purely realistic drama with an Ibsenistic undertone. When will there be an end to plays of this type? The picture they give may be true to a certain morbid phase of life, but they are not true to truth. It is a mistake to suppose that because a drama depicts an actual situation in life, that therefore it is typical. "Mid-Channel" presents an exceptional and decadent phase of modern life and that without any Raison d'être. It conveys no proper lesson and leaves a distinctly bad taste in the mouth. A catastrophe or tragedy has its dramatic reason if it purges the passions. A play which merely photographs a debased phase of existence, leaving the spectator dejected and disgusted, has no higher claim than a newspaper account of some sordid story of current events.

"Where There's a Will," Weber's Theatre.—A vulgar piece of foolish theatricalism of the cheapest type, with which certain managers, by lurid and unsightly posters, have in the near past attempted to fleece the public.

"None So Blind," Hackett Theatre.—An example of a well-meant attempt by a good actor, to successfully carry a play devoid of dramatic construction and literary quality. The story and the obscure motive betray an inexperienced hand. The metaphor of the title is striking, but the playwright has so attenuated it with the commonplace that its significance is entirely lost. It is the story of a professional man so absorbed in his work, that he neglects and ignores those nearest and dearest to him, taking it for granted that their interest is equal to his own. He only awakes to his almost fatal error, when he is about to lose their affection. No doubt the play in the hands of a more experienced author could be made sufficiently effective to enable Mr. John Mason, by his clever acting, to make it worth while. Charles McDougall.

On Sunday evening, February 20, at Carnegie Hall, the Catholic Oratorio Society will produce Anton Dvorak's "Saint Ludmila," with soloists and the New York Symphony Orchestra. The oratorio is based on the conversion of Bohemia to the Catholic Faith, and is a work that has been seldom heard in this country. The Oratorio Society is composed of about one hundred and fifty professional singers and soloists, carefully selected and grouped as to quality and balance, and trained by Madame Selma Kronold, the directress, into a splendid body of musical artists. In the coming production they will be assisted in the solo parts by Miss Caroline Hudson, the New York oratorio soprano; Miss Eva Mylott, the Australian contralto; Mr. Reed Miller, tenor; and as basso, Mr. Frank Croxton, of Cornell's music department. Mr. Ewil Rey, of the Deutsches Katholischer Saengerbund, will conduct.

OBITUARY

Rev. Joseph Genier died on February 11, at Morristown, N. J., of paralysis. He was born at Grenoble, France, on March 19, 1831. He fought in the Crimean war, and afterward studied for the priesthood at Grenoble. He went later as a missionary to Algiers and his work won praise during an epidemic of cholera there. Coming to the United States he did missionary work in California and Texas, and eighteen years ago went to Morristown to assist the late Mgr. Flynn, in whose literary work he joined as translator of several books of devotion. For a number of years he also acted as chaplain of All Souls Hospital, which Mgr. Flynn established at Morristown.

Mother M. Regina Cosgrove died of heart disease, in her seventy-third year, at the Mercy Hospital, Pittsburgh, on February 1. She entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1858, and during the Civil War was engaged in caring for the sick and wounded soldiers at the Stanton Hospital, Washington, D. C. She served three times as Superior of the community in Pittsburgh. Her brother was the late Rev. James A. Cosgrove, and three of her sisters also entered the religious life.

William Bulfin, proprietor of the Southern Cross, Buenos Aires, died of pneumonia, in Birr, Ireland, February 1, after a short illness. Born in Derrinlough House, Birr, in 1862, Mr. Bulfin with several young men from his neighborhood emigrated to the Argentine Republic, some twenty years ago. Settling in Buenos Aires and its district they have prospered greatly and exercised considerable influence for Catholic betterment, largely owing to the initiative and guidance of Mr. Bulfin in the Southern Cross. Returning for a visit to Ireland in 1907, he wrote for the New York Daily News an account of his impressions in a series of breezy letters, which were after published under the title, "Rambles in Erin," and went through several editions. Mr. Bulfin was a strong advocate of the Gaelic Revival, and took his children to Ireland to be educated in the bi-lingual College of St. Enda, Dublin, where the teachers are all Gaelic speakers. He was on a visit to them when he contracted the cold that resulted in his death. For his services to the Catholic Church in Argentina he was invested by the Pope with the Order of St. Gregory. He had recently resigned the editorship of the Southern Cross to the capable hands of Mr. Gerald Foley, his fellow-townsmen, but continued to the eve of his death to contribute racy letters on Irish affairs.

Rev. James J. McGowan, senior pastor of St. Mary's Church, Fort Covington, N. Y., died in Hôtel Dieu Hospital, Kingston, Ont., January 31, in the eightieth year of his age. Father McGowan was born in the parish of Riverstown, County Sligo, Ireland, October 28, 1830. He made his preparatory studies in Mt. Melleray, Ireland. Afterwards, coming to this country, he finished his theological course in the University of Ottawa, where he was ordained in 1866. The first six years of his priestly labors was spent in Canada. In 1872 he was affiliated to the Diocese of Ogdensburg, where he since labored.

In an appreciative sketch of the late Father Michael, C.P., the New Orleans Picayune says that Father Michael was well known in that city, where thousands were swayed by his eloquence in the pulpit, and where he preached successful missions in different parishes. Wherever he preached the churches were not large enough to hold the crowds who came to listen to him. It was Father Michael who founded the first Holy Name Society, in the parish of St. Vincent de Paul, the oldest parish in New Orleans.

Brother Edmund, former professor at Calvert Hall, Baltimore, and Rock Hill College, Ellicott City, died at Allegany Hospital, Cumberland, Md., on February 12. He was a native of New York City, and at an early age entered the novitiate of the Christian Brothers. From 1886 to 1895 he was director of the Junior Normal School at Ammendale, Md. Later he became director of St. John's School, Baltimore city. For six years he was president of St. Emma's Agricultural School, Belmead, Va., afterward he was appointed principal of La Salle Institute, Cumberland.

The Rev. Stephen A. Kelly, S.J., a former president of Loyola College, Baltimore, and at one time rector of Trinity Church, Georgetown, D. C., died on Feb. 13, at St. Joseph's rectory, Willing's Alley, Philadelphia. Father Kelly was born in Dublin, Ireland, on Dec. 26, 1833, and entered the Jesuit novitiate at Frederick, Md., when a youth of sixteen years. He was ordained to the priesthood forty-five years ago. He labored principally in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and was esteemed and loved for his piety and zeal.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

I beg to express my appreciation of your kindness in sending me your valuable Review for 1910, and also for the bound volume which I received some weeks ago. AMERICA is in a field of its own. You are doing a great service to the Catholic cause and I congratulate you on the eminent success which has attended your undertaking. The bound volume of AMERICA is a veritable treasure-house of information concerning things Catholic at home and abroad. In extending my New Year's greetings I wish for AMERICA a still more prosperous year than the past and a wider circle of influence.

A. CHRISTIE,
Archbishop of Oregon City.

Your Review is a wonderful factor for the Catholic cause in America, and in the whole world. Long life to the Editors!—The Archbishop of St. Boniface, Manitoba, Canada.

I would not be without AMERICA for any price. It stands alone in a class by itself. May its usefulness be ever on the increase. —Edw. Masterson.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA546

CHRONICLE

Week in Congress.—The Administrative measures recommended to Congress seem to have made little or no headway, and it is thought doubtful if their enactment can be effected at the present session. The week was enlivened with a defensive speech from the floor of the House by Speaker Cannon, his plea being that majorities should rule and that responsibility and power should be inseparable.—A sub-committee of the House Naval Committee reported adversely the bill to promote Robert E. Peary to the rank of rear admiral on the retired list. Some members of the House may demand that, before voting a gold medal and the thanks of Congress to the explorer, the verdict of the National Geographical Society should be confirmed by other scientific bodies of the world.—Senator Lodge was appointed chairman of the Senate's special commission which will investigate the high cost of living. It is believed that a committee headed by the Senator from Massachusetts can command the confidence and respect of the public to a far more notable extent than would be the case had a Senator of less high standing been placed at its head.—The House Committee on Naval Affairs, by a unanimous vote agreed to increase the cost of dry dock No. 4, at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, to $2,500,000, so that it can accommodate the largest battleship. It will be 110 feet wide and about 700 feet long. The contractors will proceed with the work immediately on the assumption that Congress will agree to the recommendation of the Committee.—No return of indictments is expected in the Federal Grand Jury's investigation into the methods of the Chicago Beef Trust until the entire inquiry is finished. Gathering of evidence concerning the relation of the National Packing Company to the New York Butchers' Dressed Beef Association is apparently finished.

Public Lands Withdrawn.—An extensive temporary withdrawal of lands from the public domain was made by Secretary Ballinger on February 17, involving 2,068,493 acres reserved from coal entry and 127,122 acres withdrawn from all sorts of disposition. He restored 56,431 acres to settlement. The lands reserved are found in Wyoming, Montana, Colorado and Utah. These withdrawals have been made owing to data collected by the Geological Survey indicating that these lands contained valuable deposits of coal, phosphate or petroleum and will be held pending their classification and appraisalment by geologists.

Disasters at Sea.—With thirty-two men on board, the United States Navy tug Nina, which left Norfolk navy yard February 6 for Boston, has been given up as lost. The warships which for five days had been searching for the missing tug were ordered by the Navy Department to discontinue their hunt.—The Pacific Navigation Company's steamer Lima was wrecked on a reef in the Strait of Magellan; a Chilean cruiser rescued the eighty-eight persons who were on board.—Two steamers were wrecked in a storm on the Persian Gulf and 200 persons perished.—The Italian freighter, F. S. Ciampa, hailing from Castellammare, Sicily, with her crew of twenty, went down in a gale off the Irish coast.—The French coasting vessel, Madeleine, was wrecked off Bordeaux and five members of her crew perished.—The Danish steamer, Cambodia, sank near Grimstad, and sixteen of her crew are missing.—The steamer Yucatan of the Alaska Steamship Company, bound from Valdez to Seattle, was wrecked by an iceberg in Icy Strait. Her passengers and crew, sixty-five in all, reached Chichagoff Island and were afterwards rescued.

Miscellaneous.—Colonel Roosevelt and the other members of the Smithsonian African Scientific Expedition arrived at Gondokora on February 17. They have now passed through the most trying stage of their African journey and from now on will be in close touch with the outer world. Mr. Roosevelt will deliver the Romanes lecture at Oxford on May 18, which is the only engagement definitely arranged for his visit to England. Frederick G. Bonfils of Denver, representing almost every Chamber of Commerce between Kansas and the Pacific Coast, sailed from New York on February 19 on his way to Khartoum to meet Mr. Roosevelt and urge him to return to this country through Russia and the Philippines, making his entry at San Francisco. The program which will be suggested to Mr. Roosevelt will not interfere with his present engagements in Europe.—The Rhenish-Westphalian machinery works captured orders for three powerful turbines for use at the Niagara Falls power plants. Twelve other turbines have been built for Niagara by the same company. The orders were obtained in all cases in competition with leading American turbine builders.—Announcement was made that Charles M. Schwab, as president of the Bethlehem Steel Company, awarded a contract to firms in Berlin and Stettin for the erection of four hundred coke ovens at the Saucon plant of the Bethlehem Steel Company, at a cost of nearly $5,000,000. The capacity of the ovens will be 3,000 tons a day. Saucon is eight miles south of South Bethlehem.—Louis R. Glavis, former special agent of the General Land Office, acknowledged on cross-examination that he made no charge of corruption against Secretary Ballinger, Commissioner Dennett, or any official of the Government, and on further questioning before the Congressional Committee reiterated his belief that no official, except Ballinger and Dennett, had been actuated by other than wholly proper motives.

Cost of Canada's Navy.—The new naval college Canada is to build, according to the estimates presented to the Ottawa House of Commons, will be situated at Halifax and its initial cost will be $150,000. It will be provided with barracks at a cost of $200,000, and probably an Admiralty yard estimated at $100,000. Halifax will also be the headquarters for the Atlantic fleet to be composed of two Bristols, six torpedo boat destroyers, and the Niobe, all of which will cost $1,075,000. The annual cost for the maintenance of the Halifax naval station is estimated at $2,402,000. At Esquimalt, British Columbia, where two Bristols and the Rainbow will be stationed, the total annual expense will be $1,278,000.

New Brunswick Legislature.—The third session of the fifth Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick was opened in Fredericton on February 17 by the Lieutenant-Governor, attended by a large military staff. The speech from the throne, which was not so long as usual, promised the introduction of a bill to promote the speedy construction of the St. John Valley Railway, expressed gratification at the honors won by New Brunswick fruit at the London horticultural show, directed attention to the development, by the local government's assistance, of the Cuban market for potatoes, foreshadowed during the coming year a settlement of the fishery dispute with the Federal Government, and announced the introduction of a bill for the appointment of a Public Utilities Commission and another to provide pensions for teachers.

Montreal Eucharistic Congress.—A cablegram was received on the 18th inst. by Archbishop Bruchési from the Right Rev. T. L. Heylen, Bishop of Namur and President of the Permanent Committee of Eucharistic Congresses, announcing that the Holy Father has appointed Cardinal Vincent Vannutelli, Bishop of Palestrina, as Papal Legate to the Montreal Eucharistic Congress. The finance committee, of which Sir Thomas Shaughnessy and Mr. Rodolphe Forget are joint chairmen, held a meeting the previous evening at the Archbishop's palace under His Grace's direction. A sub-committee for subscriptions to defray the expenses of the Congress was appointed, consisting of Mr. Tancrède Bienvenu, general manager of the Banque Provinciale, ex-Judge Doherty, Mr. Michael Burke, Mr. J. U. Emard, K. C., and Mr. Albert Hébert, treasurer of Notre Dame Hospital. About seventy leading Catholic laymen were present. It was agreed that one hundred thousand dollars would be the outside limit of the estimated expenses. Of this sum almost two-thirds, or to be more exact, sixty-five thousand dollars, have already been subscribed. The Sulpicians have given $25,000, Lord Strathcona $5,000, His Grace the Archbishop $5,000, the Congregation of Notre Dame $5,000, and other direct contributions to His Grace amount to $25,000. What remains to be collected from private citizens is, therefore, only $35,000. Cardinal Gibbons has accepted His Grace's invitation to be present at the Congress next September.

The British Crisis.—Parliament opened February 21. The King's speech touched only the Peers and the Finance Bill. The latter, it is assumed, will be dealt with first. Regarding the former, the Government proposes to secure the undivided authority of the Commons in finance and its predominance in legislation, to reform the constitution of the Upper House and to restrict its power.

Henry George, Jr., and Louis I. Post, who had been engaged in the British electoral campaign, speaking nearly every night for the Liberals, have returned to New York. They told the Manhattan Single Tax Club that the real issue was the Taxation of Land Values and the victory was for Single Tax.—Public attention has been drawn to the deficiency of horses suitable for military uses. A law is proposed forbidding their export and promoting stud-farms.—6,268 carcasses of frozen pork from China have been ordered to be re-exported on account of having no sufficient guarantee of wholesomeness.

Nationalists and the Crisis.—Of the Nationalist members who ran successfully in eleven constituencies against the official candidates, only one, Mr. O'Sullivan, of Kerry, was summoned to the party meeting for the election of a sessional chairman. Mr. Healy sent a letter of protest to Mr. Redmond on the grounds that the chairman had no right to exclude from the meeting any Nationalist member who came prepared to sign the pledge to sit, act and vote with the party. That pledge had been drawn by Mr. Healy and every member who accepted it was a juror on the acts of his colleagues. No chairman had a right to select the jury arbitrarily. However the Party of 72 made the conditions more stringent, empowering a majority of a called meeting, instead of two-thirds as heretofore, to disqualify a member, and a majority of an ordinary meeting to interpret the application of rules. Efforts have been made to settle the differences that hinder united action at such an important crisis, and the arbitration of Cardinal Logue and Archbishop Walsh has been suggested, but Mr. O'Brien insists as a preliminary condition that what he calls the domination of the Hibernian organization shall be eliminated. The insistence of Mr. Redmond that the Liberal cabinet shall first destroy the Lords' veto or obtain a guarantee therefor as the price of his acceptance of the budget, may lead to an early dissolution, but his attitude is generally approved in Ireland, which being admittedly overtaxed, is opposed to any increase, though it is in accord with the general principle of proportioning taxation to wealth. Partly owing to the growth of the Temperance movement and partly to the incidence of the liquor tax, not only consumption of liquor has greatly decreased, but likewise the industry, spirit exports having fallen at the rate of $4,000,000 a year.

The Colonies.—Both houses of the Australian Commonwealth Parliament have passed unanimously a resolution declaring that sixteen years experience in different states and nine years experience in the Commonwealth, have proved Female Suffrage a success.—Another expedition in search of the Waratah, a new 10,000 ton steamer which disappeared mysteriously six months ago off the South African coast between Durban and Port Elizabeth, is setting out from Cape Town. It will take three months to examine the Prince Edward and Marian Islands, the Crozets, Kerguelen, St. Paul and Amsterdam Islands in the Southern Ocean. She was given up at Lloyds in December last, but many seafaring men hold it impossible that she could have been lost so close to shore without leaving a trace, and maintain that she must have broken down and drifted off into unfrequented seas.

Indian Press Law.—The native press is very indignant at, what it terms, the violation of its privileges, otherwise the Seditious Utterances Act meets with general approval. Nevertheless during its discussion in the Council the maximum guarantee deposit by printers, its chief point, has been reduced from $1,600 to $650.

Electoral Reform in Prussia.—"The Government does not permit itself to be influenced by public clamor." It may be that Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg did not mean that this declaration, made in his speech of last week in the Prussian Diet, when he opened the debate on electoral reform, was to be received as a challenge in answer to the threats of the Socialist party, but the events following the utterance render it apparent that the words were so accepted. Meetings of protest against the stand of the Chancellor in favor of the existing electoral system have been held in every part of the kingdom. Thirty-eight immense demonstrations were announced for the Sunday following the speech in Berlin and its vicinity. Some of these assemblies were orderly enough, others developed into riotous gatherings in which the police and soldiers were called upon to use force to quiet the disorderly mob. The demonstration in Frankfurt on Thursday and Friday night developed into a bloody conflict between the populace and the troops. More than 300 were seriously wounded before the tumult was quelled. Meanwhile but little progress was made in the consideration of the bill proposed by the Chancellor, although the commission to which it has been referred declared against the secret ballot by a vote of 15 to 13.—In the Reichstag on Saturday von Bethmann-Hollweg was sharply attacked by the Socialist leaders for his speech before the Diet. The Chancellor was called upon to explain what he meant by his criticism of the universal suffrage guaranteed by the Imperial Constitution and by his contention that a democratic franchise exerts an evil and degenerating influence upon political morals. Though the Chancellor in reply assured the House that the universal suffrage of the empire was in no danger of attack on the part of the Imperial Government or the Bundesrath, the bitterness of the debate was in no wise lessened. Finally Vice-President Spahn was compelled to call the Socialist speakers to order and to rebuke them for saying that the blood shed in the rioting of the week is upon the Chancellor's hands.

Criticism of the Payne Tariff.—During the conferences of the Council of Agriculture in Berlin, which met:

last week for its thirty-eighth annual session, Graf von Kanitz read a paper in which the prospects facing German industries were rated as very unfavorable in view of the relations resulting from the Payne Act. The speaker thought that the injury sure to be wrought would affect German manufactures, but that agricultural interests would not suffer in any marked degree. There seemed to be no inclination on the part of the delegates to urge reprisals, but a resolution was unanimously accepted urging on the part of the American Government a reasonable discretion in the interpretation and administration of the new law.

Tariff Relations With Austria.—As announced in the Chronicle two weeks ago, the "minimum rates" clause of the Payne Tariff Act has not been extended to the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Last week, under the presidency of Graf Aehrenthal, Minister of Foreign Affairs, a conference was held to consider the changes to come into play at the end of March when the new tariff will be effective. Representatives of the Department of Commerce and Finance conferred with delegates from the commercial and industrial bodies of the empire. Information was laid before the assembly that the Washington Government insisted upon certain conditions as preliminary to the extension of the privilege of minimum rates to Austria, the chief of these being a marked lowering of the Austrian tax on imports of cotton-seed oil. The conferees agreed to empower the Austrian Ambassador in Washington to make known to the American Government the present impossibility of any change in the Austrian tariff schedule. The delegates affirmed a readiness to comply with the wishes of the American Government in the conditions set down, but declared that such action would require legislative approval, which, in the existing disturbed state of parliamentary life in Hungary especially, could not be immediately looked for. The necessary legislative action, it was added, would undoubtedly be later secured, and in view of this the hope was expressed that the privilege might be extended to the Empire before the Payne Act became effective.

Party Strife Scored by Austrian Emperor.—Prime Minister Bienerth, of the Imperial Ministry of Austria, has been in consultation with the different party leaders regarding despatch of business in the approaching session of the Reichsrath to open February 24. The question of possible changes in the cabinet was considered, and it was officially communicated to the leaders that the Emperor had sharply criticized the repeated changes in the ministry marking the last few years. His Majesty affirmed that party ambition and strife were destructive of the stability and progress of the nation.

Firmness of French Catholics.—A Paris cablegram, dated February 19, states that the Diocesan Congress, which has been considering the public schools question, concluded its deliberations on that day with the adoption of a resolution affirming invincible attachment to the Church, "the benefactress of the people," and pledging the use of every means to protect the faith of the children and liberty of teaching. Mgr. Amette, Archbishop of Paris, declared that the Catholics, if united, would be victorious in the coming general elections.

France and Morocco.—On the 18th inst., France sent to the Sultan of Morocco an ultimatum, calling upon him to accept the conditions of the loan intended to settle the indemnities due by Morocco to residents of various nationalities who suffered from the Casablanca revolt. Moulaï Hafid is warned that if he does not accept within forty-eight hours, M. H. Gaillard, French Consul, will, with the whole military French mission, leave Fez. Moreover, France will immediately seize several of the Moroccan custom houses. This ultimatum has been communicated to all the powers that signed the Algeciras convention.

Preventing Paris Floods.—The commission composed of engineers, technical experts, and scientists, appointed to inquire into the causes of the recent Paris floods and to agree upon measures for the avoidance of future inundations, held its first meeting on the 18th inst. under the chairmanship of M. Alfred Picard, civil engineer and former Minister of Marine. Besides elaborating a plan for higher revetments to prevent the Seine from overflowing into the city and for an overflow canal around Paris to carry off the high water, the commission will prepare reforms in the public services likely to be affected by floods, such as the tramways, the underground railways, the sewers, the gas, electric, telephone and telegraph conduits.

Philadelphia Car Strike.—During the week another street car strike threw the normal repose of the whole commercial and civic life of Philadelphia into a whirl of riot and confusion. The trouble began on Saturday, February 19, and reached an acute stage in the early part of the week with the summary arrest of Clarence O. Pratt, leader of the striking motormen and conductors. Turbulent crowds resorted to violence in several city districts, cars were smashed and burned, and some persons were killed. Three thousand special policemen were sworn in to help preserve order, and the State Militia was called on to reinforce the local authorities. In the first conflict four companies of the "Fencibles" were worsted. It is claimed that 6,200 of the 7,000 employes of the transit company left their cars. There is a political element in the situation as John J. Murphy, president of the Central Labor Union, was a defeated candidate last fall for city treasurer in opposition to the dominant political organization in Philadelphia. Local political leaders are credited with taking an active interest in the management of the street railway system.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Church Insurance.

The old-established fire insurance companies do a safe business, because their reputation enables them to choose in great measure their risks. They require these, first, to be sufficiently safe individually, and to be widely distributed. To obtain the latter they have, on the one hand, agencies everywhere; but, on the other, the amount of insurance to be written for any country, state or city is carefully limited, nay, in every city the amount to be written in each district, even in each block or square, is fixed. Moreover, when an individual risk is large, say a building worth half a million or more, a conservative company will rarely underwrite the whole. It may write its own policy for the entire sum, but it protects itself by reinsuring a considerable part of it in other companies.

With regard to premiums, a large percentage of the sums received goes to the cost of carrying on business, and even of getting it in these days of strong competition. Out of them, therefore, brokers, agents, salaried officers, advertising, have to be paid. Besides, the shareholders in the company have to get their profits. If, therefore, all business came unsolicited, if there was no competition, and if no profits had to be paid, it is clear that insurance might be much less costly to the public than it is.

Churches and religious houses are held to fulfil the conditions of good risks. Individually they are good because they are generally detached, more or less, from surrounding buildings and are carefully watched. Collectively they are good because they are well distributed as regards country, state and city. The question is often asked: Why should not the Church carry its own insurance? As business would come to it by diocesan laws, brokers and agents would be unnecessary. Then there would be no profits to distribute. Hence a large part of the premium could be saved for each parish.

Some will say: "It can not be done. It has been tried and has failed." It has failed sometimes, we cannot deny. Let us see why, and then we shall see whether it be true that it can not be done.

There are three dangers to which such a scheme is exposed. The first is that of a great loss before premiums have accumulated into a fund. There is no more dangerous time for a fire insurance company than its first years, just as there is no easier time for a life company than the same period. During this time business must be watched most carefully and distributed most judiciously and its volume must bear a relation to the subscribed capital, upon which it may be necessary to call, since, despite all prudence, a serious loss is possible. Gradually the strain passes, premiums accumulate and as the reserve-fund grows business may safely increase.

Now if a diocese, or a province, or a number of provinces take over their own insurance without providing at least a temporary fund against possible losses in excess of premiums, the position is that of an insurance company which begins business without capital or guarantee. Luck may be good and things may turn out well, or luck may be bad and then comes collapse. This is the danger that constantly confronts mutual associations which generally come to an end after a succession of heavy losses.

The second danger is the attempt to carry too heavy individual risks. Even though the entire insurance of the Church in the United States were pooled, this would not justify the managers in attempting to carry from the beginning all the insurance say of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and still less of adding to it that of Georgetown or Notre Dame University. Of course the temptation would be great; for if all went well a strong reserve fund would quickly be accumulated. Nevertheless, what would be reckless in the estimation of the managers of such companies as the Royal or the Hartford, could not be tolerated in ecclesiastical managers.

The reducing of premiums to too low a figure is the third danger. It takes an actuary, with all his statistics, the result of long years of experience, to determine just how low a rate may safely be. Ecclesiastical insurers have not these statistics and they cannot get them. Their desire to make things easy for pastors and congregations may easily lead them to exaggerate the profits of the companies, the amounts paid to agents and brokers, etc., and in consequence to make rates that will forever prevent them from putting their business on a solid basis.

The first danger would be met by a temporary guarantee-fund, to which each diocese would contribute proportionately to its interests. Probably it would remain intact. Even if it had to be drawn upon, it could be restored out of future profits. Its existence would mean that those engaged in the work had made up their minds not to be frightened by difficulties into thinking a perfectly sound undertaking to be ruinous.

The second would be obviated by fixing a limit beyond which no individual risk might be taken. As funds accumulated the limit might be raised. In the meantime the pastors and congregations would derive real benefit. Smaller risks would be carried entirely at a much lower premium; the larger would be reinsured in the companies at a rate lower than could be obtained through agents or brokers.

The third danger would be met by moderation. Any reduction would be acceptable to those interested, and if at first premiums were placed too high, they could be reduced in the course of time. Meanwhile the reserve fund, which is everything, would be accumulating more rapidly than if the premiums were at the lowest possible figure.

These sound principles seem to have governed the operations of the Catholic Mutual Relief Society of America, which, organized by the late Bishop O'Connor of Omaha, is watched over by seven Ordinaries with Archbishop Glennon of St. Louis at their head, and operates in many dioceses, religious orders and congregations. Up to December 31 last it had received as premiums and interest on investments $359,733.56 and had paid out $167,392.70. Its reserve is at present $156,750, almost equal to the losses paid, invested in convertible securities such as United States, state and first mortgage railway bonds. This suggests another remark. A reserve must always be treated as this is, as every man of business knows. The temptation to lend it on mortgage in order to get higher interest must be firmly resisted. To lend it to churches and ecclesiastical institutions would be to confound an insurance association with a building and loan society, two things that can no more be mixed than oil and water, and would mean nothing else than ruin.

We may add that in any plan devised for the carrying by the Church of its own insurance, a system of rigid inspection no less thorough than that carried out by the underwriters' associations will conduce greatly to its success. All electrical work should be done under such inspection, and inspectors should examine carefully the heating apparatus and, in places subject to thunderstorms, the lightning rods and their connection with the earth. On great feasts, Christmas especially, they should visit each church and satisfy themselves that the arrangements made for illuminating the altars and the crib are perfectly safe; and they should see that there is in the sacristy a fireproof place for lighting the charcoal for the censer and keeping this in safety after service. If such precautions are taken the danger of fire in churches is small indeed. Similar inspections should be made in pastors' residences, schools and religious institutions.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Religious Life in Italy in the Sixteenth Century*

A most important contribution to the "History of the Society of Jesus," now in course of publication, is the book before us—the first volume by Father Tacchi Venturi, S.J., on the career of the Order in Italy. The text of this book presents a preliminary view, necessary for the right setting of the history to follow. The sub-title shows the scope and comprehensiveness of the treatise: "Religious Life in Italy during the first period of the Order," that is, during the sixteenth century, without omitting antecedents in the century before. This general framing of the specific subject exhibits the manifold bearings, which the subsequent course of events, in the life of the Order, will limit and define.

The religious spirit in the peninsula was vigorous still in part; but for the greater part was much decayed. It had now to face the critical times of the Protestant Reformation, the spirit of which was rife in many a learned or publishing centre from Venice to Naples. The Catholic reformation, which came to operate officially through the decrees of the Council of Trent, was effectually begun and carried on by the zeal of new religious institutes, a revived clergy, and the restoration of old ideals. The historical elements which portray the process of revival are the following: the condition of theological, biblical and historical studies in the clergy, secular and regular; the monasteries of religious women; the episcopate; the prevalent abuses; the restoration of reverence for the Holy Eucharist; the frequency, or rather infrequency, of Holy Communion; sacred eloquence, its state of decline, its propagandism of error, and the cure effected through new agencies of apostolic zeal; religious instruction; the catechism; the infiltration of the new doctrines from Germany; the organization of beneficence or charity.

The amplitude and accuracy with which these matters are treated may be sufficiently inferred from the vast array of literature drawn on for the development of each head. Fruits of original research are given in the second part of the volume, where documents of singular merit for their novelty and value substantiate the tissue of the text before us. Half of the documents here produced are materials for the volume immediately following, on the foundation of the Society of Jesus in Rome, and the local establishments of charity or piety established or promoted in the Eternal City by St. Ignatius of Loyola. The archives drawn on by the author, in strenuous personal research, are some thirty within the Italian peninsula. But many of them, which are denominated now State Archives, represent a vast collection of monastic, collegiate and community depositories, all expropriated at the late revolution or unification of Italy, and now massed together as State property.

The Society of Jesus takes rank in this volume among the elements, new, quickening and vigorous, for the revival of Catholic spirit in the clergy and laity. The setting thus prepared for the history of the Order is clearly an augury of the thoroughness and judiciousness with which the subsequent course of events will be treated. The literary merit of the volume is attested by the solemn act of the Italian Academy, the time-honored Crusca, which crowned a preliminary redaction with the first honors, and awarded to the author, among the historical competitors of 1906, a premium of 2,000 francs.

If one will compare this treatment of Italy at the epoch of the Protestant Reformation with Janssen's similar presentment of Germany for the same period, and will supplement both with Pastor's "History of the Popes," he will see that the circumstances of Christendom at the time were very uniform, were all sadly in need of a sound reconstruction, and were just ready for a religious conflagration when the spark should be applied. As to the question why the northern nations seceded from the Papacy while southern countries like Italy remained faithful, we are more convinced than ever by the perusal of this volume that, secondary motives apart, only one main and adequate reason can be assigned for the line of demarcation which was drawn between Catholic and Protestant Europe. That was the greater or less proximity to the centre of unity, and the greater or less influence received, owing to mere geographical conditions, from the Papacy, which had Christianized Europe in spite of geographical obstructions.

England, Germany, Italy, showed the Catholic sentiment under identical forms up to the moment of the Reformation. But the clergy and the religious Orders in far-off Scotland and Sweden showed less of the Christian spirit than in England and in Germany; and in England and Germany the same salt of the earth had less savor than in Italy. And, as the clergy went, so went the people, when the chance came for cutting adrift from the law. No doubt, there were secondary reasons which operated one way or other: that clannishness in Germany, which may be dignified by the name of nationalism; the bull-dog sensuality of a Henry VIII; the predatory instincts of princes and barons, who had an "aspiration" to appropriate the Church's goods. But, again, these princes and barons were distant in the north, and were remoter from the restraining arm and Christian influence of the Papacy.

We consider that Father Venturi's work takes rank with the best historical productions on the period, and is a worthy introduction to the history which will follow.

Our South American Neighbors

II.

PERU.

The Republic of Peru ranks fourth in South American politics. It must be admitted that Peru is a long way behind Chile, to whose persistent and relentless warfare much of her backwardness is due. Peru has a special interest for us because all through her history the United States has been her friend, and she now looks upon us with Argentina, as allies in her unequal fight. No Peruvian has forgotten that in the massacre of the defenders of the Morro of Arica perished John More, the plucky American, whose expedients prolonged resistance until the Chileans despaired of taking the stronghold.

Singularly enough, while the victors were at their bloody work, the admiral of the British squadron in the bay saw fit to show his country's Chilean bearings by a formal salute to the lone star flag, when it displaced the red and white upon the walls.

A still more remarkable coincidence of that memorable assault was the presence among the Peruvians, fighting at the side of More, of a young Argentine, Roque Saenz Peña, who is to-day the popular candidate for the presidency of his native land.

In Peru especially have the old Spanish influences been preserved. Lima, with its beautiful cathedral, its old-world atmosphere and its bull-fights, might well pass for a town in Spain. Fine characteristics of the people are their reverence for their faith, and their respect for age: a less creditable trait is the national indolence which is coupled with a weak physique; both so unnatural to dwellers on inhospitable and mountainous soil whose natural riches are only to be extracted by the hard but invigorating labor of mining at high altitudes.

The cholo or Indian laborer is a direct descendant of the Incas, that wonderful race whose monuments abound in Southern Peru to-day, built so skilfully that, after the lapse of centuries, their walls, innocent of mortar, will not admit the blade of a penknife between the huge stones.

URUGUAY.

This article, treating of the principal factors in South American politics, would be incomplete without a few words about the gallant little "buffer" state of Uruguay.

The people of this country, the smallest on the continent, are not one whit behind their Chilean and Argentine brothers in courage and manliness; but unfortunately these qualities have found vent only in the many revolutions which have been the country's curse. The two political parties, "Colorados," and "Blancos" stand for no particular principle, but solely for the ambition of their leaders. Elections are a farce, so that the outs, at present the "Blancos," must fight for control if they are to regain it, and this is made almost impossible by the vigilance of the Government which has so far prevented the introduction of arms into the country. The question of which faction is to rule in Uruguay is of importance far beyond her borders, for the "Blancos" are ancient friends of Argentina, the "Colorados" of Brazil. These two antagonistic nations, therefore, take a deep and lively interest in Uruguayan politics, for in the not impossible case of a war between them, the fiery little army of the buffer State might easily turn the scale in favor of one or other.

LESSER STATES.

The remaining Republics, Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay and Venezuela, may be dismissed with a few words, for the purpose of this article. Although steadily advancing, not one is of sufficient strength to be a considerable factor in international affairs.

Bolivia is a mountain republic of large area and small population, containing probably a very great proportion of the mineral wealth of the continent. Hemmed in by the four great powers, her position is not an enviable one, and her ultimate destiny, if she does not succeed in regaining a seaport, in all probability will be to lose most if not all of her territory to one of her neighbors, or to be divided between them, a South American Poland.

Colombia has been cursed with misgovernment perhaps more than any of the other states except Venezuela. Her natural resources are considerable, but her cities are commercially inaccessible, her five hundred miles of railways pitifully inadequate, and her treasury is so depleted by wholesale official corruption that the present value in United States currency of a Colombian dollar is exactly one cent. Under these conditions years of strong, honest government are necessary before her influence can be felt, even remotely, beyond her own borders.

The small Republic of Ecuador has made greater strides of late years than any of the other four, and will perhaps receive more benefit than any other from the Panama Canal. The recently completed railway from Guayaquil, her one important seaport, to Quito, the capital, although from all reports mismanaged and badly run, is an encouraging start in the right direction. The most serious drawback to her progress is the unhealthiness of Guayaquil, perhaps the worst, certainly one of the worst cities of the continent in this regard.

Of unfortunate Paraguay, hidden far up an affluent of the River Plata, out of the way of commerce and progress, there is little to say. Plundered, laid waste and depopulated by the allies after her one attempt to win her spurs, under Lopez, a bloody tyrant but an able fighter, she lies prostrate to-day without the power, and indeed almost without the will to recover. Absorption by Argentina, although not likely to take place in the near future, seems a foregone conclusion, and is probably her only path to ultimate progress.

It is sad to think that, of the noteworthy men Venezuela has produced, the first should have been the splendid patriot, Simon Bolivar, the last the adventurer Cipriano Castro. In the course of time, she will no doubt free herself from the clutches of self-seeking officials, but for the next decade, at least, her progress must needs be small. Nature has given her exceptional advantages, and properly ruled she should occupy a position of dignity and importance; but she seems doomed to a constant course of misrule which has made her the laughing stock of the world, and incidentally a permanent thorn in the flesh of her patient, long-suffering Uncle Sam.

C. LOUIS COFFIN.

The Art of Gardner Symons

Some five or six years ago, a visit to a Chicago picture gallery where there was an exhibition, a one-man exhibition, gave the immediate impression of strong work. The canvases were almost all pictures of California, with one or two quiet views of English landscape intermingled. But in the memorable pictures of the coast, with great mountains towering in the clear air, hills and plain of a velvet greenness, an extraordinary limpidness and softness of atmosphere, and marvelous strata of wild flowers, mauve, or rose, or pale gold brushed across the canvas, the achievement was rare and of the highest quality. The color may have been the brilliant color of California: the artist's way of painting colored objects in bright light, and the robustness of the workmanship were peculiarly his own. The signature, "Gardner Symons," seemed one to be remembered.

The other day, at the Winter Exhibition of the National Academy of Design, it was almost a personal triumph to find the jury awarding the Carnegie prize "for the most meritorious oil painting in the exhibition" to a large canvas bearing the same signature; and the picture was further honored by acquisition for the Metropolitan Museum. It is needless to say that Mr. Symons is pleased with this recognition of his "Opalescent River." He will tell you, laughing, that it is the first and only prize he ever received, boyhood not excepted.

What has he been doing between the Chicago private exhibition and his arrival among us; for he is here, it is hoped, to stay? Mr. Symons does not speak of himself willingly. He will tell you all you care to know about his pictures, but the personality shrinks from questioning. He volunteered that he still kept the old studio in California and that he has another in Cornwall, a fisherman's cottage, from which you can throw stones into the blue depths of the Cornish Sea. He has been working all the time—you really hardly need to be told that—and almost always out of doors. When you get a man weather-beaten as a deep-sea fisher or an Alpine guide you are apt to believe that he lives in the open air. For further signs, he cannot endure fire in his studio and paints standing, in a bracing atmosphere of thirty-two or thereabouts. "I do most of my work out-of-doors and prefer to do it in winter." He trudged through sixteen inches of snow, laden with his painting paraphernalia, to the banks of his "Opalescent River," Deerfield Valley, Mass. Yet there are still people in the world who consider artists soft.

Of his early studies Mr. Symons has not much to say. He drew at the Art Institute, Chicago (his native city), at the Julian School in Paris, and followed classes in Munich. After a first trip to Europe in 1887, he returned thither, with the formal purpose of study, in 1893. He esteems that he owes less to academies than to the artists with whom he associated as a friend, with whom he sketched, and by whom he was criticized. It is his earnest belief that the landscape painter should "go to Nature" for his training. Mr. Symons himself has gone to Nature with some purpose. A perfect simplicity and directness of view, no affectations of manner, no sign-manual to his craft; but a steady, honest and persevering effort to render what is before him. For special qualities a clean, vigorous and brilliant color, an unusual clearness and limpidity of atmosphere, an altogether personal sense of width and depth, and light painted with a ruddiness and rutilance that almost dazzles the eye.

Mr. Symons smiled at the suggestion that his color and light are done by magic. "I don't know whether I could call them that. I know too much about the hard work and the years of striving." He resents the imputation, however (which no true lover of nature could make), that he puts into his canvases more than the landscape gives him. "As if I could! As if anybody could! There are days when Nature herself gives nothing and it is almost impossible to work; other days when things come, and work is a joy and a glory. But I never finish without feeling how inadequate the picture is. Only a year or two after, I begin to think it not so bad."

"Because you bring to it a fresh eye and mind?"

"No; because I have forgotten my vision."

The vision in question seemed not so much the trained eye, learned in the subtle harmonies of line and color in nature, the orchestration of delicate effects, as the specific inner gift of the artist which makes him own-brother to the poet. In Mr. Symons' interpretation, a bright day is not only blue but smiles its promises; rain-clouds are turbulent, like an army in battle-array; trees in shadow seem to brood sadly; a clear, sudden ray rings out in trumpet-notes; where the wind has played over the sand-dunes they take great, sweeping rhythms of motion that suggest dancing; ebbing light has the soft pulsations of organ tones dying out in the dusk. And yet, everywhere and in all things, true and close faithfulness to Nature.

During his long absences abroad Mr. Symons has exhibited frequently in Munich, at the Royal Academy in London, and at the Paris Salons. He appeared first at the Old Salon in 1898, with his two canvases, "Rock-Bound Cornwall" and "Cornish Hill-sides," both of which were hung on the line. In 1900 his picture, "Vibrant Notes of Autumn," (afterwards purchased for the Art Gallery, Lincoln, Neb.) was similarly distinguished. About this time Mr. Symons was elected to the Society of Western Artists; in 1907 to the Royal Society of British Artists, of which Whistler was sometime president; and in 1909 to the Union Internationale de Beaux Arts. His picture "Winter" was considered one of the great successes at the Royal Academy in 1907, and he followed it up, in 1908, with "Snow Clouds," the placing of which gave him genuine pleasure as it hung under Sargent's decoration, with Shannon and East for company.

Although Mr. Symons considers himself purely an American, and he is a good one, he has a number of pictures in private collections in England. One of the earliest was acquired by the Marquis of Lorne, and Lord Ronald Gower, no insignificant critic, has five in his gallery. In this country the Woman's Club of Chicago owns the "Coast of San Juan," and the Cincinnati Museum a landscape called "Sorrow," illustrative of the poet's line, "Behind the Clouds is the sun still shining." Recently the "Live Oak, California," was exhibited in Munich, and Mr. Symons has just sent to the Pennsylvania Academy a picture painted in Germany, "The Moon and Morning Light." It is treated in a rather decorative way and shows an eerie, frosty winter's day-break with two dim sources of illumination. A big oak tree is in the foreground. "The icicles kept dropping on my palette while I worked," is the artist's suggestive comment. Next March twenty-four canvases are to be shown at the Art Institute, Chicago.

The paint is barely dry on the large picture now exhibiting at the National Arts Club (American Landscape Painting). It is another view of the Deerfield River and admirable in quality, big composition, powerful and significant color, and wide reaches of far space. (The latter means a genius for perspective and values true as tones in music; but knowledge is kept out of sight in the artistic production.) The more delicate and subtle beauties are not neglected. In first line one would place the perfect clarity and transparency of the atmosphere; you can almost taste the freshness of the limpid, bracing January evening, one of those incomparable days when the air is brilliantly pure and its edge keen. A lovely passage of bank and faraway trees lies reflected in a reach of tranquil water. Across the horizon an exquisite shade of hyacinth, a genuine end-of-day color, is drawn. Nearer at hand swirls the vibrant deep-blue of the moving river, green where it pours over cakes of ice. Low down on the bank nestle roseate reflections, vivid and glittering, as the last sun-rays strike. The level above is cold already, showing in transparent pale-almond shadows. This painting of shadows in translucent tints belongs to impressionism, but we must insist on the strength of the face-to-face, breezy out-door coloring and on the dazzling effect of the snow in light. The title is "Winter Sun."

One more canvas Mr. Symons was kind enough to bring forward, and he said of this, "Last Lights—Angarrac," that it held a very special place among his works. It was painted in a remote nook in Cornwall and, to the superficial glance, looks sombre and uninviting. Dusk is approaching; along the country road a cart drags slowly, and field laborers trudge homeward. A strong decorative motive of trees, gloomy and large-looming, starts at the left hand and almost traverses the canvas. Beyond rise the moors, green-clad and showing rifts of soil. The sky is full of jostling clouds that threaten rain. At first blush, the mood of the picture, sullen and foreboding, and the low tone depress you. But have patience a moment. The mass of lowering trees is not solid. Interstices open and, of a sudden, your sight has escaped from all this gloom into perfect fugues of vivid light. Warm and joyous lie the last sun-rays on the palpitating flank of the moor, on roofs clustered together, on faraway faces of distant cottages, radiant in this last glory, on one tendril of curling smoke that beckons home. Here, and there, and again, your eye and your soul plunge together into the glow with a sense of sudden freedom and jubilation. "For me that picture holds a suggestion," Mr. Symons says; "there really is in it something of the spot and the hour." He is quite right; it is potently suggestive in its subdued and restrained key. The minor predominates: evening, work done, silence coming—and the dark. But the light is there, far away, in the background, and the lure of the distance and the gleam is surely calling. The fine reticence of the brush makes us feel all the combat and the peace of this hour of ending and beginning. In the valley of shadow the bugles of animate nature are waiting to sound taps until the Prince of Day shall have flung upward the last gleam of his sword, in salute and in benediction. Afterwards comes the night—but it will have stars.

Millennium of a Great Abbey

II.

"The Great Abbots" is the title assigned by history to the first nine rulers of Cluny, among them Sts. Berno, Odo, Majeul, Odilo, Hugh and Peter the Venerable, and from their hands four popes went forth to rule the Church; yet we are told that Hildebrand was the only really great man that Cluny produced and his establishment of papal theocracy and sacerdotal celibacy was worse than failure. To elaborate this conclusion, with the aid of an occasional sneer and partisan perversion of fact from Voltaire and others, seems the real object of the Independent writer. As a matter of fact Hildebrand, though trained in the Cluniac spirit at Santa Maria in Rome, was not, strictly speaking, a monk of Cluny, where he spent but one year, after his ordination and profession, and then apparently by accident. Born about 1020, he was appointed chaplain of Gregory VI in 1045, accompanied him to Cologne in 1046, and, on Gregory's death, withdrew to Cluny late in 1047, whence in January, 1049, he returned with Leo IX to Rome. There he acted as chief administrator to Leo and his successors, Victor II, Nicholas II, and Alexander II, till his own election in 1073, strengthening the hands of the pontiffs and directing their policy against the corrupting influences of the times.

For nearly three decades Hildebrand, under the advice of St. Hugh, was endeavoring at Rome to do for the Church in general what Cluny had done for the Benedictines. Cluny had abolished the system by which court or crown nominated religious superiors, appointed lay-abbots, held monasteries as fiefs and made them receptacles for incompetents and undesirables of noble blood. Uhlric of Cluny had laid down that men must embrace monastic life, "not in the age of caprice or levity, or at the command of their parents, but of their own free will, at a mature age, and in single obedience to the command of Christ." Gregory VII would apply this principle to the priesthood of the entire Church. As the monk Hildebrand he had seen the German Emperor nominate popes, make them and unmake them. He had traveled with one such pope as a suppliant to the imperial throne, and he had been compelled to go himself as a suppliant for another. He had seen benefices and bishoprics put up for sale, and worthless henchmen and unprincipled self-seekers thrust into the most important churches and sees by the princes and potentates of France, Italy and Germany. As a consequence of this simony and laic usurpation he had seen the law of celibacy disregarded and shameless incontinency parading itself in holy places.

He saw one ray of hope. The Benedictine monasteries and monks, animated by the spirit of Cluny, were holding up to the eyes of the people the true ideal of the priesthood; and Hildebrand resolved to devote his life to extend that ideal, to re-establish primitive conditions by driving simony and incontinency out of the Church, and for that purpose, to free her from the lay hand that was strangling her. His predecessors from Clement II to Alexander II had renewed the ancient laws of sacerdotal discipline, but secular opposition had largely nullified their efforts. As chaplain and chancellor he had inspired or directed the reformatory measures of five popes and had noted the causes of their failure. Now that the authority of Peter had come upon him, Gregory VII bent all the resources of his genius and experience with indomitable will and holy zeal to overcome the opposition of the world and the flesh. His object was not to set up a papal theocracy but to re-establish Christian law; not to enslave the civil power but to free the Church from its grasp; not to dethrone kings but to dethrone Simon Magus, who, as St. Bruno put it, "was lording it over the Church."

In his first Lenten Synod the new pope forbade all clerics who had purchased their orders or were incontinent to exercise the ministry, prohibited the retention of a purchased church and the buying and selling of ecclesiastical rights, and commanded the people to reject the services of clerics who disobeyed these injunctions. His known character made it clear that he meant his decrees to be executed, and at once the simoniacal and state ecclesiastics of Italy, France and Germany rose up in open revolt. These he promptly deposed and excommunicated, regardless of their powerful patrons, and replaced them by worthy men. Then the mighty Emperor of Germany took up their cause and his own. It was as Gregory had foreseen: civil domination in the Church begat simony and incontinence and would defend its progeny. Henry IV had expressed regret in 1073 for his simoniacal spoliation of churches and promotions of unworthy men to ecclesiastical offices, and promised amendment; but when put to the test he refused to relax his grasp on the power and pelf that thereby accrued to him, and set the Pope at defiance.

To the secular power Gregory opposed the spiritual. He meted to the emperor the same penalty that he would assign to his humblest subject for like offense. He excommunicated him from the Church for public and contumacious violation of its laws. Deposition was the logical consequence; an excommunicate was then constitutionally disqualified to rule. Henry had repeatedly broken faith; and therefore when his people abandoned him as a leper, and he repented or feigned repentance at Canossa, it was necessary to put his sincerity to the test and fit the punishment to the crime. Before all his people he had set himself in matters of religion above the Vicar of Christ; hence he was forced to kneel in lowly submission to Christ's Vicar, not through pontifical resentment but as an object lesson to his subjects, and to all people, that in religion the Pope and not the King is supreme. The rulers of France and Italy profited by the lesson; Henry again forswore himself, and the result of his persistent opposition was pithily expressed in reference to another imperial usurper of pontifical rights: "He who eats pope dies of him."

Henry IV of Germany was the last monarch who claimed the right to nominate a pope. The people proved loyal to Church and pontiff rather than to king, and though Gregory died in exile, his purpose was achieved. Simony was driven out of the Church; soon clerical celibacy prevailed, and the next Ecumenical Council (First Lateran, 1123) reiterated his decrees and pronounced marriage of clerics not only illicit but invalid. The fearless and holy heroism of the pontiff saved religious liberty and the sanctity of religious life; but it must not be forgotten that, had not the example of the 37,000 Benedictine monasteries enabled the people to distinguish between true priests and state-made clerics, they would never have rallied to the call of the Pope against Emperors, Kings, princes and corrupt ecclesiastics. And in that day the animating spirit of the Benedictines was the spirit of Cluny. If Hildebrand's vindication of religious freedom has been the occasion of countless wars and bloodshed, grasping kings and states have made it so, for Henry had his successors. And if it has been and still is a "stone of offence," so is Christianity itself, as St. Paul found it in his day and as its Founder predicted for all days.

"Its system of centralization," says Dom Gasquet, "was the glory and weakness of Cluny." It was its glory while state interference was excluded and it was controlled by saintly abbots, freely elected according to the rules of its institute; but when, in the fifteenth century, the state began to encroach on its liberties, and appoint its rulers, its well-knit organization only served to subject the whole congregation to the civil power, and its decline became inevitable. One state system hampered and weakened it; another confiscated and destroyed it. That is roughly the history of the Benedictine monasteries, as of most religious institutions, in France, England, Italy and Germany: first, officious intermeddling by the State, then spoliation, persecution and destruction. The State, grasping for power, has ever tried to usurp the functions of the Church, and when she resists the wolf calls the lamb a meddler. Her meddling in civil affairs is merely her assertion of religious rights against civil aggression. A stone of defence would be a better metaphor to represent her mode of warfare in the past; and a study of history will dispose many of her sons to regret that she did not hurl it hard or often enough.

Vandal reformers and atheistic revolutionists could tear down the walls of Cluny and other Benedictine monasteries, but they could not pluck out the spirit which upreared them. The Benedictine Order still flourishes. They have returned to England and again lecture in the halls of Cambridge and Oxford. They are firmly established on the continent of Europe where they are nobly upholding the scholarly traditions of Cluny, Solesmes and St. Maur. Their teachers, missionaries and ascetics have carried the Rule of St. Benedict, and the discipline of St. Berno, to distant lands of which their founders never dreamed, and in Australia, South Africa, India, the Philippines and North and South America, the spirit of Cluny has found a new and beautiful life.

Duty to God

General Washington called religion and morality the two "great pillars of human happiness" and the "firmest props of the duties of men and citizens." He also said that "reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle." This firm foundation has been our safeguard in the past, shall we not defend it in the future? That question must be answered by the American people themselves.

There is a neglect of religious education and of spiritual development in our American colleges for young men which is a threat of future danger. Our attention as a nation has been called to it. The duty to God, as the one end and aim of all human endeavor, is a very dead letter in the education of most of our American young men of to-day, but it was a living power in the lives of those great men who laid the foundations of our government.

This is a heritage which it is a sacred duty to preserve. To swerve from religion is to endanger the life of our nation. Already modern materialism has changed the duty to our neighbor into a mistaken and twisted philanthropy called "humanitarianism" which leaves mankind discontented with this life and without hope as to any future one. Take from the poor the patience and the faith in a future life, which religion alone can plant in the human heart, and socialism and anarchy will surely follow. We should accept as a warning not only the word of General Washington spoken in 1796, but some of our own mistakes. As religion grows dim socialism becomes more threatening.

In France, too, great men who were patriots have fearlessly defended religion, and urged the necessity for religious education. They foresaw the ruin that would come if their warning words should be unheeded. On the 15th of January, 1850, Victor Hugo made a speech before the Assemblée Nationale, for even so long ago, some of the members wished to drive God and religion from the public schools. "Religious instruction is, in my opinion," he declared, "more necessary for mankind to-day than ever before. The greater man grows the more imperative is his need of religious belief. One of the misfortunes of our modern existence, I may say the misfortune, is a tendency to concentrate everything into this life. In giving to man (as the supreme end and aim of his earthly existence) material welfare only, every form of suffering is aggravated, because at the end there is nothing; to the burden of misfortune is added the insupportable weight of annihilation, and what before was only pain, that is to say, a law of God, becomes despair! Such doctrines as these produce dangerous social convulsions. I most certainly wish to ameliorate in this life the condition of those who suffer, but I do not forget that the best of all gifts to them is Hope. As to myself I believe absolutely in that better world: and here and now I declare this faith to be the supreme certainty of my reason as it is the supreme joy of my soul. I advocate sincerely—I will even say ardently religious instruction in the public schools!"

When we consider that an irreligious socialism is the danger which threatens the whole civilized world in the twentieth century, let us hope that the American people may be aroused in time, and may see clearly the need of religious education in all our American colleges and the cultivation of those virtues which are distinctively Christian, and with regard to which the Father of our Country has said: "Humility and a pacific temper of mind were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion. . . . without an humble imitation of whose example in these things we can never hope to be a happy nation." The Father of his Country was wise and far-seeing. We have been heedless children. If we wish to get back these virtues we must correct some of our mistakes as a nation and reform the present trend of our American colleges.

"For frantic boast and foolish word, Thy mercy on thy people, Lord!"

MARIA LONGWORTH STORER.

The missionaries of the Belgian Congo, in a letter which has been made public, state that 325 missionaries and 130 Sisters are devoting themselves to the work in the Congo, where, at present, there are 35,270 Christians and 74,080 catechumens. They lament the death of King Leopold, saying: "In the judgment of the history of the Church, the colonization of Central Africa will assure to his memory an imperishable renown in spite of envious calumnies."

CORRESPONDENCE

Golden Jubilee of Manila Ateneo

MANILA, P. I., DECEMBER 10, 1910.

The Ateneo de Manila has been celebrating its golden jubilee. Fifty years have passed since the Fathers of the Society of Jesus took over the little school known as the "Escuela Pia," and in short time developed the institution now famous as the Ateneo de Manila.

The exercises marking the celebration lasted three days, December 7, 8, 9. A dinner to some five hundred of the city poor was the opening act of the jubilee. Before the hour appointed they began to gather—a motley throng of men and women, the blind, the crippled, the aged, all of them unmistakably of the poorer class. When they were seated under the sheltering porches of the atreo, distinguished alumni of the college who acted as waiters, sallied forth, lawyers, doctors, city officials and prominent business men. Among them were the Alcalde Sr. Felix Roxas, Sr. Pedro Paterno, Sr. Dominguez, Sr. Maximino Paterno, Sr. Manuel Ravago, Sr. Eleizegui, Sr. Menije, Sr. Alberto, Sr. Fernando, Dr. Quintos, Sr. Fernandez, Sr. Bernardino Hernandez, Sr. Barrera, Sr. Jose Gonzalez, Dr. Luis de Castro, Sr. Camps, Sr. Albert and other well known citizens.

The menu was worthy of a Delmonico. The wine was the gift of Sr. Pueo, who personally assisted in dispensing what he had generously contributed. The plentiful desserts were donations from the firms of La Campana of Calle Dulumbayan and of La Palma de Mallorca. There was no stint of supplies and after the feast most of the guests carried away in baskets a goodly store for those who had remained at home.

At the church services in the afternoon the number of men in attendance was remarkable. The sacred edifice was brilliantly illuminated and every corner of it was filled with a congregation that extended to the doors and out into the street. Literary exercises in which the alumni took a leading part were held in the evening. The college hall was tastefully decorated and speeches and poems filled out the program. The address of Dr. Manuel Ravago was an eloquent résumé of the successful work accomplished by the Ateneo which, the speaker said, was "the glory of the Philippines." It had produced her most illustrious lawyers, her doctors and scientists and patriots, the mention of whose names was greeted with applause. Among the honored sons of the Ateneo was Rizal, the Filipino patriot, whose memory, the speaker declared, would always be lovingly entwined with the names of his Jesuit preceptors. The Hon. Rafael Palma spoke on the scientific work of the Jesuits and of the famous observatory of Manila. During the festivities the college building was ablaze at night with thousands of electric lights and the Santa Rita band entertained the crowds that gathered in the neighborhood of the college.

The second day of the celebration coincided with the Feast of the Immaculate Conception. The jubilee Mass was sung by the Right Rev. Dennis J. Dougherty, Bishop of Jaro. Archbishop Harty, owing to illness, was unable to be present. Bishop Carroll of Vigan, Mgr. Joseph Hendrick of the diocese of Rochester, N. Y., brother of the lamented Bishop of Cebú; Mgr. Tuñon, Vicar General of Manila; Mgr. Singson, Vicar General of Cebú; Mgr. Padilla of Lingayen; Mgr. Petrelli of the Apostolic Delegation and others of the clergy were present in the sanctuary. A choir of two hundred voices accompanied by the Rizal orchestra fittingly rendered the music of the solemn Mass.

In the evening there was a procession of students and alumni and various societies connected with the church through the principal streets of the city. Six thousand persons joined in the parade and twelve bands of music representing 350 musicians were distributed among them. The scene was impressive as the long line of marchers, candle or torch in hand, passed through the crowded streets of the city and were reviewed in the open amphitheatre near the college. Here a multitude of 10,000 persons were addressed by the Rev. Joachim Anon, S.J., president of the Ateneo, who thanked the people for their appreciation of the works of the Ateneo and the magnificent testimonies of their good will. Enthusiastic "Vivas" were given for the Patroness of the college, for the Church, for the Pope and for the Ateneo.

On December 9, a solemn Mass of requiem was celebrated for the deceased students and professors of the college. The celebrant was the Right Rev. Monsignor Singson of Cebu, assisted by the Rev. Anastasio Corro and the Rev. Francisco de la Torre. The festivities were brought to a close that evening when the college tendered a banquet to four hundred of the alumni.

China's Present Outlook

SHANGHAI, JANUARY 3, 1910.

To record but the principal events of this vast empire during the past year is not an easy task. There is a glamour of reform and a plethora of Imperial decrees, which at first appearance impart to the onlooker the impression that things are moving, while in reality the obsolete ways of the past have a terrible hold on the nation and obstruct the forces that make for the betterment of the people. When the first reforms were inaugurated, there was a general opposition to the movement. They were contrary to ideals held in the past, to customs and traditions supposed to be part and parcel of national life. Little by little, however, the movement was taken up and some changes effected, but with such a half-heartedness that this period may be well styled the farcical age of the new methods. Some pretend they were adopted only to fool the foreigner, but this can hardly be credited to the central government, which seems at all times to have been well-meaning but is baffled in many of its attempts by provincial incapacity, sluggish conservatism, procrastination and inertia, all of which constitute a dead weight counteracting the good will of the Court.

The recent phase of reform is a little more consoling, though it would be still unwise to think that China has attained a status enabling her to be placed on a footing of equality with Western Powers. The ball is however a-rolling at present, but as all new measures are entrusted to old hands while the men trained in foreign methods are practically excluded, the results are generally unsatisfactory, crude and below standard. A detailed list and a critical examination of each reform are reserved for further communications.

After reform, the principal phase of national life is the rights recovery craze. China has signed treaties with the Powers whereby rights and privileges have been established, but now attempts are made to elude obligations, interfere with the administration of the Settlements and Open Ports, restrict rights of navigation, boycott commerce and industry, and recover by hook or crook whatever has been granted in the past. The tendency assumes at times a boisterous and almost insolent attitude, which if indulged in to excess may prove dangerous to international peace. What seems extraordinary to the outsider is that the school element is constantly allowed to dabble in questions regarding foreign countries. These youthful politicians are filled with exuberant patriotism but ignore altogether that others have rights and will not fail to defend them if imperilled. Such a solution is doubtless to be deprecated, but if it becomes necessary it will be brought on by China's own fault.

Another feature which becomes more and more prominent throughout the country is the growing hatred of the foreigner. China was an exclusive nation for forty centuries, and this accounts for her quaint type of civilization, her conservatism, inertia, adherence to all kinds of primitive and clumsy methods. The coming of the foreigner, and contact with him, caused her to move much against her will or be absorbed. This event marks a new and important turning point in her history. It signifies progress and advancement, a dawn of better things; foreign ideals and methods have conquered; China has been compelled to adjust herself to outer civilizations, to get along with the new comer, and to use a popular phrase, to swim with the current or drown. For such a proud and self-satisfied people, the pill was unsavory, and has ever left a profound bitterness rankling in the minds of the ruling and literary classes. Though the foreigner has been admitted, it has never been on a footing of equality. He is neither a friend nor a teacher, and has against him that his ability, learning, superiority and success cast into strong relief the incompetence of the Chinese. He is moreover suspected of casting a longing eye on the land, and this is corroborated by the German grab of Kiaochau, the present-day policy of Japan and Russia in Manchuria, and the international rivalry for railway and mining concessions.

For these and sundry other reasons, the foreigner is hated. There hovers around him an atmosphere of opposition, prejudice and suspicion which cannot be removed except by mutual trust, recognition of all that is good in each other's civilization, genuine cooperation for the betterment of the country and the strict application of treaty rights, foreign Powers avoiding all undue interference with China's internal administration, development and various reforms. China on the other hand should carry out all necessary reforms in due time, effectively and not on paper, for the benefit of the people and not for that of the official class, and utilize for this purpose her ablest men instead of degrading them for silly and obsolete motives of ritual. In all international relations, she should also maintain towards foreign countries a spirit of cordial reciprocity and sympathy and discard prejudice as unbecoming a great nation.

On Tuesday, December 23, 1,014 sailors and marines from the United States squadron, Tennessee, Washington, Wilmington, Cleveland, Helena, Callao, Samar and Villalobos were entertained at the Town Hall by the American Women's Club, and a very enjoyable time was spent. During the treat, the municipal band discoursed national music. At the conclusion of the luncheon, Dr. A. P. Wilder, Consul-General for the States, delivered a short address of welcome and said that Shanghai was a model of efficient government and honesty in finances. Here British, Americans, French, Germans, Japanese and Chinese all walked hand in hand. He then reminded them that the protection of their country's flag extended to the Far East, and the 80,000,000 people of the United States hoped that their men in the navy would show themselves brave in times of war and gentlemen in days of peace. Judge Rufus Thayer, Mr. Cheshire, Inspector of U. S. Consulates in China, A. Basset, U. S. District Attorney, Dr. Ferguson, ex-Protestant missionary adviser to the Nanking Viceroy, Dr. Hinckley, clerk of the U. S. Court and other prominent members of the American community were among those present on the occasion.

Admiral Sebree returned suitable thanks to the ladies and gentlemen for the excellent entertainment provided and requested the men to give three cheers for the American ladies of Shanghai and three others for the Consul-General.

The fleet left Shanghai on the 30th for Japan, the men having been delighted with their short stay in the great commercial metropolis of the East and the generous hospitality lavished on them by their countrymen.

Notes From Japan

The Japanese Government has decided to convert Port Arthur into an auxiliary port of Dalny or Tairen. The reasons are that Tairen is imperfect in its equipments as a port, and moreover the port is frozen over during winter, so that small freight goods from South China are imported to Manchuria via Newchwang. The railway between Tairen and Port Arthur is, therefore, not serviceable in winter except as a military line. If Port Arthur is opened goods from South China would be landed there instead of Newchwang. It is, however, well understood that the Government will not abolish the naval station in any circumstances, but Port Arthur will be made a half military and half commercial port.

Tokio and Osaka are vying with each other as to which shall furnish the greater scandal in connection with municipal corruption. Thus far victory rests with Tokio in the number of arrests made, but in the quality of the crimes committed, Osaka easily takes the lead. The charges in Tokio are limited to mere dishonesty in carrying out contracts; in Osaka they include theft, forgery, attempted murder and other heinous crimes. What renders the Osaka case particularly detestable is that the frauds were perpetrated at the expense of the sufferers from a recent conflagration. Instead of extending to them the relief which their charitable fellow-citizens provided, the provisions and clothing furnished for that purpose have been sold to supply the pilferers with funds for purposes of riotous living.

Anglican Church Elections

LONDON, FEBRUARY 5, 1910.

The general election is over, but there is another series of elections in progress of which the average politician and newspaper reader hears very little, but which have a certain interest for Catholics, partly from the history of the bodies that are being elected and partly because of their bearing on the religious situation in England generally. When Parliament is dissolved and a general election takes place, there is a simultaneous dissolution of the two Convocations of Canterbury and York, and an election of new Convocations follows. The two Convocations are the synods of the Established Church of England. Their origin dates back to Catholic days, and the contrast between their position before and after the Reformation throws a striking light on the strange theory of Anglican continuity.

The medieval Convocations were the Provincial synods of York and Canterbury, in which bishops and clergy met under the presidency of their archbishops, first to make purely ecclesiastical regulations, and secondly to grant subsidies to the Crown at its request, for the clergy and church property were not taxed by the lay Parliament. When Henry VIII began his process of enslaving the Church, one of his first acts was the passing of a law by which the Convocations were forbidden to enact any new ecclesiastical canons without special license from the king.

Queen Mary restored the freedom of the Convocations and under Elizabeth the last important act of the Catholic Convocation of Canterbury was a formal protest against the Act of Royal Supremacy and the substitution of the Book of Common Prayer for the Mass. In its resolutions presented by the bishops of the House of Lords, Convocation declared its belief in the Real Presence, Transubstantiation, the Sacrifice of the Mass, and the Supremacy of the Pope, and protested that to decide on doctrine, sacraments and ecclesiastical discipline belonged not to any lay assembly, but to the lawful pastors of the Church (Wilkins, Concilia, iv, 179).

The protest was overruled by the lay Parliament. Those who signed it were deprived of their benefices, imprisoned or exiled. The Convocations formed out of the new Protestant episcopate, and the clergy of the Elizabethan establishment, were mere deliberative bodies having no effective power whatever. Parliament was to rule the Church of England and the lay judges were to interpret the new legislation. So things went on until, in the days of King George I, the Convocation of Canterbury made an ill advised attempt to assert itself. It was in 1717 when Bishop Hoadly, most subservient of State prelates, preached a famous sermon before the King, who did not know enough English to understand five words of it. The text was "My Kingdom is not of this World," and Hoadly's thesis was that Christ had not delegated His powers to any ecclesiastical authorities whatever. Convocation adopted a resolution condemning the theory of the courtly bishop, and the King's ministers replied by proroguing it, and then for a century and a half Convocation was not even allowed to play at Church government.

The meetings of the Canterbury Convocation were revived in 1852, and of the York assembly in 1856. The clergy of every diocese elect representatives or proctors whenever there is a general election to Parliament, and these proctors and the bishops form the Convocations. They have not the smallest vestige of legislative power. The members can only express pious opinions and pass recommendations. Not a word, not a rubric of the Prayer-Book can be altered by Convocation. The Book is, strictly speaking, a schedule or appendix to an Act of the lay Parliament and only that Parliament can alter it in any way. Neither can Convocation or the Bishops' courts decide on the meaning or effect of any canon or rubric; the ultimate decision rests only with the King's courts. The contrast between the actual position of Convocation and that asserted by the Catholic Convocation of 1559 is sufficiently clear.

A "House of Laymen," made up of lay delegates of the southern dioceses, now sits concurrently with the Convocation of Canterbury, but forms no integral part of it. The House of Laymen can of course only express opinions. In the elections now proceeding there is a trial of strength between the High Church party on the one side, and on the other the Low Church and the rationalizing parties which combine forces against the advocates of "sacerdotalism" in the Establishment. The High Churchmen are better organized and are likely to carry most of their candidates. They are putting forth special efforts in order to be in a position to resist in Convocation the agitation for the revision of the prayer book. Of course the actual revision would have to be the work of Parliament, but the Government is likely to be influenced in its attitude towards any Bill in Parliament by the resolutions of Convocation. The late Convocation of Canterbury adopted by a small majority a resolution the practical effect of which would be to remove from the Church Service the Athanasian creed, on account of its definite assertions of the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation and Eternal Punishment. This has caused much searching of heart as to their whole position among the more orthodox members of the establishment, and serious anxiety as to what a general revision of the Prayer Book might lead to.

Then there is another thorny question arising out of the decision of the King's courts that although the canons of the Established Church rigidly forbid marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and declare it contrary to the law of God, the new civil law on the subject overrides the canon, and a clergyman who stands by the canon may incur serious consequences. The High Church position is becoming more and more untenable.

It is difficult for one who does not closely follow the development of affairs in the Establishment to realize the existing confusion. For instance—the Bishop of London is a "sacerdotalist"—a High Churchman, who believes he is a priest and the legitimate successor of St. Augustine's Bishop of London, the Roman monk St. Mellitus, and of the miracle-worker St. Erconwald of Saxon days. Yet in his ecclesiastical court, his diocesan chancellor, Dr. Tristram (a lay lawyer, by the way) has twice lately decided that a stone-topped communion table cannot be erected in a church of the Establishment, for stone suggests an altar and the English church has no altars only "communion tables." Further one of the prominent members of a Council of laymen that this High Church bishop has formed to help him in church work is Lord Kinnaid. His Lordship is, however, one of the candidates put forward by the Low Church or "Evangelical party" for the Canterbury "House of Laymen." And one of the High Church papers points out that Lord Kinnaid goes to Scotland each year to preside as the King's representative at the annual assembly of the Established Church of Scotland, which is a Presbyterian and Calvinistic body. This does not prevent him from being one of the trusted helpers of the High Church Bishop of London in diocesan work. But then when the King goes to Scotland, at the moment when the royal train reaches the middle of the Tweed railway bridge he ceases to be an Anglican and becomes a Presbyterian. He always attends the Presbyterian Sunday service in Scotland, as his mother used to do. He rejoins the Established Church as the train runs back into Northumberland.

No wonder that there is a gathering force in favor of Disestablishment among the members of the Establishment itself. Zealous High Churchmen resent the slavery of the State, though it spring from the very origin of their church. Low Churchmen hope that in a disestablished Church more effective measures could be taken against Ritualism than is possible under the present system of compromise, and with the slow process of the law courts. Then there is among the younger clergy a growing Socialist party that resents State control on other grounds than those of the "Anglican Catholics." Changes come slowly in an Establishment the first principle of which is that the greatest point in Church government is to avoid definite decisions, and keep things much as they are, without doing anything "to force earnest men out of the Church" no matter what form their earnestness takes. Newman once described the typical prelates of the Establishment as "sensible, temperate, sober, well-judging persons, fit to guide it through the channel of No-meaning, between the Scylla and Charybdis of Yea and No." But fundamental questions are now being pressed home, and such steering is more difficult. Critical times are coming for the Established Church of England.

Ferrer's Schools

MANRESA, SPAIN, JANUARY 28, 1910.

Just one week after the demonstration held in Barcelona in favor of the condemned rioters of last fall, the militant element of Catholic Cataluña held a meeting, in the same city, to protest against the action of the present government in reopening the "Escuelas Modernas," and to prevent a similar action in favor of those that remain still closed.

These so-called "Escuelas Modernas" were put on foot by Ferrer, with money received from the infatuated Miss Le Meunier, for the purpose, if you please, of caring for destitute children. The "Escuelas Modernas," though, are nothing else, but hot-beds of godless anarchy, as is evident from Ferrer's own words, from the textbooks written for these schools, from the answers given by their pupils, and lastly from the deeds of last fall. I need not quote, as AMERICA must have received, by this time, the official documents.

Last Sunday's meeting was, indeed, a success, especially if we take into consideration, that it was gotten up in less than a week. It was held in the Tivoli theatre, which is said to seat about four thousand. The place was fairly packed. They say, in fact, that many had to return home, since they were not allowed to gather in the streets adjacent.

When Don Dalmacio Iglesia came forward with his opening speech, he knew that he was backed by no less than 705 different associations. The five speakers, with eloquent and convincing arguments, treated the theme of the day—the "Escuelas Modernas" and stigmatized them as godless, unpatriotic, illegal and unscientific. Their most convincing arguments were based on the very textbooks written for those schools. The last speaker, Señor Conde de Pomés, as an introduction to his speech, said that he was proud to place before the house fifty thousand signatures of the ladies of the land, protesting with them against the reopening of the "Escuelas Modernas."

After formulating a vigorous and dignified protest to be presented to the government, the meeting was brought to a close.

Letters and telegrams from various quarters were read during the session and the telegram of Cardinal Aguirre, the Primate of Spain, was received with great enthusiasm and acclamations.

They say that they are thinking of holding a large meeting to counteract the demonstration held in favor of the condemned, but I have seen no confirmation of the report.

Lectures on Socialism

Under the auspices of the Institute of Scientific Study, the Rev. Dr. W. J. Kerby, of the Catholic University, lectured on "Private Property and Socialism" in Cathedral College, this city, on the evening of February 16, to an audience of about twelve hundred men of all creeds, classes and political convictions. Archbishop Farley presided, and the Director of the Institute, Rev. W. B. Martin, at the opening, announced that, while no interruptions of the speaker would be permitted, as he was making an exposition of his subject and was not conducting a debate, at the close of Dr. Kerby's address all questions would be answered. This program was carried out, and when Dr. Kerby ended he aptly replied to several queries put to him by unmistakable partisans of Socialistic theories.

The next day in the daily press, notably the World, there appeared an alleged report of the lecture that not only distorted what Dr. Kerby had said, but gave wholly mendacious details of a disturbance supposed to have taken place inside and outside the hall. There was no disorder as thus stated, and no interruptions of the speakers. The report, like the words it put into Dr. Kerby's mouth, was at entire variance with fact.

Catholics, however, sometimes are partially responsible for such disorders. They do not know the malice of Socialists, and, hoping for their conversion, invite them to a conference. These accept the invitation expecting to convert their hosts by confounding the lecturer. In a western city a parochial society of young men invited a priest, a professor of Ethics, to address them on Socialism in their parish hall. When he stepped upon the platform he saw to his surprise the front benches occupied by a compact body of men bearing all the external marks of the demoniac. The young men were not to be seen. In their simplicity they thought they had done a good work by collecting all the Socialists in the neighborhood, who were nothing loth to come in. Fortunately the lecturer did not lack courage. He went through with his task. But from the beginning his lecture was accompanied with a running commentary from the front benches and interrupted with contradictions, the usual charges of ignorance, insults and clamors. Three morals may be drawn. First, don't invite Socialists to Catholic meetings, as the devil within them will break out. Second, if a lecturer is to address Socialists, let him know beforehand, and have sufficient material force to compel these to be as decent as possible. Third, learn from what has happened, what tyrants Socialists will be, if ever they get the upper hand.

Reform of the Russian Calendar

Professor P. M. Saladiloff, a writer in the Novoe Vremya of St. Petersburg, has proposed a workable plan for the reform of the Russian Calendar. As is well known, the Russian Empire uses the old style or Julian Calendar, which is now thirteen days behind the new style or Gregorian Calendar, in use in all western European countries and in America. Russian business men and government officials have earnestly wished for the adoption of the reformed Gregorian Calendar so as to bring them in chronological harmony with the rest of Europe. The great obstacle is the Russian Orthodox Church, which is unwilling to change any of its old forms and associations, aided by the Russian popular idea that no innovations affecting Russian life should be adopted from outside nations.

The Russian Orthodox Greek Church regards the reformed calendar as a "Latin novelty" not to be adopted or encouraged, and in the eyes of the people such adoption could be considered equivalent to yielding several points to Rome. On the other hand, learned Russian savants have made much of some minute errors in the Gregorian Calendar, whereby a day is lost in a little over 3,000 years, and have proposed a much more accurate calendar of their own devising which will avoid this. But this calendar does not at all coincide with the Gregorian, or new style calendar, and the writer in the Novoe Vremya will have none of it.

He points out that its adoption would alienate the users as much from the church people as the adoption of the Gregorian Calendar, and on the other hand would not bring the Empire a whit nearer the usages of other European peoples, and thus would give rise to two inconveniences instead of one. At the same time he admits that to drop out thirteen days at once (as the English Government dropped out eleven in 1754) would be almost revolutionary, and, among the more fanatic and ill-educated churchmen, might produce schism and dire confusion, especially as the moveable feasts in the year

(such as Easter, Ascension, and the like) would be vastly changed. He proposes a simpler plan whereby the old calendar will catch up with the new calendar by the year 1912, after which the Russian calendar will be the same as that of the rest of the world.

As there are seven months in the year (January, March, May, July, August, October and December) which have thirty-one days, Professor Saladiloff suggests that if the government will direct that, for the years 1910 and 1911, commencing with March, 1910, these months be reckoned with only thirty days, the whole thirteen days may be dropped and the first of January, 1912, fall according to the new style. Thus June 1, 1910, will only be ten days behind; January 1, 1911, will only be seven days behind; June 1, 1911, only four days behind, and November 1, 1911, only one day behind, which will be wiped out by leaving the day off December, 1911. In this manner the writer thinks that the change can be accomplished with the least amount of inconvenience, and without making the change too apparent and too sudden.

Canada and the Empire

When the proposal for Colonial navies was accepted almost unanimously in England a few months ago, AMERICA pointed out that such a step would lead necessarily to colonial independence. Events seem to be justifying our view. In Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier has determined that the employment of his navy in imperial affairs must depend upon the consent of the Canadian Parliament; and, lest any should suppose the consent a mere formality, he is claiming for the Parliament a power hitherto unheard of.

"We are under the suzerainty of the King of England, and we bow the knee to him. But the King of England has no more rights over us than are allowed him by our own Canadian Parliament," said Sir Wilfrid Laurier last January in Toronto; and as Prime Minister, standing in his place in Parliament, he accepted the responsibility of his words. These seem to contradict facts and theories alike. The Dominion of Canada is the creature of the Imperial Government. It exists by virtue of the British North America Act, 1867. Its Parliament has the same origin and can do only what the Act empowers it to do. Before the Canadian Courts the constitutionality of an Act of Canada's Parliament would turn upon this point: is it within the powers conferred by the Act, or not? And the last resort in such a question would be to the Court of Appeal of the Imperial Parliament. Constitutionally the suzerainty of the King of England and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament are antecedent to the existence of the Canadian Parliament and therefore are not the matter of any grant by it. As a constitutional lawyer Sir Wilfrid Laurier knows this quite well: as a popular leader he puts it all aside to assert its contrary.

Nevertheless, his position is perfectly clear. Canada is past the time of tutelage. Coming to her majority, she holds herself no longer bound by facts which she connects essentially with her long minority, during which England was, so to speak, her trustee, administering for her those things to which the title was her own and of which the use had to be hers in the end. He cannot be called disloyal, for the principles he uses have been commended by English statesmen over and over again to the revolutionists of Europe and South America; and the so-called constitutional development working out in England under our eyes, rests upon them. No political right can be founded on a mere fact, every modern politician says virtually, but upon the fact in relation to its environment, and more upon this than on the fact itself; so that when relations change old rights disappear and new ones come up. Whether this gives a stable or a moral political system, is a question which does not touch the statesmen of the British Empire at home or over-sea. The practical point now is whether the Canadian people follow Sir Wilfrid Laurier or not. If they do, the suzerainty of the British throne, as admitted by him, is nothing, since the Canadian Parliament is free to recognize or reject it, and the frail legal ties that bind Canada to the Empire will snap one after another. If they do not, there is still a chance for Imperial Federation, England's only hope.

In his Supplementa et Monumenta Periodica, Father Vermeersch, S.J., publishes a Rescript signed by Mgr. John Bressan, private secretary to His Holiness, in which, under date of July 19, 1909, it is declared that His Holiness will view with pleasure the wearing of a medal as a substitute for any and all scapulars; that the scapular itself, properly made, must be used when one is invested, as no other pious object should replace it for this ceremony; that greater cleanliness or convenience is a sufficient reason for wearing the medal instead of the scapular, or scapulars, nor is it necessary to disturb one's self in looking for other motives; that it suffices to carry the medal about one, and it is not required to carry it suspended from the neck or concealed by the clothing.

Father Ferreres, S.J., the famous Spanish moralist, writing in Razón y Fe for February, 1910, comments on the Rescript as follows:

"After having been invested with any scapular with all the prescribed prayers and ceremonies, the recipient may lay it aside and wear in its stead a medal blessed for this purpose by His Holiness or by any duly authorized person. One and the same medal will represent not only all the scapulars that have been duly conferred already, but also all others with which one may be invested after getting the medal. With regard to the scapular of Mount Carmel, which enjoys certain promises made by Our Lady, as well as privileges granted by the Popes, it may be held that the form and way of wearing that scapular are left to the judgment of the Vicar of Christ. The medal may be worn suspended from the neck over the inner garments, or sewed to the clothing, or fastened in a buttonhole, or loose in the pocket, or attached to a rosary. Upon retiring, it may be left with the garments or laid on a table or hung on the wall."

At present, it seems that few outside of Rome have the necessary faculties for blessing medals for this purpose. Thus far, as no particular form has been prescribed for them, the one essential condition is that they be blessed for this particular use by His Holiness or by some person duly authorized by him.

In some parts of the world, notably in England, when a newspaper transgresses the limit of truth, or otherwise offends the sensibility of a subscriber, he straightway writes a letter to the editor, not always in the most courteous terms. Whether his screed be published or not, he has the satisfaction of having discharged the vials of his wrath upon the head of the offender. The practice might with advantage be more commonly adopted in our own country. Here the offended reader too often writes to the editor of a non-offending paper in which he hopes to read the correction. There was a time when our newspapers generally prospered, or imagined they did, by attacking one or more "esteemed contemporaries," and religious organs, we regret to say, were not more irenic than the secular press. Editorial courtesy is the rule now. Rarely does any leading newspaper advert to another to correct misstatements. Whether it be that each has its distinct group of readers few of whom ever read another newspaper, or because editors attach but slight importance to what they publish, true or false, they give little time or space to criticising or correcting what appears in other journals. It is doubtful if they see it at all; but they, or their subordinates, do see the letter to the editor.

In commending letters to the offending editor, we are not implying that we object to receiving letters about misstatements in newspapers or other periodicals, in such, especially, as we have not an opportunity of reading. We examine weekly about two hundred publications, but we are aware that hundreds of others occasionally lapse from the truth, not always intentionally, but as a rule for lack of proper sources of information. Very frequently these lapses concern religion or morality, and it is the province of AMERICA to correct such errors, not with the vain hope of setting the offending newspaper aright, though this also may often be the result, but in order to provide our readers with information they cannot easily obtain elsewhere and to enable them to meet the difficulties and doubts which such misleading statements occasion in the minds of others. We are not so presumptuous as to imagine we can correct every such error, but we shall do our share. Still this does not relieve the reader who writes to us of the responsibility of writing to the offending editor as well.

The revelations about our food supplies should dispose the nation to a more ascetical mode of life, at least as regards eating and drinking. With so few edibles fresh and scarcely anything pure, the fundamental pleasure of appetite is impossible. The most exquisite condiments cannot long palliate decay. All that medical research can do to promote longevity must be undone by the adulteration and spoiling of the simplest food stuffs. The crust and water, the herbs and lentils of the hermit, were honest and nourishing, if not stimulating sustenance. If we join anti-meat movements because of the high prices, why not also because of the quality, or loss of quality, in what is sold for fresh meat? We have been living in the illusion that we were deriving our strength and sustaining our native energies by taking meat at almost every meal. Now that the cruel illusion has been dispelled, perhaps we may not find Lent the great hardship or the strength reducing season we imagined it to be, because forsooth we abstained from a food that had lost its savor.

The country is in a whirl of investigations. The courts are investigating trusts; Congress is investigating Departments; Departments are investigating general conditions; public prosecutors are after trade combinations, and State assemblies are unveiling their own venality. The chief aim of the investigators as well as the investigated seems to be to put limits on discoveries and disclosures. One would like to believe that these inquiries are conducted in good faith, even when they have been started reluctantly. The scandal they cause would in some degree be offset by the sincerity of examination and by the punishment either of the guilty party or of the unjust accuser. When so many investigations end without clear conviction or exoneration of the accused, the impression obtains that the parties are not in earnest, or that they are seeking at most some political effect. In any case the number and the futility of official investigations which have become the order of the day, is demoralizing. They confirm the suspicion that our political and commercial ideals are as low as they can possibly be. One rich corporation dissolved, one dishonest financier or venal legislator behind prison bars, and we should need fewer if any investigations for years to come.

The success of the sixth annual performance of the Catholic Oratorio Society should encourage the promoters and patrons of this difficult enterprise. Those who recall the first performance at Mendelssohn Hall can appreciate the progress which has been made in so brief a period. All this has been achieved without money foundation, and with an organization almost entirely of volunteers. Dvorák's "Saint Ludmila" was given for the first time in this country last Sunday evening at Carnegie Hall. The story of the conversion of Bohemia was unusually well narrated in the libretto.

LITERATURE

PASCAL'S LATEST EULOGIST.

In the Revue des Deux Mondes for February, M. Victor Giraud, one of the editors of this review and one who has published special editions of some of Pascal's works and two books on his philosophy and influence, writes on "L'évolution religieuse de Pascal." The facts and quotations are of course critically correct, the tone of the article is deeply religious and ascetical, but the tendency is distinctly in favor of Jansenistic spirituality. Anent the convent of Port Royal, of whose inmates Bossuet said that they were pure as angels and proud as devils, M. Giraud says that "the attitude so generous and so truly Christian of the entire holy household, of Mother Angélique in particular, made a keen and lasting impression on" Blaise Pascal.

However, M. Giraud's admiration for Jansenist virtue does not delude him into defending the "Provinciales," that blot on Pascal's otherwise pure memory, that book which Joseph de Maistre aptly styled "les immortelles menteuses," immortal because the matchless style needs no verbal change after more than two centuries and a half, and marks the earliest specimen of French classic literature, and yet full of misrepresentations and garbled quotations, for which he trusted blindly, as M. Giraud himself admits, to his friends of Port Royal. In fact M. Giraud assures us that the nuns of that famous convent, especially Mother Angélique, had doubts and scruples as to the righteousness of the weapons used in their defence, and points out that Pascal himself, dismayed at the wrong his bitter onslaughts might do to the cause of the true religion, left his nineteenth and last "Provinciale" unfinished, and turned to other work.

M. Giraud goes so far as to aver that even if Pascal had been right on all points in his controversy with the Jesuits, "he was completely and deplorably mistaken on the fundamental question of casuistry. No one but a mere theorist can believe that morality is always very clear, and that the problems which it presents may be solved as easily as a theorem of geometry. No, duty does not always speak so distinctly as Pascal seems to think. Very often the difficulty lies not in doing, but in knowing well what we are to do. Besides, there are contradictory duties, and we all know of very sincere and very pure consciences that have long struggled in anxious doubt between the conflicting claims of morality. Moral life, when properly understood, is, perhaps but a succession of cases of conscience to be solved. How, then, and in virtue of what right can one proscribe casuistry, which, coeval with humanity itself, will doubtless disappear only with the human race? But royal intellects like Pascal's have not always such scruples: the real, in its humble truth, escapes them sometimes; and they find it hard to die to themselves and give up once for all the systems over which they linger and with which they are charmed."

These words of M. Giraud's may perhaps help to explain what does not seem to have puzzled him, viz., how so habitually conscientious, so self-denying, so God-seeking a man as Pascal can have been so infatuated with Jansenist errors as never to have forsaken them even at the hour of death, and never to have had the honesty to retract the clearly proven falsehoods of the "Provinciales." He was a man of one idea. Possessed by it, he despised everything else. At first his mind was absorbed by mathematics and physics. Then he became intellectually converted to God. Finally, his heart was touched. He thought he had received a supernatural vision of the God of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, and of Jesus Christ, of the greatness of the human soul.

This brought him joy and tears of joy, and made him feel that he must become a saint. M. Giraud thinks he did. He gave up his beloved geometry cheerfully, bore sharp bodily pain, practised corporal mortification, tried to be humble and to despise himself, he who had so long delighted in excelling, as he did, by the sheer strength of his genius, all his fellow countrymen. We have no right to sit in judgment on the sincerity of a man whose mind was too theoretical to be thoroughly sane and human. We may safely leave him to the uncovenanted mercies of the only All-seeing and just Judge.

SOME LITERARY BOOKS.

G. P. Putnam's Sons (New York) are the American publishers of the Leslie Stephen Lecture on "Tennyson," delivered last year at Cambridge by William Paton Ker. The little booklet is a worthy memorial of the Tennyson centennial. The style of the lecture is academic and dignified, and not verbose. A large amount of ground is covered, and some important principles of poetic criticism clearly enunciated and aptly illustrated.

"The Social Ideals of Alfred Tennyson," by William Clark Gordon (Chicago: University of Chicago Press) is a book that has been before the public for several years. The author tells us in his preface that it was written originally as a thesis for the degree of doctor of philosophy at the University of Chicago. As a consequence, the contents of the book are somewhat formal in their presentation and over-conscientious in their thoroughness. But a lover of Tennyson will find it pleasant to follow the author in his gathering of data wherewith to determine the attitude of the poet towards such momentous subjects as man, woman, the family, society, "State and Church" (the precedence is noteworthy), democracy and progress.

We are inclined to agree with the conclusion that Tennyson "believed in God, in Christianity, and the Established Church, though he steadfastly refused to become the partisan of any creed." Of course, there seems to be a contradiction somewhere in the above statement: but even the contradiction has objectivity in Tennyson's own confessions.

Professor C. T. Winchester discourses entertainingly and instructively on literary subjects in "A Group of English Essayists of the Nineteenth Century" (New York: The Macmillan Co.) Six essayists are chosen for treatment in as many chapters—Jeffrey, Hazlitt, Lamb, De Quincey, John Wilson and Leigh Hunt. While the author's main purpose is critical his method is largely biographical, and the subjective quality in the writers whom he deals with justifies him fully in his course of interpreting each writer by the facts of his life. It is needless to add that this method also ensures attractiveness, as well as clearness, to the professor's criticisms, which are marked in general by excellent judgment and unaffected style.

The "Brother Luiz de Sousa" of Viscount de Almeida Garrett has been translated from the original Portuguese into English by Edgar Prestage, and published by Elkin Mathew (London). The author of the original lived in the first half of the nineteenth century and owed his un-Portuguese surname to a strain of Irish blood in his father's family. "Brother Luiz" represents his best work and is a successful acting play, still able to command large audiences in the theatres of Lisbon. One is struck by its air of weird symbolism,—a quality which modern critics credit Maeterlinck with introducing into literature. Indeed, the play anticipates so notably some of the latest peculiarities of the drama that a reader, unacquainted with the history of its origin, would be inclined to see in it the influence, not only of Maeterlinck, but of Ibsen also. The translator has been successful in his work, if the proof of a good translation lies in giving it the freedom and naturalness of an original composition. In the second scene of the first act, however, there is a curious mistake. Magdalena is made to speak of the Redemptorists. As the action of the play takes place in the seventeenth century and the Redemptorists did not come into existence till the eighteenth century, the Redemptionists, or Trinitarians, must be the order referred to.

It is nearly twenty years ago since Coventry Patmore deliberately placed Mrs. Alice Meynell among the foremost living writers of English prose. This was an authoritative classification which no one has ever disputed. Mrs. Meynell's latest publication, "Ceres' Runaway and Other Essays," (New York: John Lane Company), is in her characteristic manner. One cannot analyze these essays, laying bare their logical structure and following them down to their roots. They are the flowers and fair petals of thought, suggesting intellectual processes, but mainly occupied in flinging fragrance upon every wind.

A NEW JESUIT REVIEW.

The French Jesuits have inaugurated a bi-monthly review, entitled Recherches de Science Religieuse. In their foreword to the first issue (Jan.-Feb. 1910) they state that the review will publish short articles which purpose to keep one in touch with the advance of religious thought. Bulletins will tell the actual state of research along various lines of ecclesiastical studies. Now and then short documents will be published, so long as they have not hitherto been in print or are practically out of reach of the ordinary student. The spirit of the review will be one of entire submission to the authoritative teaching of the Church and of up-to-date scientific method.

The leading articles of this first number of Recherches are by Fathers Lebreton and Lammens. Father Lebreton is professor of the history of dogmas in the Catholic Institute of Paris. He contributes a scholarly article of twenty-four pages on the question of the faith of the new born Church in the Lord Jesus. This article is to be incorporated in Father Lebreton's "Histoire des Origines du Dogme de la Trinité" (Beauchesne) which he announces will shortly appear.

Father Lebreton's article is brim full with learning, and at once discriminates Recherches from Etudes, the semi-monthly review written by the French Jesuits in more popular form. Critical references in Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek, as well as citations from the modern German and English exegetes are given in notes; so that the learned text is not heavily packed with an erudition that may not be of use to priests who have not kept up their seminary studies.

Naturally the arguments of Father Lebreton are drawn from the apostolic writings. The preaching of the apostles, as set forth in the Acts, portrays Jesus as the God's Anointed, the Messiah; nay, gives to Him attributes that can be explained only in the hypothesis of the divinity of Jesus. The sum and all of the preaching recorded in the Acts, Father Lebreton shows, is a faith in a Messiahship of Jesus such as the Jews did not reach; the Messiahship of Jesus was much more universal and far reaching in its influence than the Messiahship that the Jews of His time conceived. The Messiahship of Jesus meant that which Jesus came to bring. He brought salvation, and that not to the Jews alone but to all the world. His double office of Lord and Saviour of all depends upon his altogether unique relation with God. From God He has received all that He has; with God He is united in such wise as no man ever was or could be united; He is God's Son. The preaching of the divine Sonship, Father Lebreton shows, is not recorded in the Acts outside of two passages (9-20 and 13-33); and even in these two passages, it is the preaching of St. Paul that is recorded. Father Lebreton makes a thorough study of the preaching and teaching of the great Apostle on the subject of the divinity of Christ. The argument is against the French Modernist.

The Rationalist and advanced Protestant scholar of to-day outside of France will readily admit the thesis of Father Lebreton and most of his proofs. That the new born Church believed in the divinity of Christ is admitted by many who deny that divinity either by their frank avowal of Unitarianism or by a covert giving up of all the ground of the old belief in the Godhead of the Christ. Today Harnack, the Lutheran Professor of Church History in the University of Berlin, brings Christianity down to its lowest common denominator. What is that lowest common denominator of the Christianity of Christ,—i. e. of Christ of Harnack? The belief in God the Father! Christ did not reveal Himself but only His Father! Christ is not the revealed object but only the revealing subject of the revelation of Jesus. Christianity does not at all include the belief in Jesus as God! Christianity is essentially the belief in God the Father! Such being the case, we can understand how Presbyterian ministers invite their fellow Jewish rabbi to preach Christianity to a Christian congregation. If Christianity be boiled down to a belief in God the Father of us all, the Jew is as much a Christian as is any one of us.

How came it then, that Christianity was for so many years discriminated from Judaism? Paul is to blame! "Away from Paul! Los von Paulus! Back to Christ." Such is the latest cry that springs upon us as a "chip from a German workshop." Jülicher of Tübingen, Schmiedel of Zurich and others send that cry over the land. Paul foisted on the Church Jesus as God; Paul fabricated the whole doctrine of the atonement! Away from Paul! Away from all these ideas! All this is not Christianity but (to coin a word) Paulinity! Paulinity must go! Christianity must come! Such is the tenor of the writings of the men I have cited. They follow in the wake of Harnack's work, "The Essence of Christianity." If any one thinks all this an exaggeration, he has only to read the current writings of Jülicher, Schmiedel, Drews (who does not even admit that Jesus ever existed) and other "ministers of the Gospel" who teach the future Lutheran and Calvinistic preachers of the Word of God in Germany and Switzerland. Indeed there is no need to go so far over the sea. The latest contribution to Christian apologetics is a work entitled "Jesus or Christ" (Boston, 1910). Of the ministers that contribute to this symposium, twelve deny the divinity of Jesus, many deny that He was even the Christ, only one gives an unreserved and a safe defence of the divinity and Messiahship of Jesus; that one is the Catholic contributor, Father Rickaby, S.J.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Under the Sanctuary Lamp: The Hills that Jesus Loved. Reflections for the Holy Hour. By the Rev. JOHN H. O'ROURKE, S.J. New York: Apostleship of Prayer. Price, 50 cents.

The reflections contained in this excellent little volume have been reprinted with some revisions from the pages of the Messenger of the Sacred Heart. There are twenty-one papers on some mysteries of our Lord's life from the Visitation to the Ascension. Priests will find in the book passages suitable for reading during the celebration of the Holy Hour; religious and the laity will welcome it for spiritual reading.

Reviews and Magazines

The first contribution in the February issue of La Revue Canadienne is "Un Souvenir de 1838," two letters from J. N. Cardinal, one of the Canadian rebels who suffered the death penalty. On the eve of his execution he wrote to his wife two separate letters the same night, December 30, 1838. They are here published by the Rev. Elie-J. Auclair, who adds some valuable historical notes. Father Auclair received them from a daughter of the writer, Mrs. Barcelo, who is still living. The letters are full of sorrow for past faults, resignation to God's will, and exhortation to frequent reception of the Sacraments, so that his wife, soon to be his widow, may be better able to bear her cross. Cardinal wrote these letters because he had been refused a last interview with his wife; but at 11.30 that night she was finally allowed to see him with two of her children. Rev. Canon Choquette, head of St. Hyacinth College, and a popular lecturer, chiefly on scientific subjects, contributes extracts from a lecture he delivered last autumn in Quebec and Montreal. The title of the paper, "Les Revenants du Pôle Nord," which may mean either "those who came back" or "the ghosts" from the North Pole, is justified by the Canon's contention that the only thing certain about Dr. Cook and Lieutenant Peary is that they both came back from the arctic regions. It has yet to be proved, thinks Canon Choquette, that either of them reached the Pole. This opinion, expressed long before the University of Copenhagen had repudiated Dr. Cook, would carry more weight if the writer had mentioned the extraordinary and hitherto unexplained similarity between the two narratives of Cook and Peary as first published in the New York newspapers. "Un Saint Inconnu," a biographical sketch of the Blessed Jean Eudes, beatified on the 25th of last April, is interestingly written by the Eudist, Father P. M. Dagnaud. The history and aims of the International Catholic Truth Society are effectively treated by the Rev. Philippe Perrier, who pleads for the founding of a similar society in Canada. In "Pages de Littérature Sociologique" the Rev. Emile Chartier shows the wholesome tendency of that recent literary movement in France which emphasizes and develops the resources and traditions of each writer's native province. Thus Taine is redolent of the Ardennes country, Botrel sings of Brittany, Mistral of Provence, Barrès mourns over Alsace-Lorraine, René Bazin is at home on the banks of the meandering Loire, and some of these are the foremost writers of France. Father Chartier thinks the same home-studying method should be adopted by French-Canadian men of letters. The Rev. M. Tamisier, S.J., thoroughly dissects and exposes the fallacies of Jean-Jacques Rousseau's "Contrat Social." "Pages d'Histoire" is one of a series of historical sketches by M. Ernest Gagnon, a learned Canadian historian. This chapter covers part of the most anxious period in the history of New France, the ten or twelve years immediately preceding the advent of the Marquis de Tracy with his Carignan regiment, which put an end to the Iroquois reign of terror. This particular period, when the very existence of the French colony was trembling in the balance, is, as handled by M. Gagnon, more thrilling than any novel, and, like a skilled novelist, he leaves the reader gasping over the probable fate of the fifty heroic French Catholic laymen who, when starting to found a white settlement in the heart of the Iroquois country, were ready to die for the Faith. "A Travers la Nature," by M. Luc Dupuis, is a sprightly description of some of the more peculiar birds, quadrupeds and insects, the paragraph on the gnu being particularly graphic. The veteran journalist, M. Thomas Chapais, writes, with a distinctly literary touch, a review of current events, dwelling especially on the result of the British elections, the parliamentary session in France, recent receptions into the French Academy, and the Canadian Naval Bill.

In the current number of Razón y Fe is a masterly article from the pen of A. Pérez Goyena on "The Scourges of France Today." A French writer had already included Spain among France's "intellectual colonies," namely, those countries which show a more or less marked tendency to ape French thought and action. Before his elevation to the office of Prime Minister, probably before he dreamed of such a metamorphosis, Señor Canalejas, Moret's successor as head of the Spanish cabinet, translated into Castilian, and put forward as a plank of his platform, Waldeck-Rousseau's laws against the Congregations. Certain elements in Spain's political world see in those laws the ideal that should exist in Spain between Church and State, between religion and politics, between conscience and action.

The first scourge is put down as race suicide, a disgustingly criminal state of affairs, which has attracted the attention of sociologists and publicists throughout the civilized world. "When there are more graves than cradles, it is the beginning of the end. Thus, on account of their own sins, must disappear from the world's stage those peoples that have torn to tatters the fundamental laws of life." A Spartan generation, breathing strength and life, was what the freethinkers proposed to develop by banishing monkish bias from the schools. Since 1902 school enrolment has fallen off, illiteracy has increased, and the attendance is only two-thirds of the enrolment. Delinquency, and even suicide, have increased so alarmingly, even among mere children, that it was not without reason that the French Academy of Moral and Political Sciences offered a prize of 2,000 francs in 1908 for the best paper on the causes of the increasing criminality among the young and the remedies therefor. This is the second scourge.

Antimilitarism has reached such a pass that agencies for the promotion of insubordination and desertion have been opened in France itself, with what success the frequent mutinies of soldiers under arms, and the monthly, and almost weekly, announcements of flight from barracks and escape to the nearest frontier, bear eloquent witness. The condition of the fleet is not a whit better than that of the army. The state of the army and navy constitutes the third scourge.

The laboring classes, crushed with heavy taxes, flee to the cities, where they are lost to sight as individuals and become factors in the ever-increasing army of Socialists. Alcoholism, crime and divorce have so sapped the vitality of the national character that together they form another scourge under which the country groans.

Dr. Hogan, the editor, in this month's issue of the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, closes the history of Maynooth in the British Parliament with the debate on the National University Bill of 1908. Contrary to numerous precedents in English Universities, several English members, Liberal as well as Conservative, were strongly opposed to the contention of the Irish members and the mild desire of Mr. Birrell that Maynooth should be affiliated with the new University without being compelled to subject its Arts students to residence in Dublin. Mr. Balfour was averse to such affiliation, though the provisions therefor were the same as in the English Universities' charters. Clergymen predominated in the English and Scotch boards of control, but priests would have more influence on teaching than Protestant ministers, hence such influence should be barred. Messrs. Redmond and O'Brien could not see that what was proper for parsons should be denounced as clericalism in priests, and finally Mr. Balfour reluctantly agreed that the powers of affiliation of the Irish University Board should not be limited. Barry O'Brien, in a well written paper, overemphasizes the influence of nationality as against that of religion. His view that national sentiment was at the root of English Protestantism is well sustained, though if Mary had reigned as long as Elizabeth or if James II were as strong a character as Henry VIII, their foreign alliances would hardly have hampered them. His contention that Ireland rejected Protestantism because it was offered by the "Sassenach" foe is against historic fact. The Celtic Irish were as opposed to the "Sassenach" before the Reformation as afterwards, and it was only then that the Anglo-Irish of the Pale joined hands with the "mere Irish" on the common ground of religion and became one with them. In Ireland, as in Belgium, it was religion that fostered and strengthened nationality. Other informing articles are "Catholic Ideals in Education," "The Philosophy of Energy" and a review of Father O'Kavanagh's translation of Cardinal Mercier's Conferences, which is called a classic in ascetic literature. "Rights and Privileges of Inferior Prelates" will be particularly useful to the clergy.

The February Canadian Magazine opens with "Evolution of Aerial Craft," by J. E. M. Fetherstonhaugh, who describes clearly the recent developments and the present state of aviation. Eight diagrams, giving sketches, plans and elevations of the Voisin biplane, the Curtiss biplane, the Blériot monoplane, and Mr. A. V. Roe's triplane, are great helps to laymen who have hitherto had but a vague understanding of the way these new machines work. "Catholic Church Extension," by Margaret Lillis Hart, frankly relates what has been done in the United States and Canada by the promoters of this praiseworthy movement. It is quite refreshing to find in a magazine that has thus far been somewhat pronouncedly Protestant an article condemning the Presbyterian proselytizers who try to capture unwary Ruthenians in the Canadian Northwest by masquerading as priests, saying Mass, administering the Seven Sacraments and distributing pictures of the Blessed Virgin. In reference to the Navy Bill the editor of this magazine, in order to prove how difficult is the settlement of such a question, briefly reviews, with fairness and competency, the needs and aspirations of each of the nine provinces of Canada, concluding with the remark "that Congress is not so important a body as the Dominion House of Commons, but the State Legislatures have a wider scope than the legislatures of the Canadian Provinces."

In the February New Ireland Review Philip Hanson completes his very practical paper on the causes and remedies for unemployment; Prof. Meldrum shows that William Higgins of Sligo (1768-1825) was, with his uncle, Bryan Higgins, the pioneer of modern chemistry; and Lena Butler, M. A., defends the utility of examinations in school-work, presumably written examinations on a set program after the manner of the Intermediate Board and the Royal Irish University. When the program is well devised and the questions are judiciously set, examinations serve as a stimulus and a direction, and conduce to clearness and exactitude of thought. These are useful and thoughtful articles worthy of New Ireland; there are two others that are unpleasantly new. Philip de Courcy attacks Irish ideals of the past, as the Norman de Courcy stormed the churches and monasteries he found in Ireland; however, the Norman set up new shrines on the sites of the old, but his destructive scion has nothing to replace what he demolishes. Colonel Pilkington takes up this task in "Ireland and the Crisis." Home Rule is coming, he thinks, but it will come only by instalments. Mr. Redmond is foolish in relying on the Liberals, who are not very anxious to solve Ireland's problem if they could, and could not if they would. The Unionist protection program suits Ireland's needs; hence the wise and magnanimous thing to do is to vote against the Budget, throw out the Liberals, put in the Tories without asking a single quid pro quo and rely on their generosity to give Ireland everything she wants; she has only to show her zealous attachment to the Empire to get it. This would make her a new Ireland indeed, but the condition seems unlikely of fulfilment.

The monthly, Truth, published by Father Price at Mazareth, near Raleigh, N. C., is deservedly regarded as one of the most tactful, capable and efficient defenders of our Faith. Moderate but uncompromising, it meets every difficulty squarely and gives a straightforward, simple answer, based on sound knowledge and an acquaintance with the needs of its readers. Its charity is as strong as its faith; in expounding Catholic doctrine fully and fairly, it never hurts the sensibilities of non-Catholics, and hence it has a large circulation among them, directly and indirectly. Many Catholics subscribe for several copies for distribution among their Protestant friends, a custom which is facilitated by the extremely low price of one dollar a year. The February number contains a lawyer's view of Infallibility, a remarkable tribute to the Church by a Protestant minister, a continuation of a most convincing exposition of the Church as established by Christ, the witnesses for a celibate priesthood, a full Question Box and apt Notes and Remarks.

EDUCATION

The Cornell Daily Sun, edited and published in Ithaca, New York, by the students of Cornell University, in its issue of February 11, chronicled a gruesome tale of fatalities resulting from the mid-year examinations recently brought to a close. No less than one hundred and sixty-two undergraduates have been dropped from the University, and fifty have been put upon probation, following the rigid tests imposed in January. The number is the largest in years, and shows a notable increase over that of the year 1907, when but fifty-one failures were posted from all the schools and colleges of Cornell. The School of Medicine alone is honored by non-appearance in the list, but all other Cornell colleges are more or less prominent in the schedule of failures. The Civil Engineering students were especially unfortunate, fifty of them being dropped from the college lists. The student-body is much wrought up by the results and the student editors of the Sun have published a mighty protest against "the diabolical idiocy of final examinations." The writer makes much of the danger resulting from the nervous strain of immediate preparation and trial of final examinations, and some of Cornell's professors appear to agree with his contentions that the system serves no direct or useful pedagogical end. Of course, educators are not unaware of the arguments advanced for the elimination of final examinations as a just and satisfactory test for all parties. In an ideal condition a system of class-room grading which should settle the destiny of every man on his actual daily class-room record—the record of a term instead of a day—would unquestionably be the fair test of a student's standing, but unhappily, in the ordinary experience of educational institutions to-day conditions are not ideal. Classes are frequently entirely too large, to mention but one element of difficulty, to permit that careful personal attention necessary to enable the teacher to form a judgment of the diligent application and the progress of his pupil. The nervous strain accompanying the preparation for "finals" is easily exaggerated in argument. The college student who really works will find no great hardship in summing up the term's labors, and the benefit that comes to him in return for his special effort at the year's close should not be ignored. The whole question of school examinations is a delicate one, and one which mere rhetoric will never aid in solving. That the system of "finals" has its value the experience of centuries as well as the actual practice in all the great schools of the day surely proves. That it should not serve as the exclusive test of a student's standing seems equally clear, and hence it is that the professor's judgment, based on his actual record of day-by-day work, has come to be generally admitted as a helpful factor in determining a student's standing in educational institutions.

Readers will recall the attack on college education and college professors made a year ago by Richard Crane, the multi-millionaire manufacturer of Chicago. Mr. Crane has chosen to repeat his attack in a book recently published. College education, he claims, is in no wise a benefit but rather a deterring force to greatness, and it were, therefore, better if all colleges and universities were burned to the ground. He says these institutions agreed to make civil engineers out of anybody, an impossible task; and he further questions the sincerity of college professors and presidents, except in the case of some few engaged in medical research. The book has called forth a storm of indignant criticism from the educators of the West, the President of the Minnesota University scoring the volume as "outrageous emptiness." Rev. John P. Frieden, S.J., President of St. Louis University, issued the following statement regarding the Crane attack:

"Mr. Crane's charges are based on a misconception of the purposes of higher education. It does not claim to manufacture either brains or ability, but it aims at developing brain power and increasing and directing ability.

"Hence, no university holds 'that it can make a great engineer out of anybody.' On the contrary, its object is to aid a young man in the choice of his natural vocation; and only after he has found it does the university claim to be able to guide him to success or eminence in proportion to his talent and application.

"Mr. Crane thinks it a fallacy that, 'all other things being equal, the college man is better than the non-college man.' Why? Because the non-college man has an 'experience' that his college brother has not. But, surely, the temporary advantage of that experience which has been obtained by blundering will not long keep the non-college man in advance of the student whose brain power has been matured and all his faculties sharpened. If there is an exception, then that non-college man is an unusual exception, and educational establishments are founded for average men, not for the rare exceptions.

"His fling at college professors is amusing, leaving out the fact that men can and do devote themselves to education for far higher motives than seem to have entered the mind of Mr. Crane, who measures all things by dollars and cents. These professors do not say they are 'able to manage affairs better than business men themselves.' They modestly contend that the broadening of a man's faculties will aid him in business, and add, moreover, a power of appreciating other things which are superior to mere business and round out a complete man's life."

Longmans, Green & Co. have published a companion brochure to the "Quick and the Dead" favorably noticed in this column some time back. "The Fountain of Life," written by one of the authors of the former production, is a further development of the ideals of a Christian teacher, and it is quite as full of helpful suggestion as was its predecessor. It is concerned entirely with the teaching of the mysteries and obligations of faith, which the author holds to be the main duty as it is the highest privilege of the Catholic teacher—the element "which, precisely, lifts for us the function of teaching above the rank of a mere profession." Needless to say, the book is redolent of the spirit which has made the members of the Institute of School Sisters of Notre Dame so deservedly successful in the direction of Catholic schools. No one is unaware of the danger facing the Catholic teacher to lose sight of the supernatural in the fevered fret for the development of the natural, that too often marks the course of even well-intentioned Catholic school life, and it is well to have attention called to the need of carrying religious teaching in its true sense into every subject touched upon in the classroom. The Catholic ideal in teaching looks not to mere periodicity of religious sentiment and atmosphere, peculiar to day or hour; it would have the entire routine of the day's work impregnated with faith and colored by its light.

This booklet, which comes to us from the well-known training-school of St. Mary's Hall, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, is written on the lines of this ideal, and its precepts are illustrated by model lessons which make clear the immense advantage it possesses over the cold modern pedagogic theory of the ethical values of school subjects. The attractive make-up of the "Fountain of Life" is in keeping with the contents.

Commenting on criticisms directed against a course announced by Dr. Wesley, a professor in the Ann Arbor University, which was recognized to be antagonistic to the fundamental ideas of Christianity, an editorial writer in the Detroit News says:

"After all, this matter must turn on the question of dealing fairly with the student. It is not fair to him to allow him to think, to virtually compel him to think, that all scholarship is on the side of the rehearsed destructive temper in which religion is handled in the university. The present course in philosophy would appear to be deliberately planned to take from him every spiritual support he ever knew, and then leave him alone and unguided in the stony wastes of negation. The very best a multitude of students can do after this treatment is to struggle back to what Carlyle calls 'the center of indifference,' and drop the matter as nearly as their natures will allow them to drop it. They are not reminded by any circumstance that there is as superb a scholarship in the service of sane faith as there is in that of the destroyers. They are confined to one man's mood and mind; they are not permitted to see that strong minds have grappled with the same big problems and have drawn light and help from them. Until the student is given a fair statement of both sides of the matter by men competent to do it, no university can ever claim the credit of dealing fairly with him."

ECONOMICS

The Trade Statement of the Department of Commerce and Labor for January deserves serious study. Imports free of duty amounted to $70,449,819: dutiable imports, to $63,208,245. Total value of imports, $133,658,064. The total value of exports was $144,015,350, the excess of the latter over the former being only a little over $10,000,000. In the corresponding months of 1908 and 1909, imports were in round figures $85,000,000 and $103,000,000; exports, 206,000,000, and $156,000,000, and the excess of exports $121,000,000 and $53,000,000. The value of exports has therefore decreased greatly while that of imports has increased, and consequently the excess of exports has decreased to a most notable degree. Moreover this state of affairs is not exceptional for January only, but has existed for some time. The imports for year ended January 31, 1909, was $1,100,000,000; and for the year ended January 31, 1910, $1,500,000,000, while the corresponding exports were in each year $1,700,000,000. The imports of gold were in each year $43,000,000, while the exports were $89,000,000 for the first year and $131,000,000 for the second. That is an excess of $134,000,000 for the two years, which more than exhausts the importations which followed the panic. The causes of high prices are more universal than people think.

The total value of minerals produced in Alaska from 1880 to 1908 inclusive, was $148,000,000, of which $142,000,000 was gold. More than half of this, $80,000,000, was obtained during the last four years of the period. During the next few years we may look for an increasing production in coal. A remarkable characteristic of the Pacific Coast coal measures is that the quality improves steadily the farther north the fields are found. California coal is almost worthless. Coos Bay is inferior to Puget Sound, and this bears no comparison to Vancouver Island coal. Nearly fifty years ago anthracite was found in the Queen Charlotte Islands, though it occurs nowhere to the south. The Alaskan fields may therefore be expected to produce coal of all kinds most excellent in quality, and exploration tends to prove that the facts will correspond to the theory. Iron also abounds. The Pacific Steel Company has been organized in Vancouver, British Columbia, with a capital of $20,000,000, some of the wealthiest men of San Francisco, Portland, Seattle and Vancouver being interested in it. It is probable that British Columbia and Alaska will within a very few years be one of the chief iron and steel regions of the world.

In the United States $100,000,000 is invested in silk manufactures, and the value of the product is about $133,000,000 per annum. In 1870 there were 86 factories producing the value of $12,000,000; in 1880 the factories were 382, and the product $41,000,000. The silk manufactured is consumed almost entirely within the country, the export never having reached $1,000,000 in a single year. More than half the raw material comes from Japan; the remainder in equal proportions from China and Italy, less than 3½ per cent. coming from France. The value of manufactured silk imported during 1909 was $33,000,000, of which nearly half came from France.

SOCIOLOGY

Having made clear that the British Poor Law of 1832 and the Unemployed Workman Act of 1905 were both failures because they did not touch the causes of the unemployment or enable the unemployed to help themselves, Philip Hanson, in the current New Ireland Review, shows that the system of Labor Exchanges recently established by Mr. Lloyd-George and soon to be set up in all the principal towns, is likely to succeed because it grapples with the sources of distress. A Labor Exchange is a place where workmen can register their names and qualifications and employers can make known their needs and have them met. It is a market-place for labor in each district. It saves the workman from the wasteful and demoralizing process of searching for employment. When the system is complete one district will be able to help another; laborers who are not wanted where they are will be informed of openings elsewhere, and each center can ascertain whether the applicant is a bona fide laborer or only a tramp. Thus demand and supply can be made to fit one another and the employer is protected, provided the system becomes universal. There is opposition from a certain class of employers and workmen, notably trades unions who have a similar system of their own on a restricted scale, but it is hoped that the difficulties will be overcome. Among other remedies that the Government intends to provide by legislation are: (1) A system of insurance against unemployment, to be managed and partly controlled by trades unions and similar bodies. (2) A diminution of the labor supply by raising the age of employment for boys and girls, who shall be kept longer at school. (3) Arranging the work given out by Government departments and town councils so that less shall be done in good years and more in bad years. (4) Industrial, Farm and Detention Colonies shall be established for the residue of the Unemployed, according to their capacities, needs and limitations.

Hon. William H. De Lacy, Judge of the Juvenile Court of Washington, D. C., lectured at the Catholic University on February 10 and 17. The first lecture was on the "Rise of the Temperance Movement;" the second, on "What Temperance Means for the Child." Beginning with an account of the abuse of liquor in this country up to the earlier years of the nineteenth century, he explained the work undertaken by secular and Protestant organizations on the principle that the use of liquor is wrong. He then took up the Catholic temperance societies springing out of the preaching of Father Mathew, which, refusing to accept the false principles of the others, drew more powerful motives from their religion and the personal devotion of their members to Christ. The lecturer laid down very earnestly this practical point, that in such societies temperance means total abstinence. In his second lecture he developed most convincingly the absolute necessity of temperance in the families of the lower orders, if the children are to be reformed. This is impossible if the child is to be born of drunken parents, to grow up in a drunken home, to be given strong drink in the cradle, and kept in contact with it during childhood and youth. He appealed for the suppression of the drink traffic by the Government, and urged this to seek out some means of supplying for the revenue arising from the tax on drink.

When the Hospital de San Pablo (St. Paul's Hospital) in Barcelona, Spain, is completed it will place the beautiful Mediterranean seaport in the front rank of the cities of the world well provided with modern facilities for the care of the sick. While the new Hospital Clínico, opened in 1907, occupies some 27,700 square metres of land and has accommodation for five hundred patients, the San Pablo, more scientifically constructed in accordance with the most modern ideas, will embrace 145,500 square metres of land and will accommodate a thousand patients. This great hospital, now almost ready for use, will be one of the largest and most perfect hospitals in the world. Besides being fire-proof, the nine separate beautiful buildings, or pavilions, as they are called, will be as germ-proof as modern sanitary science can make them. Plaster and wood are not used; floor, ceilings and surface walls are of artistic glazed tiles, while in the great main building, which has a frontage of four hundred meters, highly polished stone and beautiful mosaic work adorn the floors, walls and ceilings of the spacious corridors, chapel, museum, library, reception rooms, etc. Subterranean passages connect the different pavilions, excepting, however, the pavilion of infectious diseases. Work on the great hospital was begun in May, 1905, and was made possible by the rich legacy of Pablo Gil, a wealthy Catalan, who died in Paris. The buildings overlook Barcelona and the Mediterranean.

Right Rev. Mgr. Shahan, D.D., Rector of the Catholic University, is planning to have a call issued for a great national convention of Catholic charity workers. The project has the approval of Cardinal Gibbons. To consider the advisability of such a gathering in the near future, a meeting of representative Catholics interested in such work was held in Washington, D. C., last Saturday and Sunday. The gentlemen present, in each case designated by the bishop of the diocese represented, assisted at a series of conferences in which Mgr. Shahan's plans were discussed; the decision regarding the convention is not yet made known. Right Rev. Mgr. D. J. McMahon, Thomas M. Mulry, Edw. J. Butler and Chas. F. McKenna were the New York representatives named. Cincinnati sent Richard Crane.

Under the auspices of the Ladies of Charity of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, Philadelphia, a course of Sunday evening lectures is being given at the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel in that city. The opening lecture, by Dr. Maurice Francis Egan, Minister to Denmark, was delivered on February 13. The subject was: "Denmark in the Olden Times." The rest of the program is as follows: February 20, "Ideals in Education," Very Rev. Edward A. Pace, D.D., of the Catholic University; February 27, "The Mission of Humor," Miss Agnes Repplier; March 6, "Divorce," Hon. Walter George Smith; March 13, "How Old is the New in History?" (an arraignment of Modernism), Dr. James G. Walsh, Dean of the Medical School of Fordham University. The proceeds of the lectures will be devoted to the Summer Home for Poor Children at Port Kennedy.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The Lenten Pastorals of the Irish bishops deal with a variety of matters of religious, national and social interest. All emphasize the dangers of bad books, papers and magazines, and insist on the duty of supporting the efforts of the Catholic Truth Society and other Catholic publications, of providing a sound education for their children, and of continuing the great advance in temperance of the last few years. Several urge the necessity of sobriety, economy and intelligent industry in order to secure the advantages of better agrarian conditions. Cardinal Logue advises his people to avail themselves of the facilities offered by technical schools and university education, and though the new University is not Catholic in conception, to make it so by their loyal cooperation and the earnestness of their religious faith. The Bishop of Limerick utters a trenchant warning against the dangers that accompany the great economic educational and political advance of recent years, especially from "our close, too close, connection with England," and the intimate relations of Irish Catholic members and leaders with English politicians, "many of whom are avowed Atheists and Socialists, and none of them have a feeling or conviction in common with us. . . . The tide of English opinion, feeling and habits is flowing into every nook and crevice of Irish life, and those who think that that process can go on, from top to bottom of the country without hurt to its traditional thoughts and sentiments will yet be woefully disillusioned." The remedy is to return to Irish standards, revive Gaelic ideals and impregnate primary and university education "with the broad, deep philosophical system of Catholic doctrine."

As seventh Bishop of Hartford, Conn., the Pope has appointed the Rev. John J. Nilan, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Amesbury, Mass. The bishop-elect was born in Newburyport, Mass., August 1, 1854, and made his classical studies at the College of Nicolet, Canada. Thence he went to St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, N. Y., where he was ordained priest on December 21, 1878. Assignments as assistant at South Framingham, Abington and South Boston then occupied his time until 1891, when he was made rector of St. Joseph's, Amesbury. During his pastorate there of nineteen years he has shown executive ability of an uncommon order in administering the spiritual and temporal affairs of a large and complex parish.

As consecrator of the Most Rev. John Carroll, Archbishop of Baltimore, the first Bishop of the United States of America, the Right Rev. Bishop Walmesley, O.S.B., takes rank as the Father of the American Episcopate. The translation of his body from the old Catholic chapel in Bristol to the Church of Downside Abbey has been thought a fitting occasion for the erection of a suitable tomb to commemorate this historic fact. It is proposed that the monument take the form of an altar tomb, to contain the body of Bishop Walmesley, with recumbent effigy and canopy above, to stand at the right hand side of the high altar in the abbey church. An appeal is made to Catholics in America by the Prior of Downside Abbey, the Rev. G. Aelred Kindersley, O.S.B., to secure a monument alike worthy of him whom it commemorates and of the great American Church whose spiritual ancestor God's Providence saw fit to make him.

Right Rev. Thomas Gilmartin, D.D., was consecrated Bishop of Clonfert, Ireland, at the Cathedral, Loughrea, on February 12, by the Most Rev. Dr. Healy, Archbishop of Tuam. Cardinal Logue presided at the ceremony and the sermon was preached by Dr. Beecher, of Maynooth. After several years of parochial duty in his native diocese Dr. Gilmartin was elected Dean of Maynooth College, some ten years ago, and served in that capacity, to the great satisfaction of the faculty and student body, until his election to the bishopric of Clonfert.

Old St. Matthew's Church, Washington, D. C., was demolished last week to make room for what will be one of the largest office buildings in the city. The church was one of the landmarks of the national capital for more than half a century.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"A Man's World," Comedy Theatre.—This play is good dramatic art; it is logical and carries a strong moral. It is true that the theme is old, but it bears a pertinent message. Its literary quality is good and its dramatic construction shows marked ability, sustaining the interest cleverly and subtly to the very drop of the final curtain. In the hands of most modern playwrights its story would have received the oblique treatment which such themes usually evoke from the decadent school, but Miss Crothers has handled it with decorum and dignity. She teaches a needed lesson with force, driving home the justness of her argument with striking effect. The situations are natural and coherent and the climax is developed cleverly and consistently. The heroine, a woman with the highest ideals of morality, is earning her own way in the world and at the same time propagating her principles by writing books. She demands of men the same ideals of purity that they would exact of women:

there is no double standard; what is morality for one sex should be morality for the other. She has adopted an illegitimate child left in her care by its dying mother. She herself is suspected of being the child's mother, an imputation which she completely ignores as unworthy of her consideration. In the meantime a young lawyer falls in love with her and she returns his affection. By chance she discovers that he is the father of the adopted boy. She is shocked and crushed at the revelation, for when confronted by her he admits the fact, but refuses to acknowledge that there has been any wrong-doing on his part, and declares that the standard of morals for men is different from that for women. This false standard she strenuously and passionately repudiates. His sin, she declares, she could have forgiven, but his oblique adherence to a double standard of virtue—or perhaps no standard of virtue for men—she cannot excuse, and though loving him, she resolutely rejects him and dismisses him. The entire company was excellent, and the present season has not, perhaps, seen a better balanced cast. Miss Mannering played the part of Frank Ware, the heroine, with grace and insight, and in those scenes where intense emotion predominated, with a restrained and well-governed passion now rarely witnessed on the stage.

"The Witch," The New Theatre.—As a glimpse into the character of New England Puritanism "The Witch" may have some reason for being, but considered as a specimen of dramatic art, though strong in construction, we fail to find its purpose. As a play it is gruesome and harrowing, sombre and lugubrious in the extreme, utterly unrelieved in its leaden realism. It is a drama, based on the theme of Salem witchcraft, and its action takes place in the town of Salem in the year 1692. A young Portuguese girl, thrown by chance with her mother upon the shores of New England, is married to Absalom Hathornel, minister of Salem, who is old enough to be her father. She does not love him, but falls in love with his son, just returned from his theological studies abroad, who reciprocates her unlawful passion. She vehemently wishes her husband dead, and he, upon the discovery of his wife's and son's unfaithfulness, falls dead from the shock, for he has a weak heart. Whereupon the mother of the dead husband accuses the wife of having killed him by witchcraft as well as having seduced the son into loving her by the same means. We are spared the scene of her hanging, but we know perfectly well that she is doomed and the curtain goes down upon the demented wife—for she has lost her reason in the horror and terror of the situation—surrounded by the fanatical villagers eager to bear her away to the ever-ready gallows on Witch's Hill. If the purpose of the author be to show Puritanism in one of its most baleful aspects, he has succeeded admirably. As a bit of historical realism it is a successful picture, though scarcely needed nowadays, when the erroneous tradition of Puritanism has long been corrected. The American imagination had for generations indulged the fancy that Puritanism was a thing of rare virtue, full of light and goodness, though a bit austere, as well as the cradle of our liberties. Now, however, it is known that Puritan New England was the home of a narrow and arrogant pride obsessed with a spirit of persecution and intolerance and a hot-bed of superstition. If there is an excuse for "The Witch," it is in this presentation of Puritanism. It is needless to say that it was exceedingly well rendered by the New Theatre company. The performance was carefully balanced and all its parts becomingly cast. There was no rôle that was not well done, and some exceptionally so. Madame Kalich, as the unfortunate young wife, played the part with rare skill, bringing out with intense emphasis the scene of her undoing, when, like some hunted creature of the woods entrapped by merciless foes, she stood among the crowd of eager fanatics clamoring for her life.

CHARLES MCDUGALL.

OBITUARY

General St. Clair A. Mulholland, United States Pension Agent, soldier, author and lecturer, died in his home in Philadelphia on Feb. 17. An ardent Catholic, he was one of Philadelphia's best known and most respected citizens. At the time of his death he held numerous positions, including that of chairman of the Gettysburg Monument Committee, to which he was appointed by the Mayor of Philadelphia; Prison Inspector and Chairman of the Father Corby Monument Committee. He was a member of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, of the Grand Army, and of the companions of the Medal of Honor.

Brevet Major General St. Clair A. Mulholland was a native of Lisburn, County Antrim, Ireland, where he was born April 1, 1839. He was one of the youngest major generals commissioned during the Civil War, and had the unique distinction of holding commissions as Pension Agent in Philadelphia under Presidents Cleveland, McKinley and Roosevelt.

Coming to this country while yet a child, his youthful tastes inclined him to military life. While a very young man he became connected with the Pennsylvania militia and at the breaking out of the Civil War he joined the 116th Regiment of Volunteers, which was attached to Meagher's Irish Brigade, in which he was commissioned lieutenant colonel. This was in June, 1862, when he was only 23 years of age.

Later he was promoted to the colonelcy. He took part in the engagements at Charleston and Ashby's Gap, Va., in October and November, 1862. He commanded his regiment at Fredericksburg, Dec. 13, 1862, and was severely wounded in the gallant attack on Maryes' Heights on that eventful day. In the battle of Chancellorsville, May 3 and 4, 1863, he led his regiment and distinguished himself in saving the guns of the Fifth Maine Battery, which had been abandoned to the enemy. For this he was complimented in general orders, and received the Medal of Honor from Congress. In this campaign he was selected by General Hancock to command the picket line of the Second Corps, and while performing this duty covered the retreat of the Army of the Potomac from Chancellorsville across the Rappahannock.

He participated in the fight at Thorofare Gap, Va., June 25, 1863. In the battle of Gettysburg he again led his regiment, which was badly cut up in the first day's fight. He then took command and led into action the 140th Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers. He was engaged in the fight at Jones's Cross Roads, July 10, 1863, at Falling Waters, July 14, and in the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, 1864, where he was again wounded. For his gallant conduct on this occasion he was made brevet brigadier general. He was in the fight at Tod's Tavern, May 10, 1864, and in the battle of Po River, where he was a third time wounded.

Having been sent to the hospital in Washington, he remained only ten days, and then resumed his command. He was engaged in the fight at North Anna and on the Pamunkey River, May 28, 30 and 31, 1864. At the battle of Tolpoto-moy he was dangerously wounded by a musket-ball.

He commanded his brigade in all the actions around Petersburg until the end of the war. He particularly distinguished himself during this time by storming a fort in front of his brigade, and for this he was brevetted major general, October 27, 1864.

When in 1868 Daniel M. Fox was elected Mayor of Philadelphia, he called to his aid as Chief of Police General Mulholland, and it was due to the discipline which he inculcated that the force, before that time in some disorder, was brought to a fine condition. General Mulholland was a member of the board of prison inspectors, and his knowledge, gained through this service, caused him to be considered an authority on the science of penology. He was also widely known as an art student, a lecturer on the Civil War and writer on its records, among his contributions in the latter field being a history of the 116th Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers. When the Catholic Alumni Sodality of Philadelphia resolved to erect on the battlefield of Gettysburg a statue of Father Corby in the attitude of giving absolution to the soldiers of the Irish Brigade, General Mulholland, an eye witness of the event, was appointed chairman of the committee to further the movement, and it was his ambition that the unveiling of the statue should be coincident with the dedication on July 10, 1910, of a triumphal arch to all the Pennsylvania soldiers who fought on that memorable field.

The recent death of Father Henry Benedict Rietvelt, Superior of the Redemptorist house at Brandon, Manitoba, is a great loss to the Church in that city and province. He was born at Veurne, Belgium, in 1856, spent six years there in classical studies, studied philosophy one year at Roulers, and theology four years at Bruges, where he was ordained priest in 1882. Later on, that same year, he entered the Redemptorist novitiate at Brussels, and after a year of noviceship labored four years in that city. In 1887 he was sent as assistant priest to St. Thomas, West Indies, and after two years there he was promoted Superior of the mission of St. Croix, W. I., where he remained until 1895. He was then recalled to Brussels, but again returned to St. Croix in 1898, where he enlarged the monastery and church. In 1900 he was appointed to St. Ann's Church, Montreal, and remained there till February, 1905, when he was appointed Superior and parish priest at St. Augustine's, Brandon. When on Sunday, December 22, 1907, Father Rietvelt celebrated the silver jubilee of his priesthood, both Catholics and Protestants showed how great was their esteem and affection for him. On Monday, January 24 last, though suffering from a severe cold, he insisted upon filling his engagement to preach a ten days' retreat to the Trappists at St. Norbert, seven miles west of Winnipeg. At the end of eight days, being on the verge of a collapse from sheer weakness, he asked to be taken home to Brandon, 132 miles west. On being driven past the Misericordia Hospital in Winnipeg, he asked to be taken there for a brief rest. A physician found that Father Rietvelt was almost at death's door, suffering from acute pneumonia, and that he must therefore remain where he was. In the evening the Very Rev. Father Allard, O.M.I., anointed him and gave him the Viaticum. Next morning Rev. Father Lietaert, C.S.S.R., arrived from Brandon, and on entering the sick room, asked the dying priest how he felt. "First rate," was the answer, "I have received the last sacraments." From that moment he lost consciousness and died two days later with a prayer on his lips. When the news of his death reached Brandon, a city of 12,000 inhabitants, mostly non-Catholics, the city bells were tolled out of respect for one of the most popular clergymen. At the funeral, which was a very large and solemn one, Archbishop Langevin bestowed high praise on the zeal and kindness of the dead Superior and quoted Father Rietvelt's admiration for the Brandon citizens in general.

The President of the German Reichstag, Count Udo von Stolberg-Wernigerode, died February 19. The Count, a distinguished member of the Imperial Parliament, in which he had served with some interruption since 1877, was the head of one of the collateral branches of the princely house of Stolberg, which, in December, 1901, celebrated the seventh centennial of its foundation. He was born in Berlin in 1840, and during his long and active life he had won distinction in widely separated fields of service. Gallant conduct in the wars of '66 and '71 brought him rapid promotion in the army, of which he was a major general on retirement. He was a life member of the Prussian Upper House, and a Privy Councillor of the Empire. Count Udo filled the post of Vice-President of the Imperial Parliament for a brief period, and in February, 1907, his colleagues chose him to preside over that body. At the reopening of the Reichstag December 1 of last year, he was again elected to the presidency, filling the position with general satisfaction until his fatal illness came to him a month ago.

The Rev. John Schandel died at Plainfield, N. J., on Feb. 19, aged eighty-two years. He shared with Dean McNulty, of Paterson, the honor of having seen more than fifty years active service in New Jersey. Father Schandel was born in Rinbruch, Germany, on November 24, 1828. In 1848 he came to this country, was educated at St. Francis Xavier's College, St. Vincent's Seminary, Beatty, Pa., and was ordained by Bishop Bayley in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Newark, July 22, 1859. He held many pastorates in New Jersey and for twenty-six years was rector at Stony Hill, retiring in 1904 because of advanced age.

The Rev. Joseph G. Lavallé, pastor of St. Matthew's Church, Fall River, died on Feb. 15, after a protracted illness. He was born in the Province of Quebec, July 20, 1857, was educated at the seminary of St. Hyacinth, and ordained to the priesthood in 1885. He was stationed at Woonsocket, R. I. for several years, and was appointed pastor at St. Matthew's in 1895.

Rev. Leo V. White died in New York on February 17, at the age of twenty-six. Before completing his studies in Rome he was compelled to return to New York on account of ill health. He was a young priest of great promise.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

NEW YORK, February 11, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It sometimes happens that one's best friends prove to be one's worst enemies. Apropos of the recent discussion concerning an annual appropriation by Congress for the benefit of George Washington University, in the city of Washington, D. C., we find the following communication in The Living Church for February 12th:

"To the Editor of the Living Church:

"I notice that you encourage a protest in your issue of January 29th with reference to an annual appropriation by Congress to the George Washington University in Washington, D. C., on the ground that it is a private and sectarian institution. Permit me to say as an alumnus of the university and a priest of the American Church that it is not a private institution in any sense of the word, nor is it sectarian. As Columbia College it was started under Baptist patronage, but as far back as 1892, while I was a student there I never heard any Baptist teaching mentioned by any of the professors, and several of them I know were churchmen. Several of us were students for the priesthood and were given scholarships in the college. Any minister of any Christian communion can take a course in the university to-day free of charge. I have taken advantage of this liberal spirit and I know of several others in our priesthood who have done so.

"I am sure if you understood fully the conditions here in Washington you would withdraw your opposition. The Roman Church is strongly entrenched with educational institutions and the work of the George Washington University is sorely needed. I am sure the downfall of this university would please Rome very much. At the present time I am the only clergyman on the executive board of the alumni. When I was a student I heard of more Churchmen in the college than any other Christian body. I believe more of the professors in the university are Churchmen than any other Christian communion.

"Howard G. England.

"Rock Creek Parish,
"Washington, D. C., Jan. 29, 1910."

This naïve letter reminds one of the old Confederate veteran who used to say that he was quite content with the failure of the Southern cause—quite content; but that he'd shoot a d——d Yankee anywhere on sight.

Our Protestant brethren are quite liberal, and their institutions are "public" and by no means "sectarian" just so long as there is no question of Catholicism. What they mean by toleration is in reality sympathy and partial agreement, for it expresses their attitude towards other non-Catholic bodies. The only body toward which they have any occasion to show toleration, in the true sense of the word, is the Catholic, for this is the only body which is really opposed to them and their teaching. And when a test of this kind occurs—as has developed in the Washington affair—they are quite willing to subsidize with Government funds a "public and non-sectarian" institution for the purpose of making it an active agency against Georgetown University and the Catholic University of America.

Haven't the friends of George Washington University been somewhat hasty in declaring their full mind upon the subject? If they dwell in the clear air of non-sectarianism, what offence is it to them, of all people, that two Catholic educational institutions are "entrenched" (it hath anything but an amicable sound) in their city?

After all these years, during which we have been accused of a lasting, unexpressed desire to subvert the Constitution and inaugurate a régime of Church and State, it comes somewhat as a shock to see how ready our Protestant friends are to finance a "non-sectarian" university with Government funds, with the express purpose of combating two Catholic institutions, which, by the way, are quite legally constituted and of law-abiding repute.

The Reverend Mr. England, being, as he states in his letter, a member of the executive board of the university, may be presumed to know the mind of his colleagues. But may they not pray, with great sincerity, to be delivered from their friends?

DARWIN'S THEORIES.

Although not written with a view to publication, the following letter brings out so neatly a suggestion worthy of the attention of our readers that we give it here with the consent of the writer.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Two facts determined me to write to you about the article on "Darwin's Place in Biology," the high position AMERICA has already won as the leading Catholic weekly, and the trouble others and myself have experienced from time to time in trying to explain to scientifically inclined minds, Catholic and non, difficulties which arose chiefly from incorrect or misleading statements by our brethren.

While it is true that Darwin's "Origin of Species" does not discuss ex professo the origin of species, its whole tendency and immediate effect was so distinctively that way, that it is stretching a point to state it had nothing to do with origins—the name, misnomer though it be, was not quite indefensibly applied to it. To pass over other writers, our own, like Fathers Wasmann, Muckermann, Girard and Windle, Mivart, etc., all regard and refer to it as practically a work on origins. But letting this point drop, the sentence: "It is indeed of preservation and not of origins that D. has anything to say," is too general and could easily be taken, notwithstanding the context, to imply that origins were not a subject of his thoughts and theories, etc., whereas "The Descent of Man" is proof to the contrary.

It would also seem as if the writer had taken for granted that species do not originate within our ken. Father Wasmann admits they do, though within a narrow circle. By the way. Father Wasmann's book (I speak as one less wise) marks a stage, to Catholics at all events, in the whole discussion, and statements about evolution, quite common a few years ago, now need careful qualification. Father Hughes' vigorous little book leaned heavily upon the constancy of species and though not as yet superseded, that staff could be cut in a slightly different pattern.

I confess that I cannot but think that we are still too much inclined to make the old mistake of yielding in non-essentials only when compelled to do so. I doubt if evolution will ever be proved to the extent I am about to mention, but, would it not be well, if we would state quietly, repeatedly and universally, and, so to say, in advance of any new discovery or well-founded theory, that Catholic Truth has nothing to fear from any evolutionary system as long as the biblical origin of man's "breath of life" is left intact? All the little side-swipes which our popular literature has been rather apt to give to evolution produce but little good effect directly, and lead to uneasiness in many minds and often turn back the enquirer.

WHY PURCHASE INSULTS?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The admirable letter in defense of Truth and Justice addressed to the publishers of McClure's Magazine should not be the only one forwarded by the American Federation of Catholic Societies to periodicals in this country. A similar communication should be sent to Life, a paper which aims not only to amuse but to instruct and which, on account of a certain artistic excellence it once possessed, has become very popular, especially in our schools and colleges, and is more or less influential in shaping the opinion of a portion of the public. Not only has this paper, in its editorials, related the Ferrer case in most arbitrary, exaggerated and unfair terms, and offended every Catholic by its comments thereon, but in a recent number it contains a half-serious, half-comic "interview" with the Holy Father so vulgar and offensive in its tone that every person who is loyal to Holy Church should not only refuse to subscribe to but refuse to purchase so untruthful a publication.

There is no excuse for insulting a venerable old man, even if he be the Head of Christendom.

BENJAMIN COCKER.

Dubuque, Iowa, Feb. 9, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Saturday usually brings me AMERICA, and I look for it eagerly. All its contents are excellent; all appreciated—not the least the European correspondence, France, Italy, Spain, Germany and others. I was more than surprised that any one of your readers should have criticized you for this feature, and wished more home news. Home news we have enough and to spare from our daily press. Our Catholic religious newspapers supply the current home religious news. What American Catholics need, what the American people greatly needs, is European news from trustworthy sources—not the prejudiced anti-Catholic news supplied by the Associated Press, which deceived the American people about France and the Church a few years ago, and which it took months and years to correct; lately about Ferrer in Spain, in which truth is barely beginning to prevail. No, give us more European news—more news from all parts of the world.

LOUIS FUSZ.

St. Louis, Jan. 25.

Among the weeklies it is indeed a "gem of purest ray serene," easily the peer of any other publication in America. Innocuous desuetude does not linger long when perusing its contents. The "Chronicle" is brief, terse and to the point. "Questions of the Day" are answered precisely and lucidly. The "Correspondence" is not only entertaining, but also very instructive. The editorials are very elucidating and thought-provoking. Its "Literature" is ideal and discriminating. The "Educational Department" is always up to date. Its "Sociological" page is clear and well edited. "Economics" is far-seeing and enlightening. "Science" is always illuminating. The "Personal Column" is interesting. "Ecclesiastical News" is succinct. "Dramatic Notes" are trenchant, but just. The department, "Pulpit, Press and Platform" is always good. One reads with pleasure and profit. Even the "Obituary" page is not dead. Letters to the editor are timely and full of interest. What is said of AMERICA is nothing but the truth, and an appreciation of its magnificent contents.—Rev. George G. Thiele, Niles Center, Ill.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

A. P. C., New York.—In the February Month, at the end of the Rev. Joseph Keating's article, "Neither God nor Master," there is the following note (p. 176): "To shout at the wolf is charity to the sheep," says the wise and gentle St. Francis of Sales. If that maxim had been borne in mind we should not perhaps, find in a well-known Catholic book of reference a scandalous assailant of the Holy See described as 'a keen master of polemics and a "candid friend," nor a writer of immoral novels (alas that Catholics should do these things) called the inaugurator of a 'new class of fiction'!" Would you kindly explain these allusions. What is the book and who are the persons?

Answer:—See "Catholic Who's Who," 1908, 1909, 1910. The first quotation will be found under Dell, Robert Edward, the second under Bright, Mary Chevelita ("George Egerton"), novelist.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

We are all proud of this first-class periodical, and would like to see it in every Catholic family. Non-Catholics, too, would become enlightened on certain topics by its perusal.—Sister M. Geraldine, Convent and College of the Holy Name, Oakland, California.

Your journal is surely a great credit to the Catholics of America, and an ornament to American journalism.—James J. Hinde, Sandusky, O.

Let me tell you sincerely that nothing better has ever appeared in the line of English Catholic publications than your most valuable review.—Rev. Antoine Huot, Quebec, Canada.

I am glad that we have at last a Catholic paper that covers the entire field and covers it so ably.—Rev. Simon Fitz Simons, Lima, N. Y.

Since taking it, I can do without the daily papers. It supplies the necessary things.—Rev. M. J. Higgins, C.M., Philadelphia, Pa.

CHRONICLE

President's Newark Speech.—President Taft addressed the Newark Board of Trade on the revenues and expenditures of the Government. The speech was a message for the nation. The President assured his hearers that the Panama Canal would be completed in 1915; explained how the cost of its building had risen from $139,000,000, the first estimate, to $297,000,000; declared his approval of a Congressional Commission to regulate and co-ordinate the various branches of the Federal Government with a view to the retrenchment of current expenses; deplored the lack of a budget system such as other countries employ to adjust outlay to income; favored the institution of a National Board of Health and the pensioning of superannuated civil servants, and said he had reason to believe that the new tariff law would be so productive of income that for the year ending June 30, 1911, the surplus would be about $35,000,000 in the supposition that the expenditures would not be heavier than now anticipated and that the $38,000,000 necessary annually in the construction of the Panama Canal would be met by bonds.

Supreme Court Decisions.—The United States Supreme Court handed down several decisions of great importance in their bearing upon the authority of States over corporations. The court upheld the decree of the State Court of Minnesota to the effect that a State may levy a tax upon the gross earnings of a railroad. This victory means that the State comes into possession of $800,000 in taxes due as well as an assured annual revenue of $200,000. The State of Georgia lost in its attempt to levy on the property or franchise of a railroad company operating under a charter which subjected it to an annual tax on the net proceeds of its investments. The Alabama statute, levying an annual franchise tax on foreign corporations, was declared unconstitutional and an improper discrimination between foreign and domestic corporations. The State of Kansas won out in its fight with the Missouri Pacific Railroad for the installation of a separate passenger train on a branch road to the state line even if the operation of this train was at a loss to the company. Another State enactment which the Supreme Court rejected as unconstitutional was the Arkansas trust law which sought to impose an incorporation fee on foreign corporations to the amount of their capital stock.

Maryland Boundary Line.—After eighteen years of litigation before the Supreme Court of the United States, the State of Maryland has lost every point contended for in the dispute with West Virginia over the boundary lines except in so far as Maryland claimed full jurisdiction over the waters of the Potomac River. The court decided that commissioners be selected to run a line along the old State line as known and recognized after the so-called Deakin's survey, but the high-water mark on the southern bank of the Potomac is designated as the boundary of Maryland, instead of the northern bank as averred by West Virginia. Maryland also gains a few hundred acres of land where Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Maryland come together. Otherwise the contentions of West Virginia were recognized.

The suit grew out of the dispute over a strip of land several miles wide to which Maryland laid claim, resting her contention upon the construction of the charter granted to Lord Baltimore in 1632.

Federal Extravagance.—Senator Aldrich informed the Senate that $300,000,000 a year could be saved to the Government by strict business methods. He proposed to establish a commission which should be given authority to conduct an investigation and frame recommendations to the end that the greatest saving possible might be effected. The plan met with considerable opposition. Senator Dolliver thought it a needless addition to the score of commissions now in full blast at an "expense so great as almost in some cases to be incredible." Senator Money deplored the mixing of the executive and legislative branches of the government especially in that sort of work. Senator Carter, of Montana, while conceding that "infinite duplication exists in the various departments of the government," which, for instance, has eight or ten different map-making departments in the city of Washington, attacked the proposed commission as "a bureaucratic advance to power." Senator Bristow, who admitted that there are hundreds of employees of the government whose services could be dispensed with, objected to "going to a lot of expense to find out that we ought to do things which we know now we ought to do." All these statements are considered frank and outspoken coming from representatives in Congress of a political power which has had control of the government for thirteen successive years.

Philadelphia Car Strike.—Lawless demonstrations continued through the week in the extensive strike of the Philadelphia street railway employees. One hundred and forty labor unions, numbering 125,000 men, voted on Sunday, February 27, for a general strike in sympathy with the striking car men. The walk-out was decided for Saturday, March 5, unless the grievances of the railway men were arbitrated by that time. In the resolution declaring for a strike a clause was ingeniously incorporated which puts the city in the same defensive position as the Rapid Transit Company by calling upon the City Council to take cognizance of the situation in such manner as will effect a settlement.

Ballinger-Pinchot Affair.—As a preliminary to his examination before the Congressional investigating committee, Mr. Pinchot read a statement in which he says that Mr. Ballinger, Secretary of the Interior, had entered office with the determination to make short work of the policy of keeping the natural resources of the country out of the hands of monopoly; that the Secretary had been unfaithful to public interests, had deceived the President and should be removed from office. In reply, Secretary Ballinger issued this statement: "In view of the fact that I will presently have an opportunity to appear before the committee and acquaint them with the truth, I shall not reply through the press to the mendacious aspersions which Mr. Pinchot seeks to cast upon me."

Senator Gordon's Farewell.—An unusual scene occurred in the United States Senate when Senator Gordon of Mississippi addressed his colleagues. As he had held office for less than two months pending the election of a new member, it was the Senator's maiden speech as well as his farewell address. The aged soldier and statesman, who is past seventy-six years, told in simple, unaffected language how his life's ambition to sit in the Senate had been realized, adding a graceful tribute to the courtesy of his fellow Senators and a plea that Mason and Dixon's line be obliterated. Contrary to rule the speech was greeted with rounds of applause from the galleries and the members on the floor joined in heartily. There was no attempt made by the Vice-President to call for order.

Crisis in Great Britain.—Lord Rosebery has given notice of his intention to move on March 14 that the House of Lords go into Committee of the Whole to formulate a plan for its own reform.—The Liberal Cabinet has conceded the demands of the Irish Party and the Radicals. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd-George announced on Monday that resolutions excluding the Lords from financial legislation and limiting their veto on other legislation to the life-time of one Parliament will be introduced March 29 and before proceeding with the Budget. Should these resolutions, when passed by the Commons, be rejected or delayed by the Lords, the Premier will ask the Crown to exercise the royal prerogative, and if King Edward refuses he will resign. He will later introduce a bill substituting an elective for an hereditary second Chamber. The change of tactics is attributed to the tactful pressure of Mr. Redmond.

Mr. Redmond and Mr. Asquith.—Mr. Redmond said, in his Dublin speech, that it was not Mr. Asquith's Home Rule declaration that decided the Irish party to support the Liberals at the election, but his pledge that neither he nor his colleagues would hold office without guarantees against the veto of the Lords, who now can and would throw out any Home Rule bill passed by the Liberals in the Commons. Hence unless the Government adheres to its program of Redress before Supply and disables the Upper House from marring a measure of Irish self-government, the Liberals will be in no position to enact such a measure and Ireland cannot support them. Home Rule is now the dominant issue in British politics and must so remain till it is granted. This strong ultimatum, with the firmness of his subsequent attitude towards the Government, has won Mr. Redmond support in Ireland beyond party lines. A few days later the new Bishop of Clonfert, in reply to addresses on his consecration, commended the past achievements of the party and their present uncompromising policy. They represent a great principle: Ireland can mind its own business as well as Canadians, Australians and Boers, and in using their power over parties to enact that principle into law Irishmen should give them unanimous support. A statement by Col. Everard, who is trying to revive the tobacco industry, illustrates the unpopularity of the Budget. His experiments have proved that Ireland can produce tobacco that would bring $250,000,000 in wages to its workers, but is barred by a tax of a dollar a pound. He had to pay $850 revenue per acre under tobacco, and the Budget adds to this $200 more, thus strangling an infant industry that has no competitors to injure.

The British Colonies.—The Paramatta, one of the torpedo boat destroyers building for the Australian Commonwealth, and the first ship of its new navy, was launched on the Clyde, February 9. The attempt to have the first Ministry of the South African Federal Parliament nonpartisan seems likely to fall through, as the more advanced members of the Bond are opposed to it. Those who favor it still hope that General Botha, who has not yet expressed his mind on the subject, may bring it about, but this is a bare hope not based on any very definite grounds.

Troubles in India.—In the debate on the Press Bill in the Legislative Council, an attempt was made to limit its operations to three years. It was defeated by 42 votes to 16.—The Viceroy announced that he had granted an amnesty to those who had been deported for seditious utterances. This was received with astonishment and no little distrust by the Europeans and some of the more conservative of the natives, who judge that his hopes of thus conciliating the revolutionary element will be disappointed. Among the native Princes there is no little wonder at the changeable policy pursued, as well as at the toleration of revolutionary speech in England, which must have its effect in India.—Some of the amnestied agitators have reached Calcutta and were received by processions singing seditious songs. The principal one, Krishna Kunar Mitter, made a progress through the principal streets and was received at his house by Arabindo Ghose, a leader in the agitation.

The Congo Accusations.—Last January the Rev. Dugald Campbell wrote to the Times in the highest terms of the Katanga District of the Belgian Congo. Mr. E. D. Morel replied, traversing his statements. Lieutenant Learmonth now writes to the same journal that, having travelled in that district during 1906 and 1907, he can corroborate Mr. Campbell's assertions. He declares Morel's letter inaccurate and misleading and asserts him to be always needlessly aggressive towards the Congo Government which treats the natives much better than the British do in Rhodesia.

Nova Scotia Legislature.—The Legislature of Nova Scotia opened in the afternoon of February 24 at Halifax with the usual military display. In the speech from the throne Lieutenant-Governor Fraser referred with satisfaction to the adjustment of the difficulties between the coal and steel industries in the eastern section of the province; to the abundant evidence of progress in agriculture and to the usefulness of the Truro Agricultural College; to the methods for better utilization and conservation of natural resources, especially forests, of which the Provincial Government has made a survey during last summer, thus becoming the leader among the provinces of Canada in making an inventory of its forest wealth. Other topics touched upon were the betterment of the highways through the expenditure of the provincial road grant; the proposed legislation enabling the Minister of Railways to obtain any of the lines connecting with the Intercolonial Railway; the work of the commission on the limitation of the hours of labor; compensation to workmen for injuries received in the fulfilment of their tasks, and the proposed plan for a Canadian naval service to act in co-operation with the Imperial Navy. George E. Faulkner was elected Speaker of the House.

Germany and Austria in Full Accord.—Graf Aehrenthal, the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, was warmly welcomed on his visit to Berlin last week. During his stay of several days in the German capital he held long consultations with the Chancellor and the Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs of the German Empire and evidently found himself in full accord with them regarding international policies. Following his departure from Berlin an official note, published simultaneously in the German and Austrian capitals, declared that Graf Aehrenthal's visit had strengthened the bonds of sympathy uniting the two peoples. Germany and Austria, it continued, would work together to preserve the status quo in the Balkans, together they would lend their help in promoting the order now being introduced into the domestic affairs of the Ottoman Empire. The note gives assurance of the stability of the alliance between the two Empires as well as of their traditional relations with Italy. Both Graf Aehrenthal and Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg are represented as having like confidence in the peaceful evolution of international policies in the future, a confidence based upon the strength of the Triple Alliance and upon the present favorable aspect of relations existing between the German and Austrian peoples and the other great powers.

Progress of the Electoral Reform Measure.—The Electoral Reform Commission of the Prussian House of Representatives has completed the first reading of the Reform Bill. The partial compromise suggested by the National-Liberal party, which would allow a secret ballot to the electors chosen by open ballot in the three classes, was rejected by the votes of the German-Conservatives, the Independent Conservatives and the Centrum. The members of this last party are being complimented on the cleverness they have so far shown in pushing their own idea of a proper reform. As planned at present the debate on the second reading will begin on March 3, in order to present the Commission's report to the House on March 14 and to complete the further readings in the full assembly before Easter. The holiday recess to follow will permit the rest required by the constitution before the measure enters upon its second and final consideration. This second consideration is a requirement fixed by law in case of enactments involving changes in the constitution. Amendments of the constitution, after their first approval, must be debated a second time in both Houses and be voted upon again 21 days after their first passing. If this program be carried out the completed measure will be sent to the Upper House shortly after Easter.

Germany's Attitude to American Exhibit.—Considerable astonishment was created in American quarters in Berlin by the statement of Herr Delbrück, Imperial Secretary of the Interior, in the Reichstag, that the German Government is not supporting the projected American industrial exhibition in Berlin either morally or financially. The statement was later corrected in the report of the Reichstag to read "no official support." An official statement explains that the Secretary's words were "the necessary expression of neutrality toward an undertaking which was inaugurated without the foreknowledge of the German Government, and according to whose plan German producers were offered no opportunity of bringing their manufactures into competition with foreign exhibits." The explanation further states that the Government had given no official introduction to representatives of the exposition syndicate who had gone from Berlin to the United States to interest Americans in the project. It concludes with a pledge of cordial reception in case the exhibit open in Berlin on the understanding implied in its statement. It may be added that the declaration came as a complete surprise to Americans interested, as they had been led to believe that the project had the official support of the German Government. The announcement of the intended exhibition, made some time ago, assured those on this side that the invitation came through the German Embassy; Prince Henry, the Emperor's brother, was President of the Committee of Reception; the Government had waived the right to customs duties on the exhibits to be sent over, and, finally, the Emperor himself was to open the exhibition.

New National Party in Hungary.—As stated in the Chronicle, Prime Minister Graf Khuen-Hedervary, after the vote of "lack of confidence" in his cabinet late in January, suspended the sitting of Parliament until March 4 without giving formal notice of his future plans. It appears that he had then in mind the forming of a new political party, powerful enough to offset the efforts of the coalition which has of late rendered all attempt at legislative action in Budapest futile. The new party appears to-day an assured fact. The program of organization recently published has met a hearty response in the Kingdom and the National Labor Party, as it is termed, appears strong enough to carry into effect the plans of the Premier. These turn chiefly upon a satisfactory electoral reform measure, and Graf Khuen has made known his intent to bring about as large a measure of universal suffrage as shall be found consistent with the national character. The army proposals favored by the late Tisza Cabinet shall also be pushed through Parliament.

French Cardinal Government's Victim.—The text of the judgment rendered by the civil tribunal of Rheims against Cardinal Luçon, Archbishop of Rheims, for having signed the episcopal letter forbidding the use by Catholic pupils of certain public school text-books, was published on February 26. The court declares that every complaint of the teachers was justified, and says that in some isolated communes the episcopal letter aroused such hatred against the public school teachers as to cause them to be subjected to veritable brutalities. The judgment asserts that the letter failed of the sympathy of many priests and of some bishops; but the only case alleged in support of this assertion is that of the Bishop of Nice, who is reported to have declared publicly that he could not join in an incitement to civil strife. The conclusion of the judgment seems to hint at this being a test case that may end the prosecutions of bishops, for the judges explain that the wide publicity given to this litigation has afforded the teachers the moral satisfaction demanded, and that as Cardinal Luçon's high character frees him from the charge that his action has been inspired by base motives, material damages of one hundred dollars only are assessed, the defendant being condemned further to pay the costs. It will be remembered that each bishop who signed that letter was to be sued for one thousand dollars damages (see AMERICA, Vol. II, p. 138). The Cardinal appeals to a higher court against both damages and costs.

Victory for the Slavic Union.—Hinting that his action had been inspired by the Emperor's desire of peace, Freiherr von Bienerth, Prime Minister of the Austrian Empire, has dismissed his Minister of Agriculture, Dr. Shreiner. Throughout the Empire the dismissal has caused bitter sentiment among the German parties, who affirm that Dr. Shreiner has been sacrificed to placate the Slavic Union. No Minister will be named to fill the vacant post for the present.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

St. Cyprian on Unity

It is generally known in a vague way that certain documents used freely in times past to demonstrate the primacy of the Holy See, have been called in question. Some suppose the whole Catholic position to be in consequence destroyed. This is far from being the case, since it can be fully established without the aid of these documents. If theologians no longer quote them, it is not because they admit them to be discredited. On the contrary, they hold the traditional view of them to be generally the right one, and they do not use them because they recognize that in so grave a matter every testimony should be absolutely above suspicion.

Certain controversialists, not equally moderate, exaggerating the results of modern criticism, assume them to have been proved worthless. With more courage than learning they cry: "It is a well-known fact that this never occurred; that such a treatise has been falsified or interpolated in the interests of Rome." As certain of these assertions have been made lately, both loudly and persistently, we take the occasion to make the following counter-statements:

It is not a fact that the Holy See did not send legates to the First Council of Nice.

It is not a fact that legates did not preside in its name over the Council.

It is not a fact that a canon, usually reckoned the sixth, of that Council, did not assert the universal primacy of the Holy See, but merely determined the primatial or patriarchal jurisdiction of Alexandria and Antioch.

It is not a fact that St. Cyprian's treatise, De Unitate, has been interpolated in the interest of the Roman Primacy.

As those controversialists are weak in logic we must call to their attention that these propositions are only the contradictories of their favorite assertions and logically do not state the contraries of these. Take the first for instance. We hold, of course, that the Pope sent legates to the Council; but our proposition does not assert this. It simply contradicts the controversialists who say it is a fact, that is, it is certain he did not. Hence it is true, if it be only probable that he did. Were they contented with only a probability in the matter; did they confine themselves to saying: "It is not a fact that the Pope sent legates," that is, "it is probable he did not," we should be perfectly willing to defend the certainty that he did. But such modesty would not suit their case. This requires them to assert absolutely he did not. This explanation is to be applied to the rest of our counter-statements.

Before one can assert something as an undoubted fact he must be ready to solve every difficulty in the way. Against the assertion: The Pope did not send legates to the First Council of Nice, these grave objections occur: the presence of the two Roman priests, Victor and Vincentius, their subscription to the acts with the definite statement in every catalogue of subscriptions, that they did so on behalf of St. Sylvester, the peculiar position in the Council of Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, which can not be attributed to anything personal in him, and the statements of historians that the three were legates of the Holy See. The controversialists attempt to solve these difficulties, it is true, but they do not dissolve them in such a way as to give them even a shadow of a right to say: "It is a fact."

Against the positive statement that these legates did not preside over the Council in the Pope's name, the question comes up: If they did not, who did? Historians are divided. Some pretend that the Emperor Constantine did so. Photius claims the office for the Bishop of Constantinople. Others say, the Patriarch of Alexandria; others again, the Patriarch of Antioch. In general, however, these historians join with him to whom they give the first place, the Roman Pontiff represented by his legates. Photius himself does so. Orientals had an obvious motive for putting, now one, now another, of their patriarchs in the presidential office, but what constrained them to join the Pope with each? Suppose, for example, some fifteen hundred years hence, men should find one historian saying that Adams and Washington were chiefs in a certain transaction, another saying Madison and Washington, a third, Hamilton and Washington; suppose further, that each should be known to have been a partisan of the one to whom he gave the first place, the conclusion clearly would be that Washington was the real chief in the affair. And if on turning to all the official records extant, these men should find Washington's name always in the first place, the conclusion would become a certainty. Now this is what happens when we look into the catalogue of subscriptions to the acts of the Council. Hosius, Victor and Vincentius sign first, then come the names of those amongst whom their partisans divide the honor of presiding. The conclusion is inevitable. What answer do they make who say so dogmatically: "It is a fact that the Pope's legates did not preside"?

It is easy to take Ruffinus as an authority in the matter of the sixth canon, and to quote his brief paraphrase. But is this sufficient to justify the confident assertion: It is a fact? Ruffinus is by no means above all suspicion, and as for the canon itself, Labbe, wiser and more learned than any of the controversialists, styles it: "vexatissimum apud eruditos omnes," most discussed amongst all scholars. Those, if they know them, can not ignore the codices which begin the canon with the words: "The Roman Church has always had the primacy," nor can they pass over the fact that in the famous sixteenth session of Chalcedon the legates of the Holy See quoted it in that form in testimony to the rights of the Roman Pontiff. Hence the probable sense of the canon is: Saving always the primacy of the Roman Church, let the Bishops of Alexandria, Antioch and other chief sees, exercise over surrounding sees that metropolitical jurisdiction which the Bishop of Rome exercises over the suburbican bishops; and what corruption has been introduced into its text is rather of Greek than of Roman origin. All this must be cleared away before the controversialists can say: It is a fact that the canon does not assert the primacy of the Holy See.

In St. Cyprian's treatise, De Unitate, occurs a passage in which he demonstrates the necessity of holding the unity of the Church from the fact that Christ made this unity manifest by building His Church on one, St. Peter. Though He gives, after the resurrection, to the other Apostles equal power, like fellowship of honor, yet the origin of unity is from Him. A little reflection would enable one to draw from the passage an excellent argument for the Primacy of the Holy See. Nevertheless in many manuscripts another version of the passage is also found, in which the argument for the Primacy is drawn out explicitly. A third version exists in which the two are combined. This is materially spurious inasmuch as it is not the work of St. Cyprian; it is interpolated if the second of the versions just mentioned be spurious. But is it so? This is what the controversialists have to show before they can say: "St. Cyprian has been interpolated"; and this they coolly assume. The style of the text is St. Cyprian's. Its arguments can be reproduced from other writings of his. It is quoted by Venerable Bede, St. Gregory the Great and St. Gelasius. It was almost certainly known to St. Jerome and St. Optatus in the fourth century. Hence many learned men hold St. Cyprian to have been the author of both; of the first when he wrote his treatise to draw the Novatian heretics to union with himself as their bishop; of the second when he sent, as he certainly did, his treatise to Pope St. Cornelius to be used to bring back to the rightful pontiff the Roman confessors who had been drawn to support an antipope.

As for the further statement that interpolations are made in the interests of the Roman Primacy, the controversialists must show that this needs interpolations. This they will labor in vain to do: the Primacy is proved absolutely by arguments they cannot challenge.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

The Library of the "Exercises"

There is a well known story told of a saint who when shown by a duke through his valuable library, drew a small volume from his pocket with the remark: "And yet, within the compass of this small book a richer library is to be found than the splendid collection which your Grace is kind enough to show me, and one from which infinitely more may be learned." That book was the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius, which, since its approbation by Paul III in 1548, has not only proved a library of spiritual doctrine to those who know it but has also been the object of so many explanations both within and without the Society of Jesus, of so many attacks, misrepresentations and apologies on the part of Catholics and Protestant alike, that to-day a collection of some of these forms a library of over 6,000 volumes.

Not far from the Belgian capital, in the house of theological studies at Enghien, where almost 150 French Jesuits enjoy the religious liberties no longer accorded them in their own country, Father Henry Watrigant has collected as many editions and translations of the "Exercises" as he has been able to find and all the books and manuscripts which in any way refer to or treat of them. These he has catalogued and arranged in an orderly disorder according to their subject matter. The collection goes by the name of the "Library of the Spiritual Exercises." By the side of old volumes in parchment of the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries is found the neat book of modern times; the bulky edition in folio rests high on its shelf next to the slender brochure of a dozen pages, all sounding in perfect harmony the praises of "the Exercises," explaining its methods, teaching its practice and recounting the history of its persecutions and its triumphs from its composition down to the present day.

The idea of the library is unique; its history is simple. In the year 1878 a young Jesuit in the college of Vals, France, wrote an account of the fruit being reaped in different localities by means of the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius. This account was well received; the author was encouraged and began a study that was to be the object of his predilection throughout life—the study of "the Exercises." Ordained priest, Father Watrigant was able to continue and give himself more fully to his favorite work. In 1882 he founded and directed a House of Retreats in Lille, and soon by his counsel and experience contributed largely to the foundation of others in various cities of France and Belgium. Catholic Congresses, as those of Paris, Rheims and Lille, listened to him advocating the establishment of houses of retreats and advising the use of "the Exercises." For all this study was necessary, and as Father Watrigant came more and more in contact with the literature of his special work, he saw that a collection of documents referring to the precious book of St. Ignatius would be of the greatest practical utility.

The library was begun. In 1887, with its founder it was transferred from Lille to Rheims. We find it already numbering 2,000 volumes in 1891, but three years later everything came to a standstill on account of the ill-health of the collector. When he again resumed work in 1899 the library was back in its first home at Lille. The French Government struck at everything religious in 1901, and the library of "the Exercises" was saved by being brought to Belgium and installed in the college at Enghien. For the same reason of security the invitation to place the library at Rome where it would be more accessible to visitors could not be accepted, and so it remains indefinitely at Enghien.

A few moments in the library and one sees the admirable order that Father Watrigant has drawn out of chaos. There are four great divisions: (1) books or documents regarding the text; (2) books or documents which relate to the theory; (3) books or documents concerning the practice; (4) books or documents giving the history of "the Exercises." The first three groups form a complete whole; the fourth division is a history of the practice, a natural complement of the third group. Father Watrigant himself explains the division in one of his letters: "Father Louis de Ponte has said somewhere that the book of 'the Exercises' is a tree upon whose branches rest the birds of heaven. If I should develop this comparison and apply it to the division of my collection I would say that the text of 'the Exercises' is the root of the tree, . . . the theory is the trunk from which the branches grow; these, spreading as they do on every side in great abundance, give us the idea of the practice of 'the Exercises' in their manifold application; finally, the fruit of the tree is the history of 'the Exercises,' which by the grace of God have had such a wonderful fecundity." Since writing these lines the collector of the library has added a new division—spiritual doctrine in other schools than the Ignatian, e. g., Benedictine, Franciscan, etc.

Each of the great divisions—text, theory, practice, history—is subdivided into smaller divisions, of which it would be too long to speak here in full. In the first division we find the original text, its different editions and translations, the vulgate version and its editions, and finally works describing the genesis and composition of "the Exercises," their general tenor, economy, characteristics and a complete bibliography. Father Storger's work on the ascetical literature of "the Exercises" was once the great bibliography. It is, however, very incomplete and full of errors. Father Watrigant has made a new and enormous one, in which he has gathered all that has been printed on "the Exercises" by Jesuits and others and everything that gave indication of the manuscripts scattered through countless libraries in Europe. The undertaking was immense but absolutely necessary. Among the Vulgate versions are three which deserve more than ordinary attention. One is of the first edition of 1548, now exceedingly rare and the fourth publication made by the Society of Jesus. Another is the beautiful folio printed at Paris, typis argenteis, by order of Louis XIII. It is one of the first publications of the national library. The third is a real curiosity, the edition of an Anglican minister, Orby Shipley, who wrote it for the spiritual benefit of Protestants. In spite of his desire of adhering scrupulously to the text of St. Ignatius, he was willing to modify rather freely the Rules for thinking with the Church, which he afterwards entered. There are other works by Protestants, especially Anglicans, of which we shall speak later.

Under the headings, Theory and Practice, we meet with all the great names connected with "the Exercises." Method and doctrine divide the theory with a part reserved for censure and praise. Here the names of Roothaan, Diertins, Nonell, Meschler, Ponlevoy, Gagliardi, Suarez, Hettinger and Palma occur often. But since "the Exercises" are eminently practical and lead to practical results, the works under practice are the most numerous of all. Here we have a labyrinth of divisions and a galaxy of great names. "The Exercises" are treated in all their possible adaptations to particular ends and persons, to religious, secular priests, laymen, as a preparation for death, marriage, etc., etc., in the light of particular devotions, e. g., Blessed Sacrament, Sacred Heart, St. Joseph, Blessed Virgin, the Angels, etc.

Besides the biographies of many Jesuits, special expounders of "the Exercises," we find here also the lives of several saints known for their admiration of St. Ignatius' spiritual weapon, e. g., St. Charles Borromeo, St. Vincent de Paul, St. Alphonsus Liguori, St. Leonard of Port Maurice, etc. St. Vincent de Paul gave "the Exercises" to 20,000 exercitants at St. Lazarus. After the lives of many other illustrious priests and laymen, come some of those remarkable women, as Mesdames de Miramion, Budes, de Rennes, Mlle. de St. Luc, guillotined at Paris for having distributed pictures of the Sacred Heart. The "Book of the Exercises" used by the latter in her retreats at Guimber is one of the precious relics of the library. It was bought for two cents! Let us not forget the life of Maria-Antonia de San José de la Paz, who, after the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Spanish colonies, had "the Exercises" given in retreats to over 100,000 persons in South America.

The work of collecting is still going on as ever. A glance at the bibliographies published by Father Watrigant for 1904-07 and 1907-09 shows the necessity of this. For these past six years we have 340 review articles, books or brochures on "the Exercises" in eight languages. Thirty are in English. Among the old books in English we find many from the pens of Anglicans, principally the Cowley Fathers. Their founder, Rev. M. R. Benson, has several, e. g., "Instructions in the Divine Art of Systematic Meditation," "Benedictus Dominus," "Of the Advantage and Aim of Spiritual Retreats." We find one book by Dr. Pusey, "Eleven Addresses During a Retreat of the Companions of the Love of Jesus." There are others by the Rev. T. T. Carter, the Rev. Edward Churton, Bishop of Nassau; Dean Randall of Chichester, etc. Perhaps the most curious is "Vita et Doctrina Jesu Christi . . . Per N. Avancinum, S.J., ad usum cleri anglicani accomodavit Presbyter Ignotus." Of course, the Presbyter-Ignotus had to introduce many changes to make his work acceptable to the clerus anglicanus.

In order to make his work known and to offer to others the world over the results of his own studies and that of others privileged to visit the library at will, Father Watrigant founded a review four years ago which appears six times annually. Its name is Collection de la Bibliotheque des Exercices and is published by Lethielleux, Paris. Its object is theoretical, historical and practical. As years go by this review will become a veritable commentary on "the Exercises" and any questions pertaining to them. In the twenty-four numbers already published we find two bibliographies, discussions on the fundamental meditation before St. Ignatius, on the use of lantern slides in retreats, on retreats for deaf-mutes, on the organization of retreat-houses in different countries, etc. Each number is complete, a veritable classic written by some master. The use of lantern slides to-day replaces the use of large illustrations so effectively employed by St. Peter Claver, Blessed Anthony Balducci, etc. Some Jesuits have even arranged little dramas according to the plan of "the Exercises," thus to drive home better the fundamental truths of religion.

The library of "the Exercises" is a delight for lovers of old manuscripts and rare books. Seneca feared a man of one book. What would he have said of a man with a review and a whole library on one book?

FERDINAND C. WHEELER, S.J.

"Bradley or Bergson?"—or Aristotle?

Almost everyone interested in current philosophy is sure to be attracted by the signature of Professor James, if not through hope of enlightenment, at least for the sake of the entertainment afforded by his brilliant style and because of his great prominence. Avoiding, as he usually does, anything like a definite formulation of his philosophic creed, and emphasizing on principle the necessary inadequacy of any such attempt, he would seem of late to yield somewhat to the demand ever growing louder for a coherent, brief statement of his fundamental tenets and the reasons thereof. This tendency is especially marked in his article, "Bradley or Bergson?" which appears in The Journal of Philosophy, Psychology and Scientific Methods for January 20, 1910.

An avowed admirer and disciple of Bergson, he very graphically presents us in this paper with what he looks upon as the clearest possible expression in brief of the basis of true philosophizing, the last word to be said by Radical Empiricists in reply to the last word of Intellectualists, who are typified by Mr. Bradley. The latter had given a résumé of his creed in Mind for October. The main issue is of course bound to be the same old epistemological problem, whether we call the contestants realists and idealists—empiricists and intellectualists—nominalists and realists—dogmatists and sceptics. In the end it is the cardinal question of the true nature and value of the universal. Involved with it are all those other questions of truth, certitude, the worth of speculative science and especially metaphysics, even the true meaning and value of our sensitive cognition. But it is a great relief to have it once more narrowed down so sharply to the basic question as to what is the essential element that we are all conscious of in the mind's encounter with reality.

According to Professor James's analysis, in the beginning of their philosophic journey, Bradley and Bergson follow the same path, both reject the Kantian explanation of conception as a unifying of discrete unconnected sensitive percepts; both admit that in sensation itself we grasp the object as a unit, "a transparent, immediately intuited much-at-once." According to both, the subsequent concept is a distorted, denaturalized, second-hand encounter with reality, lacking the genuineness and the fulness of direct sensitive contact; distorted because static, whereas the feeling grasps reality as it is, in flux; so inadequate, that by its omission of many elements found in reality it is hopelessly unable to give an account of space, time, causality, relation, activity, personality, that shall be compatible with what our senses report.

At this point the roads divide. The one, the road of speculative philosophy, confessedly incompatible with truth and with what our senses tell us—"The way of Philosophy is not the way of life"—is that adopted by Bradley and the most advanced and consistent idealists; the other, the path of radical empiricism, is that of Bergson and James; in one word, it is the path straight back home. Speculation, it says, is waste of time under the circumstances. Real philosophy is better described as avoidance of such vain questionings. Let us be content with practical life. The richest and most satisfying course lies in proximity to the here and now. If you are tormented by a desire to roam, you will best satisfy it by giving rein to the irresponsible imagination; do not torture yourself by vain rules of logic which will lead you no nearer to the truth.

There is no defending the aberrations of Bradley, or his perverse adhesion to a path he knows leads far from life and common sense, admitting that "doubtless it may be delusion," yet trusting to an ill-grounded conviction that somehow everything will come right in the end. However, one must resent Mr. James's assumption that the only alternative to all this is Bergson's and his own radical empiricism. If there is one notorious fact in the history of philosophy, it is that extremes meet and their meeting place has always been the arid land of scepticism. Philosophers hate this word and shrink from the absurdities it implies, but the trade (for doctrine it is not) is by no means obsolete, and Bradley and Bergson furnish us with the latest example of a pair who have unexpectedly met there. It is this coincidence, both in the early stages of their journey and in its final outcome, that gives James hope for their final reconciliation. We agree with him that, so far as results are concerned, Bradley might just as well give up his wearisome, roundabout route to nowhere.

The stock advertisement of ancient Greek sceptics (borrowed from their predecessors, the Sophists) was, that they dealt with practical life; in practical life alone happiness was to be found—that fulness of encounter with reality. Whether one takes sides with the Platonists, ancient or modern, who so exalted the ideal as to reduce the throbbing world of time and space to a shadow, or, on the other hand, gives allegiance to Heraclitus, who could grasp nothing beyond the here and now, in either case, there is the same unnatural divorce between life and intellect, common sense and philosophy, with the inevitable conclusion—intellectual despair.

The great service of Aristotle was to lay bare the fallacy and to point out the middle course of sane philosophy. It is surely pitiable that on this of all questions the painstaking distinctions of the sage of philosophers should be considered beneath notice beside the systems of Bradley and Bergson. Why should there not be the direct encounter of mind with reality? Human thought is not a mere web-spinning process by which reality already grasped in a distinctively human but un-intellectual way is done over. Thought-concept marks rather the very first meeting that man as such has with reality. Without the universal direct cognition neither James nor Bradley nor Bergson would find much relish or richness in his contact with reality, however much he may despise that important entity. Presupposing this, reflective thought has a new meaning. The function of intellect is not reduced to the impossible unifying task ascribed to it by Kant, nor is it a mere ornamental appendage to human life. Without intellectual activity there is no active human life.

Overlooking all the shallow Lockean confusion of thought and feeling in direct cognition, one marvels at what this "richness and fulness of life" can be, and how it can more than compensate for either the pleasure or the usefulness which speculative thought has brought to individuals and to the world at large. It seems quite as intelligible, to say the least, that, even from the sceptics' standpoint, Mr. Bradley should choose intellectual gymnastics for the keen satisfaction he finds in them, as that Mr. James should prefer another mode of enjoyment. If there be question of practical utility, in the long run we can have very slight room for doubt which of the two methods per se could be more readily dispensed with. Purely speculative mathematicians have rendered no slight service to the practical well-being of men, and though the effects of metaphysical abstract reasoning are less tangible, the clear reason is that they are more far-reaching, more widely distributed, and exercise a more subtle influence.

The ideal man is one in whom is found the harmonious development of all human faculties, each one trained to a high degree of excellence. His would indeed be a rare encounter with reality. But who will find such a man? "Procul et de ultimis finibus terrae." Even our greatest men are either by reason of natural endowment or by education somewhat lopsided. In real life there are no perfect spheres, and the most we can hope for in an individual is that he have, besides a good general equipment, some particular faculties particularly keen-edged, or some particular field of human endeavor particularly well cultivated. Moreover, the cultivation of one faculty or application to one line of endeavor may, and usually does, interfere with accomplishment in other lines. The ploughman has as a rule neither time nor opportunity nor, perhaps, the taste to develop into a great social reformer, a profound speculative thinker, a poet or an artist; but, if he is a normal man, he does encounter reality through the same faculties of sense, imagination, intellect and will, which if more highly endowed or more fully developed would have made him all of these. He does, in his own humble and rudimentary fashion, enter into an appreciation of reality through all these varied channels. To excel in only one, even though it rank not first in the list of human activities, is no reproach, but rather a necessary consequence of our limitations.

If we understand Mr. James's dictum of higher wisdom, he would have us eliminate from the list of activities worth special cultivation the exercise of speculative thought, because this function does not include all the others. He would have us "tumble to life's call and turn into the valley where the green pastures and the clear waters always were." But for many vigorous minds, in the future as in the past, "life's call" will be truth's call, and in the following of that call they will still find a "full thickness and activity" that "the me's and thee's and now's and here's" could never yield them without it.

Like every advocate of an outlandish system of philosophy, Bergson has the faculty, an unavoidable and indispensable one, of scattering parenthetical grains of truth through the tares. One of these deserves notice both on account of the unexpected analogue it suggests and of the unwarranted conclusion it insinuates. "The way to know reality intimately is, according to this philosopher, to sink into those data (i. e., perceptual data—the data of sense) and get our sympathetic imagination to enlarge their bounds. Deep knowledge is not the conceptually meditated but of the immediate type. Bergson thus allies himself with old-fashioned empiricism on the one hand and with mysticism on the other." To those acquainted with Ignatian asceticism these words recall a familiar expression and an all-important distinction. There is indeed an "intima cognitio" that brings one in closer personal touch with reality than mere dry, abstract, discursive thought. It is that cognition which pauses for the will to act. There is indeed a profound difference between going deeply into a subject and letting the subject sink deeply into your soul. But these two are neither mutually exclusive nor to be contrasted in the manner implied in this passage. One might range through all the realms of theological thought and still remain untouched within, unsympathetic, as dry as the interior of a hollow ball that has sunk through fathoms of ocean. His contact with reality is incomplete because man was made to encounter reality not only by knowing the truth, but by loving the good.

The contrast, then, is not between cold, unsympathetic reason and contact with the things of sense, either as "here-and-now" or by the "enlarging of the sympathetic imagination," but rather between cold, unsympathetic reason and the same reason hand in hand with will, that source of warmth and sympathy and love that we call human in its best sense.

Stripped of its complicated allusions to modern persons and systems, and reduced to its lowest Greek denominator, Mr. James's statement amounts to this: "I think the sceptic Heraclitus was right. I think that Plato, the idealist, to be consistent, should have agreed with him in his conclusion." It is the play of Human Thought without its Hamlet. Aristotle it was who with scientific precision pointed out how you could and why you should "tumble to the call of life" and philosophy simultaneously. Surely his words deserve a little scholarly attention, before taking so momentous a leap.

Electoral Reform in Prussia

The fight being waged on trusts and corporations in the legislative halls of their own country no doubt distracts the attention of the American people from the bitter conflict now going on in Prussia, where a once all-powerful bureaucracy is battling for its life against the growing strength of the people. And yet the conflict offers an interesting study in politics. Prussia is almost the last of the great world powers, as we know, in which the constitutional prerogative of popular franchise is so limited and controlled as to practically make the voice of the people powerless. The present constitution of the Kingdom, promulgated by the King in 1850, vests the legislative power in the King and a bicameral legislature (Landtag), the two Chambers having substantial equality of powers in legislation.

The House of Peers (Herrenhaus), made up of hereditary peers, and of life peers and representative worthies largely dependent on royal appointment, is naturally aristocratic in sentiment. It numbers to-day about 300 members, of whom two-thirds, at least, are of the large land-owning classes. The House of Representatives (Abgeordnetenhaus) should be a popular assembly, and in the present trend of political feeling in Germany would be a democratic body were it not that the indirect vote system renders such an outcome ordinarily a doubtful one, the moneyed class having a decided advantage under its provisions.

The reason of this is readily understood. The House of Representatives is composed of 433 members, elected for a term of five years by indirect vote. The country is divided into districts, and in each district usually one representative is chosen by the three-class system. This system arranges the qualified voters of a district (all Prussians twenty-five years of age who enjoy the privilege of municipal franchise) into three classes according to the amount of taxes they pay; the largest taxpayers, who together pay one-third of the taxes, forming the first class; the next highest taxpayers, together paying a second third of the taxes, constituting the second class and the remaining taxpayers making the third class.

Each class of voters, by open ballot somewhat after the manner of an American convention, chooses an equal number of electors and these latter then assemble and ballot for the district's representative in the Abgeordnetenhaus. Popular leaders in Prussia have not been blind to the manifest advantage such a polling system assures to the wealthier classes, and they have for years back been schooling their constituents to make formal and insistent demand for such a change in the constitutional policy of the Kingdom as will give to them the privilege of direct and universal suffrage with secret ballot, such as imperial enactments make mandatory in the election of members of the German Reichstag.

The militant policy of these leaders at length forced from the Prussian Ministers a promise that an electoral reform measure would be laid before the Landtag in the session which opened early in February of the current year. The dissatisfaction which followed the introduction of the bill prepared by the Ministers, as well as the widespread popular demonstrations in opposition to its enactment, have been chronicled in AMERICA.

Although it is fathered by the National-Liberal party of Prussia, the opponents of the measure claim that it is neither "national" in its provisions, nor is it "liberal"; indeed they are outspoken in the contention that the so-called reform bill openly favors the permanency of plutocracy and bureaucracy in the Kingdom. The framers of the reform, so the complaint runs, have pushed aside every clause suggested by nonpartisan well-wishers of genuine progress to favor meekly the continued dominancy of the spirit hitherto holding that progress in check.

A correspondent has this to say of the reform bill so earnestly recommended by Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg shortly after the opening of the Landtag: "One recalls the sneers and jeers, which, even in Prussia, greeted the new franchise measure introduced in the Hungarian Parliament some time back by Count Andrassy, and how men laughed out of court a project more bureaucratic in its details than any suggested in the caste-ridden days of the Citizen-King Louis Philippe of France. Andrassy and his friends may well return the compliment to-day, since the proposed scheme of Prussian electoral reform is in no detail better, while in many of its enactments it is far worse than the Hungarian mockery. The world will be astonished to learn that a proposal like the present one should receive serious consideration in the Parliament of a nation so advanced as is Prussia."

To one who analyzes the reform bill now before the Prussian Landtag, the reason of this sharp criticism is easily discovered. A very objectionable feature of the bill is the absence of any suggestion to do away with the public ballot. The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung makes this pitiful defence of its party's position: "Through the open ballot a sense of personal responsibility is strengthened and the voter is safeguarded against many influences which endanger the honesty of the secret ballot." "Seldom," says the correspondent already quoted, "is a more audacious slap in the face given to truth."

The experience of our own country is proof enough that the more zealously the secrecy of the ballot is defended the greater certainty exists that individual conviction of what is best for the country's interest will rule the voter's action. And common report has it that in Prussia the politician, the capitalist, the wealthy corporation representatives have not been slow to avail themselves of the powerful weapon they possess in the knowledge which the open ballot gives to them to coerce the voters dependent upon them. The members of the great Centrum party, who have long had bitter reason to appreciate the vicious effects of the open ballot, will never cease in their opposition to a reform proposal which fails to eliminate it, and they are not at all backward in giving the Ministry assurance that no thought of compromise on this point is in their minds.

Another disposition of the new measure, whilst appearing to be a concession to the popular demand, is not calculated to effect any salutary change. Hereafter it is proposed to put in the first of the classes all those who pay taxes to the amount of 5,000 marks or over, and in the second all those paying 1,850 marks or over. To be sure it will not occur in this contingency as it has occurred in the system actually prevailing that in given districts the first class will contain but one or two voters, still the widening of the limits marking the divisions will not essentially change the dominant strength of the moneyed classes as compared with their poorer fellows. The principle of a very objectionable class system remains the same, and it is the principle which has been attacked by those who have looked for a genuine reform.

The one detail of the projected bill which gives satisfaction to the people is the change from the indirect to the direct ballot. Henceforth, should Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg succeed in pushing his measure through the Landtag, the citizens of Prussia in choosing parliamentary representatives will be able to vote directly for the individual they favor. The intermediary of electors will be eliminated. It is, as was said, an interesting lesson in latter-day politics, and one will be well repaid if he follows closely the accounts which come to us of the bitter struggle now on in the capital city of the great German Empire. "Harper's Weekly" Advises the Pope

We presume the tea-pot tempest let loose by Mr. Fairbanks in Rome upon American newspaperdom has at length been laid. Our former Vice-President is more to be pitied than blamed. For a good, harmless man, his turbulent career in the world of print is a mystery which we cannot explain. But his last weird episode is closed, and the only thing that interests us now is the vast literature cast up on the shores during the few days of raging storm.

Out of the mass of wreckage we take for choice a highly wrought piece of editorial comment stamped with the name of Harper's Weekly. "Nothing seems to be so useful to the Roman Catholic Church as lively Protestant competition. . . . If the Pope, with propriety, could subsidize the Methodist Association in Rome, it would pay to do it."

We submit this as the most adroit expression of opinion that appeared in connection with "the late unpleasantness." It was not an easy task to say something which would appear friendly to both Methodists and Catholics. To seem sympathetic with Catholics, and at the same time to tip a friendly wink to Methodists, is not an easy achievement; we recommend our diplomatists to study Harper's Weekly.

The sentences which we have quoted look plausible enough. Indeed the only suspicious feature about them is their bland and convincing innocence. See, for instance, how the so-called Protestant Reformation created a salutary counter-reformation in the Church itself. See, too, the vigor and self-sacrifice of Catholic activities in those countries where the Church is kept up to the pitch of strenuousness by the opposition, not always scrupulous, of widespread heresy. The case seems clear. It really appears to the editor of Harper's Weekly that the Pope ought to pay people to become Protestants in order to prevent his bishops and priests from falling asleep. In order to preserve vigilance among the shepherds of his flock he ought to subsidize the multiplication of wolves. It is a fascinating theory.

But we wonder whether the theory would work out to the satisfaction of the editor in matters concerning which there is no religious prejudice to obscure the vision. Hardship and struggle are age-old tests and promoters of truth and character as well in the case of individuals as in that of institutions. Suffering and privation and unjust antagonism are acknowledged moulders of rare manhood and womanhood. This is universal experience. But are we, on that account, justified in wishing to see others sick and hungry and wrestling with adversity? It is highly probable that the writer we are criticizing is of the stuff to profit spiritually and intellectually from the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune. If he should lose all his fortune (quod Deus avertat) in the next Wall Street shuffle, it might have a very chastening effect upon him. It has happened that way more than once. But we are not going, for all that, to tell him that if he, with propriety, could subsidize the jobbers of the stock market, it would pay to do it. A dangerous illness, or the loss of a friend, has often done men good. But we should not thank the Job's comforter who could watch us writhing in the "fell clutch of circumstance," and could observe with smug decorum that "man's extremity is God's opportunity." To be in extremity is very often to be near grace; but we do not think "it would pay" us to encourage others to reduce us to extremity. A little murdering and robbing will keep the official conscience of the police alert and vigilant, whilst a period of Saturnian peacefulness would disrupt their discipline. But still we cannot approve, much less encourage, the commission of crime.

A little reflection ought to show the editor of Harper's Weekly that there are many things in this world which are productive of good in the long run, but which we cannot even seem to encourage nor even desire to exist. St. Augustine said that God would not permit evil if He could not draw good out of it. Even with our limited intelligence we know how many evils work unto good. But to do evil that good might come from it, or to wish to see it done, or to encourage it on the score that "it would pay"—this is a perversion of thought that we find it hard to account for.

What a multitude of advisers the Pope is burdened with! Modernists, editors of papers, politicians, progressive and dissatisfied Catholics—we cannot name them all—they are forever pouring a deluge of advice and friendly suggestion and amicable fault-finding and useful hints and superior wisdom in papers and books and speeches Romeward to the venerable Pontiff, the successor of St. Peter. He has need of infallibility; but not for such advice as that proffered by Harper's Weekly.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

The lack of a sense of humor is the cause of much modern infidelity. Take as an example the following sentiment in an article which treats of divorce. The writer—a woman—believes divorce is hurtful to society and civilization. Let there be separation if necessary, but no remarriage. She admits that, while this is the best for society, it conflicts sorely with the happiness of the individuals concerned. How, then, is this sin against society to be discouraged? Does the writer refer to God, or His law, or the malice and punishment of sin? Not at all; she is too polite and refined to be so baldly obvious to her gentle readers. Listen to her substitute for the ancient truths: "If only this pathetic creature, clamoring for personal happiness at any cost to the race—if only he could realize that when individual happiness conflicts with any great human ideal, the right to claim such happiness is as nothing compared to the privilege of resigning it!" Till-vally! There's red blood for you! This is the kind of frothy syllabub modern advanced thought serves out as intellectual meat.

CORRESPONDENCE

Belgian Bateliers

LOUVAIN, FEBRUARY 7, 1910.

It is not very well known, even by Belgians themselves, to what a great extent transportation by means of the interior waterways has grown in their little country. Canals intersect the country at every point and connect Belgium with Rouen and Lyons in France, Ruhrort in Germany and Rotterdam and Amsterdam in Holland. In 1904 there were 9,380 registered Belgian boats plying on these canals. 6,034 averaged from 100 to 500 tons. In 1905 the figures show that the imports and exports over these waterways were respectively 5,901,116 and 7,003,909 tons of merchandise.

On their continuous voyages across Belgium, France, Holland and Germany, these floating houses carry also about 20,000 children of an age when if they were residents of any particular city, they would be found in school. It can be readily imagined how difficult their nomadic life makes schooling. They cannot frequent a day school, and a boarding school is generally beyond their reach. The past gives striking evidence of how utterly neglected most of the children went: 65 per cent. of the bateliers are absolutely illiterate and the authorities have never been able to impose upon them the legal obligation of keeping a day-book.

The bateliers show themselves little worried about the instruction of their children and the means of obtaining it for them. They themselves have succeeded in their vocation without being educated; their children can do the same. Moreover the batelier is more isolated than the rest of men and consequently loves to have his little family about him for his comfort and later on to assist him. Boys of nine and girls of eleven years leading the horses along the tow-path is a common sight in Belgium.

The more difficult the enterprise the greater the praise for those who were the first to organize a methodical course of elementary education for the young bateliers. In December, 1903, Mlle. Jeaumart founded at Namur the "Ecole Pensionnat St. Jacques des Bateliers," which has already received in its classes 700 children of both sexes, of whom 248 were boarders. Attendance at the day school, necessarily irregular, has at least the great advantage of familiarizing the world of bateliers with the ideas of school and study. In the boarding school—"pensionnat"—the influence of the devoted teachers is greater in proportion as the voyages of the parents permit of only short and occasional holidays, when for instance they make a stop of some days at Namur or in the neighborhood.

The school is composed of four classes: two for girls, two for boys. The first for each division is preparatory; the second is professional for the boys, while that for the girls is ménagère-professionnelle, a mixture of professional work and training in house keeping. This latter kind of school for girls is common in Belgium and needless to say a power for good. It forms a useful wife for the industrious ouvrier. On the program of studies in the boys' professional class we find manual training in some trade, the making and repairing of cables and splices; general courses in German and Flemish, commercial arithmetic, commercial law of the batelier, correspondence and keeping of books, notions in hygiene and therapeutics for cases of sudden indisposition or of accident, geography, etc. These courses, rendered as concrete as possible, interest the young bateliers because they are ever in touch with their former lives and besides they become attached to their profession in a remarkably striking way. The results have more than justified expectations.

This school is founded for the children; the adults are not neglected. On Sundays they are gathered for Mass, brought to the duties at regular intervals and in many ways cared for by priest and layman who have their good at heart. Belgians are not slow in the matter of social work; priests and laymen by their united efforts have made of Belgium an example in this respect. What has been done, is being done and remains to be done, Father Vermeersch, S.J., has clearly set forth in his recent work, "Manuel Social, La Législation et les Œuvres en Belgique," the second edition of which was awarded the quinquennial prize of social sciences in 1908.

A Ceremony at Montmartre.

Those who were in Paris during the week of the flood will not readily forget their experience. The loss of property in the poorer quarters of the city and in some of its suburbs amounted to a national disaster; the gloomy aspect of the submerged houses, the difficulty of communication, the misery of the thousands of homeless beings, whom the sudden catastrophe sent adrift, all these things make up a picture very different from the usual aspect of the gay capital of France.

Side by side with these pathetic and poignant memories are others that bring a ray of light and hope into the gloomy atmosphere. The spontaneous burst of charity that made men and women, whom the flood had spared, fly to the assistance of their less fortunate fellow citizens will long be remembered, and the passionate trust with which thousands of Parisians threw themselves upon the mercy of God is another memorable feature of the tragic week.

The 27th, 28th and 29th of January were days of gloom and fear; on the 30th, things looked more hopeful, the worst seemed over and this improvement coincided with a splendid demonstration that goes far to prove the depths of faith still existing under the careless exterior of the Parisian. In the morning, the Archbishop, Mgr. Amette, presided over the fête celebrated at Notre Dame des Victoires, in honor of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The church was crowded, and the attitude of the worshippers earnest, anxious, sorrowful, yet filled with supernatural hope and trust, told an eloquent tale of past anguish. In the same afternoon, at the special request of the Archbishop, hundreds of pilgrims, chiefly men, made their way to the votive church of Montmartre that stands high above the city, a perpetual symbol of prayer.

It was no easy matter to reach Montmartre; omnibuses and tramways stopped running; several bridges were impassable; nevertheless the big church was crowded, many worshippers having come on foot. The central aisle was filled with men, those men who, at the present crisis, are fighting the good fight, in whose hands rest the destinies of France as a Catholic country. Senators and deputies were there as well as workmen and artisans, all united in a common feeling of intense emotion. One of the chaplains of the church, M. L'Abbé Langlois, delivered a short discourse in which he touched on the lessons taught by the national calamity, and on the duties that it brings in its train. Then the Archbishop ascended the pulpit. Since his appearance at Notre Dame des Victoires in the morning, he had been in a boat to visit the submerged quarter of St. Antoine and his mind was full of the scenes of misery among which he had moved. He spoke warmly of the charity that shone so brightly in the gloom of the awful visitation and, with a trembling voice, of the many thousand workmen who had lost all their worldly goods; tools, furniture, clothes. He laid stress on the helplessness of human science before the advancing flood, and implored his hearers to have recourse to the only means of salvation: humble, earnest prayer.

When the Archbishop descended from the pulpit a great cry of supplication rose, as the pathetic tones of the "Parce Domine" echoed through the great basilica. Ten thousand men's voices took up the strain; it was the intense soul of Catholic France that expressed itself at that solemn hour, a soul that still believes, hopes and loves, that, in spite of occasional weaknesses, cherishes its heritage of sacred traditions and holy memories.

A procession was then formed, in which the Archbishop carried the golden monstrance. Around him were the senators and deputies; he walked to the great door of the church, which was then thrown open, and, for a minute, he stood, the monstrance in his hands, above the stricken city. The scene was one never to be forgotten; far below Montmartre lay submerged Paris, wrapped in the gathering twilight of the short January day. Those present knew what scenes of unutterable distress, of cruel pain, of wholesale destruction lay behind the veil of darkness that hid the sheets of turbid water. They seemed to hear, rising from the flooded streets, the cry of anguish of a ruined multitude and they turned, in wordless supplication, towards the golden monstrance that held the Lord of Earth and Heaven. Three times the Archbishop raised the Sacred Host on high, to the South, to the East, and to the West, above the seething waters below, above the broken and despairing hearts that were, even then, struggling with a tremendous calamity. "Who knows," writes the celebrated Catholic orator, Count Albert de Mun, "what may have been the mysterious effects of this blessing? Who knows what may have been its power, not only over the forces of nature, but over the minds and hearts of men!"

When we consider how, under the pressure of suffering, the emotional Parisian has revealed a depth of generosity, a religious faith, a manly patience that in moments of prosperity lie dormant, we are constrained to believe that to some souls the wild waters of the Seine may have brought blessings more precious and more lasting than the possessions that they swept away!—

Death of a Distinguished Diplomat

ROME, FEBRUARY 5, 1910.

After battling for a fortnight with an attack of pneumonia, his excellency Dom Miguel Martius d'Antas, Portuguese Ambassador to the Holy See and dean of the diplomatic corps accredited to the Vatican, died on February 2. In him the Church has lost a worthy son, for the devotedness of the Count d'Antas to the Holy See was unbounded, and the lustre of his lively Catholic faith remained undimmed during his long diplomatic career which brought no reproach upon it. He entered the service of the Crown in 1842 at the court of Savoy in Turin and was a witness of nearly all the events which prepared and effected the Italian revolution. During the second empire he was at Paris where he enjoyed the particular esteem of the emperor, so much so that the widowed empress selected him to arrange the private papers of her deceased consort.

At the celebration of the golden jubilee of the priesthood of Leo XIII, the Portuguese Government sent the Count d'Antas to Rome as the special envoy charged to present the homage and congratulations of the royal family and the nation. Three years later, to the no slight gratification of the Pope, he returned to Rome with the permanent appointment of ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Holy See. Leo XIII had a true affection for him and delighted to discuss familiarly with him early political times and turns in which both had taken such an important part.

Upon the demise of the great pontiff, it was the same Count d'Antas who with tears in his eyes presented as dean the condolences of the diplomatic corps to the Sacred College. The solemn funeral, which took place in the national church of St. Anthony of the Portuguese, was attended by nearly the whole pontifical court and was a striking testimonial of esteem and affection for the deceased statesman, who had been preceded to the tomb shortly before by a wife in every way worthy of so great a man. He was about 78 years of age.

L'EREMITA.

A Promising Harvest.

Pietermaritzburg, January 21, 1910.

I have received from Bishop Simon the following statistics concerning his Vicariate and the Prefecture Apostolic of Namaqualand erected in the course of 1909:

Vicariate of Orange River:—Priests 10, Oblates of St. Francis de Sales. Nuns 10, Oblate Sisters of St. Francis de Sales. Stations 7, namely: Pella, Pella Orange, Nbatjes Kloof, Nabaabeep, O'Okeip, Port Nolloth, Keimoes. Schools 7. Number of Catholics in the Vicariate about 2,000. The Vicariate comprises the districts of Namaqualand, Calvinia, Van Ryn's Dorp, Fraserburg, Kenhardt, Gorgonia.

Prefecture Apostolic of Namaqualand: Prefect Apostolic, Rev. Father Stanislas von Krolikoski. Priests 6, Oblates of St. Francis de Sales. Nuns 8, Oblate Sisters of St. Francis de Sales. Stations 3, namely: Hieragabies, Warmbad, Gabis. Schools 3. Number of Catholics in the Prefecture Apostolic about 800.

The Prefecture Apostolic is bounded on the North by the Tropic of Capricorn; to the East by the English and German boundaries; to the South by the Orange River; to the West by the Atlantic Ocean. All the missions in the Vicariate Apostolic and in the new Prefecture are essentially native.

Manifestations of Catholic Faith in Spain

TORTOSA, SPAIN, FEBRUARY 9, 1910.

The proposed reopening of the lay schools, as told in AMERICA of January 8, has raised a veritable tempest on all sides. The united protest of the Spanish Bishops has caused the Catholics in all parts of Spain to rally in support of the demands of the hierarchy. Meetings of indignant protest against the Government's proposed action are being held everywhere. In Madrid a gathering, conservatively estimated at eighteen thousand and representing the most cultured and distinguished classes of that city, strongly demanded that these schools should remain closed. In Barcelona, where the effects of the pernicious teaching of these schools were experienced in the "Sad Week" of July, four great meetings of Catholic men have been held. The most distinguished Catholic ladies of that city called upon the Civil Governor and added their protest to that of the Catholic men.

Not to be outdone, the anti-Catholic Lerroux forces, mainly of the tavern type, planned counter-meetings, including a demonstration for women. This latter was cleverly arranged. The men decided to send their wives to the English Consulate, with the ostensible purpose of congratulating the English Consul on the felicitous ending of the elections in England, but in reality with the purpose of compromising the Consul by some statement which might be interpreted as showing that the English Government was in favor of the reopening of the neutral schools. The English Consul, however, with prudence which reflects credit on the British Consular service, politely declined to receive any visitors and thus avoided being drawn into Spanish politics.

The troops returning from the war in Africa have everywhere been received with the greatest enthusiasm. In Madrid fully three hundred thousand people were in the streets awaiting the arrival of the brave Brigada de Cazadores, which had continually distinguished itself under fire. An edifying sight was that of these sunburnt, bearded veterans asking and receiving with bowed heads the solemn blessing of the Bishop of Madrid-Alcalá.

A proof of the strong Catholic faith of Spain's English convert queen was recently witnessed in the royal palace in Madrid, when the young English mother consecrated her three children to the Blessed Virgin and had them formally enrolled in the Sodality of the Holy Angels.

For the Conversion of England.

London, February 10, 1910.

Father Philip Fletcher, the founder and Warden of the Guild of Our Lady of Ransom for the Conversion of England, is endeavoring to get as many priests and laymen as possible to unite in a great effort of prayer for conversions. This year in England there will be a novena beginning on Friday, March 4th, the Feast of the Five Wounds, and ending on March 12th, the Feast of St. Gregory. It was under the banner of the Five Wounds that the brave men of northern England rose in defense of their altars in the days of the "Pilgrimage of Grace," and St. Gregory was the Pope who sent St. Augustine to convert the Saxons.

Father Fletcher has fixed no special form of prayer for the novena, but leaves it to each one to choose for himself. He asks priests to offer one or more Masses for this intention during the novena, or at least to remember it in the daily Mass, and also to commend the novena to their people. He asks lay persons to offer one or more Communion, hear Mass, or offer a daily rosary during the nine days. The prayers of religious communities are specially asked for. In London there will be special services of intercession at Tyburn Convent, near the spot where so many of the martyrs died for the old Faith; at St. Etheldreda's church, the only church in England built in pre-Reformation days that has been restored to Catholic worship, and at the Church of the English Martyrs in South London.

Father Fletcher is anxious that Catholics in other lands should join in this time of united prayer, and has asked me to have this information and his request published in the columns of AMERICA, in order that as many as possible in the United States may give their help.

Is Italy United?

NAPLES, FEBRUARY 15, 1910.

No! It is not. No sharp observer will say that it is united. The old local republican traditions are as vivid as ever. Genoa hates Venice and Florence, and Rome hates Naples, and right cordially does every Neapolitan who is not an office holder hate Rome and all the northern cities of Italy. "They have cheated and robbed us," is the familiar cry of barber, cabman and storekeeper in Naples. But the Savoyard, who sold his country to France, still succeeds in levying heavy taxes which are driving the poor people out of the country, and with these taxes swarms of superfluous office holders are fed and oppress the beggared population.

Italy and France have clearly shown that they know better than any other countries in Europe how to subsidize one part of the population to keep down the others. But the radicals' dagger is up his sleeve and the socialist and the anarchists are biding their time. Rome is now only a dungeon, and one-half of the citizens scowl at the other.

The old gaiety is gone out of Roman life, and in Naples thousands would welcome back "old Bomba," the Bourbon, if he could come back to life. Why should it not be so? The Neapolitan and the Sicilian are not Italians. They are Greeks. How can Genoa and Venice forget the glory of their doges, or Florence the glory of the Medici? Or how can Rome forget the happy days of low taxation under her pontiff kings? United Italy is pinned together by bayonets, and its chief champions have fat salaries in their pockets.

Thoughts of this kind were running in my head when I found this passage in Lord Lytton's "Last Days of Pompeii":

"Italy, Italy, while I write your skies are over me, your seas flow beneath my feet. Listen not to the blind policy which would unite all your crested cities mourning for their republics, into one empire; false, pernicious delusion! Your only hope of regeneration is in division. Florence, Milan, Venice, Genoa, may be free once more if each is free. But dream not of freedom for the whole while you enslave the parts."

Confederated Italy might exist, but the present Italian unity is a shell. One blow of the Austrian's fist would smash it to pieces, for it has no money or resources. It is overtaxed and impoverished. We in North and South America see the proofs of this assertion. Rats leave the sinking ship.

THE STREAK OF PAGANISM

Old-fashioned paganism of the character which Cardinal Wiseman describes in "Fabiola" is the leprosy of the modern Italian and French mind and art. Take up the newspapers which represent the dominant thought of both countries, or read the debates in their parliaments; or visit their picture galleries and graveyards, you will see this paganism as common as it was in the Renaissance. Infidel journals and orators agree that the State is God, that neither the individual nor any private corporation nor the Church has any rights which the State is bound to respect. The child is not primarily owned by his parents but by the State, hence the State has the right to ignore the wishes of parents regarding the education of the child; and the right to ignore the primacy of the Church in the sacrament of marriage.

There is no sacrament; the State says so. There's only a contract the form of which exclusively pertains to the State's jurisdiction. You can read these doctrines boldly asserted in the actual discussion on the education and marriage question in France and in Italy. Uneducated mountebanks, and atheistic materialists who form a large percentage of the French Corps legislatif and of the Italian parliament are daily promulgating the doctrine of old pagan Caesarism: Quod regi placet legis habet vigorem. They may end by creating a State pope, and a State god. And yet Italy and France call themselves liberal governments!

In art the vilest forms of paganism are found in the graveyard. Everyone knows France's reputation in this respect. But Italy is no better. The shameless nude fills her art galleries and her public promenades, even in Rome of the Popes.

The African savage covers certain parts of the human body, for the sense of modesty is innate; but Italian and French art glories in violating all its laws. If you bring a lady into an Italian gallery of art she has to hang down her head in shame; and so should a man do, if he had a clean mind. Naples, Rome, Florence, Genoa, everywhere you find indecency, even in the statues that are set up in graveyards.

Take the celebrated Campo Santo, or graveyard of Genoa where the tombs of the rich have been made by some of the best modern Italian sculptors, as a special proof of my assertions. Religious symbols are most frequently lacking; and the nude is everywhere on the graves of the dead. Monuments they are of pride and shocking indecency.

UMILTÀ.

The hundredth anniversary of the execution of Andreas Hofer, the Savior of Tyrol, who was shot in Mantua on February 20, 1810, was solemnly commemorated throughout the land he saved from Napoleon's arms. The most splendid services naturally were held in Innsbruck, where his body rests. In the Hof-Kirche a solemn requiem was sung, at which an immense multitude assisted. All the notables of the province were in attendance and the Emperor sent a special representative from Vienna.

Reports from Vienna indicate the approaching death of Dr. Carl Lueger, so long a prominent figure in the politics of Austria's capital and the revered leader of the Catholic Socialist party.

It now seems more than probable that the United States will intervene in Nicaragua. On March 15, John Barrett, Chief of the Bureau of American Republics, and a commission representing the United States will go to Nicaragua to investigate conditions. The report will determine the future action of the United States Government with regard to Nicaragua. It is generally believed that the United States will eventually establish a government in Nicaragua similar to that maintained by the American Government in Cuba. Current information of the state of affairs in Nicaragua points to this solution as the only practical remedy for the increasing political and economic ills afflicting that ill-starred republic.

Juvenile Courts.

The Survey for February 5 is devoted to the Juvenile Courts and is most interesting reading. So many of the newer social methods involve false principles that it is a pleasure to see this most beneficent institution resting upon principles perfectly true. A child acts spontaneously. It can not, therefore, be a criminal except in the case in which malice makes up for lack of years; and even in this case society, rather than the child, is responsible. Hence, to treat a child as a criminal is to begin badly; and this the Catholic Church has always understood, and, what is more important, has always acted on. As for the apparatus of the police court, it is rather pleasant than otherwise to the young delinquent who has got rid of the first feelings of shame, and if he only could, he would gladly imitate the nonchalance and persiflage of Dickens' Artful Dodger. The Juvenile Court does not appeal to his imagination. It is a commonplace affair, not unlike the principal's office at school, which does not degrade and yet is by no means an agreeable place. One provision would perfect the system. The work of the Juvenile Court is curative. But a cure can be effected only by bringing about in the young a reverence for external social order, as something independent of man's will, intimately connected with God, the Creator and Ruler of the world, bound up with His justice and truth, and established by Him under a sanction that must be paid when it is violated. Every child should pay the penalty of its fault, not as a criminal, but as one under the universal law of order. When it has done this, let it be handed over to those who will sympathize with its condition, comfort its sorrow, heal its stripes and bruises, make the new life of virtue pleasant with those things that delight young hearts, and lift the soul up to God the Rewarder of all good. This is an ideal beyond the range perhaps of a law court, but the Juvenile Court was itself an ideal to realize which required much time, patience and philanthropy.

An Enemy to Christian Teaching

Advance copies of the Fourth Annual Report of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching were sent out to the press late last week. Like its three predecessors the report for 1909 presents a detailed statement of the current business incident to the conduct of the retiring allowance system, but the larger portion of the bulky volume is given over to the discussion of questions dealing with educational history and educational policy. The Fund is now paying 318 pensions, the cost being $466,000. The professors receiving these pensions come from 139 colleges, distributed over forty-three states of the Union and provinces of Canada. Seven colleges were admitted during the year to the list of accepted institutions, that is, to the list whose professors may regularly receive pensions under fixed rules as a right and not as a favor. The governors and legislatures of thirty-one states asked, under the concession agreed to last year by Mr. Carnegie, that the privileges of the fund be extended to their universities.

But five of these institutions, one of them in Canada, were admitted to the Foundation; the petitions, in the case of the remainder, being held for further scrutiny of the administration in their case of the rules under which tax-supported colleges and universities become eligible. Two institutions, the Randolph-Macon Woman's College and the George Washington University, retired from the accepted list; the former because its trustees must be approved by a Methodist Conference, and it, therefore, fails to fulfil the rigid rules against denominational control laid down by the Foundation; the latter because the university had impaired its endowment, and because two professors had been dismissed for reasons touching the administration of the Fund and disapproved by the Trustees of the Foundation.

But these are mere dry statistics. The sections of the report which are apt to prove of interest to those engaged in educational work are those dealing with the working of the rules for retirement, the discussion of tax-supported institutions, and the presentation of educational problems and progress from the viewpoint of the trustees of the Foundation. The details of this presentation unquestionably will be sharply criticized as evidencing a tendency through the power which the vast resources of the Fund assure, to secure a dominant control of education in this country. The tendency has been referred to in notices of previous reports and it will surely not make for the broad-minded scholarly freedom so insistently put forward as the aim and purpose of the Foundation.

Already sinister reflections are expressed concerning those institutions which have shown a readiness to submit to a change in the disposition of their charters in order that the imputation of "sectarian" control and influence may be set aside. Not only is the severance in these instances of the historic relation between the college and the religious body that founded and nurtured it, open to serious ethical objection, but it may be unhappily construed by many friends and patrons of these institutions as a sacrifice of principle for monetary gain. Controversies are thus provoked and college constituencies are likely to be weakened.

It is a misfortune that Mr. Carnegie in carrying out a great purpose for the betterment of the teaching body in the country cannot bring himself to see that neither religious influence nor religious control is an element to be feared in the development of higher institutions of learning. On the contrary, an element certainly to be viewed with alarm is the building up of an immense fund for educational achievement the benefits of which are rigidly limited to those institutions in which ex professo Christian influence is debarred from the academic and administrative policy prevailing. No doubt this is the motive underlying the contention of a speaker in the recent Chicago Conference of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance, that no greater enemy to Christian teaching exists to-day than this same Carnegie Foundation.

The Christ of the Andes.

During the past week an effort was made by AMERICA to locate the authorities for the statements put forth during the recent convention at Rochester, N. Y., of the body called "The Student Volunteer Movement" concerning religious and moral conditions in South America. This Rochester gathering was the "quadrennial convention" of the "Volunteers," and its "message to the students of North America," according to John R. Mott, chairman of the executive committee of the "movement," was to summon "the three thousand representatives of the seven hundred leading institutions of higher learning in North America, and through them their fellow students, to face an absolutely unique world situation." Mr. Mott, who lives in Montclair, N. J., is also the itinerant and foreign secretary of the national board of the Young Men's Christian Association. According to his remarks, and what was said during the convention by several other leading delegates, this "unique world situation" consists chiefly in "a demand for university men in the diplomatic, consular, civil, military and naval services, and in the commercial and industrial enterprises as well, to devote themselves with like missionary motive and consecration to Christianizing the impact of Christendom on the non-Christian world." His executive committee report gives this further explanation: "There is a large and growing demand for American and Canadian students, both men and women, to go out to different parts of the non-Christian world to teach in government schools and colleges and in other non-missionary institutions. Scores of our fellow-students are now holding such positions in the Philippines, in Japan, in China and in Latin America. The demand for such workers will increase; hundreds will probably be required within the next few years. Such teachers, outside of the classroom, in the several hours each day at their disposal, have a wonderful opportunity to expound and illustrate the teaching of Christianity among those over whom they have won such large influence in their regular work, and to help the missionaries in many other directions."

The inclusion of Latin America among the "different parts of the non-Christian world," in which this proposed turning of government officials into adjuncts of proselytizing missions, will be noted. The record of the Rochester convention also shows that the star-performer in regard to Latin America was Robert E. Speer, one of the secretaries of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, who began his oration on "Our Spiritual Obligation to Latin America" with the assertion: "In setting forth conditions in South America, we are not provoked by any attitude of hostility or prejudice in regard to the Catholic Church." An analysis of what he continues to say fails to show any sincerity in this protestation of honesty. He starts out with a wail: "Latin America, especially South America, is a country of appalling illiteracy," and then, like all his ilk, is moved at once into groans and lamentations over its moral corruption, especially of the clergy. The infamous assertions he makes against the latter he bolsters up with: "I will not here express my own judgment but read to you from the pastoral letter of the bishop of Caracas in Venezuela;" and as this is not enough he adds: "Let me quote from the letter of the Pope to the Clergy of Chile."

A formal report of that Rochester convention has been sent out to the press, in a broadside sheet, from F. P. Turner, General Secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement, which has its office at 125 East 27th Street, this city. When a representative of AMERICA asked there for the documentary confirmation of Mr. Speer's assertions all responsibility for them was disavowed, and the query was referred to him personally. At Mr. Speer's office, in the Board of Presbyterian Missions, 156 Fifth Avenue, it was stated that Mr. Speer was now in Scotland on his missionary work, and would not be back for a month. His representative was asked if copies of the alleged letters of Bishop and Pope that he mentioned in his address could be seen, or the name of the bishop given, and the answer was a negative. This matter belonged to Mr. Speer personally it was stated, and he had taken the precious documents with him to Scotland. All that could be remembered about them was that they had been sent to him by one of his fellow missionaries in South America, and had been translated, but it could not be recollected "whether they were in Spanish or Portuguese."

Mr. Speer, who deals principally with Argentina and Chile in his diatribe, says: "I visited myself eighty Catholic churches in different parts of South America. In not one was there a picture or a symbol of the resurrection or the ascension. In every case Christ was either dead upon the cross or ghastly dead in the grave. Where is the living Christ, one cries out again and again, and no voice may give him reply."

It was hinted at the outset that this man only protested honesty to make dishonesty effective, and we think we need go no further to justify such a harsh conclusion. He is talking of the country, and the people, where the Catholic Bishop Benevente, of San Juan de Cuyo and the Catholic women of the Argentine raised to the amazement and admiration of the whole civilized world, 14,000 feet high, on the summit of the Andes, the most remarkable and famous monument of modern times to the triumphant risen Christ: El Cristo de los Andes, the colossal statue of Christ blessing the world, that the opening of the present century saw erected, with the imperishable granite of the Andes as its base, to seal the compact of peace between Argentina and Chile. The Carmelite, Juan Antonio de la Virgen María, the last Bishop of Carácas, was elected in 1792. A letter of his would be precious.

An Unnecessary Gathering of Skirts

Margaret Deland, the novelist of "Old Chester," writes about the "New Woman" in a current magazine. She opposes woman suffrage principally because "we have suffered many things from Patrick; the new woman would add Bridget also." The main force of Mrs. Deland's argument lies perhaps in what it implies rather than in what it expresses. Mrs. Deland assumes an air of superior detachment and masculine wisdom all through her article; and yet, at the first opportunity, enlightened woman that she is, she succumbs to the feminine weakness of little parochial prejudice and snapping, uncompromising condemnation careless of insult. It is unnecessary to point out that the Bridgets have, at least, too much sense of humor to indulge in the unbecoming vagaries of the "New Woman"; and that the ordinary citizen would sooner trust his political fate and civic welfare to uneducated Irish wives and mothers than to the shrieking Mrs. Jellabies of modern politics and sociology. Moreover, Mrs. Deland might find food for thought in a careful perusal of criminal calendars. In all the recent exposures of political corruption, in Pennsylvania, Minnesota, New York, the names that one reads in the accusing headlines of the newspapers recall the Mayflower more urgently than the shamrock. This observation holds true for nearly all the great scandals in our political history. The New Englander may have distinguished himself as a man of wealth or culture; but his morals, even in politics, do not make it safe for his virtuous sisters to be insistent on his political impeccability at the expense of other nationalities.

French Flood Subscriptions

On February 13, Le Temps published a detailed list of subscriptions received at its office from French citizens and other residents of France, Alsace-Lorraine and Frankfort-on-the-Main. This was the twelfth list, amounting to 145,594 francs, and bringing the grand total up to 1,308,890 francs. Most of the contributions to the twelfth list are small sums, though there is one person who subscribes four thousand francs. The "Syndicat de la Presse," to which Le Temps hands over the amounts received, had already, on February 13, distributed 2,571,063 francs. M. Briand had, at the same date, received, among other donations, twenty thousand francs from the Chicago International Harvester Company of America (Chicago), one thousand francs from Archduke Eugene, five thousand francs from M. Hennessy of Cognac, one thousand francs from the archpriest, Maltzow, chaplain of the Russian Embassy in Berlin; fifteen hundred francs from the Société des Quais of Constantinople, five thousand francs from M. Max Lust of Berlin, from the American Chamber of Commerce and other contributions sent to the American Embassy in Paris (second installment) two hundred thousand francs, from the Lombardy Savings Banks one hundred thousand francs, from Madrid twenty-five thousand francs, from the Canadian Parliament 258,647 francs, and two remittances aggregating 503,550 francs from the Lord Mayor of London, whose total subscription then approached one million and a half in francs.

What the superstitious of olden times attributed to comets is always an agreeable topic with some. The superstitious of to-day who consult mediums and believe in charms and luck have an opportunity of connecting Halley's comet with British politics. Dr. Turner, Savilian Professor of Astronomy, Oxford, mentioned in a lecture that just before its return in 1835, Parliament was dissolved; it has been dissolved before the return of 1910. At the former dissolution the supporters of the Liberal Government numbered 514; at the latter they were 513. After the former election they were 385; after the latter, 397. At the former dissolution the Opposition numbered 144; at the latter, 157. After the both elections it returned to Parliament numbering 273. In 1835, with a nominal majority of over 100, the Liberal Government was weak in the House on account of internal dissensions; the same is the case in 1910. Gradually it improved its position; and in the next election, 1837, gained command of the House. The modern superstitious will, perhaps, be on the watch to see if the parallel is carried out to the end.

The Council for Medical Education of the American Medical Association says that of the 133 medical schools in the United States 68 fully reach the standard of the Association, 37 need improvement, and 38 fail to satisfy.

LITERATURE

LENTEN READING.

"Why I am a Catholic," by John Gwynn, S.J. (New York: Benziger Brothers), is not a good descriptive title for the excellent contents of the little book which it names. We have here a series of lectures, delivered in Dublin, during the Lent of last year, and dealing in a popular style with the divine origin and mission of the Church. The important subject is treated with reference to modern difficulties and the more recent forms of hostility to Catholic belief. The mastery of a volume like this will be a helpful antidote against the evil influence of miscellaneous reading.

The Rev. Francis X. McGowan, O.S.A., aims to afford assistance to priests during the weekly services of Lent in his "Lenten Sermons." (New York: Frederick Pustet & Co.) The sermons number sixteen and are divided equally into two series; the first, on sin and its remedies; the second, on the seven deadly sins. The purpose of the author is primarily to be instructive and to collect about his ever-timely themes a large amount of "practical and thought-provoking suggestions."

Priests who give retreats or missions during Lent will find a storehouse of valuable material concerning frequent Communion in "The Eucharistic Triduum," translated from the French of Père Jules Lintolo, S.J., by F. M. de Zulueta, S.J. The translation is made from the second French edition. The original work has merited high ecclesiastical endorsement and won extensive popularity. Father de Zulueta is so widely known as an able writer of English spiritual books that any commendation of his work in the present instance must be superfluous. We are inclined to find fault with the sub-title, "An Aid to Priests in Preaching Frequent and Daily Communion," being convinced that the laity will find the book useful, interesting, and easy to comprehend.

It is a good practice with some persons to select serious books exclusively for their Lenten reading. When such readers are growing weary and tired from their self-imposed and most salutary penance, we can recommend, as a fillip, so to speak, for their jaded interest "The Sacrament of Duty," by Joseph McSorley, Paulist. (New York: The Columbus Press.) It is full of literary references and poetical quotations, and couched in an agreeable and refined style. The author tells us that his pages "are intended as a reminder of certain ideals which the writer and many others who have come under his observation are ever, to their own great hurt, forgetting." Since Lent is the time especially set aside for refurbishing our religious ideals and recalling into fresh realization a few primary truths, "The Sacrament of Duty and Other Essays" ought to serve the double purpose of satisfying rigid Lenten reading diet and of supplying an interval of needed recreation and pleasure in the long stretch of forty days.

"Man Mirroring His Maker; The Priest of God's Church," edited from an unpublished MS. by F. C. P. (New York: Benziger Brothers), is, as the name indicates, exclusively for priests. It supplies, of course, good Lenten reading. The objection, however, may exist in many instances that priests are apt to have little leisure during Lent for any kind of reading. In which case the Lenten reading has to be spread over the rest of the year, with a period of special condensation during the annual retreat. This book could not fail to be useful at such a time. We may not agree with everything contained in it, but in its dealing with present-day conditions it has much which will provoke quiet and profitable reflection. To choose a random passage for quotation: "The priest," says the author, "has to speak of God. . . . There are some now living, witnesses to my words, who were lulled to security in their own belief, because friendly priests whom they respected—loved—never hinted that they were wrong. There are others that have lost their deep reverence for the priestly state, having known them for years; they have eaten and drank at their tables, and have never spoken to them of God. The priest whose soul is steeped in the spirit of Calvary is the one who can best mix in society. It is all very well—we may be 'bon-homme,' and people may like us, and we may be sought after, but the 'man of God' is supposed to speak of his God, not awkwardly, not putting in the word at the wrong time, with effort as though ashamed, but as though it was as natural a thing as possible, which indeed it should be."

This is good, homely instruction, and if the manner in which it is put is homely, too, we need not be unnecessarily fastidious.

The Biographical Story of the Constitution, by EDWARD G. ELLIOTT, Professor of Politics of Princeton University. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

From the abundant literature already existing on the subject, it might seem that every phase of the adoption and the adaptation of the Constitution had received due attention from qualified writers, but Professor Elliott's book proves, if proof were needed, that the matter could be presented in another setting. Here, exactness of historical detail is united with the careful and lifelike portrayal of that all-important element, the great actors in the drama. History of deeds and places makes dreary reading; the man who achieved the feat, who made the place famous, gives color and life to the cold dead page. Even in the most democratic of commonwealths actual government is necessarily by the few; great political and social movements are likewise the resultant of the action of the influential few. Amid all the torrents of eloquence which have been poured forth in the cause of the Republic, how many streams have produced a lasting effect? To how many men do we owe our present status among the nations? To very few. They set the pace; others simply followed.

Beginning with the suspicions and jealousies which rent the States under the Articles of Confederation, the author's graphic pen traces the struggles, the bold advances and the precipitate retreats, which finally resulted in the formation and adoption of the Constitution. In the light shed by a century and a quarter of its practical working, we may be inclined to look almost sneeringly upon some of the whimsical schemes which were proposed with all soberness and sincerity while the Organic Law was in the making; but in view of the diverse and conflicting interests which were represented in the Convention, we may well marvel, not that such projects were brought forward, but that it ever resulted in anything better than a universal agreement to disagree.

The influence which Alexander Hamilton exercised over Washington and the cabinet officers even into John Adams' administration is summed up on one page. With him (p. 47) money was "the vital principle of the body politic." He saw at the outset that to bind the citizens of the United States to the Federal Government, it must be identified in some practical way with their interests, and from this oneness of interests, regard and patriotism must result. The first master-stroke towards strengthening and perpetuating the newly constituted General Government was made when, on Hamilton's initiative, it combined and assumed the total State and national indebtedness incurred by the Revolution. At once it entered into men's lives, for it concerned itself with their pecuniary interests. We may remark that during the first half-century of our national existence, the Secretaries of the Treasury who either established the public credit or signally increased or husbanded the public revenue, were three foreign-born citizens, Hamilton, Gallatin and Dallas.

The growth of the Republic through legal interpretation is set forth in the judicial career of the great Virginian, John Marshall, Chief Justice from the troublous days of the elder Adams to the even more turbulent times of Old Hickory. Political tempests did not perturb the calmness of his course. Hardly had he assumed the ermine when the decision of the Supreme Court in the memorable case of Marbury vs. Madison was brushed aside by the Jefferson administration, which never recognized it; he was near the end of his thirty-four years of service when the redoubtable President Jackson could say of another decision of the same tribunal, "John Marshall has made his decision; let him enforce it!" It was not enforced, for the Supreme Court is judgment, not force.

To Jefferson's personal opinion, expressed at the time, that in effecting the Louisiana Purchase the administration "had done an act beyond the Constitution" and that a constitutional amendment was needed to render the action valid and licit, the Chief Justice opposed his decision when the question reached his court in connection with the acquisition of Florida, that "the Constitution confers absolutely on the government of the Union the powers of making war and making treaties; consequently that government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty."

The sketch of John C. Calhoun and his extraordinary influence on public life for a generation introduces (p. 200) a concise statement of the State-Rights theory and its relations to democracy which may well serve as a model of clear and cogent reasoning.

In the Lincoln and Douglas debates (pp. 216, ff.,) we see arrayed against each other, as in war, contending forces which were to unite when the call to battle sounded, for though the Little Giant of the West loved the Presidency much, he loved the Union more. It strikes us that "not" in the second line (p. 218) tends to obscure the author's meaning.

Although repeated time and again, some historical facts seem destined to remain unknown or, what is worse, to be perversely understood. Professor Elliott does well, therefore, to lay special stress upon the fourth resolution of the Republican platform of 1860 (p. 219) that "the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively is essential to the balance of power;" and to remind us once more of Lincoln's declaration in his inaugural address that no encroachment was contemplated on slavery in the States where it already existed. But when those reassuring words were spoken, the question of slavery had already been relegated to an entirely subordinate place. The one all-absorbing question, looming up black and menacing, was Secession. Even in the Emancipation Proclamation, which every citizen ought to study, the liberation of the slaves was made contingent upon the existence of actual armed resistance to the Federal authority. That proclamation did not alter the status of even one slave in the slave States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri, and in parts of Louisiana and Virginia.

The development of our Government, from the first unsteady steps of the "Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union" of 1778, up to and including the period of Reconstruction which followed Appomattox, though vast and comprehensive beyond the wildest dreams of our Revolutionary sires, is dwarfed into nothingness in comparison with the change that has taken place in the last twenty years. Though called "Expansion," it resembles tumefaction. It is now the quite generally accepted political doctrine that the Constitution does not follow the flag. Why hoist the flag in a place unfit for the Constitution? The liberty-loving citizens of a great republic now govern whole nations of subjects, not equals, and they enforce that rule while they are deaf to the cries of those subjects who ask for at least the powers and privileges which were thrust upon the dazed freedman. But in no other respect is the transformation so patent as in the exaltation of the Federal authority and the enlargement of its sphere of activity, and in the increase of the Presidential prerogative.

"The Biographical Story of the Constitution" is a textbook for every voter. Though bristling with references and adding an exhaustive bibliography, its own twelve chapters and its appendix of fifteen epoch-making documents, will give him a clearer knowledge of the Constitution and its workings than he could get by dint of long study and research.

A Married Priest. By ALBERT HOUTIN. Translated from the French by JOHN RICHARD SLATTERY. Boston: Sherman French and Company.

The object of this book is to prove there was a secret marriage between the Abbé Charles Perraud and his housekeeper, Rosalie Duval, and to tell how, living in that state, he continued to exercise his ministry, with the connivance of his brother, the Bishop of Autun and afterwards Cardinal, one of the most famous prelates of the day. Such charges demand thorough substantiation: the author expects his readers to be content with the unsupported assertions of the ex-Carmelite, Loyson. Charles Perraud is said to have contracted his secret marriage in July, 1872, and to have written immediately afterwards on the subject to Loyson, who answers him on August 3. This letter, the only document which would have settled the question forever, is not given. Not even its substance, though it is the document above all others that should have been published. Had Perraud written: "We have contracted a secret marriage," or even hinted at it, the letter would surely have appeared. Hence we may conclude it contained no such avowal. Loyson's reply is given. Neither is there anything in Loyson's reply nor in the disjointed scraps of correspondence which make up this book, that necessarily supposes the marriage. In fact, one may say that so far from containing evidence to convict, the book would hardly be accepted by a grand jury as sufficient to ground an indictment. As to the charge that the Bishop knew of the marriage, the author himself gives us its refutation. After the death of Charles, Mgr. Perraud, knowing well the intimacy which had existed between the two, wrote to Loyson, entreating him in the name of the departed whose holy death he recounted, to abandon his scandalous life and return to the Church. It is simply inconceivable that he could have done so had he known that Charles had, like Loyson, attempted matrimony.

Charles Perraud, Rosalie Duval and the Bishop are dead. Now that there is no one to contradict him, Houtin makes these unproved accusations on the authority of Loyson. Their sinister motive and that of the translator can be divined without difficulty.

Filosofia del Derecho, Tomo I, Ética y Derecho Individual, por PEDRO MARIA CARREÑO, Doctor en Derecho y Ciencias Políticas de la Universidad Nacional de Colombia. Bogotá: Imprenta de La Luz.

It is a pleasure to note that these lectures, delivered in a government university and intimately associated with the everyday life of the citizen, are published with the authorization of the Archbishop of Bogotá. The chapter on "Human Acts," in which Hobbes' and Bentham's views are subjected to a searching examination, and that on "Innate Rights," with considerations on the right to life and property, the right of association and liberty of conscience, are particularly clear and well thought out. It augurs well for Colombia's future when her young men are grounded in ethical principles so solidly founded and so lucidly expressed.

Ireland Yesterday and To-day. By HUGH SUTHERLAND. Philadelphia: The North American.

This handsome and finely illustrated volume of 264 octavo pages, is well described as "an American text book of Ireland's progress and Ireland's national aspirations." It consists of a series of letters on the Irish land problem and on Irish questions generally, written for his paper from personal observation by Mr. Sutherland, Associate-Editor of the Philadelphia North American. The entire set makes a clear and consecutive story of Ireland's present conditions and the causes that produced them. Writing without a trace of racial or religious bias, he presents the facts as he saw them, sad, humorous, pathetic, squalid, heroic, and with the skill of a trained journalist fits them into a vivid historical setting which enlightens while it interests. In 1902 Mr. Sutherland observed the wretched land conditions of the West of Ireland and the gallant fight that its priests and leaders were making to remedy them. In 1909 he traversed Ireland more extensively and witnessed the transformation effected by the land acts, won by long continued, persistent agitation; but he also noted the anomaly of a hostile faction of the people ruling the whole, and "the chaotic anachronism" of Castle Government. His outline of the causes of present discontent is an excellent summary of the salient facts of modern Irish history. His sketches of men and movements "exhibit," in the introductory words of Mr. John Redmond, M. P., "a comprehensive grasp of the Irish question in all its details, historical, political, moral and material," and, we may add, educational and religious. Commissioned by the North American in the interest of good government everywhere, but especially of "a people bound to this nation by strong ties of blood and sympathy," Mr. Sutherland has presented an American view of Ireland's social and economic conditions to the American public in a readable reasonable way that should win the public ear, apart from the added grace of devoting the entire profits of his book to the Irish Nationalist cause. Its intrinsic interest and its vivid illustrations by pen and picture make it exceptional value for a dollar.

Ireland and Her People, Vol II. By T. W. H. FITZGERALD. Chicago: Fitzgerald Book Co.

The second volume of this projected Library of Irish Biography does not fulfil the promise of the first. The order, proportion and the principle of selection seem arbitrary. It includes a large number of people that were connected with Ireland only by the accident of birth and profited little by the gift. Over 1,000 words are devoted to a laudation of Tyndall as a great scientist, which he was not, and not one of them to his blatant preaching of agnosticism as the corollary of science. Yet Bishop England, one of the greatest Irishmen of the century as prelate, patriot, orator and publicist, is dismissed with some twenty lines. Francis Mahoney was not expelled by the Jesuits for "grave irregularities," but left for lack of vocation; they parted as friends and so remained. Mr. Onahan's sketch of Archbishop Hughes is well done and there are many other good biographies; but the succeeding volumes must greatly improve on this to be worthy of the theme.

Reviews and Magazines

An elaborate disquisition on Halley's comet and Pope Calixtus III is given in La Civiltà Cattolica. On June 29, 1456, this Pope issued a Bull calling upon all the faithful to pray for the success of the Christians against the Moslems, who were then threatening Belgrade. He was a Spaniard and knew what danger to the Church was imminent, for nearly all Spain had been subject to the Crescent for eight centuries. During his short pontificate he published no other call to prayer and penance, and that Bull, which is still preserved, made no mention of the comet. Twenty years later Platina, who was a stylist rather than a historian, wrote what might be called popular lives of all the Popes, in which he said, speaking of Calixtus III, that the Pope had ordered public prayers because physicists asserted that the appearance of the comet implied the coming of pestilence, famine, and some great disaster. Have we not been regaled with statements of what might befall us at its reappearance if we were to get a swish of its tail? Laplace (1749-1827) was the first to introduce to public notice the supposititious anathemas and exorcisms which are now so important an element of the fable. Finally Arago, improving on all that had been done to embellish the tale, soberly wrote, though he must have chuckled as he did so, that Calixtus III had excommunicated the comet. Father J. Stein, S.J., of the Vatican Observatory, has brought out, in a brochure of forty-one pages, the whole story of how Platina's molehill became the mountain of later days.

The February Catholic World opens with a highly appreciative review of Father Tabb's poems by Alice Meynell. Whitman was the poet of clamorous mediocrity; Emerson and Tabb are the only American poets who attained conspicuous greatness. Father Tabb's imagery is at once the matter, form and substance of his poems which have to be counted as well as weighed. "It is for abundance that we must praise him—the several, separate, distinct discrete abundance of entire brief lyrics." Dr. Walsh has a very helpful article, illustrated by apt citations from the leaders of thought in the medical world, showing that the Catholic Church alone has rightly appraised the relations between religion and health, and that prayer, self-denial and confidence in God alleviate pain, both mental and physical, generate content and conduce to happiness. "The War on Religion in France," by Mrs. Bellamy Storer, is a picture of the religious and moral anarchy to which the insensate hate of a persecuting Masonic government is reducing France. "An Institution along New Lines" is an account of the Lincoln Agricultural School at Lindolndale, N. Y., in which the Christian Brothers are training children in family groups to be self-respecting and self-supporting. Dom Bede Camm gives the history of the Stonor family seat, which has been Catholic since the Norman Conquest, and Andrew J. Shipman relates his personal impressions of the Barcelona disturbances. There are three stories and a good set of book reviews.

EDUCATION

A new plea for vocational education was put forward by the Commissioner of Education for Massachusetts, in an address delivered at the New York State Teacher's Association meeting. Mr. Snedden, the Commissioner, deduced the needs of its introduction from a condition which has led to practically every development in school systems—the natural evolution of things outside of the schools. The public agencies, he claimed, must do to-day what private agencies did in the past. "The home of to-day in the crowded city is not the vocational educational centre it was years ago. The mother of to-day cannot train her daughter as she could in the old-fashioned home, nor can the father of to-day show his boy 'how to do it' to follow in his footsteps, as he could in another age. Neither can the big factory supply the want of this education. It cannot do for the youth, who is just one of its employees, what the old shop 'used to do.'"

And if this latest development of education be handled temperately and wisely; if, as another speaker said at the same meeting, one remembers that every system of education exists primarily to develop the mind and character of the child and industrial training should come after that, there will be many who will frankly admit the utility of a wider extension of training such as the devotees of vocational teaching demand.

According to statistical tables of averages the great rank and file of our workers have to become self-supporters at the age of sixteen. Educators realize the inadvisability of too much specialization and the disadvantage of putting young children into exclusively manual schools. If vocational schools be so adapted as to reach boys who leave the other schools at the age of fourteen and go nowhere else, and the girls who leave at the age of sixteen and go nowhere else, they will prove a genuinely helpful factor in the training of the young, and will in nowise threaten or displace the schools whose aim is rather the liberal and cultural training of their students.

The Second Annual Report of the Superintendent of Parish Schools of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati (1909) presents gratifying evidence of the excellent condition of graded and primary school work in Archbishop Moeller's jurisdiction. It gives the usual statistical information, showing, one may note, a surprisingly good percentage of Catholic children attending Catholic schools, as well as a clearly defined purpose to introduce the parish school into every parish in the diocese. The personal report of Rev. O. B. Auer, the Superintendent of Schools, suggests an admirable point worthy of consideration by all who have the interest of parochial schools at heart.

No doubt the heavy burden which a good parish school lays upon a parish is the chief reason why the over-crowding of classes in the primary grades is permitted at times. And yet a moment's thought will make clear the supreme importance of excellence in the foundation work of these grades. It were well for Catholic school boards to take example from the practice now general in our public schools and have earnest care to give to the little ones the best—small classes, comfortable and pleasant accommodations, well-lighted and well-ventilated rooms and, above all, the best teachers available.

Even though these provisions restrict the outlay for improvements in the higher grades, the better results in primary work will more than compensate the apparent loss in the grammar departments. One notes with satisfaction, too, that the Cincinnati schools are well graded, using a uniform schedule of studies as well as a uniform series of text-books throughout the archdiocese.

There is too much common sense in the American people to make it probable that the vicious extravagances of the French government in its educational experience shall ever find footing in this country. Yet its present policy compelling the elimination of religion and morality from the scheduled training given in its public schools is dangerous enough to cause Catholic and non-Catholic alike to dread the outcome of educational evolution in the United States. Every Christian must deplore the existing condition, and it is not surprising, therefore, to find that there is a growing sentiment among men and women of all shades of religious conviction in favor of religious education. Unfortunate prejudices have hitherto held Catholics and non-Catholics apart and prevented a dispassionate study of ways and means whereby religious training and moral instruction may be assured as an essential element of our public school system. One is inclined to believe that the danger recognized in a policy tending to hand the training of our little ones over to agnostic and infidel influence will lead the common sense of a Christian people to find a way to safeguard the holiest interest of the nation. The mutual benefit that accrues in this direction makes the report of a conference recently held in Columbus, Ohio, especially gratifying. Rev. Francis W. Howard, well-known for his work in the Catholic Educational Association, was invited recently to address the Monday meeting of the Protestant Ministerial Association of that city on "The Catholic Position in Education." Press accounts say that at the conclusion of Father Howard's address a rising vote of thanks was tendered him, and many of the ministers personally complimented him for his clear and succinct presentation of a subject in which all present were deeply interested.

Detroit, Mich., is to have the opportunity to entertain the Catholic Educational Association during its seventh annual meeting on July 5, 6, 7. Inspired, no doubt, by the example of the excellent arrangements at Boston, which made last year's meeting so great a success, the Catholic body in the Michigan city is already preparing to cordially second the assurance of welcome given by Bishop Foley, when he made known his desire that the Association's next gathering should be held in his Episcopal city. A local committee on arrangements, headed by Rev. E. D. Kelly, of Ann Arbor, has selected the working subcommittees, and the energy with which preparations are being mapped out augurs excellently for the success of the coming meeting. The Jesuits of Detroit College have offered their institution for the sessional work of the convention, and the religious exercises usually marking the Association's annual convocation, will be held in their Church of SS. Peter and Paul. Preliminary announcements from the Secretary of the Association indicate that the program to be carried out in the convention will follow in its main features those of other years. The general and final program of the convention will be issued in May from the office of Rev. F. W. Howard, Secretary General, 1651 E. Main Street, Columbus, Ohio.

The charges of agnostic influence and worse, made in reference to the teaching in universities of this country are growing in strength and spreading in circulation. Last week AMERICA quoted a series of resolutions accepted by the delegates to the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance in its Chicago meeting. A later utterance of a speaker at the same meeting is even more direct and pointed. Speaking before the Western Section of the Alliance, Dr. David J. Burrell, pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church of New York, makes this attack. "I have been called to task for saying that the Biblical instruction in Princeton University has been under the direction of a man who does not believe in the inspired trustworthiness of the Scriptures as the word of God. The same affirmation might be made, and still more strongly, respecting many of the institutions of learning under avowedly Christian control. In my judgment, the Carnegie Foundation is the most significant movement of modern times in the interests of agnosticism in general education."

SOCIOLOGY

A correspondent has this to say of the changing conditions marking property owning in Poland: "Galicia, crown land of Austria-Hungary, is proving more hospitable than the promised land of old to the Jews who, as Poles of the Mosaic faith, have been and are being supported by the most influential spirits of that province. The following data are worthy of attention: In the year 1868 the right to hold immovable property was by law granted to the Jews of Galicia, and scarcely a year later 39 estates were in the hands of Jewish proprietors. By leaps and bounds have the once proscribed people extended their domain until to-day 1,100 of the old landed estates have passed from the Polish gentry to the possession of its representatives. Only 900 of these estates are now controlled by Polish magnates. The story of city property is even more striking. Eighty-five per cent. of registered owners of city real estate are Jews. The rural holdings of the peasants and the small farms of the land are similarly passing into Jewish control. The records show a yearly total of mortgages to the value of 9,000,000 crowns filed upon 2,000 such small holdings, generally at usurious interest, and it is easy to understand how many of the unfortunate owners are forced to sell their little properties at ridiculously low prices. To-day 70,000 of these smaller holdings are controlled by the Jews, their former possessors being reduced to the position of servants on the lands of their forefathers or forced by dire poverty to seek relief through exile in America."

The Catholic Socialist party of Italy—the term used describes a thoroughly Catholic body—is making marked progress in strength and development in the kingdom. The latest feature of its growth is the union effected between the many rural savings institutions founded, through the efforts of the body, in Lombardy, Venice, Central Italy and Sicily. A very actual condition facing the organization just now, and very important as well, since it touches the social policy of the Sonnino cabinet, is the question of Catholic agricultural organization in reference to state-favored institutions. The Social Democrats are intent on depriving the Catholic associations of the benefit of recognition by the State, and thus far their efforts have been successful. The new Minister of Agriculture, Signor Luzzatti, has, however, just issued a declaration favoring justice to the Catholic associations and has proved his sincerity by naming a well-known Catholic organizer of Bergamo member of the National Council of Labor. The question takes on the greater interest because Luzzatti has planned the establishment of a national Labor Bank, following in this the experiment already made in other lands. The Labor Bank, as thus far planned, will have two sections. The first section will offer loans at cheap rates to small property-owners and workingmen; the second section, somewhat after the fashion of building associations in America, will assist the poor in the erection of cheap homes. The Labor Bank, it is intended, shall have an initial capital of 15, 000,000 lire, to be furnished through the State and the large trust associations of the kingdom, and its influence in the industrial development of Italy will unquestionably be no slight one.

Kilmainham Gaol, associated with the trials of so many political prisoners in Ireland, has been handed over by the County Council to the Sisters of St. John, and it is now converted into St. Brigid's Home. The cells have been transformed into comfortable rooms, and the whole place stripped of the elaborate unfriendliness supposed to soften the heart of the wrong-doer. St. Brigid's is to be a home for female inebriates. The prison could no longer keep its character and, having waited in vain for a second Parnell or the return of Mr. Wilfrid Blount, had grown of late as empty as only Irish gaols are apt to be.

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America has forwarded to every priest in the United States the January number of the C. T. A. U. Advocate, together with a pamphlet prepared by the Spiritual Director, Rt. Rev. J. Regis Canevin, D.D., Bishop of Pittsburgh, Pa., and a leaflet published by Father M. A. Lambing, of Scottsdale, Pa., National President of the Priests' League. The pamphlet prepared by Bishop Canevin presents in concise form the approbation that the Church has given to the National Union. It also suggests the means of establishing temperance societies, where these do not already exist. For forty years this Union has been sustained by the Hierarchy of the United States and blessed by the Sovereign Pontiffs of the Church.

The Immigration Commission reports to Congress that the congestion in large cities has been somewhat exaggerated. The population of the congested districts consists in great measure of immigrants less than ten years in the country, and the statistics of dwellings show that on an average 134 persons occupy 100 rooms, including kitchens, and 232 persons sleep in 100 rooms. On an average one family out of every ten occupies its own house. The extremes were one in five in Milwaukee, one in six in Chicago, Cleveland and Buffalo, one in twenty-two in Boston and one in two hundred in New York. Five-sixths of all the houses examined were fairly clean.

The Census Bureau announces that the statistics of 158 cities with over 30,000 population show that in 1907 there was a decrease of 6 per cent. in the number of saloons. Of the cities with more than 300,000 population, Washington had fewest saloons, 521. Pittsburg was next with 818. Milwaukee had the largest number in proportion to its population, one for every 142 persons, and New Orleans, one for every 200. Of smaller cities Galveston had one saloon for every 134 persons; La Crosse, one for every 183, and Sacramento one for every 188. The proportion was smallest in the cities of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, and largest in those of Texas, Ohio and Wisconsin.

Official returns show that, on February 5, 128,670 paupers were receiving relief in London, 3,504 less than on the corresponding date last year. This corresponds to a rate of 26.6 per thousand. Last year the rate was 27.6; in 1908 it was 27.2, and in 1907, 26.8.

The first conference of the charity organizations of the Diocese of Fall River was held recently, under the direction of Bishop Feehan, for the purpose of rendering their efforts more effectual. Papers were read on "Industrial Training," "Institutional Care of Infants and of Older Children," and on the detailed work of the various charitable societies and conferences.

It is announced from time to time that married couples with children are not wanted for farm work in Australia. Mr. Deakin, Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, has taken the matter up. He declares that families are what Australia needs, and denounces the advertisements for couples without children as tending to lower morality.

The Italian Labor Bureau has just issued its report. More than 3,000 immigrants obtained work through it and over 10,000 workmen applied for work. It charges no fees for its services. It urges strict supervision over the so-called private bankers who undertake to manage the savings of the Italians and in many cases rob them, and over the hygienic conditions of the labor camps.

The eleventh annual convention of the Canadian Forestry Association, held by invitation of the New Brunswick Government in the Legislative Chamber at Fredericton, was opened on February 23 with an address by Lieutenant-Governor Tweedie and speeches of welcome from Premier Hazen, Hon. C. W. Robinson, leader of the Opposition, Hon. W. C. H. Grimmer, Surveyor-General, and Mayor C. F. Chestnut, to which a suitable reply was made by the chairman. A letter was read from Sir Wilfred Laurier, in which he said the forestry question was one of vital interest to every Canadian. The annual review of the president, Mr. Thomas Southworth, of Toronto, read in his absence by the chairman, showed how the arousing of public opinion had made the Conservation Commission possible, and insisted on the imperative duty of pressing forward in all parts of Canada to save the forests and all that depends upon them. At the close of the convention the following afternoon resolutions were passed, urging the Federal Government to limit the cutting of timber or pulpwood on Crown lands; endorsing the House of Commons committee, which recommends that the available forest lands upon the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains be converted into a permanent forest reserve; suggesting that the Federal and Provincial Governments preserve to Canada all the water-power within their boundaries, especially in waters bordering on the neighboring republic; calling upon the Dominion Government to pass more stringent laws compelling railway companies to prevent forest fires along their lines, and impressing upon the Federal and Provincial Governments the necessity of reserving the timber lands at the headwaters of all rivers and streams, so as to maintain the regular flow of water. Among the resolutions which concern the Forestry Association itself the most important is that which recommends to the executive the advisability of appointing a committee of five to consider the fire laws of the several provinces and suggest legislation that would more effectually prevent and control fires.

The automobile trade with foreign countries is growing quickly. In 1902 the value of machines exported was one million dollars; in 1909 it was eight and two-thirds millions. In this year machines worth two and one-half millions went to Canada; two millions to Great Britain; $846,000 to France, and $300,000 to British Australasia. The imports from Great Britain were valued at $176,000; from France, $2,124,000, and from Italy, $664,000. The French export trade amounted to twenty-five million dollars.

The foreign tobacco trade of the United States for the last twenty years amounts to over one billion dollars. The exports were 646 millions and the imports 386 millions. The world's trade last year was valued at 150 millions. Of this the United States imported forty-one millions; Cuba, thirty-one millions; the Dutch East Indies, twenty-three millions. German imports came to thirty-five millions; those of the United States to thirty millions, and those of Great Britain to twenty-five millions.

The Pacific Steam Navigation Company is to build four fast steamers for a direct line from Liverpool to Buenos Aires, to connect with the Trans-Andean Railway. The time from England to Valparaiso by this route will be about a fortnight.

During the last twelve years the British Treasury has received no less than £211,041,690, over a billion dollars, from death duties, that is, the tax on estates passing by inheritance.

In Massachusetts the legislature is considering bills presented to it by the Boston Federation of Catholic Societies dealing with moving picture shows and immoral theatres.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"She Stoops to Conquer," Garden Theatre.—It is a delight to witness such a fine presentation of Goldsmith's charming comedy as given by Mr. Greet and his excellent company. A contrast of the superior wit, humor and dramatic quality of this lovable and laughable play with the horseplay and vulgarity of one of our modern comedies would be an insult to ordinary intelligence. It teems with that subtle humor (so frequent in the older dramatists and so conspicuously lacking in the modern playwrights) which provokes continuous amusement, while its literary quality shines brilliantly amidst the banalities of the hour. Mr. Greet, as Tony Lumpkin, was exceptionally good, delineating with a sure touch, the sly, light-hearted, care-free, carousal-loving youth, with his haughty disdain for the "ladies," and his propensity for the lasses of the taverns.

The inn scene was exceptionally well acted, and contained many life-like impersonations of the various habitués of the village ale-house of Old England. His support was well balanced and gave evidence of careful and intelligent training. It was gratifying to witness the hearty appreciation of the audience, especially in these days, when we are wont to hear that old cry of managerial commercialism about the long suffering public not wanting the old plays. Another striking and present example of this appreciation of the public is evidenced at the large attendance of the production of Shakespearean plays at the Academy of Music, by Mr. Sothorn and Miss Marlowe, whose success has decided them to return shortly for another engagement.

Mr. Greet has long identified himself with a movement towards the uplift of the stage, by teaching the people in various ways the superior literary and dramatic quality of the elder dramatists. This season he has undertaken an unusually interesting repertoire which includes that exquisite morality play of the Fifteenth Century, "Everyman," "The Merchant of Venice," "Taming of the Shrew," "Macbeth," "Julius Caesar," "Hamlet," "As You Like It," "Two Gentlemen of Verona," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "Twelfth Night," "Romeo and Juliet," Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus," Sheridan's "The Rivals," Lytton's "Money," and a Greek or modern play. Such an undertaking deserves public appreciation, and it is to be sincerely hoped that Mr. Greet's efforts will not go unrewarded.

"Children of Destiny," Savoy Theatre.—A curious medley of realism, sensationalism, and utter improbability. The play is illogical and in its essence vicious, notwithstanding its supposed solution in a virtuous finale.

"Mr. and Mrs. Daventry," Hackett Theatre.—A play heralded as one of Oscar Wilde's, but without any evidence. It is true that its theme has a tang of Wilde's worldly cynicism, but its execution is so far below his workmanship that until proof positive is forthcoming, his attributed authorship may be classed as pure fakerism. The theme is on the usual lines of the modern drama of degeneracy, marital infelicity, infidelity and the usual catastrophe, presented to no purpose, in a realistic and sensational setting. It opened on a Wednesday night and was withdrawn at the end of the same week. May it rest in peace.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

A. V. W., Waldwick, N. J.—Who was "T. H.," a convert who wrote a remarkable book on prayers for the dead, and published the same in the year 1600? I do so wish to know more about him and his book, and surely some of the readers of AMERICA can tell me.

J. G.—The "Drama of St. Cecilia" is now out of print and cannot be obtained in England.

SCIENCE

The Duke of the Abruzzi lectured lately before the Alpine Club of Turin on his mountaineering in the western Himalayas last year. Setting out from Srindgar in Cashmere, he reached the Baltoro and Godwin-Austen glaciers a month later. Here he established a depot at Rdokass, from which he set out to attempt K² of the Ordnance Survey, or Mount Godwin-Austen of the atlases. Having reached its southern wall he sent out parties to examine the eastern and western sides for a practicable route. None was to be found. Everywhere the explorers met only steep ridges, sheer precipices and overhanging glaciers. The Duke made an effort to climb the mountain by the east-southeast ridge, but after reaching an altitude of about 16,000 feet he was compelled to abandon his task. He then spent several days in surveying the upper basin of the Godwin-Austen glacier. Having done this he turned his attention to K⁶, otherwise known as Bride Peak, not quite so high as K², but still for all that over 25,000 feet. June was already past and the unfavorable season of the monsoon was at hand. Nevertheless, he was going to try the ascent. This meant to live three weeks at an altitude of 21,000 feet, amid heavy snowstorms and almost continual fog, awaiting an opportunity of a dash for the summit. Twice he made it, but unsuccessfully. The second time, July 18, he was only 536 feet from the top when the fog came up and made it impossible to proceed. Nevertheless, he reached the height of 24,583 feet, the highest point ever reached by a mountaineer.

Mr. G. C. Bell, a member of the British Institute of Electrical Engineers, has conceived a novel device for storing heat energy that may be generated by electric apparatus during the day when there is small demand of current. It consists of a block of iron encased in a capsule of magnesia, which renders the block heat-proof. In the interior of the block is a removable partitioned heating unit. By passing the current through this unit a temperature of from 600 to 700 degrees Fahrenheit is possible. Thus heat is at hand at a moment's call and the efficiency of power-producing machinery is quadrupled. The use of the invention will depend on the prices per kilowatt power companies will see fit to offer. The prevailing high prices of electric current would not warrant its general introduction.

Professor Marbe, a French physicist, has made practical the use of the monometric flame of Dr. Koenig, to register disturbances of an alternating type, such as those of the electric current and heart beats. He finds that any flame, giving off soot, is sensitive to the influence of these pulsations and reproduces graphically not only the frequency of these disturbances but also their form. In every case the pulsations are made to traverse the flame; in case of the heart beats, through an acoustic capsule held close to the chest. The impressions are taken on a ribbon of paper which is made to pass through the flame. Heart pulsations have been measured up to one-hundredth of a second.

With the launching of the battleship Utah on the Delaware River, at Camden, New Jersey, the largest sea-engine of war in the world is afloat. Its displacement is 21,825 tons, with a length of 551 feet and a width of 88 feet. Turbine engines of 28,000 horse-power operate her propelling mechanism. A remarkable feature in connection with the construction of the Utah is that she was assembled in the short period of nine months.

Professor Robert S. Ball, of Cambridge (England), ridicules the idea of danger to the earth from Halley's comet. "A rhinoceros," he says, "in full charge does not fear collision with a cobweb;" "We passed through a comet's tail in 1861, and nobody knew it;" "Sir John Herschell said a whole comet could be squeezed into a portmanteau;" "As far as I can learn, we shall be in the tail of Halley's comet on May 12. I sincerely hope we shall."

The United States Light-house Board, after sixty days trial, has decided to adopt the submarine bell system of signals for foggy conditions. Forty-eight light-ships, equipped with these bells, have been anchored at different stations along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and all ships of war are being fitted with receiving apparatus. The sounding of the bell is registered electrically in the pilot house. This method enables signals to be received from a distance three times greater than that through which the blast of the fog horn is transmitted.

Dr. Edward Lee Greene, one-time professor of botany at the Catholic University and now associate in botany in the United States National Museum, has just published, under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution, an interesting volume, entitled "Landmarks of Botanical History." The volume is a detailed study of certain epochs in the development of the science of botany. The point of view is philosophical rather than industrial. Interesting biographies are included of such botanists as Theophrastus, Brunfelsius, Fuchs, Tragus and Cordos.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The visit of Supreme Grand Knight James A. Flaherty of the Knights of Columbus to Panama was a memorable event in the religious annals of the isthmus. Arriving at Colon on January 20, Mr. Flaherty and his party were welcomed by a committee of knights, who so thoroughly provided for their entertainment that the five days of their visit were crowded with events that must have afforded matter for pleasure and lasting recollection. One day was devoted to the inspection of the Culebra cut, the Gatun dam, and other canal works, a special train having been provided for the occasion. On Sunday, January 23, there was a solemn high Mass in the cathedral, at which the visiting and local knights assisted in a body. An eloquent sermon was delivered by the Rev. F. J. McDonald, C.M.

In the afternoon of the same day the Supreme Grand Knight exemplified the third degree, to which fifty-four were admitted. In the evening, Mr. Louis K. Rourke, of the Panama Council, presided at the banquet, at which the guests of honor were the Right Rev. Xavier Jungs, Bishop of the diocese, and Mr. Flaherty. On Monday a visit was paid to the neighboring islands in the Pacific, followed by a grand ball in the evening. On Tuesday, January 25, the visitors set out on their return to the United States. Their presence and their public profession of their faith produced a profound impression, according to La Defensa Social, of Panama, from which we have taken our details, and will redound to the good of religion.

There is announced from the office of the Cardinal Secretary of State in Rome the appearance, in the near future, of a detailed statement of the distribution of the vast sum entrusted to the Pope by the charitable faithful of the Catholic world on the occasion of the earthquake disaster more than a year ago. The document will show that a total of more than 6,000,000 liras was disbursed by the agents of the Holy Father in the stricken districts of Sicily and Calabria. Besides the sums expended in helping the needs of individuals, substantial donations were made to those charged with the rebuilding of churches, hospitals, orphanages and similar institutions of charity which have risen from the ruins within the past year. The statement covers only the distribution of the quasi-public fund administered by Papal direction. The Holy Father has not permitted in the report any mention of the million and a half liras which he caused to be given from his private resources to the unfortunates of Reggio and its neighborhood.

The report appears in a neatly bound pamphlet, and is to be issued in English, German, Italian and French.

With the Archbishop of Westminster acting as President and the other Bishops of the Province as Vice-Presidents, a permanent Committee representing various Catholic societies in England and Wales has been formed to arrange for a National Catholic Congress to meet every year in England. According to present arrangements the Congress will open at Leeds on July 29. As at the Eucharistic Congress, there will be one or more large demonstrations and meetings of the various constituent bodies, at which papers will be read and discussed. On Sunday, July 31, there will be solemn functions in the churches, with a general Communion. Details on these and a number of other points have not been settled.

Preparations are already being made by Austrian Catholics for a popular pilgrimage to Lourdes and other noted shrines during the coming summer. Special trains will leave Vienna on August 20, and the pilgrims will return on September 2. Going or coming stops will be made in Oberammergau, where the pilgrims will witness the Passion play. Zurich, Einsiedeln, Lucerne, Bern, Freiburg, where special services will be held at the tomb of Bl. Peter Canisius, the patron of Sodalities of the Blessed Virgin, Ghent, Lyons and Paray le Monial. The pilgrims will spend four days in Lourdes and, if the record of past years be attained, the pilgrimage will be a notably large one.

On February 25 Bishop Kennedy, Rector of the American College, presented to the Pope, in the name of Archbishop Farley, the gold medal recently struck in commemoration of the centenary of the diocese of New York. The Holy Father admired its artistic details and returned his thanks to Archbishop Farley for the gift.

The consecration of the Right Rev. M. F. Fallon, O.M.I., as Bishop of London, Ontario, is to take place on April 25, the Feast of St. Mark, Evangelist.

A boarding school in Manila, conducted by the Augustinian nuns (native) was utterly destroyed by fire on December 27. The loss was $75,000 and there was no insurance. The house belonged to the Archbishop.

It is announced that the Pope will be asked to allow the Blessed Sacrament to be carried in the procession at the coming Montreal Eucharistic Congress, in a special carriage drawn by six horses, as used to be done by the Pontiff himself in the olden times.

PERSONAL

At the last meeting of the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York, the vice-Chancellor, Dr. St. Clair McKelway, who presided, paid a tribute to the memory of the late Bishop Thomas A. Hendrick, of Cebú, once a member of the Board. "There was a union of cultivation, fellowship and genial humor in him that made him a charming colleague as well as a valuable regent," said Dr. McKelway.

"When he was called to service in the Eastern possessions of our republic, he unhesitatingly gave up the labor in which he had attained distinction, and wrought and won love for missionary labor under conditions of peril and difficulty of a grave kind. His record in that field commanded the admiration of his superiors, the affection of the people over whom he was made the spiritual overseer and the respect of the government of his country. Education had in him an exemplar. Religion had in him a faithful disciple. Authority, spiritual or civil, had in him a wise leader and follower in one. His life was a blessing. His conduct was an example. His end was peace."

Regent Pliny T. Sexton followed Dr. McKelway and said: "Assiduously, he sought to develop and translate into usefulness to others the divine spark which he realized had been implanted in his material being. Untiring devotion and service to his God, through like devotion and service to his fellow men, is a truthful and just characterization of the animating spirit and purpose of our greatly beloved brother and former associate. Peace be to his ashes and eternal joy for his soul."

The Manila Cable News of Nov. 26 reports that Padre Pedro Chaves, a native priest of Sorsogon, delegate to the first Philippine Assembly, was badly defeated in his attempt at re-election. Padre Chaves is an unfrocked priest, the author of a bill calling for the immediate independence of the Philippine Islands, which was first approved by the Nationalist majority of the House and then pigeonholed. It was never dreamed for a moment, says the Cable News, that a delegate who, by his bill, had made himself immortal among his fellow delegates, should have to suffer defeat. During the revolution of 1898 Padre Chaves was a captain in the forces of the Philippine republic. After the war he retired to private life and engaged in business.

Congress has passed a bill appropriating $3,000 to place a memorial over the unmarked grave in the cemetery at Carrollton, Mo., where Gen. James Shields was buried thirty years ago. General Shields was a veteran of the Mexican and civil wars, and the only man who had been a United States Senator from three States, Missouri, Illinois and Minnesota.

A press cable from Rome states that the Pope has appointed the Rev. J. W. Hendrick, of Ovid, N. Y., brother of the late Rt. Rev. T. A. Hendrick, Bishop of Cebú, a domestic prelate, with the title of monsignor.

The new auxiliary of St. Paul will have the titular see of Ermopolis Major, and the auxiliary for San Antonio, Texas, that of Costabata.

OBITUARY

The Rev. Matthew Antillac, missionary of the Society of Jesus, died at Belize, British Honduras, aged 63 years. He was a native of the Spanish province of Catalonia, and as a young priest began his missionary career in the new world. Although never robust, he endured without flinching the hardships of a tropical climate; his thirty years of missionary life were full of works of zeal and self-sacrifice. His genial and sympathetic disposition and his ability in expounding the word of God gave him great influence with the natives. In the evening of February 16, as he was about to give Benediction of the Most Blessed Sacrament in the presence of Bishop Hopkins, he was stricken with paralysis and expired two hours later. The Bishop administered the last Sacraments and gave the last blessing to the dying missionary.

The Rev. John S. Coyle, S.J., who for some years has acted as treasurer of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, died in that city on Feb. 25. He was born in Philadelphia April 28, 1864, and entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Frederick in his sixteenth year. For many years he suffered from ill-health, but his sufferings never interfered with the conscientious discharge of the duties assigned him. The Rev. George Coyle, of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., is his brother.

Rev. James O'Reilly Sheridan, for fourteen years pastor of St. Francis' Church, Naugatuck, Conn., died there on February 22. He was born in County Longford, Ireland, February 10, 1855, and came here in 1869. Graduated at Holy Cross College, Worcester, in 1875, he made his theological studies at Montreal, and at St. Bonaventure's Seminary, Alle-gany, N. Y., where he was ordained to the priesthood, June 15, 1878. Father Sheridan came of a Levitical family. Two of his brothers were also priests, the late Bishop O'Reilly, of Hartford, was his uncle, and the late Very Rev. James Hughes, of Hartford, was another kinsman. Since Bishop Tierney died in 1908, the diocese of Hartford has lost by death fourteen of its priests, nine of them prominent pastors.

Colonel Claude R. Conder died in England, February 16, aged 62. He will be remembered by our readers for his share in the survey of the Holy Land under the Palestine Exploration Fund. In this work he was occupied for ten years, from 1865 to 1875, during which period he surveyed 4,700 square miles. On his return to England he gave the public an account of his work in his book, "Tent Work in Palestine." While his professional work is beyond all praise, the same can not be said of his archeology. In this he was inclined to be destructive of well-founded traditions, and was particularly hostile to the traditional site of Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre, and a supporter of the so-called Gordon site beyond the Damascus Gate.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The sermon on the occasion of the public demonstration made by the Knights of Columbus in Panama was delivered by the Rev. F. J. McDonald, C.M., and was a noble tribute to the Church and an eloquent appeal to the assembled knights to live up to the spirit of their Order by cherishing and practising ardent loyalty to their faith. It was in part as follows: "If Windhorst with a few faithful followers strong in the principles of justice could disarm the Iron Chancellor of Germany, if O'Connell, strong with the strength of right could force his way to the greatest parliament of the world and wring from it measures of justice, who need fear the failure of the cause of truth when it is supported by men chosen from among the best and raised to the honor of knighthood after they have proved their lofty principles? United for battle, you are stronger than Napoleon and his veterans, Wellington and his armies, Washington and his patriots. You have nothing to fear from without as long as the Order is faithful to itself. As long as it adheres loyally to its principles and duties, there is no power that can effect its destruction. The strength of any association depends more upon the quality of its members than on their number.

"Never will it be too well understood that there is only one institution that has stood every test of time and trial; that only one has seen the birth, the growth, the decay and death of all others; that only one flourishes in the night of persecution and in the days of religious peace as well, and that this one institution is to exist until the last moment of time. The Church is a divine institution; all others are the work of men. These flourish as long as she imparts to them the life-giving warmth of her existence. Orders strong and flourishing of old forgot this truth or denied it, and therefore they are not. All that hopes for perpetuity must cleave to the Church as the vine to the oak, as the earth to the sun which vivifies it. In every ray of light that flashes from our character, in every one of our actions sealed with Christian morality we give testimony to Jesus Christ. We must face many conflicts, great trials await us, our order of knighthood must right many wrongs and resist much injustice.

"Like the valiant knights of old, with God and country in our hearts, let us wave the banner of the Cross, which has never been overcome; where truth is crushed, where liberty suffers, where there is hunger and thirst for justice, where religion is persecuted, there let us fly and bare the sword. In all lands our ancestors in the faith maintained it at the cost of their blood. A price so high is not demanded of us. Nevertheless, we may be brought face to face with contempt and ridicule, suspicions springing from ignorance, infamous calumnies and vile persecution. What matters it? It is in the stress of trial that true loftiness of character is seen."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

FRANCISCAN CONVENT, UGANDA,
BRITISH EAST AFRICA.

Jan. 18, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It surprised me to see my letter printed in AMERICA. I should like to correct an error in it, viz., that the money had not been voted for printing two thousand copies of Colonel Roosevelt's speech given at Nairobi. The money was voted and the copies printed and distributed.

On December 21, 1909, our mission was honored by a visit from Colonel Roosevelt, his son Kermit, and Commissioner F. A. Knowles. Colonel Roosevelt inspected every part of the compounds, showing keen interest in all he saw. He looks remarkably well and has thoroughly enjoyed his hunting trip and this magnificent country. He said that we have nothing at home, excepting, perhaps, the grizzly bear, which is anything like the fierce and wild beasts of Africa. Kermit is a fearless hunter. While here he succeeded in shooting a very rare species of large antelope. As far as is known, only five of these antelopes are trophies, and he has the fifth and finest.

In Uganda Protectorate, as in East Africa, Colonel Roosevelt made a most favorable impression, and pleased everyone by his greatness and his simplicity, as well as his straightforwardness. He very kindly offered to speak in public of our work here, upon his return to the United States. He left Kampala early on the morning of Christmas eve to overtake his safari (caravan), which he had sent forward on the previous day. We have been told that the Sirdar is sending a gunboat to Gondokoro to meet Colonel Roosevelt's party and take them up the Nile.

The amalgamation of British East Africa with this Uganda Protectorate, by which Sir Percy Girouard would have control of both, has not come to pass. The appointment is announced of the Commander-in-Chief of Somaliland, Captain Henry Edward Spiller Cordeaux, C.B., C.M.G., as the new Governor of Uganda Protectorate.

MOTHER MARY PAUL, O.S.F.

BLUE MONDAY IN THE "LIVING CHURCH."

To the Editor of AMERICA:

For some time past there has been considerable perturbation and searching of heart amongst the High Church members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country. One evidence of this is the unusually large number of their clergymen who, within the last two years, have made their submission to the Catholic Church. Another is the frequent appearance in the columns of the Living Church, the leading organ of this party, of articles of a strongly anti-Roman tone, intended to strengthen and reassure the wavering brethren who may be suspected of meditating a flight Romewards. Amongst these is an article with the title "On Going to Rome," which has been reprinted as a pamphlet for general distribution. (From its style it is evidently the production of a clerical correspondent of the paper who contributes thereto a weekly column under the heading of "Blue Monday Musings," of a virulent anti-Roman tone.)

The article begins with an attempt to minimize the force of the recent conversions to Rome by setting over against this gain the "vastly greater company" yearly lost to the Catholic Church. We do not deny that annually the Church suffers the loss of many of her children. The wonder would be if it were otherwise considering the omnipresence and activity of the forces of worldliness and infidelity, the multiplied and multiplying forms of false religions, and, in this country, the "soup kitchen" methods used by Protestant "evangelizing" societies for capturing especially the children of poor Catholic immigrants. We take exception, however, when the author descends to particulars. That recent events in France have resulted in a great loss to the Catholic religion will not, we think, be the conclusion of any unprejudiced observer. It is the testimony of many witnesses that, since the Separation Law went into effect, the churches have been better filled, and there has been more evidence of religious devotion and zeal than for many long years past. Religious persecution there, as elsewhere, has had the effect merely of separating the chaff from the wheat, those who have withdrawn from the Church never having been Catholics in anything but the name, and whose withdrawal, therefore, is no loss of strength to the Church, but rather the reverse. As to the reported accessions to the ranks of the so-called "Old Catholics," without doubt the wish is here father to the thought. This sect, in the forty years of its existence, has had abundant opportunity to show what it could do, and it has been sufficiently evident for a long time past that it is a "movement" which will not "move" except backwards. While speaking of Poland, however, the writer of the tract might have mentioned the Mariavite delusion, which has unfortunately carried off a considerable number of Polish Catholics. These people are followers of a certain woman who claims to be the incarnation of the Holy Ghost. This movement is enjoying the favor and support of the Russian authorities, who are naturally glad of an opportunity to weaken the power of Catholicism among their Polish subjects, but, what is still more disgraceful, a bishop has been consecrated for these fanatics by a bishop himself consecrated by prelates of the "Old Catholic" sect. As it is this body with which Anglicans of the "High" persuasion are so anxious to promote union it must be interesting to them to see with what strange bedfellows they are going to become associated should such union take place.

The Protestants of Italy will no doubt be glad to hear of the considerable increase in their ranks discovered by this Living Church writer. The most recent Italian religious statistics, however, furnish information quite the contrary. If the Church suffers annually the loss of many of her children, still, when it comes to the question of the "departure of great numbers into separation," the Catholic Church is not the only religious body which has to confront this condition. As the result of a recent religious census taken in the Harlem district of New York, it is reported by a prominent Episcopalian rector in that quarter that, of the Episcopalians, thirty per cent. attended no church whatever—a pretty large "departure into separation." The number of Catholics returned as non-church-going in the census of this region was very small in comparison.

His remarks as to the painful and often life-long separations between friends caused by these religious changes are only too true, and that so many have been, and are, willing to make the change, in spite of the almost certainty of such pain and loss, ought surely to be accepted as a testimony to the sincerity and strength of their convictions.

Equally unexceptionable is the position taken that the mere fact of one making this change who had hitherto been looked up to as a leader and master, is no reason in itself for a change of attitude on the part of those who have been his disciples. We know not to what extent defections from the Episcopal Church from this cause have been made or are threatened, but from personal experience and the testimony of others, we know that the principle thus deprecated, of blind discipleship, is not unfrequently invoked to keep waverers in that Church. "What!" in effect it is said to the anxious one, "you dare, on the strength of your own private judgment, and with your limited knowledge of history and theology, to contemplate making such a tremendous change! Think of Dr. Pusey, that most learned man, so deeply versed in antiquity and patristic lore. He had been over this whole subject in a way that you can never hope to be, and the result of his deep and long-continued study was to strengthen his belief in the Catholicity of the Anglican Church. How can you dare to put your knowledge and experience against his, not to mention his sanctity?" Ah, yes, Ward's "Credo in Newmannum," quoted by our reverend Doctor, has its echoes nearer home. It is certainly true that, no matter who comes or goes, "we shall serve God and secure our own salvation best by fidelity to the task God has given us in the vineyard where He has placed us." Granted always. But here is the all-important point—that it is His vineyard. And it is precisely the conviction, forced upon the minds of so many men and women, that the Anglican Church, as a body, has no part or lot in God's Vineyard, that has driven them from that body to Rome. Our author may think them mistaken; nevertheless, he will surely admit that, having that conviction, they were bound to take the step they did.

CATHOLIC CHURCH-GOING.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

During the heat of summer, when outside temples are apt to be thinned by fashion's exodus, the church in this Catholic parish is filled Sunday after Sunday, at all the Masses; on a day of obligation that may fall on a week-day, perchance, as All Saints' Day fell on Monday, Immaculate Conception on Wednesday, last year, the Circumcision on Saturday, this year, the same church is literally packed with devout throngs. A saying of secular "Father" Abraham Lincoln comes to mind, to wit, just as "you can fool some of the people all the time, all of the people some of the time, yet not all the people all the time," neither is the constant reality of Catholic worship in a consistent parish at all compatible with delusion.

There may naturally slip in some black sheep, or supposedly a masked sheep or two, in a large aggregate of promiscuous human beings; yet the constant and persevering devotion of the flock as a whole, Sundays and week-days, fasts and feasts, winter and summer alike with steadfast fidelity to Church and pastors, is a palpable test of the truth. While there is never a sign of perfunctory, constrained attendance, in this typical Philadelphia parish, on days of strict obligation, but rather an evident, spontaneous conscience at work with a Catholic will therein, quite as remarkable is the voluntary thronging on days not of obligation, but of appointed great devotion, such as All Souls (on a Tuesday, last year) and Ash Wednesday. Pray witness if any "converted" Waldensian, "away from Rome," would proceed to "evangelize" that Ash Wednesday surge of Catholic "sheep," silently crowding, step by step, to the altar, there to be signed with Palm Sunday's ashes in most reverential awe of Palm Sunday's truth to their souls brought home. Do they lack the Gospel? Do they lack the Gospel, again reverently crowding to voluntary devotions called "Stations" or "Way of the Cross?" The priest in his vestments kneeling in the aisles, though the weather be slushy, and many wet feet have trodden before him, is he therefore a symbol of "sacerdotal pride?" Neither so when at the altar itself he is vested in robes that do honor to Whom honor is due. And as to any alien rejection of devotions in praise of Blessed Virgin Mary, Whom, then, was the Holy Virgin elected to bear? Could she stay a vessel of inferior election, that fact allowed?

The one proved institution in all this world is the Catholic Church. What fatuous delusion in heresy or schism to fight that cause!

AMERICA is a paper of intense interest to all Catholics; it is well worth having and studying. It is a good compilation of thrilling facts which should stir the hearts of its readers. The hour is ripe for such a paper, which ought to circulate by the hundreds of thousands among our pastors and laymen.—James M. Bennett, Auburn, N. Y.

CHRONICLE

President's Legislative Program.—The President will insist, as far as he legitimately can, that some at least of the conservation measures shall be enacted into law before the present session of Congress adjourns. The bills which the President looks for Congress to pass in redemption of solemn party pledges are five in number, namely, the bill which calls for the establishing of postal savings banks; the one for amending and strengthening the interstate commerce law; the conservation measures, giving the President the right to withdraw public lands from entry and to continue the withdrawal until revoked by himself or by an act of Congress, and providing for a reclassification of the lands; the anti-injunction bill and Statehood for New Mexico and Arizona. In addition to these the President has recommended several other matters of legislation, including bills for a new form of government in Alaska, for Federal corporations and creating a public health bureau, but as these measures largely reflect his personal views, the President would not have them stand in the way at this time of bills designed to fulfil party pledges.

Corporation Tax Law.—The Chicago Record-Herald states that 300,000 of the 415,000 corporations in the United States have filed with internal revenue collectors the reports of their business called for by the new corporation tax law. The last day under the law for the filing of these reports was March 1, unless in particular instances an extension of time was granted; failure to report carries with it a fine of from $1,000 to $5,000. The estimates of the revenue are enlarged by $5,000,000 to $30,000,000, and this sum will be further increased by the fines under the law which, if the figures of the Record-Herald be accepted, will exceed the tax. Collectors of internal revenue were notified some weeks ago of the President's decision that the returns by corporations under the law imposing a tax of one per cent. on their net incomes are not to be open to general public inspection unless a substantial appropriation is made by Congress to defray the necessary expense.

Ballinger-Pinchot Inquiry.—Gifford Pinchot concluded his testimony in the Ballinger-Pinchot inquiry leaving the impression after his four days on the witness stand, that he had not made good his serious charge against the Secretary of the Interior. Secretary Wilson denied the statement that he had authorized Mr. Pinchot's letter of January 5 to Senator Dolliver, which forced the President to dismiss the Chief Forester from the service.

The Rockefeller Foundation.—Senator Gallinger introduced in the Senate a bill for the incorporation of "the Rockefeller Foundation," the object of which is "to promote the wellbeing and to advance the civilization of the peoples of the United States and of foreign lands in the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge; in the prevention and relief of suffering, and in the promotion of any and all of the elements of human progress." Towards this foundation, it is reported, Mr. Rockefeller will contribute the greater part of his vast estate, variously estimated at $300,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. The principal office of the foundation will be in the District of Columbia, though the bill gives the right to establish branch offices elsewhere. It is planned to make John D. Rockefeller, Jr., executive head of the foundation when the bill providing for its incorporation is passed.

Philadelphia Car Strike.—The last hope of averting the general strike in Philadelphia was given up when President Krueger on behalf of the rapid transit company refused to accede to the request of the Amalgamated Union that joint appeal be made by the union and the company for arbitration by the courts under the terms of a law passed in 1893. The situation is one of the most serious that has ever faced the business interests of a large city. Mayor Reyburn issued a proclamation forbidding a mass meeting in Independence Square and the Director of Public Safety announced that he had made thorough police arrangements to prevent it. On Monday the labor leaders declared that 125,000 were out under the general strike order; conservative estimates put the number at 40,000. Some few casualties were reported. Instructions were sent from Washington to Gen. Wood, in charge of the Army of the East at Governor's Island, to have troops ready to go to Philadelphia to guard the Mint and other Government property in case of serious disorders.

Income Tax Amendment.—The most important utterance concerning the proposed income tax amendment to the Federal Constitution since Governor Hughes took ground against that measure, appeared in a letter written by United States Senator Root to State Senator Davenport of New York. In his letter, which was read in the State Senate and has been ordered printed in the "Congressional Record," Senator Root controverts the opinion of Governor Hughes and argues at length that the proposed tax is both constitutional and proper. The income tax amendment has been ratified by both houses of the Illinois legislature.

Plan Remedies for Existing Evils.—The executive committee of the National Civic Federation met last week in New York to devise ways and means for a campaign to be carried on throughout the United States to secure uniform legislation in the States on matters of public interest and the public welfare. The meeting was the outcome of the recent conference in Washington of the National Civic Federation in cooperation with the session of the governors of the States and the commissioners of universal laws. The subjects chiefly to be aimed at are the divorce laws, prevention of the white slave traffic, pure food, and numerous economical and industrial questions. Among these latter the federal incorporation bill will claim attention.

Quebec Anti-Tuberculosis Exposition.—The official opening of the Anti-Tuberculosis Exposition took place on March 2 in the Promotion Hall of Laval University in the city of Quebec. Sir Francis Langelier, president of the Anti-Tuberculosis League, presided. On his right were the Right Rev. P. E. Roy, Auxiliary Bishop of Quebec; Mayor Drouin, Doctors Rousseau and Groundin, and on his left the Anglican Dean Williams, Doctors Adami and Simard and the Rev. A. Gosselin, Rector of the University of Laval. The most important address was Dr. Adami's. His experience at the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal showed that one-half of the autopsies revealed the presence of tuberculosis in persons who died from other causes. The fact that 50 per cent. of adults are infected with this disease and that only 13 per cent. die of it, proves that tuberculosis is curable. The anti-tuberculosis campaign comprises three distinct enterprises: prevention, cure, segregation and care of incurables. Of patients who can be cured 249 out of 250 present no danger of contagion. Dr. Adami thinks that the Province of Quebec is in a particularly advantageous position for combating the White Plague. He said: "We have that noble phalanx of the Sisters of Providence who are ready to devote themselves for practically no earthly reward. We know with what admirable abnegation they care for these poor patients whether Catholic or Protestant. I am a Protestant and I am happy to give this testimony to the Catholic nuns. . . . In the Middle Ages another chronic malady as fatal as tuberculosis ravaged the nations of Europe. I mean leprosy. And it is thanks to the devotedness of the Catholic Church that this terrible disease has practically disappeared. Certain it is that nowadays, with the diffusion of science and hygienic appliances it will not take four hundred years to drive tuberculosis out of the Province of Quebec, and I am sure that I can count on the kindness and devotion of the Sisters."

Avalanches in Canadian Rockies.—On March 5, ninety-two men perished in an avalanche that swept down into Rogers Pass in the Selkirk Range of the Rocky Mountains. Fourteen injured are in the hospital. The work of recovering the dead and clearing the Canadian Pacific Railway main line was greatly impeded by a raging blizzard. Another big slide of snow and rock occurred the same morning a mile east of the spot where the ninety-two men were overwhelmed, but nobody was hurt this time. This second avalanche destroyed a portion of a snowshed and buried four hundred yards of the track to a depth of sixty feet. While the main line was being cleared passenger traffic was handled via the Arrow Lakes, Nelson and the Crow's Nest Pass. The death list from avalanches in Idaho, Washington and British Columbia between February 28 and March 5 was 224. A despatch from Winnipeg, dated March 5, says that the Wilcox & Ymir mines near Nelson, B. C., have been badly damaged by snowslides. At the Wilcox mine the bunk house and dining room, with the boilers and dynamo plant and the superintendent's house, were wrecked. The financial loss is said to be $100,000.

London Elections.—The municipal elections for the London County Council took place March 5. The Municipal Reformers' majority won three years ago was destroyed, their opponents gaining 21 seats. The Councils as it now stands consists of 58 Municipal Reformers, 56 Progressivists and 3 Labor members. In general Municipal Reformers correspond to Conservatives and Progressivists to Radicals.—The City of London is preparing to receive Mr. Roosevelt with great distinction. The ceremonial will be that followed in the reception of General Grant.—Mr. Austen Chamberlain's motion in favor of Tariff Reform, after a brilliant debate, was defeated by only 31. The Nationalists did not vote.—Sir Pieter van B. Bam, of South Africa, was entertained by the Imperial Cooperation League. He gave a powerful address in favor of Imperial Federation and an Imperial Parliament.—The Bristol, protected cruiser, has just been launched. Her engines will be the American Brown-Curtis turbines. She is the first large ship of the British navy to be equipped with them.

The Irish Party's Attitude.—Mr. Redmond's speech in Parliament on government procedure was admitted to be the most statesmanlike utterance on the occasion and an unanswerable indictment of Mr. Asquith's tactics. The refusal of the Irish organization of Great Britain to support the reelection of Captain Benn, a strong Home Ruler, because of dissatisfaction with the cabinet's course, also had influence in effecting the change desired. Mr. Kettle's insistence that Protection would not benefit nor satisfy Ireland unless her Parliament controlled it as far as it related to Ireland, was enlarged on by Mr. Balfour as a new development of the Home Rule demand which Mr. Asquith would find unpalatable. The Irish Party decided not to ballot for bills or motions until a satisfactory method of dealing with the veto question should be introduced. The National Board of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the directors of the United Irish League, representing the two largest Irish organizations in the United States, have agreed to combine in order to produce unity in the Irish ranks and support their brethren at home in their efforts to achieve the largest possible measure of autonomy.

British Colonies.—The coal-strike in New South Wales is over. Some weeks ago the southern miners resumed work. On February 21 the northern miners determined to do the same, by a vote of 4,062 to 1,751.—The public account of Jamaica show a surplus for last year of £140,000, of which £100,000 will be used for roads, public buildings and other improvements. The Governor invited the Legislative Council to consider the reduction of duties on food.

Political Assassination in Egypt.—Boutros Pasha, the Prime Minister, fell a victim on February 20, to a terrorizing society akin to those of India. The object of the society is the expulsion of the English and independence of Turkey. Opinions are divided as to its extent. The Young Egypt party denounce the murderer as a madman: nevertheless, he took an active part in the Young Egypt Congress last September. Others pretend that it is restricted to the readers of the Lewa, a revolutionary newspaper. The probabilities, however, are all the other way.

Indian Press Law.—The Swarajya, of Allahabad, has been suspended for failing to make the deposit of 1,000 rupees required by the new law. Two of its editors were amongst those convicted of sedition since the agitation began. This is the first order under the Press Law.

French Chamber.—The French parliamentary session, which generally lasts till July 14, will be much shorter this year because the term for which the deputies were elected is soon to expire. The Briand ministry has decided that the general elections will take place on Sunday, April 24, and that the second balloting will be on Sunday, May 8. A very long night sitting on March 2 closed with the final adoption of the budget for 1910, the total of which is 4,183,294,064 francs ($807,376,140). The end of the sitting was marked by great disorder. M. Pierre Leroy-Beaulieu, deputy for Hérault, tore off the cover of his neighbor's desk and began pounding with it on his own to annoy the radical majority. Two radical deputies, M. Danzon, of Lot-et-Garonne, and M. Lenoir, of the Marne, rushed upon the obstructionist, snatched away the desk cover, and, as he resisted, pommelled him with their fists. When the use of fists threatened to become general, M. Briand, who had vainly rung his bell for order, put on his hat and declared the meeting closed. Bailiffs then succeeded in separating the combatants.

Moroccan Affairs.—M. Pichon, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, received on March 3 an answer to his ultimatum, confirming the acceptance by the Sultan of Morocco of all the conditions imposed for the Moroccan loan and for the payment of indemnities to the victims of Casablanca. Meanwhile there has been fighting on the frontier of Morocco. The region of Chaouïa has been pacified since the occupation of Casablanca. The natives have been not only submissive to the French military force, but they have joined in forming a Franco-Moroccan cavalry corps of twelve hundred men to keep the peace. The growing prosperity of this region stirred up the envy of the Zaers, a tribe not subject to France, and dwelling in the mountains to the northwest of Chaouïa, which they invaded. A detachment of the Franco-Moroccan cavalry having attempted to seize some of the raiders, the commander, Lieutenant Meaux, was killed. Thereupon General Mounier, commanding the garrison at Casablanca, placed himself at the head of a column of French troops and of the Moroccan cavalry and sallied forth on a punitive expedition. A despatch from Tangiers, dated March 2, announces that General Mounier surprised the Zaers, routed them and drove them back beyond the frontier. The Zaers left behind them many dead and a great number wounded. Two French soldiers were killed and thirteen native cavalymen were wounded.

Sahara Police.—A recent debate in the French Chamber brought out some interesting facts concerning the great desert of the Sahara. M. Messimy, reporter for the Colonial Budget, contended that the expense of maintaining a police force over this immense region more than three thousand miles in length and containing two million square miles of chiefly arid sand was quite useless, especially since trade having chosen other routes, there are no longer any caravans. M. Etienne replied that the mounted police were absolutely necessary to prevent raids by the desert-roving robber bands upon the peaceful districts of North Africa and upon the Soudan. The Sahara has been, ever since the days of the Roman Empire, a nursing mother of revolutions in the fertile countries bordering on the desert. No less than three dynasties have successively secured a foothold in Morocco through incursions from the Sahara. It is a mistake to suppose that the Great Desert is uninhabited. Such regions as those south of Oran and of Morocco, the steppe between the Niger and the Air, the Asben Kingdom, and the Tiberti, harbor pretty numerous tribes. These native groups are always on the move, and hunger leads to pillage; hence the razzias which are a constant terror to peaceful neighbors. The best and cheapest way to stop these calamitous forays is to police the Sahara itself and disperse the robber bands as soon as they try to form. Although the Sahara is so vast, there are only ten or twelve places of strategic importance, because there alone can water and provisions be secured by the nomadic tribes. These places can be carefully watched and defended by a dozen companies of mounted police, and Colonel Lapérine, has found just the men and the animals for this preventive work. The men are natives of the Sahara, the animals are the meharas, swift dromedaries, which can outrun the ordinary camels used by the raiders. These Meharists, as the Sahara police are called, become excellent cavalymen who can easily cover a hundred miles in a day. The maintenance of this force is, therefore, a military duty, not an economic question, though even from the viewpoint of economy it will pay in the long run by the security of France's colonies in North and West Africa. M. Etienne's arguments and eloquent conclusion were cheered by the whole Chamber, and the Minister of Colonies triumphantly announced the formation of two new companies of Meharists.

Progress of the Electoral Reform Measure.—The Prussian reform measure continues to hold the first place in German politics. Early in the week in Berlin an immense gathering crowded into the spacious Busch Circus to voice its protest against the bill under discussion in the Landtag. The assembly was advertised as a meeting of representatives of the cultured and intellectual circles of the city. Following the exercises in the Circus a vast concourse paraded the streets of the capital, and the marching thousands were viewed by the Emperor from a window of the imperial palace. Neither the meeting nor the street demonstration led to any disturbance and the interference of the police was not called for. Similar scenes are reported from Frankfort. A few days after these protests, on March 4, it was announced that by a combination of the German Conservatives and the Centrum in the special commission, the proposed bill as amended by these parties had passed the first reading. This success was brought about only after each clause of the bill had been discussed and voted upon, the final vote on the first reading being 15 to 13. The essential change made from the bill originally introduced by Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg is in the approval of a secret ballot for the indirect election of the delegates. These will then by open ballot choose the representatives to the Landtag.

American Exhibit Postponed.—Following the stand taken by the Government, announced last week in the Chronicle, the American promoters of the proposed Industrial and Mechanical Exhibit in Berlin, have determined to postpone it until 1911. Although at first averse to the change, the German Directors have agreed to accept the change of date and announce that the Exposition will, when held, take on the character of an American-German rather than that of a strictly American exhibit. Making known their acceptance of the plans of the American promoters in a despatch very friendly in tone, they assure their American co-workers of hearty cooperation in the venture as it will be planned in the coming summer by a committee made up of Germans and Americans. The Kölnische Zeitung makes light of the "unfriendly attitude" of Germany towards the United States, which some tried to read into the occurrences spoken of in last week's Chronicle. It declares the opposition which appeared to exist came from a few unimportant agrarian newspapers.

Germany and Canada.—On March 1 a new commercial agreement between Germany and Canada went into effect, and it is announced that two hundred representatives of leading German business houses and firms are on their way to Western Canada to begin energetic competition with resident representatives of United States corporations now controlling the trade in that section. Last year Canada's western farmers did a business of $90,000,000 with Germany.

Tariff Rates in Austria.—The proposition made by the Austrian Cabinet, mentioned in the Chronicle two weeks ago, has been accepted in Washington and by proclamation signed by President Taft, the privilege of minimum rates under the Payne-Aldrich law has been granted to Austria-Hungary.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Outlook For Irish Autonomy

Mr. Asquith's rather sudden reversal of procedure in dealing with the Budget and the Lords was an eloquent recognition of the Irish Party's dominant position in the British Parliament and a proof that Mr. Redmond has known how to use it with firmness and discretion in delicate and difficult circumstances. The situation is still one of exceptional delicacy and there are many restraining circumstances that will continue to limit the Irish leader in a prudent exercise of his power. His paramount object is to secure self-government for the people his party represents; but Tariff Reform, Free Trade and the Budget concern Ireland in degree as much as England and the hurtfulness of their incidence must be carefully balanced with the advantages of the promised Home Rule and the likelihood of its enactment. It seems to be generally accepted that Ireland is in favor of Protection, but reluctantly swallows Free Trade and the Budget as a necessary condition to autonomy. This is only partially true. Ireland favors neither Protection nor Free Trade in the English sense of the terms. The English Free Trade system not only gives free scope to a foreign competition which has proved ruinous to Irish agriculture, but carries a revenue tax that hampers the spirit trade and its kindred industries, hinders the revival of the tobacco industry which it had previously destroyed and in divers ways adds to the cost of living. The Lloyd-George Budget increases this impost and moreover diminishes the benefit of the land purchase acts by taxes on transference of land and on increment of value.

Nor does Protection seem a hopeful alternative. England is a manufacturing country and will so remain. It can never supply food for its own population, and any system of Protection it may adopt will be controlled by the industrial millions who will demand cheap food from whatsoever source; at most it would only be a revenue tax, insufficient for adequate protection and devised to guard English and not Irish interests. Ireland is mainly agricultural. It is trying to revive its industries which were crushed under Protection and Free Trade alike, but will make slow headway as long as English competitors, long and firmly entrenched, have a predominant voice in making and controlling the laws of trade. It is against these that Ireland would most need protection. This Tariff Reform will not give, nor would it greatly benefit agriculture as long as the great industrial towns are the backbone of English prosperity. Hence, as between Free Trade and Protection under an English Parliament, Ireland has a slight margin of choice. Would Home Rule or Mr. Asquith's "full self-government" alter the situation?

It depends on what is understood by the fulness of self-government. The setting up of a legislative assembly of one chamber or two would not improve matters much unless its legislative and executive powers covered all the needs of the nation. Gladstone's Bills of 1886 and 1893 did not provide for such a parliament. They seem now less remarkable for what they conceded than for what they retained. They withheld from the Irish Legislature the power of making laws relating to the Crown, the making of peace, war or treaties; to the army, navy or militia; to trade, navigation, quarantine, light-houses and beacons; to the postal and telegraph service; to coinage, foreign money, legal tender, weights, measures, patent rights and copyright. It is obvious that an assembly thus limited is not in any true sense a legislative body. But there were other limitations.

The Bill of 1886 exacted from Ireland a contribution of one-fifteenth of the total army and navy and imperial civil expenditure. This was changed in 1893 to one-third of Ireland's revenue or rather more than her present taxation, which is admittedly fourteen millions in excess of her just proportion. Moreover, England was to impose and levy the excise and custom taxes on Ireland, thus drawing about 74 per cent. of the Irish revenue directly into the British Treasury. She also reserved the right to impose and levy a special tax for war expenditure or imperial defence. It was calculated that the Bill of 1893 would leave Ireland less than $3,000,000 to run her government. Of course such a sum would be useless to build up industries, agriculture and commerce, develop educational facilities and meet the numerous requirements of a nation that has been impoverished for generations by governmental neglect and unfair discrimination.

It might be worse than useless. A parliament so lacking in power and resources could not create prosperity; could neither realize Nationalist hopes nor conciliate Orange hostility. If dissatisfaction with its inadequacy should not occasion unseemly wrangles that would provide welcome food for a hostile press, there would in any case be no finality. The whole battle would have to be fought over again, thus prolonging indefinitely the demoralizing consequences of agitation. Mr. Redmond has said that Gladstonian Home Rule would have been disastrous to Ireland, and Mr. Healy found the financial provisions so inadequate and faulty that he refused to vote for the Bill of 1893. An assembly that could not control its own finance would be little more than a toy parliament, more ornamental than useful; and freedom from the wastefulness and favoritism of Castle government would be dearly bought by its heavy imperial tribute.

Mr. Parnell regarded the Bill of 1886 only as an earnest for the future and declined to accept it as final, saying that no man could arrest the march of a nation. The grant of genuine Home Rule to the Boers and the pressure of circumstances in England from within and from without, make present conditions more favorable to Irish autonomy than in the days of Parnell, so favorable that the final settlement he had in view seems now attainable.

The economic and constitutional troubles that have split England in two are deep-rooted and not likely to be speedily solved, and as long as they last no government can afford to disregard the Irish vote in the British electorate and in Parliament, nor, therefore, the imperative condition of its support. Mr. Asquith recognized this when he promised "full self-government," subject to imperial supremacy. It is a roomy phrase capable of covering anything short of separation and the stress of parliamentary necessity might easily extend it to its full capacity. Recent developments promise to bring about, if they have not already brought about, precisely such a condition. "Boer Home Rule" is the formula of Mr. Churchill, the father of Transvaal autonomy; Mr. Lloyd-George has repeated the phrase; the progressive Liberals are not afraid of it and at present the progressives are in the ascendancy. It is a tangible, definite and satisfactory translation of "full self-government" and the Irish Party would do well to make it as familiar as possible.

Like conditions have quickened the intelligence of the Unionist Party in the same direction. The most progressive of their press and publicists have rather suddenly realized that the Irish are really a very conservative people, truly protectionist at heart, opposed to divorce, irreligion, socialism, secularism and anarchy. They are, therefore, the natural ally of the English Conservative and the management of their own affairs, if granted by Unionists, would serve to strengthen such an alliance. Mr. Lilly opened in the January Fortnightly with the thesis that not only is Home Rule the inevitable consequence of government by majorities, but that complete independence is "the consummation coming past escape as the penalty of England's centuries of oppression and remorseless cruelties in Ireland." In the following issue Mr. Iwan Muller, a prominent imperialist, took up the theme in a different vein: Home Rule, instead of a danger, would be a good riddance. Even an Irish republic would be no greater menace to England than Cuba to the United States. Ireland can be watched and the cost would be infinitesimal compared with the annual waste she is now causing of money, time and opportunity for serving imperial purposes. This sweeps away the danger of dismembering the Empire, heretofore the basis of Unionist opposition.

An article in the February Nineteenth Century by Mr. Ellis Parker, the pressman authorized by Mr. Balfour to conduct the Protectionist propaganda, is still more significant. Ireland's grievance, he contends, is mainly economic, due to Liberal Free Trade; however, she can obtain "the fullest measure of political independence" if her politicians only "part company with the Party of destruction and be willing to cooperate with the Unionist Party in a constructive policy." Let them be good Protectionists and Home Rule is their reward; otherwise a decimating Redistribution Bill is in store for them.

The ablest Unionist Dailies, following the lead of the Reviews, are also protesting that the Conservative Codlin is the true friend, not the Radical Short. Lord Northcliffe's Daily Mail has recently found Ireland at one with English conservatism on the fundamental principles of economics, religious education and personal rights. Hence, in return for her help in securing Tariff Reform, why should not England give her "a National Assembly, competent under the Crown to make laws for Ireland, as Canada makes laws for Canada, with a ministry dependent only on a Parliament in Dublin?" The anti-Irish Morning Post gives prominence to correspondence in similar tone. Protestant opposition in Ulster is dismissed as "Orange prejudice now out of date." Half Ulster is converted to Home Rule and they might risk the loss of Belfast to gain Ireland. Disraeli would not suffer an Orange sectarian phantom to bar the union of all true Conservative forces. Thus the Unionist electorate is being gradually prepared for the not unlikely eventuality of a Tory government needing Nationalist support and paying for it in terms of genuine Home Rule.

The prevision of such a possibility has no doubt stiffened the attitude of Mr. Redmond towards the present government, as well it may. It would not be the first time that the Tories experienced sudden conversion, even in the matter of Home Rule. In 1885, after a conference between Lord Carnarvon, then Viceroy of Ireland, and Mr. Parnell, Lord Randolph Churchill drew up a Home Rule scheme on colonial lines far superior to Gladstone's and, in consequence, Mr. Parnell threw the Irish vote in England to the Tories. Unfortunately the Tories were beaten and their measure was still-born. Gladstone committed the Liberals to Home Rule and hence Home Rulers have been since committed more or less to the Liberal Party. But should the Conservatives revive the Carnarvon or Churchill plan, there is every reason why the Irish Party should follow the example of Parnell. The hostility of the Lords, for the present at all events, discounts Liberal promises which may be redeemable only after a protracted constitutional struggle; control of the Upper House enables the Conservatives promptly to redeem their pledges at face value.

A Tory settlement of the question would be in accord with historical precedent. Most instalments of justice to Ireland, notably the County Councils and Wyndham Land Acts, like most English reforms, were passed by Tory governments after Liberal agitation had ripened public opinion. The hostile utterances of Conservative leaders could be as easily adjusted as they have been in similar circumstances before. Balfour is not less dexterous than Wellington or Peel and remembers how Disraeli profited by "dishing the Whigs"—taking credit for the legislative enactment of measures which his party had vigorously opposed till Liberal propaganda had made their passage inevitable.

A speedy settlement of the Irish question seems possible and probable if Ireland's representatives use their opportunity wisely. Tactical differences, which appear trivial beside the vital importance of united action, should not be permitted to divide them at such a crisis. The question they have to consider is no longer Home Rule but the kind of Home Rule that will satisfy. The time seems ripe for the Nationalist Party to define specifically what they mean by Home Rule. An authoritative declaration that they will consider no measure a final settlement which does not give Ireland unfettered control of its own finances, tariff and customs, should serve as a bond of union within the party and strengthen their position outside of it. All this, Lords and Commons have granted to the Boers but yesterday. It has made them loyal. It is debatable whether even this will make Ireland loyal at once, but it is certain that nothing less will make it loyal at any time. Mr. Healy said once: "You can't expect us to be loyal while you are sitting on our heads." Remove the incubus and loyalty will have an opportunity. Racial and religious differences may prevent a complete "union of hearts," but while Ireland is reasonably free to work out her own destiny and the British fleet retains its prestige, there is no likelihood of separation. Ireland's advantages from the imperial connection would be considerable and this, together with such contentment as financial and legislative autonomy has given Canada, would bring about a heart union sufficient for working purposes. Apart from special and selfish interests, Ireland prosperous should be of greater commercial advantage to England as a whole than Ireland impoverished.

The Act constituting the Dominion of Canada commences with the preamble: "Whereas such a union would conduce to the welfare of the provinces and promote the interests of the British Empire." It has so worked out; and there is no reason why like powers should not have like effect in Ireland. There is no sound reason why Ireland should not have as much control of her tariff as Canada and South Africa, nor why it should pay a tribute from its poverty while they pay none from their wealth. Boer Home Rule, without tax or tribute, is logically Ireland's irreducible minimum. Less would make Asquith's "full self-government" a phrase of mocking delusion. It could produce neither prosperity nor loyalty and it would settle nothing. A parliament without adequate powers, granted in a niggingly spirit, would serve mainly as a lever for fresh agitation. Home Rule by instalments means instalments of discontent.

Canada's first instalment of self-government in 1791 was a better measure than Gladstonian Home Rule, but it did not allay discontent nor prevent insurrection. It was the complete autonomy of 1841 that anchored Canadian loyalty and it is at this point that wise im-perialists should start in dealing with Ireland. Full trust in the Irish people and unfettered freedom to develop intellectual capacity, individual prosperity and national wealth, is not only the best way of generating loyalty but the only way of making it worth having when it is needed. Such a consummation can be attained only by vesting in the Irish Parliament complete control of all its financial resources. The first condition for any kind of union of hearts between Ireland and England is separation of purses.

Personalities in Religious Discussion

One of the most widespread fallacies of the times is the commonly accepted law that personalities should be eliminated from discussions on religion. In the days of bitter controversy between sect and sect, unrestrained indulgence in mutual recrimination was, we confess, carried too far, and, perhaps, was to a large extent unnecessary. But now that controversy has narrowed itself down to the single issue of religious belief or unbelief, we hold that the nature and aspect of the warfare have changed completely and that the present reaction against the angry spirit of a previous age has been carried too far. Our kindly tolerance and gentle amenities are virtues that are out of place in certain religious investigations, and, because they are out of place, take on the character of weaknesses.

In no sphere of activity is the gentlemanly fear of discourtesy carried to such uncalled for extremes as in that of our moral and religious life. One of the most striking passages in the "Life of Darwin" is his confession of having lost his early perception of beauty in poetry, music and nature. Such a confession, of course, puts him beyond the possibility of acting or being regarded as a critic of art. Yet he also confesses that he early lost his youthful habit of prayer and that he never thought much of religion or morals in society; and, despite this confession, he has never ceased in certain quarters to be a court of high tribunal in such fundamental religious questions as the existence of a Personal God and His supernatural Providence. The incongruity is striking. If his loss of the artistic sense justifies us in ignoring him as an art critic, why does not the loss of his religious sense demand that he be equally ignored in all his efforts to state conclusions bearing on religion? The one unfits him quite as effectively as the other. The biographical fact illustrates our position as to the place of personalities in religious discussion. They are in the nature of the case not only allowable but absolutely required. Before we can estimate for ourselves or others the strength of any argument about religion or morality we are obliged, disagreeably perhaps, to find out the personal habits, natural and acquired, of him who makes the argument. This personal information is the key to the situation.

This is so sensible a proposition that its very strangeness is a sign of how we are dominated in our thought by the canting formulas of the time. In business matters we defer to a commercial expert; in legal matters to a lawyer; on our health we consult a physician; we rely on specialists of all kinds for information and direction. But in morality and religion the fashion is to call scrupulously conscientious persons prudes and narrow-minded pharisees and to treat the testimony of saints as so much fantastic hallucination. The enlightened arbiters of morality are men and women whose only qualification as such is often merely a trained gift to write smartly. The most reliable judges on questions of religion are often men who have had no religious experience of any kind.

It is an axiom that "moral perception is increased by moral action." The more conscientious a man is, the finer and truer is his moral sense and consequently the better suited is he to decide moral issues. Education and intelligence, of course, will be supposed in such an important function; but it is clear that education and intelligence, compared with high and scrupulous personal character, are of minor importance in determining the rectitude of such decisions. Education and intelligence of the general type are, we venture to say, relied upon entirely too much by us, that is as far as they exclude the fine perception which comes from intimate personal experience in the matter under discussion. Whistler used to claim that no one was a good critic of pictures unless he himself had gone through the laborious stages that precede mastery of technique, and he laughed at the claims of such a writer as Oscar Wilde to be considered a critic of art. It is the same in poetry. Only one who has struggled to acquire ease in the subtle medium of verse can detect the exquisite music of such simple lines as "I know each lane and every alley green, Dingle, or bushy dell, of this wild wood."

And even such a one may not be able to analyze the beauty which he recognizes as a fact. Moreover, he might spend fruitless years in teaching others, even highly educated and intelligent persons, to observe the fact which is so plain to him.

These instances, we think, serve to show how important it is to weigh well the personality and career of a writer who attempts to enlighten us on moral and religious questions. The circumstance which makes a man a popular writer does not in itself prove that he can teach us how to live better. A college professor who has earned a reputation for historical research and critical acumen need not have acquired or developed in the least that delicate perceptive power which can see in all their fulness and relationship the cardinal facts of Christianity. A college president with an illustrious pedagogical career and a faultless academic style may know no more about religion than a native of Matabeleland knows about Milton's poetry.

We, therefore, advocate personalities at the present stage of religious discussion. The conspicuous advocates of religion and morality have been the saints, and we are free to dig and potter among the scraps of personal evidence that have survived their death. We may add, the sensitive literary world has never felt the slightest reluctance to do so whenever it thought fit. Let us now in justice have biographical data of the men and women who attack religion. Are they scrupulously exact in troubling themselves to find out the moral principles of right and wrong in every detail of private life? Are they heroic in following the light after they have discovered it? Do they say their prayers? Why have they stopped saying them? Silly questions! But, if men have no reverent and practical consciousness of God's existence or presence, why talk about Him and expect to be listened to?

A Threatened "Kulturkampf"

In their occurrence, AMERICA has chronicled the incidents marking an experience of the Bishop of Strassburg, which Germania, the leading Catholic journal of the German Empire, did not hesitate to herald as the first evidence of a new Kulturkampf in that country. Happily the gathering storm, which loomed black on the horizon at the beginning of this year, passed away with none of the evil consequences that had been feared. The calm steadfastness of Dr. Fritzen, the Bishop, the unanimity of his clergy in aligning their forces to his support, the unmistakable purpose of press and people alike to make common cause with their spiritual head, must have been reminiscent of the fighting days of the 70's. At any rate, the authorities in Berlin quietly pigeonholed the reports made to them, when Herr Graf von Wedel, Governor-General of Elsass-Lothringen, referred to their cognizance a detailed statement of the controversy which had arisen between his State Secretary and Bishop Fritzen. Diplomacy has its uses.

Through its correspondents AMERICA is enabled to go more fully into the threatened disturbance and a review of the incidents contained in the story will prove interesting to its readers. For years there has existed in the Crown Lands an association of public school teachers, whose purpose apparently is like to that of similar organizations in the United States. The membership is entirely local and largely Catholic and hitherto has had no affiliation with the General Association of State School Teachers of the German Empire. Last fall the question of union with the latter body arose and the Elsass-Lothringen association appeared to favor the project. The proposition, however, had its strong opponents, since the General Association was reputed to be strongly anti-Catholic in its principles. The reputation, it is true, rests upon no declaration of this body's constitution or statutes, yet it has shown and does show leanings directly inimical to the Christian religion. Accepted organs of the General Association of German State Teachers make no attempt to hide their distinctly anti-Christian sentiments. The Allgemeine Deutsche Lehrer Zeitung, the Pädagogische Zeitung, the Bayrische Lehrerzeitung, the Preussische Lehrerzeitung and Dittes Pädagogium, all journals approved by the body, publish unending attacks on the Catholic Church, against Catholic dogmas and the Church hierarchy, and in their zealous advocacy of education without religion they do not hesitate to controvert the fundamental truths of Christian faith. Equally evidencing a like tendency are statements received with applause in the annual meetings of the association and often incorporated into their officially approved reports. Thus in 1906, during the meeting in Munich, a resolution demanding the substitution of purely ethical instruction for religious instruction in the school program was tabled only because deemed inopportune. In the meeting in Dortmund in 1908, Dr. Natorp, chief speaker in a general assembly of the full body, urged "the teachers to lead the German Catholic body in its apostacy from Rome," and in the rising vote of thanks offered to the speaker the assembly heard reiterated the call Dr. Natorp had made "for separation from the false mother of the school," from the influence of the Catholic Church.

No wonder that the Catholic teachers of the Crown Lands hesitated to abandon the independence of their own association to enter upon terms of intimate alliance with the General Association. The attention of the Bishop of Strassburg, Dr. Adolf Fritzen, was called to the movement towards this alliance and he deemed the occasion serious enough for instant action.

Recognizing how dangerous affiliation with a body so clearly anti-Christian in disposition as he deemed the General Association to be might prove to Catholics, the Strassburg bishop, towards the close of last year, addressed to the Catholic school teachers of his jurisdiction a pastoral letter in which he described the characteristic anti-Catholic stand of the association and urged them on strictly Catholic grounds to have naught to do with the movement favoring affiliation. His action, as one sees at once, was that of prudent shepherd warning his flock of a danger facing them. There is no hint in his letter of criticism of the State system of schools, no attempt to interfere with the official management or control of that system; his warning is uttered regarding a private association and is drawn from reasons affecting the conscience of Catholic teachers.

Somehow the bureaucrats of Elsass-Lothringen could not or would not see matters in this light. On January 1 of this year, State Secretary Zorn von Bulach, the brother, by the way, of Dr. Fritzen's auxiliary-bishop, who himself in the development of the case warmly sided with his chief, sent a protest to the bishop against what the Secretary termed his meddling with affairs belonging to the civil competency. The school teachers, so runs the protest, are government servants and, therefore, are to receive directions regarding their duty from the officials under whose control they serve. Full liberty is allowed the supreme shepherd of the dioceses to address his flock on matters that touch their religious life, but, so the protest concludes, details of conduct touching the teachers of the province are to be brought to their attention only through the intermediary of the State officers in charge of the department of instruction.

In a courteous reply to this communication of the State Secretary, Dr. Fritzen denied the charge of meddling in matters out of his competency. He had heard, he explains, that the question of affiliation with the General Association was being agitated by representatives of the teachers of the Crown Lands and as he recognized the tendencies of the former body to be opposed to basic Catholic principles he had simply warned the Catholic teachers against the movement. His warning he deemed entirely proper, since its object was a matter of conscience and he claimed and would exercise at all times the rights of a Catholic bishop to interpret for his Catholic subjects the principles of conduct that should govern their lives. They to whom the warning was directed were, it is true, teachers and therefore servants of the government, but they were men and women first, with duties to God and to Church entirely apart from their relations to the government, and it was in reference to these duties he had spoken to them. Why in such a contingency he should have made his appeal through the bureau of instruction he failed to understand, as he failed, too, to recognize any meddling that had been charged.

The Governor-General took up the controversy on January 9. Writing to the bishop, Graf von Wedel explained why he found it necessary to notice the letters addressed to his State Secretary. Dr. Fritzen's contentions, so he writes, are capable of wider application than the topic at issue between himself and the Secretary suggests. Not merely would they justify the bishop's action in directing a warning to the Catholic teachers, but they would make legitimate a similar policy in regard to public officials in general who chanced to be members of the Catholic Church. This, the Governor-General goes on to affirm, implies a privilege he must deny. A large measure of liberty is allowed to Church authorities in Elsass-Lothringen so long as there is question of purely religious or ecclesiastical concern, but outside these limits he acknowledged no legitimate interference with the officials of the land.

Were this not understood, he continues, there could easily arise conscience difficulties which would seriously disturb Catholic officials in the performance of their duties to the State and in the exercise of their civic rights. Meanwhile the Governor-General saw no reason why the Catholic school teachers of the Crown Lands should not become members of the General Association if they chose to do so. Their action in the matter implied nothing that made them amenable to the Church authorities and Bishop Fritzen's letter to them was certainly contrary to the policy laid down by his predecessor in the office of Governor of the province, which assured to every official of the land the full freedom allowed by law to do as he pleased in matters not touching the duties imposed upon him by his charge.

The Governor-General's note wrought no change in the churchman's view. Courteously, but with no sign of compromise in the stand he had taken, Bishop Fritzen assured Graf von Wedel that he had been guided in his action by no mere personal opinion, but by the dogmatic teaching of the Catholic Church. No fear need arise, however, of conflict between Church and State when the representatives of each were resolved to keep strictly within the sphere of influence proper to them. Mutual consideration and good-will would easily do away with occasional conflict that might threaten and he reminded the Governor-General that the same Church law which bade him, as bishop, warn his people of grievous danger that might threaten their faith, taught him and his people the supreme need of loyal fidelity to their country's laws and their country's rulers.

His eighteen years of active service in the pastoral charge in Strassburg, he continued, were proof enough, were proof needed, of his own conscientious practice of this teaching and the point at issue involved no departure from the norm which he had thus far followed. He was convinced that the tendency of the General Association of the State Teachers was anti-Christian and inimical to the Catholic Church. Affiliation with a body thus tainted could not but prove injurious and dangerous to the Catholic teachers of the Crown Lands and in warning them of this danger he had but done his duty as a Catholic bishop and he had in no way transgressed his powers to interfere in a matter belonging to the governmental control.

To this dignified presentation of the case in controversy the Governor-General made a fairly conciliatory answer. He acknowledged Bishop Fritzen's loyal attitude towards the government and disclaimed any purpose to assume a brief in defense of the General Association of State Teachers, adding, however, that its influence could in no event prove detrimental to the permanency of religious instruction in the State schools of the Crown Lands. Supervision, he claimed, of this detail in the school program was entrusted to the clergy of the province and in case of any attempt to effect a change in its provisions appeal would lie with them to the District Superintendents. His attitude remained unchanged, however, regarding the principle at issue between himself and the bishop and he reiterated the claim that Bishop Fritzen's action had been ultra vires. Warnings addressed to the servants of the State must come only from the heads of bureaus or through them, he concluded, and he would rigidly follow this contention in act should occasion make it necessary for him to do so. Again the Bishop replied in dignified acknowledgment of the letter of the ruler of the province. Whilst he appreciated, he said, the safeguards thrown about the religious training in schools by the existent statutes, he and his people had come to put far more reliance in the Christian life of the teacher and in the religious convictions ruling that life as an assurance of the proper training of their children. For this reason did they make so much of the dispositions and tendencies that marked the associations with which the teachers held affiliation. Meantime he noted the veiled threat contained in the Governor-General's closing words and he had but one answer to make. He had but done his duty in the matter which originally led to the controversy between them and he held fast to his interpretation of principles governing the relations binding him and his people.

As was said in the introduction to this review, Graf von Wedel hurried to Berlin and laid the entire matter before the imperial authorities. No action has as yet followed the appeal, the expected Kulturkampf appears to have died at its birth. Catholics in America will see in the entire story a new and striking illustration of the greater fairness of religious liberty as interpreted in their own land and they will rejoice as well in the assurance the story gives of the enduring quality of that steadfastness in the right which made the German bishops a glory of the Church in the dark days of the 70's.

Halley's Comet

Halley's comet has not brightened up as much as was expected. It is still a faint telescopic object, and is apparently, as well as really, approaching the sun, with which it will be in conjunction on March 25. From that date until May 19 the comet will gradually become visible in the morning sky before sunrise, its greatest distance or elongation to the right or west of the sun occurring about May 8, when it will rise about two hours before the sun. It will then in ten days move with continually increasing speed toward the sun until it passes it on May 18, being probably lost in its rays for a few days before and after that time. It will after that be visible in the evening sky, separating at first very rapidly from the sun and then more and more slowly until the early part of June, when it will approach the sun again and gradually disappear from view, as well on account of its increasing distance from the earth, as also on account of its apparent increasing proximity to the sun.

The comet will be seen at its best a week before and after May 19. The best time of all will be on May 20 and 21, when it will present a magnificent spectacle in the evening sky, and may be visible all day long in full sunlight. Its tail may then be of enormous length, probably reaching two-thirds of the way from the horizon to the zenith.

We expect to pass through its tail on the night of May 18, when its head will be about twelve or fourteen million miles away. Although cyanogen gas, a most deadly poison, has already been detected in its tail by the spectroscope, and we shall be in the tail for about five hours, there is no reason at all to be alarmed, because the rarity of the gas is far beyond the best vacuum we can produce on earth. The earth has once or twice before passed through the tail of a comet, and as the fact was known only by calculation, it was certainly in no way noticeable.

However, Halley's comet may have some surprises in store for us. It may disappoint us completely by not developing a tail at all, as it did for a while at its last return in 1835. W. Pickering calls attention to this fact in the March number of Popular Astronomy, where he quotes from Sir John Herschel's account of it in his "Outlines of Astronomy." The passage is of such interest that it deserves to be given in full, together with some extensions not quoted by Pickering. In the edition of 1849, in No. 568, Herschel says:

"It was not before the 2d of October that the tail began to be developed, and thenceforward increased pretty rapidly, being already four or five degrees long on the 5th. It attained its greatest apparent length (about 20 degrees) on the 15th of October. From that time, though not yet arrived at its perihelion, it decreased with such rapidity, that already on the 29th it was only three degrees, and on November the 5th two and a half degrees in length. There is every reason to believe that before the perihelion, the tail had altogether disappeared as, though it continued to be observed at Pulkowa up to the very day of its perihelion passage, no mention whatever is made of any tail being then seen.

"569. By far the most striking phenomena, however, observed in this part of its career, were those which, commencing simultaneously with the growth of the tail, connected themselves evidently with the production of that appendage and its projection from the head.

"On the 2d of October (the very day of the first observed commencement of the tail) the nucleus which had been faint and small, was observed suddenly to have become much brighter, and to be in the act of throwing out a jet or stream of light from its anterior part, or that turned towards the sun. This ejection after ceasing awhile was resumed, and with much greater apparent violence, on the 8th, and continued, with occasional intermittences, so long as the tail itself continued visible. Both the form of this luminous ejection and the direction in which it issued from the nucleus, meanwhile underwent singular and capricious alterations, the different phases succeeding each other with such rapidity that on no two successive nights were the appearances alike. At one time the emitted jet was single, and confined within narrow limits of divergence from the nucleus.

"At others it presented a fan-shaped or swallow-tailed form, analogous to that of a gas flame issuing from a flattened orifice: while at others again, two, three, or even more jets were darted forth in different directions. . . . The direction of the principal jet was observed meanwhile to oscillate to and fro on either side of a line directed to the sun in the manner of a compass needle when thrown into vibration and oscillating about a mean position, the change of direction being conspicuous even from hour to hour. These jets, though very bright at their point of emanation from the nucleus, faded rapidly away, and became diffused as they expanded into the coma, at the same time curving backwards as streams of steam or smoke would do, if thrown out from narrow orifices, more or less obliquely in opposition to a powerful wind, against which they were unable to make way, and, ultimately yielding to its force so as to be drifted back and confounded in a vaporous train, following the general direction of the current.

"571. After the perihelion passage, the comet was lost sight of for upwards of two months, and at its reappearance (on the 24th of January, 1836) presented itself under quite a different aspect, having in the interval evidently undergone some great physical change which had operated an entire transformation in its appearance. It no longer presented any vestige of tail, but appeared to the naked eye as a hazy star of about the fourth or fifth magnitude, and in powerful telescopes as a small, round, well-defined disc, rather more than two minutes in diameter, surrounded with a nebulous chevelure or coma of much greater extent. Within the disc, and somewhat excentrically situated, a minute but bright nucleus appeared, from which extended towards the posterior edge of the disc (or that remote from the sun) a short, vivid, luminous ray. As the comet receded from the sun, the coma speedily disappeared, as if absorbed into the disc, which on the other hand, increased continually in dimensions, and that with such rapidity that in the week elapsed from January 25th to February 1st (calculating from micro-metrical measures, and from the known distance of the comet from the earth on those days) the actual volume or real solid content of the illuminated space had dilated in the ratio of upwards of 40 to 1. And so it continued to swell out with undiminished rapidity, until from this cause alone it ceased to be visible, the illumination becoming fainter as the magnitude increased, till at length the outline became indistinguishable from simple want of light to trace it."

However, let us hope that Halley's comet at this return will have a long and brilliant tail. Barnard of the Yerkes Observatory, has measured it on February 10 and found it to be about five million miles long, and he says there is great reason to hope that by May 18 there will be plenty of tail to reach to and beyond the earth.

And now a recent cablegram from Kiel, Germany, says that another comet has been sighted by Pidoux at Geneva in Switzerland, very close to Halley's. Is it a part of Halley's, or is it another comet accidentally in the same line of sight?

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The Panama Canal

In five years vessels will be passing from the Atlantic to the Pacific through the Panama Canal. This is the assurance held out to us in view of the present state of work on that vast undertaking.

Columbus sought in vain a strait or channel through which he might push in his heroic endeavor to bring India nearer to the shores of Europe; but hardly was it established that nature had formed no such passage when men began to suggest ways and means for remedying the oversight. Though not first in the order of time, the scheme of Antonio de la Gama, in 1534, was the first that reached the practical stage of actually moving any rock or earth in the furtherance of the project. As the local representative of the Spanish crown he undertook to dredge the Chagres River, but he did not remain long enough on the isthmus to accomplish even that work. It is well that he did not devote more time and greater energy to the enterprise, for, with the primitive means at his disposal it could have ended only in disaster with frightful loss of life among the natives who would have been forced to attempt the impossible task.

In 1698 William Paterson, a Scotchman, collected an enormous sum of money and sailed at the head of a hopeful band of adventurers to establish a colony on the isthmus. The climate destroyed the colonists, who might be passed over in a word if it were not for the efforts of their leader to impress upon King William III the importance of securing the isthmus for a future canal. As the American colonies were then young and feeble, Paterson showed great insight when he averred that if the British Government did not act, the Americans would one day annex the isthmus and later the Pacific Islands, and thus establish a mighty empire. "They will then scour the Indian Ocean and the South Sea," he said, "and they will heap up vast wealth. If God favors them with a knowledge of the arts and sciences, they will spread throughout the world the blessings of civilization, while England, in spite of her glory and her liberties, will be known to the world only in the memory of her past, as is now the fate of Egypt."

Henry Clay was the first great American to speak with authority on the important question of the Canal. As Secretary of State in the cabinet of John Quincy Adams, he gave the opinion of the government when he said, in 1825, that as the canal should be for the benefit of all nations, and not of one exclusively, it should be under the protection of all nations. This long remained the settled policy of the United States, for in the Treaty of 1846 with New Granada, of which the isthmus then formed a part, it was stipulated that the American Government should have the right of passage across the isthmus in any feasible way and that it should be neutral territory, but the ownership and sovereignty of the soil should be guaranteed to New Granada.

The outcome of the Mexican War must have stirred the British to action, for the year 1848, which saw the signing of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo between the United States and Mexico witnessed an aggressive action on the isthmus. The island of Tigre on the Pacific side, and the mouth of the San Juan on the Atlantic coast, were occupied by British marines. James K. Polk, who had been elected on the campaign cry of "Fifty-four Forty or Fight," was then President. The action of the British on the isthmus seemed to be their answer to the unwarranted American claim of 54° 40' as our northern boundary. The Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850, surrendered our Canadian pretensions and reiterated the neutrality of the projected highway.

Clay's position in 1825 was good enough at that stage of American development, but it cost later administrations many a diplomatic somersault to secure the advantage by which he had set so small store. President Grant voiced the general feeling in 1869 in his first annual message when he stated that it was of the greatest political importance to the United States that no European government should own the canal, and eleven years later President Hayes made the declaration still stronger. On June 24, 1881, a circular note to all the powers informed them that the American Government must necessarily reserve to itself "a political control of the canal distinct from administrative or commercial regulation." The next step forward was taken by James G. Blaine, who, as Secretary of State, emphatically declared that the interests of the country could not permit a Panama canal without American fortifications.

The end of the war with Spain, and the tremendous changes that it had involved, called forth from President McKinley in his message of December, 1898, the statement that in the light of recent events the canal had become more necessary, and that the interests of the country demanded its construction by the Federal Government. But the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty was still in the way. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, ratified by the Senate on December 18, 1900, smoothed away the difficulty, or rather, effectually buried it under a mountain of carefully chosen phrases, and left the United States with a free hand.

Although the Nicaragua route had many supporters, a majority of eight votes in the Senate on June 18, 1902, selected the Panama route, subject to a suitable treaty with Colombia. The Hay-Herran Treaty drafted to meet the requirements of the occasion gave Colombia a lump sum of ten million dollars with an annual payment of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The Colombian Senate unanimously rejected the proposed treaty, and demanded twenty million dollars down and an annual payment of four hundred thousand dollars.

This action precipitated the revolution by which Panama separated from Colombia and established itself as an independent nation. The United States, immediately recognizing the new republic, made a more favorable treaty, which, as the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, was ratified in February, 1904. Under the provisions of this treaty the prodigious undertaking has been pushed forward with an army of 40,000 employees.

The effect that the canal will have upon the commerce of the Pacific will increase from year to year. Commodities exist on both sides of the ocean, and a more convenient interchange of them will naturally build up a trade. If wise means be used to restore to the American merchant marine its former prestige, economic results of the most satisfactory nature will result. The importance of the canal in time of war is one of the surest pledges of a continued peace. The prediction of Scotland's adventurous son in 1698 has waited long, but it now seems near realization.

Rivalry in the Imperial Palace, Peking

SHANGHAI, JANUARY 16, 1910.

During the latter days of November and the whole of December last, a quarrel which raged beneath the yellow roof of the Imperial Palace in Peking has stirred and interested the whole Empire. Dissensions and rivalry broke out among the inmates of the Imperial Harem, and were well-nigh wrecking the authority of the Prince Regent, who seems to be no longer master in his own house. To understand thoroughly the matter, it is necessary to go back some fifty years, and sum up briefly a few facts of history. The Emperor Hsienfung died at Jehol, in 1861, and left a secondary consort who is still surviving. Tungchih, his only son of four years by Tsehsi (the famous late deceased Empress Dowager), succeeded him on the throne and reigned only fourteen years. Married in 1872, he died rather mysteriously in 1875, at the early age of nineteen, and left no issue. The young Empress followed him soon afterwards to the tomb. Whether this was due to foul play or excess of grief, has never been historically cleared up. Three concubines survived Tungchih, making so far four Imperial Consorts of departed Emperors.

The late Kuanghsii was chosen in 1875 as successor to Tungchih, but as they were cousins of the same generation, the choice was not in conformity with strict Chinese etiquette, and so the Emperor could not offer ancestral worship at his predecessor's tomb. To be enabled to perform this important act, he should have been chosen from an inferior or later generation. Kuanghsii died in November, 1908, and left among the living the Sungyii Empress and one secondary consort, thus making in all six rivals for rank, influence, and control within the sacred precincts of the Imperial Palace. To correct the ancestral and ritual mistake made in the choice of Kunghsii, the present little Emperor, Hsuan-Tung, has been styled the adopted son of Kuanghsii and also of Tungchih, thus carrying back his descent to the year 1875, though he was in reality born on the 7th of February, 1906. The above historical sketch will help to link the present with the past, and grasp the motives of rivalry that prevail among the six surviving consorts. Though many things must have been kept in the background since the election of the present child emperor, dissensions suddenly broke out on the occasion of the late Empress Dowager's funeral, which took place November 9, 1909. The demise occurred exactly one year ago, but the burial ceremony was delayed in accordance with the custom of the country. The Sungyii Empress, relict of Kuanghsii, the secondary consorts and a few other Court ladies wished to assist at the ceremony, and proceeded separately to the mausoleum some days before the ninth.

It was on the way thither that Tuan-Fang, the now degraded Viceroy of Chihli, had them photographed, a fact which so incensed the Sungyii Empress that she begged the Regent to dismiss him for such unruly behaviour. This eventually took place on the 23d of December last, and was principally due to female influence and the secret power behind the throne. The photographers engaged by the viceroy were at first to be strangled, but the sentence was finally changed to ten years' imprisonment, a punishment considered to be very mild as things go in China.

When the burial ceremony was over, the three consorts of Tungchih remained at the mausoleum, and refused to return unless their claims were settled. These amounted to three: first, the question of rank and title of Imperial Dowager Consorts which they wished to be officially conferred on them; second, an annual allowance of 20,000 taels, which followed as a consequence from their official title; third, the right to control the education of the youthful emperor. Duke Tsai-tseh, Prince Yü-lang and other honored emissaries were sent to plead with them, and with no little trouble succeeded in pacifying them and persuading them to return. Promises of an honorary title and an extra allowance were made but have been only partially fulfilled. The ladies are ranked at Imperial Dowager Consorts to receive 500 taels extra per month for their petty expenses. The boy emperor will be educated by his father and news of his progress will be communicated to his multitudinous adopted mothers at certain stated periods. The Sungyii Empress, relict of Kuanghsii, has also received honors and will henceforth be styled Imperial Empress Dowager. The quarrel has been thus brought to a close, but a sequel is by no means impossible. The old consorts have shown their mettle and succeeded and are still ambitious. The new Empress Dowager is likewise a woman of strong character, wants to control all within the palace and meddle with State affairs. She is said to summon daily to her presence the State Councillors and make inquiries from them on questions of home and foreign policy. The Prince Regent is sorely perplexed and does not know what to do, but his filial piety is compelled to bow to the inevitable. This is a great weakness and constitutes no little danger for the progress of reform and the welfare of the country. Petticoat influence has dominated China during the last half century and it may rule it again.

Recent Events in Japan

SHANGHAI, JANUARY 25, 1910.

The twenty-second Imperial Diet of Japan was opened on January 20. The session will deal principally with the budget, the main features of which are (1) an increase in the civil list of 4,500,000 yen; (2) readjustment of taxation on broad lines; the annual burden of taxation is 600,000,000 yen; (3) a saving of 6,000,000 yen by general economy in Government departments; (4) an increase of 9,000,000 in the salaries of civil and military officials in order to meet the increased cost of living; (5) any surplus to be devoted to wiping out the National Debt, the amount of which is 2,000,000,000 yen. The foreign exports during 1909 amounted to 412,145,000, and the imports to 392,646,000 yen.

Trade is growing wonderfully in Manchuria. The Imperial Maritime Customs report for the year 1909 revenue amounting to 3,000,000 Haikuan taels, an increase of more than 74 per cent. when compared with the returns of the previous year. As greater areas are brought under cultivation, and the immense mineral wealth of the country is exploited, the market will grow more and more important. In all parts of the country, cotton fabrics, flour, canned goods and tobacco are sure to find a ready market. Agricultural instruments are much needed especially at Mukden where a model farm has been recently started.

Japanese merchants intend to open a cigarette factory at Antung (Manchuria) to compete with the business of the British-American Tobacco Company.

The Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs intends to prohibit emigration to the United States and Canada, but encourage it to Manchuria and Korea.

Port Arthur was opened as a commercial port on January 20.

According to the Minister of Education in Japan, virtue is much on the decline in the schools. The present educational system is materialistic and secular, and this accounts for the above falling off. In natural science classes, the students are taught that man is but a high-class brute and that his mind has no existence apart from matter. All these false ideas are subversive alike of religion, morality and those social and domestic virtues which promote the welfare of a nation, especially of one whose military and naval achievements have obtained for her a prominent position in the East. Foreigners still complain of a lack of commercial honesty. Trademarks have been either pirated or skilfully imitated with a view to secure on the market the benefit of others' labors. The late sugar scandals afford a striking example of the low state of public honesty. In this case as many as 23 members of the Imperial Diet were involved and 22 found guilty of corruption. Luckily the Government is making a strong stand against the prevailing weakness, and the Judiciary has shown to the world that it will uphold a high standard of integrity and fulfil its duty.

Current Events in Belgium

LOUVAIN, FEBRUARY 11, 1910.

The bishops this year issued a collective Lenten pastoral on patriotism and loyalty, defending the late king against the attacks made on him, dwelling, among other things, on his Christian marriage and death. It paid a glowing tribute to his patriotism, because of the great things he did for Belgium for its commerce, its industries, its army; and called on the people to leave to God his faults, to recognize his greatness, his moral energy and his colonizing activity. Then going on to define patriotism and showing its need the bishops exhorted each one at his post in society to develop all his forces, especially his moral ones, to see to the good education of his children, to practise all the conjugal duties, to respect authority, and ended with a call to union for the whole Catholic party. The Pastoral called forth some respectfully expressed protests from those among the Catholics who are for complete separation of civil and ecclesiastical interests.

Since this authoritative pronouncement of the bishops in their collective Lenten pastoral there has not been heard a word unfavorable to the Church from the "anticlericals" regarding the marriage and death of the late king. The facts are now well known and contradicted by no one. An interview with the dean of Laeken confirmed the details. During a sick spell, four months before, the thought of death had persistently haunted him, but, recovering, he put off his conversion. Then on the 13th of December, feeling himself sinking rapidly, he called the dean to his bedside. He confessed and received Holy Communion. The same day the Baroness Vaughan received Communion in the parish church; that day at 3 o'clock they were married by the dean. The king was throughout in the best of sentiments and continually asked for prayers—not for his recovery, but for his soul. He confessed and communicated once more before his death. Pope Leo XIII, who, as nuncio at Brussels, knew the dead man well, said of him: "He has the Faith deep down in him. The Congolese babies baptized through his action will surely intercede for him." As we know, their prayers were heard.

The lawsuit on the legal succession of the late king has assumed international proportions. All his fortune was sunk in different companies, of one of which he was president and his doctor the sole other member. The other companies were that of Nieder Fulbach, formed for the beautifying of Brussels; of Cobourg in Germany, the city of his ancestors; the other was for the preservation of his great domain of Cap Ferrat in France. Grave doubts are expressed by many whether the Princess will get anything at all, and this is especially embarrassing for Princess Louise in view of her enormous debts. The king has shown an evident desire to settle the whole matter outside the courts.

Many have liked to see signs of a new régime in some recent events. The first was the choice of his court by the present king. All of the new officials with one exception, in a less influential position, are staunch and fervent Catholics. The choice of the Count de Mérode to the post of Marshal of the Court is especially gratifying to the country, coming as he does, from a family illustrious in the annals of Church and State. Among the different private secretaries are M. de Briey, former private secretary to M. Schollaert, the Premier, and M. J. Ingenbleek, author of a remarkable book on "Imperialism in the United States."

Our Trade with Sweden

STOCKHOLM, FEBRUARY, 1910.

The news that the President of the United States, acceding to the proposal of the customs department, ensures to Sweden, among other countries, the minimum tariff for all her exports, has given lively satisfaction here. "If Sweden had not obtained this place among the most favored nations in the matter of customs duties," writes the Svenska Dagbladet, one of the largest and most influential journals of our country, "Swedish merchandise would have been burdened, on and after March 31, of this year, with an additional 25 per cent. ad valorem duty over and above the minimum tariff, and, for certain important articles, this increase would have produced the same effect as absolute prohibition.

Hopes had been entertained that things would not go so far, and the report adopted by the customs authorities was considered a good sign. A still more significant sign was the decision of the Board of United States General Appraisers that a cargo of wood pulp exported from Gothenburg was free from the supplementary duty. It was precisely because of our forest production that we were threatened with the maximum tariff, the United States Government being inclined to look upon our wood taxes as disguised export duties. Our wood exporters took alarm and strove to obtain that the forestry taxes be so applied that they could not be considered as export duties. Diplomacy has succeeded in an amicable arrangement, or, in other words, we have succeeded in persuading the American authorities that we intend to reorganize the forestry tax so as to apply it to all industrial exploitation of wood and not only to wood destined to be exported.

Those exports from Sweden to the United States that show the most notable increase during the past year are: iron ore and coarse wood-pulp paper, commonly called wrapping paper. It is especially interesting to note the importance acquired by a Swedish product such as brown wrapping paper. This is due to the fact that this kind of Swedish paper, while generally superior in quality and particularly in toughness, is sold at so low a price that it immediately won a place in the American market. Just in this case the application of the maximum tariff would have been altogether prohibitive, making all competition impossible. But the decision so happily arrived at has also a serious importance for the large exports of ore. Since the duty on iron ore entering the United States has been lowered, the American importation thereof has grown rapidly, and we can already notice a steady demand of Swedish ore for the iron works of the eastern States, a demand that amounts to two or three million tons a year.

Furthermore, the trade between Sweden and the United States is growing from year to year, as may be seen from the following figures for three years, taken from official Swedish statistics. The sums are in crowns (a crown is worth about 27 cents).

Swedish imports from the United States: 1905, 41,-450,533; 1906, 60,009,693; 1907, 61,342,528.

Swedish exports to the United States: 1905, 9,867,-260; 1906, 11,658,216; 1907, 13,778,753.

The total trade of Sweden during the same period is shown by the following figures: Swedish imports—1905, 582,084,457; 1906, 644,227,836; 1907, 682,104,613.

Swedish exports—1905, 450,211,733; 1906, 504,284,813; 1907, 524,662,547.

The countries which, during the same period, occupy the most important place as customers and purveyors of Sweden are the following: Imports from Great Britain: 1905, 144,035,143; 1906, 160,723,730; 1907, 178,495,124.

Germany: 1905, 224,364,938; 1906, 234,021,251; 1907, 240,770,905.

Denmark: 1905, 39,768,113; 1906, 42,368,089; 1907, 50,539,515.

Sweden's exports to Great Britain: 1905, 159,398,-772; 1906, 170,960,883; 1907, 179,412,064.

Germany: 1905, 85,206,640; 1906, 96,597,094; 1907, 108,719,268.

Denmark: 1905, 50,120,633; 1906, 55,042,387; 1907, 57,704,881.

Seeing this constant increase of our trade, we cannot help being gratified that the presidential decision warrants the hope that the trade between Sweden and the United States will develop still more for the advantage of both nations.

Songs of a Princess

A posthumous volume of poems, published anonymously, at Munich, during the Christmas holidays, has as its title, "Traum und Leben, Gedichte einer früh Vollendeten" (Dream and Life: Songs of One Who Came to an Early End). They tell the simple and sad life-story of a German lady of royal birth. Much speculation was indulged in by the reviewers as to the identity of the gifted authoress, and those who could have done so did not care to lift the veil self-chosen by the departed. According to recent press reports, however, the mystery seems to have been solved after all: the "früh Vollendete" was Princess Mathilda, daughter of Prince Louis, heir-apparent to the throne of Bavaria, and granddaughter of the aged Prince-Regent Luitpold. Her life was short and, as far as the world was concerned, uneventful. Born in 1877, she was little more than twenty years old when she was married to Prince Louis of Saxe-Coburg, nephew of King Ferdinand of Bulgaria. Two children, Louis and Immaculata, born in 1901 and 1904 respectively, were the fruit of this union, which appears to have been an unhappy one. Her final days the Princess passed on the Riviera, where a wasting disease brought her to an early grave, August 6, 1906.

As a book, "Traum und Leben" deserves notice on its own intrinsic merits, quite apart from its romantic origin. There is nothing of the amateur about these songs, which so often distinguishes the productions of titled poetesses. For beauty of rhythm, depth of thought, and delicacy of sentiment they deserve a place beside the best lyrics of the century. Many of them have the true ring of the Volkslied.

It is an autobiography in verse, the revelation of a beautiful, tender, suffering soul. The authoress lingers fondly, regretfully, over the happy days of her childhood. The flush of health was on her cheek then and "all a summer sunshine was tangled in her hair."

"Auf den heissen Wangen glühten

Mir die Rosen maienwahr,

Und die weissen Kirschenblüten

Flocht ich mir ins dunkle Haar."

But the blight came all too soon, leaving behind it only "vanished happiness—and a frozen heart."

"Das—Glück, das nimmer sie finden will, Die Hoffnung, die sie verlor."

She then sings of a youthful love—the object of which she never attained—of loneliness, of unstilled longing. "What I feel I write down," she says in her diary, "because there is no one to speak to me. So I speak to you alone, my unstilled, restless longing, with which I commune when I watch, when I dream, when I suffer, when I smile."

Her father's love helps her to bear her trials:

"Und was ich auch mag erleben,

Gott hat mir ein Glück gegeben:

Der beste der Väter ist mein!"

Her marriage obliges her to leave her Bavarian home to which she clings with every fibre of her being:

"Will mein die Macht sich nicht erbarmen,

Die meines Schicksals Fäden spinnt?

Lass, Heimat, mich in deinen Armen!

O Heimat, halte fest dein Kind!"

Darkness seems to gather thick about her after leaving her father's house. The notes of her song become sadder until the birth of her first-born causes her to strike more joyous chords: a mother's love and pride and happiness speak out of the lines which commemorate this event. Then disease lays his withering hand upon her. Feverish nights and weary days and forebodings of death are her portion henceforth:

"Ich geh durch den Garten krank und still Und warte, bis Gott mich heimrufen will."

She seeks solace in her sufferings in deeds of mercy:

"Allen möcht ich helfen, allen, allen,

Die da leiden und durch Wüsten wallen,

Möchte ach, um meiner Liebe willen

Alle Schmerzen dieses Lebens stillen!"

But only when she lifts her eyes to the suffering Saviour does her heart find peace—the peace of resignation to the Divine Will:

"Wie du es willst, so soll's geschehen.

Doch, wenn du willst, erhör' mein Flehn!"

She looks on the hand of Death now as a kindly hand that beckoning summons her to a joyful resurrection, and to those who would bewail her early passing she says:

"Nicht weinen! Lass uns froh verstehen,

Dass bald in schönen, reinen Höhen

Ein Glück auf ewig uns vereint!"

St. Patrick's Day

We have been so accustomed to the annual St. Patrick's Day celebration that we seldom reflect on the wonder of it. Fourteen centuries ago an humble missionary died in a little isle, and while the anniversaries of the mightiest pass unremembered, his is honored throughout the earth. During half the intervening period the land he evangelized has had no government of its own to give organized expression to national pride in its apostle; the government that swayed it used all its forces to extirpate his influence, and yet, though its empire kept pace with the setting sun, Patrick's empire extended further. His feast will be celebrated next Thursday where that empire's flag is and where it is not.

The wonder commenced with Patrick's advent to Ireland, 432, and has been growing ever since. One apostle converted a whole nation to a Christianity so vigorous and fruitful that before he died it had an ample and organized native hierarchy and priesthood, and it was studded with monasteries, convents and schools so well equipped that they became at once the teachers and missionaries of Europe. Irish Christianity was like the mushroom in rapidity of growth, like the oak in enduring strength. Prosperity did not weaken it nor persecution by wars or wiles destroy it. It flourished in the sunshine and was more securely rooted by the storm. Liberty and slavery both found and left it strong. Like the nationality with which it was wedded and welded, it never surrendered, for it never knew when it was beaten. A hundred times doomed to death, it was fated not to die. Expatriated by pestilence and want the Irish exiles held to Patrick's spirit when they had lost all else, spread his Faith in their wanderings and, in the great dispersion of '47, coined famine into the glory of God.

St. Patrick's message was spiritual and so is the main significance of his feast. "The Mass," he taught, "is the making of the Body of the Lord. We are fed on the Body and Members of Christ," and "the priest is the dispenser of the mysteries of God." The principal St. Patrick's celebration is in the churches—many of them in many lands dedicated to his name—where Mass is solemnized and the worshipers receive from the dispensers of its mysteries the Body and Members of Christ. Whether in hall or temple the initiative is taken by men of Patrick's Faith and his people's race; the participation of others is a gracious tribute to the influence of both. The chief participants are faithful to St. Patrick's precept: "As ye are children of Christ, be ye children of Rome."

Many propitious circumstances brighten the feast of 1910. The Irish people are regaining ownership of the soil of which loyalty to faith and nationality had deprived them. Their representatives supported by hierarchy, priesthood and people have made their demand for legislative independence the dominant question in the British parliament. The National University, established this year to meet Catholic educational needs, has just affiliated as a constituent college, the National Seminary of Ireland, St. Patrick's College of Maynooth. It is a happy omen, now that the aspirations of centuries seem likely to be realized, that St. Patrick will continue to preside over the newer Ireland as he did over the old.

Marriage and Motherhood

Our attention has been called by "A Catholic Mother" to an unsigned article in the February Ladies' Home Journal, in which an anonymous woman gratuitously unburdens herself in answer to her own question: "Why I have not become a mother." First, she was frail and nervous at the time of her marriage. She seems quite unconscious that it was wrong for her to marry, knowing that she was unfit for her conjugal duties. Second, she could not afford it on an income of $1,500, though she is her own cook, housekeeper, milliner, etc., and quite a paragon all round. Her husband, who is also perfect, has now $5,000 income and her own literary efforts bring in a tidy sum, but this does not change her resolution. Third, her mother is improvident and her father is growing gray at fifty-five, a phenomenon produced by his inability to provide for the future of her four younger sisters, so she, heroic creature, moved by love, not duty, must relieve him.

When she says she has no conception of duty, she has explained the whole matter, though this never occurs to her as a solution of her problem. She is not the heroine she would have her readers think. She is a pleasure-loving creature trying to cover criminal dereliction of duty with a sentimental mantle. The primal object of marriage is the propagation of the race; it was for this purpose the attractions of the marital state were implanted by nature; and those who, while enjoying the pleasures, exclude the primal purpose, sin against the laws of nature and the commands of God. It is a sin that was called "an evil thing in Israel." A married woman who is a party to such a practice can hardly be called a wife; she is using an honorable title as a cloak for vice, and is intentionally, or actually, a murderess. The approval of her husband is no justification, it merely makes him a sharer in her guilt. Ill health might be a reason for suspension or severance of conjugal relations, but can neither justify nor palliate the frustration of effects intended by nature and commanded by God. Nor will unnatural indulgence benefit health. Outraged nature has a habit of exacting terrible vengeance, physically, morally and mentally.

This woman says that her younger sisters, the objects of her altruism, will be her children. In spite of all her efforts she has other children! Souls unborn are crying out against her for depriving them of the lives that were their right. A wife's duty is determined not by the laws of the state she has left but by the laws of the state she has adopted. Once a wife her law is the law of marriage, and no other ties may interfere with it. There are many Catholic ladies who have sacrificed marriage prospects for the sake of brothers, sisters and parents; and there are many wives and husbands who, while faithful to their marital duties, and to the children who are the happy fruit of that fidelity, manage to extend, often from slender means, effectual assistance to their kin.

Inability to afford children is the flimsiest pretext for self-indulgence; usually those have fewest whose means are most abundant. "A Catholic Mother" well says: "I could point out more than one family of five, six and seven children for whose maintenance and education there was no provision made before birth, but who have, nevertheless, grown up strong, healthy men and women, received education as anyone can in New York, where this writer resides, and have taken their places in the world. One family of six children whose parents toiled to keep nourishment and life in them for ten or twelve years, has given a priest, a prominent lawyer, a school principal and an engineer, all better men because they have striven." We have known many such who are so busy performing the duties of their state that they have no time to write to ladies' journals proclaiming their heroism. The lady who obtrudes her reasons for not becoming a mother is not the heroic altruist she deems herself; nor are they called ladies who make private vice a public boast.

Poor Buddha!

The Chinese have given indubitable proof of their awakening, and seem likely to outstrip their neighbors of Japan in running the way of modern ideas. Some time ago they sent an army fully equipped according to western ideas into Thibet to enforce their authority. They met with reverses at first, but triumphed in the end, and now they are resolved to maintain permanent garrison in the holy city of Lhasa, to keep the Dalai Lama in order. At their approach, however, he ran away and escaped into India and the Chinese Government is somewhat disconcerted. Nevertheless, it has proved equal to the occasion and has proclaimed his deposition saying, that he is "one of the worst Lamas ever known." This is hard upon Buddha, whose reincarnation he is. Steps are being taken to elect his successor. Buddha must, therefore, "decarnate" himself as regards the fugitive and choose a more reputable subject for his new incarnation.

Undermining the French Army

It has long been a favorite prophecy with the Socialists that the first step toward the general acceptance of their system by the world will be the refusal of the army to fire on an insurgent mob. Instead of obeying their officers they will go over to the enemy and hail them as brothers. This will, say the Socialist prophets, be the beginning of the end of our present system of government. The first country to prepare the way for such a terrible dereliction of duty seems to be France. Le Temps, which is not at all inclined to pose as an alarmist, lifts up its moderate and peace-loving voice to say that the discussion of the war budget in the French Chambers has once more directed attention to a situation that is very serious.

"The number of refractory soldiers," it says in an editorial of February 25, "is becoming so considerable that people are asking if the military spirit, formerly so deep-rooted in our country, is not only undergoing an eclipse, but if it is not actually in a fair way to disappear." And then Le Temps quotes the statistics given by M. Paul Bignon in the course of the debate. In 1898 there were 1,904 deserters and 4,708 insubordinates; in 1907, 3,407 deserters and 10,639 insubordinates. The progression of insubordinates during the twelvemonth is particularly noticeable in recent years: in 1903, 2,551; 1904, 3,538; 1905, 4,493; 1906, 4,932. Finally, according to figures quoted by a senator, M. Charles Humbert, there was on December 31, last, a total of 57,000 insubordinates and 13,000 deserters, that is to say, there were seventy thousand men withdrawn from military service.

So much for the appalling and incontrovertible fact. But when the smug, opportunist journal tries to account for it and suggest a remedy, it becomes lamentably weak. It attributes the decadence of the true military spirit to the entrance into barrack life of young men accustomed to comfortable homes. Formerly, these comfort-loving youths could find substitutes or escape military service in some other way; now, they are all obliged to at least two years of military service. So they complain of the rigid discipline, bring pressure to bear on the government through influential public opinion, and thus provoke a humanitarian reaction against the old-time severity. The deputies, afraid to lose their popularity, consent to the increasing rarity of punishments, and are even thinking of depriving lieutenants and non-commissioned officers of the right of punishment.

Small wonder, then, that many young soldiers have come to look upon insubordination and desertion as peccadilloes entailing no loss of honor or reputation. Moreover, every now and then an amnesty is proclaimed which wipes out all past penalties, even if as yet unpaid. The military tribunals themselves, carried away by the humanitarian current, pass sentences that are too lenient, suspend sentences, and sometimes acquit those who are clearly guilty. What remedy does Le Temps propose? "In ordinary times people do not worry about the decline of the military spirit; but when a great crisis comes, then people become aware, but too late, of the disastrous effects of this decline. It is the duty of every minister of war to meditate the foregoing profoundly wise remark of General Boguslausky, and to strive to stop this continuous disintegration of our military forces." Only this, and nothing more.

And yet there is just one little clause in Le Temps' article which suggests to practical minds the only efficacious remedy, although it is treated by that journal as a secondary factor. "The insubordinate, the deserter—he at least who has not been contaminated by the anti-militarist doctrines, for we must not forget this category, etc." No, indeed, we cannot forget this all-important category. So long as newspapers and pamphleteers are allowed openly to attack patriotism and the army which upholds it, so long will military service become more and more unpopular, so long will the socialist chimera of a universal brotherhood without home or fatherland delude the rising generation whose mental and moral stamina is undermined by false social doctrines.

A Certain Rich Woman

A "society woman" in New York has lately been seized by a very passion of philanthropy. Her heart flows over with pity for the little daughters of the poor. The papers describe her as being wealthy and holding her husband in a convenient state of uninterfering, though reluctant, subjection. We have taken a curious interest in the methods selected by her to satisfy the gnawing pain in her heart for the hopeless condition of the East Side.

The methods at her disposal, since she revels in affluence, were almost unlimited. She could have fed the hungry, visited the sick, clothed the naked and, indeed, performed any or all the corporal works of mercy on a scale that would have made her a most distinguished Lady Bountiful among the crowded purlieus east of the Bowery. But this was not to be. Such a course would have cost trouble and expense and much disagreeable experience; and, besides, it would have to be done in the dark, without lime-light or herald; and not to let the left hand know what the right hand does is, as everyone is aware, not the modern way at all. We no longer think in units, but in masses. Our enthusiasm for "uplift" transcends the individual and embraces entire classes of people. "Social redemption" is the battle cry of the new religion, which has supplanted the ancient searching and calling for the single lost sheep, even to the apparent neglect of the ninety-nine that were safe.

And so this "society woman" gave expression to the yearnings of her gentle soul by addressing socialistic young working girls at public meetings. She told them they were just as good as their richer sisters. How surprised they must have been at the news! She, moreover, had two of the poor girls array themselves in her own finery and introduced them as her friends to guests at her home without divulging their social position. The young things looked happy and preened their borrowed plumes and achieved quite a success. And the "society woman" was proud over her little experiment. What matter if her guests felt tricked or her family ashamed, she had proved what no one ever suspected, that some poor girls are just as good and as clever as their rich sisters.

We do not know what structure of argument the "society woman" is going to build upon this important sociological discovery. But we are inclined to be of the opinion that, whatever be the value of such doings in the processes of social redemption, they contribute in the meantime to increased dissatisfaction among the poor by sophistically convincing them of the injustice of unequal possession. They contribute other things also, as, for instance, exceedingly disastrous ambitions, false hopes, and unworthy longings to good girls who cannot help being a bit foolish and who need, as a defense against their folly, wiser mentors than the "society woman" who exploits them. But the "society woman" has achieved the cheap publicity of cheap newspapers and we are willing to wager that her picture in the morning paper will more than make up to her for any disappointment to the cravings of her ardent spirit for social redemption.

Oriental Civilization

A graphic description of the rapid transformation of Formosa under Japanese sovereignty is given in the Manila, P. I., Cabled News-American of January 8. The story is told by Walter A. Smith, a prominent business man of Iloilo, returning from a visit to Formosa, where he had been examining the methods of sugar raising with a view to their application to a prospective sugar enterprise of his own in the island of Negros. Incidentally the narrative of Mr. Smith throws light on Japanese methods of stamping out rebellion among the natives. The advance agent of American industry says:

"Savage tribes of marauders, resembling in ferocious opposition to civilization the Moro bandits of the Philippines, gave the Japanese Government of Formosa much concern during the first few years of Japanese occupation. But the Formosan ladrones were driven to bay relentlessly and the situation is now well in hand. The remnants of the natives, some 80,000 in number, are herded together in large corrals, surrounded by wire fences charged with electricity, and guarded by large detachment of police. The recalcitrants, who would have stopped the wheels of progress, are being pitilessly cut down by its cold, keen-edged blades. In the corrals, the sexes are separated. It means the extinction of the natives."

"Japan," says the Cablenews-American, "is not actuated by any of the sentiment, or sentimentalism, as one looks at it, of Western peoples. She is modern in her implements, but ancient in her spirit. She is imbued with the idea of the old Hebrew who firmly believed that the Lord had told him to drive all of the Canaanites out of their land in order that the tribes might increase."

Assuming the story to be true, we are astounded that, so far as we know, no notice has been taken of the wretched plight of these natives by the European or American press. The atrocities in the Congo, real or supposititious, they deemed it a sacred duty to denounce as a foul blot on civilization and a reproach to Christian nations, who would calmly look on and, without a word of condemnation, see such outrages perpetrated. Our own American Government was moved to interfere and to enter its protest with the government it deemed responsible.

What is the secret of the strange inconsistency? Are we righteous only when our own interests are at stake, or are we strong only when the offending nation is weak? The inhumanity of the reconcentrados, or concentration camps in Cuba, and the excessive cruelty with which this war measure was carried out, were largely responsible for our interference with Spain's conduct of the war in that island, though we uttered no word of condemnation or protest when England employed like methods in her humiliating conflict with the Boers.

Among the blessings which Japanese occupation has brought to Formosa Mr. Smith mentions "the fine tea trade in the hands of the Americans." Self-interest may paralyze the moral instincts of a nation as well as of individuals. We should regret to learn that the great American Government, which sets in motion the whole machinery of her administration to examine into the death of even two American soldiers of fortune in Nicaragua, is prevented by self-interest in protesting, if not in the cause of Christianity, then in the cause of humanity, against the adoption of barbarous methods of extermination in Formosa. Comparative nearness of Formosa to our Philippine possessions would furnish a reason for displaying special interest, though no land and no race of men should be considered distant enough to withhold from them our sympathy and our efficacious aid.

LITERATURE

The Up Grade. By WILDER GOODWIN. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. The Dweller on the Borderland. By the MARQUISE CLARA LANZA. Philadelphia: John Jos. McVey.

Superficially, there is a striking resemblance between these two novels. Both unfold a tale of how a man may rise on his dead self to higher things. But the vast difference in the two books comes from the authors' point of view. Mr. Wilder Goodwin's "The Up Grade" seems totally wanting in any view of happiness above and beyond what this world offers. The story is pleasing, rolls along easily on a well-defined and a somewhat worn path, will fill in pleasantly an idle hour, and harm no one.

The Marquise Clara Lanza has written an exceptionally original book—original in treatment, original in motif. As to the treatment, she begins in a strain of hard realism and ends with taking us up to the heights of mysticism. The realism, in the beginning, is almost ugly. The agnostic hero and his Protestant wife with their baby have just arrived in New York from a Massachusetts country town. While the wife is ignorant and hopelessly common, the husband is intellectual, out of sympathy with her and morose. As for the baby, failing to interest the parents and the author, it is eminently uninteresting to the reader. With the progress of the story the breach between husband and wife continues to widen. He gets a position as a private tutor, wins the love of a fine woman—almost the only agreeable character in the story, and wins it while carefully concealing the fact from her that he is a married man. His conduct towards his wife, taken in conjunction with this concealment, forces one to write him down a cad. His aged father's death is the first check in his downward path. Then his wife dies. With her death the grim realism of the book ceases; and the pent-up mysticism of the author has full play. The reader will naturally expect that his wife's death, thus clearing the ground, the story will end in the usual way. But it does not.

With his conversion to the Faith, there is no suggestion of orange blossoms and joy bells. No; his gift of faith carries with it a call to the priesthood, and the religious life. It is so common for novelists to send their heroes to the cloister because of love disappointments, that it is refreshing when we find an author able to depart from the beaten path, and to tell a story, which, singularly enough, has the element of surprise, for the very reason that it is true to life. We trust that the author will please the reading public with many more Catholic stories, and that she will inject into her graphic realism a little more of the sunshine.

American Prose Masters. By W. C. BROWNELL. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Mr. Brownell's "American Prose Masters" is a volume of appreciations marked alike by scholarliness of tone and considerable distinction of style. His literary criticism, steadied by a clear sense of literary values, is discriminating and just; it is in the weightier issues of ethical and philosophical import, as in his discussion of Emerson's mental attitude, that one may decline to follow him. Mr. Brownell's outlook is the conventionally broad and unimpeded one of the secular-minded, who have learned to escape the embarrassments of doctrinal prepossessions. Of Emerson he writes with enthusiasm, at the same time testifying frankly to his riot of inconsistencies, which he condones on the ground that it is too much to expect the oracular to be consistent. The great master, so we are assured by the critic, was "Plato Redivivus in his assumption that conceptions as such justify and prove themselves; or rather that all kinds of proof are impertinent." "Logic indeed," we are further told, "has been superstitiously overvalued;" in proof of which statement there is the instance of "Aristotle's despotic rule during the Middle Ages, still persisting in both Roman and Protestant ecclesiasticism." Logic, no doubt, is often a vain and unprofitable thing; but the alternative, for one who casts it aside on the assumption that his every intuition must be true, is intellectual caprice. Intellectual caprice is therefore the formula that best epitomizes Emerson's mental life. But the trait of Emerson that renders his influence a particularly baneful one is his intellectual pride. No more complete antithesis to that captivity of the understanding, of which the apostle speaks as the characteristic of faith, can be imagined than the mental temper of a man whose ideal was the self-sufficiency and practical infallibility of the individual mind. "We owe him," says Mr. Brownell, "our intellectual emancipation," a statement which means of course that Emersonianism was chief solvent, at least in America, in the process that transformed the dogmatic Protestantism of yesterday into the liberal and rationalizing Protestantism of to-day.

Masters of the English Novel. A Study of Principles and Personalities. By RICHARD BURTON. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

Mr. Burton's book is an attempt to sketch the broad lines of development of English fiction from Richardson and Fielding to Hardy and Meredith. Principles and personalities enter into its scope, and both are discussed with vigor and insight. The ethical measurements which the author applies to the body of classic fiction are the conventional ones of the day; hence it results that Balzac makes for morality and George Eliot remains "splendidly wholesome and inspiring in her fiction." Mr. Burton's plea on the whole is for the decencies in the storyteller's art; but his concessions to the realistic land him in strange places. "There is no danger," he assures us, "of any novelist, any painter of life, doing harm if he but give us the whole." But surely art in this matter can learn a lesson from life. To "see life whole," to come into contact with its moralities and sanctities, no less than with its grossness, is no guarantee that one will not make the grossness the object of his choice. The situation in literature is a parallel one. It is not easy to see that grossness plus spirituality, when spread before us on the pages of a novel, must issue in a zero quantity of moral detriment. Rather are the chances perilously great that the appeal to the baser will override the appeal to the nobler instincts of the reader with moral defilement for the net result.

When shall we have a guide to fiction that will measure the content of our classic novels in terms of Catholic faith and morals?

Literature in the Elementary School. By PORTER LANDER MACCLINTOCK, A.M. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

The whole philosophy of this book may be summed up in the words of the author and stated as a maxim: Remember that literature is art; it must be taught as art, and the result should be an artistic one. The second chapter, which explains the services that literature will render to pupils, is perhaps the best chapter. The vigorous protest against subordinating literature to other branches of school life, under the plea of correlation, makes good reading, and is a manifestation of the steady and wide-spread reaction against the domination of facts in the school room. The author is opposed to mere information as the end of teaching, and objects to making literature an instrument for early specialization in various sciences. However, there is here perhaps some exaggeration. To push the principle so far as to be reluctant to use literature as a means of teaching reading and writing is dangerous and illogical.

The insistence upon stories for nearly one half of the book is another point that might arouse some misgivings. In protesting against giving to children what is not suited to their capacity, can we not go too far? Why is the author so brief on history and biography and so full on fairy stories? The pupils must sing, must dance, must play, but we do not see it stated very prominently that they must work. They must be interested, of course, but must they be passive? Must we go so far in our protest against making school an immediate preparation for a profession as to make it not even a remote one? The author would disclaim such a purpose; yet if we judge by the space allotted to the subjects, these objectionable consequences are at least suggested. Some of the chapters were given as lectures. That fact may account for certain expressions which look exaggerated in cold type. Making this slight allowance for enthusiasm in a good cause, we can heartily recommend this work to all teachers in elementary schools and to the libraries of normal schools.

Christian Pedagogy, or; The Instruction and Moral Training of Youth. By REV. P. A. HALPIN, Professor of Mental Philosophy, St. Angela's College, New Rochelle, N. Y. New York: Joseph F. Wagner.

The most important duty of the parent is the education of the child. That the character of the education should be Christian arises from the nature of the obligations which Christianity imposes on all who profess it. In the performance of this duty of educating the child, the State may and ordinarily does come to the parents' assistance, but if the State be not Christian, or if acting on the principles of toleration is either openly hostile to Christianity as in France or merely neutral as in this country, the state system of education will be not only imperfect but necessarily injurious. Christian parents then, as well as those who as teachers assume for the time being the offices or duties of parents should, if they would act conscientiously and intelligently, possess a knowledge of child nature, of the Christian principles to be imparted and the methods which may be best employed. A good parent and a good teacher will make the child a study, and will welcome any assistance in the proper fulfilment of this important task. Father Halpin's "Christian Pedagogy" is the best practical guide for parent and for teacher that we know of. The writer does not aim at a scientific examination of the faculties of the human mind, nor does he set forth in detail the fundamental truths of psychology and ethics underlying the proper and efficient training of the child. Nevertheless, all these questions are taken up in logical sequence and treated in a popular and attractive style, making this contribution to the science of pedagogy far more useful to the average teacher than pages of "technical definition" or "scientific description."

The book is practical rather than theoretical. It gives the ripened experience of one whose life has been spent in classroom and lecture-hall. Every chapter is freighted with wisdom. There are essays apparently dissociated though logically connected on the school, the human soul, the human body, senses, brain, imagination, mental operations, memory and will, just so many luminous explanations of the subjects treated, sparkling with epigram and overflowing with maxims and suggestions which indicate at once a mastery of style and a mastery of subject. Here, then, is a manual which should be a Vade-mecum for every Christian teacher. The need to-day of such a handbook is the more imperative as false theories of education are everywhere accepted and even applied. The result is the existing confusion in methods of education and irreparable harm to the young. For this precious book every teacher and every child, too, owes Father Halpin a debt of gratitude.

The Renaissance of Hebrew Literature (1743-1885). By NAHUM SLOUSCHZ. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

Dr. Nahum Slouschz wrote this book as his thesis for his Doctor's degree at the University of Paris. The work has been admirably done into English by Henrietta Szold. To those who imagine that Hebrew has no place as a literary vehicle among the modern languages, these pages will bring welcome and novel information. They will also be one more proof of the wonderful vitality of the Hebrew race.

In a dozen chapters the author brings us from Moses Hayyim Luzzatto down to Smolenskin and the writers of our own days, such as Rabinovitz Sternberg and Berditchewsky. Moses Hayyim Luzzatto, an Italian Jew of the eighteenth century, is the inaugurator of the Hebrew Renaissance. Moses Mendelssohn and the "Biurists" or Commentators, Wessely and the "Meassefim Collectors," Solomon Jehudah Rappaport, "the Father of the science of Judaism," Krochmal, the herald of the modern mission of the Jewish people, have a large share in this revival.

Dr. Slouschz has carefully followed the development of Modern Hebrew Literature. The novelty of the subject and the interest with which we view everything that belongs to the Jew will appeal to the reader. Everybody will approve the effort to restore the noble language of Isaiah and David. For such an undertaking we have nothing but sympathy. We say, however, with regret, that the work done from Luzzatto to Smolenskin does not seem to be of a very high order. The spirit of this Hebrew Renaissance is too often coldly and gloomily rationalistic. With rare exceptions the point of view is not of the noblest. The deeper spiritual note is absent. Earth and the things of earth seem to be the great prizes to be fought for and won.

Abraham Lincoln. By EDWARD A. SUMNER. New York: The Tandy-Thomas Co. Cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

This address, first delivered in 1902 and now placed before the general public, gives a kaleidoscopic view of the whole career of the great President. The perusal of it will show less gifted speakers how to thrill their hearers with thoughts put strongly.

Reviews and Magazines

The "History of a Japanese Feudal Lord" is only one of the many good things in Catholic Missions for March. The action of Marquis Kuroda, vice-president of the Japanese House of Lords, in celebrating the ter-centenary of the death of an illustrious ancestor who was renowned as a soldier and a counsellor, had nothing unusual about it in that land, where ancestors are remembered with filial regard; but our interest quickens when we learn that the famous ancestor commemorated recently with all pagan pomp was a devout convert to the Faith, who made good use of his influence and wealth in the cause of religion. In celebrating the glories of the illustrious Japanese Catholic, his pagan descendant would have no religious observances by the clergy of the Church in whose communion his ancestor had died. At a time when Japan promised to be wholly Catholic, persecution, exile and death came in a whirlwind of fury, destroying the missions and almost blotting the Catholic name out of existence in the island empire. America, Africa and Oceania contribute their share of mission news towards completing a highly interesting number.

The Atlantic contains, in its March number, an article on "Our Superiority in Religion," by the librarian of Princeton University. It is striking to the Catholic reader for several plain truths about the Catholic religion—such rare things have plain truths on that subject become in magazines the most respectable whenever they open their columns to writers on religious topics. Three characteristic axioms of "modern religion" are discussed, namely, that in former times the selfish individual thought exclusively of his own soul, that the common good was ignored, and that ancient sanctity lacked refinement and the sense of humor. That such dizzy and distorted views of history should pass as current truths among educated people is a matter for the psychologist rather than the historian. Professor Richardson finds it an easy task to explode these bubbles of the "modern religionist."

Mr. Charles W. Wallace contributes the leading and most important paper in the March Harper's Monthly. He has been engaged for several years in unearthing information about Shakespeare, and the account of his latest discovery and the closely reasoned deductions drawn therefrom have the enthralling quality of a Sherlock Holmes narrative. The writer thus sums up the importance of his recent discovery: "These documents give us a new signature of Shakespeare, permit us for the first time to hear him talk and see him act, locate his London residence, reveal the life and environment in which he lived, enable us better to understand his knowledge of foreign places, peoples and languages, suggest in a new way his religious toleration, associate him in London life with a collaborating dramatist, make us know him as unmythical, living, real; confirm him as being the author of the plays that bear his name, and make us feel in it all his personal presence." Perhaps there is a slight exaggeration in one or two of these items; but one must acknowledge that the writer has succeeded in adding very materially to our meagre fund of biographical data concerning the greatest of our poets.

LIBRARY NEWS AND NOTES

The use which Catholics make and may make of public libraries has been discussed of late in a number of newspapers and periodicals. Interest in the subject has been awakened and is increasing. With a view to obtaining first-hand information upon this important matter, AMERICA has addressed a series of inquiries to all of the larger and to many of the smaller public libraries of the United States from Maine to California. Returns have been received from most of the librarians addressed. In our next issue we shall begin a series of articles in which Catholic use of public libraries, its opportunity and limitations, and to what extent it is desired and desirable, will be considered in all its bearings. No similar study of the situation has hitherto been made, and the results cannot fail to interest all who have given attention to the question from whatever point of view.

"The Old Librarian's Almanack," a literary hoax first exposed in AMERICA of February 12, is calling forth considerable comment in the periodicals. Notices reviewing the little book appeared in the Nation, New York Saturday Times, Dial, Outlook, Public Libraries and Publishers' Weekly, and all of these reviewers took it to be a serious publication. The Library Journal of February has an article giving copious extracts from the "Almanack" and throwing out some rather dubious hints regarding its genuineness. The reviewer, Miss Helen E. Haines, a few days later contributes to the Nation another review of the "Almanack," written now in a tone of conviction, and even turning the tables upon the author by correcting one of his statements about the fictitious author, Jared Bean. The real author of the "Almanack," Mr. Edmund L. Pearson, duly acknowledged the receipt of a marked copy of AMERICA by the following letter:

"Editor of Library News and Notes, AMERICA.

"Sir:—I have read your comments on 'The Old Librarian's Almanack' contained in the marked copy sent me of AMERICA for February 12. Toward the end you say: 'But what, may be asked, ever possessed Mr. Pearson, or the editors of the series, or all three of them, to play this practical joke upon their literary colleagues?'"

"An answer to your inquiry occurs in your own article, where you set forth at length that it was no practical joke at all, but a very transparent sham. Although, as you kindly say, 'the supposed frontispiece is pretty well done,' you expose so unerringly its anachronisms and fallacies, you show so readily how simple a matter it was to unmask Jared Bean, that I cannot help feeling that you are unnecessarily anxious for our 'literary colleagues.' So much (as you say) for the facsimile title.

"At the end of your article you remark that it will be an interesting spectacle to see how the editors will free themselves of the charge that they have deceived the public. As no such charge has been preferred, so far as I know, and as, indeed, your article seems to be the first to scent the possibility of such charges, the matter is thrown into the realm of hypothetical questions. If the charge is made, I fancy that the editors will say, first, that the author promises to label all his future books with the utmost clearness.

"And second, I think they will offer, with perfect willingness, to return the money of any purchaser who feels aggrieved, provided that the purchaser will send back his copy of 'The Old Librarian's Almanack.' EDMUND L. PEARSON.

"George Washington's Birthday,
"Newburyport, Mass."

Mr. Pearson seems to take his exposure serenely enough and, indeed, he has had no reason to complain of lack of zest on the part of the reviewers, who have quoted his antique maxims on library economy by the page. We think, however, that he treats the matter of misrepresentation somewhat too lightly. Not that there is anything unusual or blameworthy about a literary fiction composed under the garb of truth. Such jeux d'esprit are common enough in literature. But "The Old Librarian's Almanack" is not, as we think it should have been, an independent book; it is a volume of a series: The bearing which this circumstance has upon the matter of misrepresentation is this:

Preceding or simultaneously with the publication of "The Old Librarian's Almanack," a circular was sent out by the editors of "The Library Series," Mr. John Cotton Dana and Henry W. Kent, in which six works were announced as forming the forthcoming series. The first of them is the "Almanack;" the second is "a sketch of a pathetic figure in early colonial days, the Rev. John Sharpe, English chaplain at Fort Anne, New York City, with an account of his proposal to establish a public library in that city in 1713." Another number is a translation of a French tract on "The Hoax Concerning the Burning of the Alexandrian Library;" the fifth is a bibliography of early books on libraries, and the sixth a scholarly treatise on early libraries, originally written by Karl Dziatko, a well-known librarian.

These are all of them serious and apparently professional publications, quite in place in "The Librarian's Series." The third publication, which we have not yet named, is "The Librarian: Selections from the Articles which have appeared in the Librarian's Department of the Boston Evening Transcript, written by Edmund L. Pearson." This item may, indeed, prove to be a work of another character. Bibliographical data are given under each title, and "The Old Librarian's Almanack" is thus described in the circular:

"1. 'The Old Librarian's Almanack.' A Reprint of a Curious Old Pamphlet, Published in New Haven, Connecticut, in 1773. But two copies of the pamphlet are known to exist and no previous reprints have been made. It presents, somewhat in the style of 'Poor Richard' or the 'Old Farmer's Almanac,' the opinions and counsel of the librarian and book lover of 140 years ago. It is of interest to the librarian to-day for its striking contrast with modern ideas of library administration. 32 pages, with reproduction of the title page of the original."

This description is certainly misleading, as it was intended to be. It has no place, in our opinion, outside of the pages of the book itself, where it is allowable as part of the plan of an author to render a work of fiction more interesting by giving it verisimilitude.

EDUCATION

The criticism which Richard Crane, in his much-talked-of book, makes of higher and college training is no doubt exaggerated, but his sharp attack is not entirely froth. Like most enthusiasts, Mr. Crane has some basis of fact to support an ill-advised generalizing. Education is coming to-day to be looked upon as artificial, unsubstantial and purposeless, largely because of the experience of busy men of the world in their dealings with young men fresh from High School or College. Too commonly many of the results achieved in school days must be overcome in great part before the boy or man is capable of undertaking the rudimentary activities of our social and commercial life. It is, mayhap, this experience which has induced the multi-millionaire critic to unwisely condemn offhand the entire system of higher intellectual training. Men, we are told, are looking ahead with apprehension to the ability of the coming generation to maintain the commercial, industrial and productive eminence won by past generations of Americans. And their criticism, while not always just, has one merit at least.

School men are beginning to appreciate the truth of the old-time conservatism in its judgment of present-day educational methods. Long ago the warning was uttered against over-specialization in lower and secondary schools, and yet the tendency in this direction grew apace until present-day elementary and high school programs often remind one of university schedules of study. Educational progress is not to be likened to material development. The passing of years of human activity can scarcely be thought of without a resultant and filled-up measure of change for the better in the material and physical order, but in the spiritual and intellectual domain man had better be content with less marked mutations. In the intellectual order, while there is an ever constant advance in the spread of knowledge, one is put to it to discover a similar progress in methods of imparting knowledge.

To-day, as always, the ideal result of education is a moral man of many-sided interests, and we cannot bring ourselves to accept as true the modern notions of means best adapted to this end. Specialization in many fields of effort may result in greater efficiency, but it inevitably produces narrowness of mental capacity, and it is precisely this narrowness of capacity which makes it difficult for the youth trained in many modern schools to coordinate his work with the work of others so as to win a fair success in the sphere of life in which he will find himself eventually. If our modern leaders will but remember that the true aim of high school and college education is the harmonious development of all the faculties, the careful training of mind and heart, and the formation of character rather than the actual imparting of knowledge and the specific equipment for a limited sphere of action, we shall hear less complaint of the crude unpreparedness of those who go out of college to face the reality of the busy world.

An autograph letter of Cardinal Merry del Val, addressed to Bishop Canevin and expressing the Holy Father's gratification at the very satisfactory development that is shown to have taken place during the last six years in the school work of the Diocese of Pittsburg, is the best of imprimaturs for the Report of the School Board (1909) of that diocese recently issued by the Rev. Thomas Devlin, Superintendent of Parish Schools. The document gives a well-arranged summary of statistics conveying the usual information one wishes to have at hand, and it must have been a pleasure to record the excellent conditions that have followed the efforts of the diocesan school authorities to promote Christian education in parish schools. About one of every seven children in the diocese, more than one of every five in Allegheny County, and more than one of every four in the city of Pittsburg, the report tells us, enjoyed the great blessing of Christian training in these schools. One wonders whether the citizens of that great industrial district appreciate what this record imports, even apart from the consideration of the priceless benefit to a city resting in a thoroughly religious training of the young. To note a merely material advantage, the actual saving through the parish schools for the school year ending June, 1908, was $902,849.95 to the taxpayers of the city, $1,362,568.05 to those of the city and county, and $1,516,514.85 to the taxpayers of the counties within the limits of the Catholic Diocese of Pittsburg. The computation is based on the year's outlay for each pupil attending the schools of this jurisdiction as reported by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction. What an argument it affords in proof of the unfair taxation of Catholics for school purposes! It is gratifying to note that a systematic grading of classes and a uniform program of studies, as urged in the annual meetings of the Catholic Educational Association, are being strictly insisted upon in the schools of the diocese.

The reference to the physical defects, disease and malnutrition as the sufficient reason of the backwardness of many school children which City Superintendent W. H. Maxwell introduced into his report, recently presented to the New York City Board of Education, has aroused a tempest in other departments of the municipal service. New York's Bureau of Municipal Research goes so far as to claim that facts known to be untrustworthy, and other facts admitted to be untypical, are used by the City Superintendent as a basis of attack on the Department of Health, as well as of conclusions bound to mislead educators and to inconvenience and punish parents who need only to be informed. In a statement which works injury to the 700,000 pupils of the city, it is asserted, Mr. Maxwell has found a way to cover up a waste of millions of dollars due to a sweatshop system of teaching—overwork, poor ventilation, unsuitable courses of study, inefficient instruction, bad supervision and poor methods and policies. Outsiders may not care to enter into the merits of an upheaval resulting in the circle of city officialdom, but it may not be amiss to call attention to a feature of the quarrel that throws much light on the possibilities facing the paternalistic plans of many educational leaders to-day. If the ordinary duty of parents to provide home care for their children is to be supplanted by school meals and school physicians and school nurses provided by the Board of Education, we shall speedily have, as we have in this instance, a pretty picture of the peace and harmonious relations that must ensue among civic authorities in the development of Socialistic dreams.

The project, first favored and carried into effect by New York and Philadelphia, whereby pension funds for teachers were established, has had a remarkable growth, until it now prevails in practically all of the cities of the country. In the beginning the money necessary to support these funds was provided exclusively by a tax on their salaries voluntarily paid by the teachers themselves. Later the funds were subsidized by appropriations by the cities; New York, for example, gives 5 per cent of its excise tax to this end, the amount annually netted being $300,000. The amount of pension to the individual teachers varies; and in some cities the rate for all teachers is uniform regardless of the salary received at the time of retirement, in others the annuity is in proportion to the salary received. Besides the appropriation made by the cities, teachers are now ordinarily required to contribute annually to the upkeep of the fund. The amount of this voluntarily accepted assessment varies again in different cities,—some impose a certain percentage of the yearly salary, others make a fixed charge independent of the salary actually received by the teacher.

The Senate of the National University of Ireland convened February 24, Archbishop Walsh presiding, and approved the recommendation of the Governing Body of University College, Dublin, that St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, should be recognized as a College of the University. The Maynooth students will be admitted to the B. A. degree without attendance at any other college, on courses similar to those of the University and on examinations conducted in Maynooth with the cooperation of extern examiners appointed by the University Senate. The applications for affiliation of St. Mary's Dominican College and Loretto College, Dublin, both female institutions, are still under consideration. The Royal University program continues for 1910, and the question of compulsory Irish is still in abeyance. Steps are being taken to extend the buildings of the old University.

Montreal is to have a public library, built and operated without government or municipal assistance. The Sulpician Fathers announce that they will begin next summer, in St. Denis Street, Montreal, between Ontario and Emery Streets, the construction of a large fireproof library, provided with the most recent improvements and capable of containing two hundred thousand volumes. There will be general reading rooms for different classes of readers and special rooms for research. The land on which the library is to be built has a frontage of one hundred feet and a depth of one hundred and sixty. It is hoped that the building will be opened for public use in the autumn of 1911.

SOCIOLOGY

The Report of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in Chicago, for 1910, is an interesting document. During the past year it has disbursed $16,243. About half of this was spent upon food; a little over a thousand dollars on shoes and clothing, and nearly double that amount on fuel. When it is remembered that this charity is dispensed personally by business men during their moments of leisure, it will be realized that the figures represent a large amount of personal charity. The various committee reports disclose the activity of the Society in hospital and mission work, and in collecting and supplying Catholic literature to the inmates of public institutions. The manner in which the Society correlates its work with other Catholic purposes is illustrated by the following statement in one of the conference reports: "We consider it of prime importance in all cases that the children of the families aided attend the parish schools." The St. Vincent de Paul Society is one of the greatest expressions of modern philanthropic endeavor of the best and sanest type, and the most natural outlet of Catholic lay enterprise in the field of charity and religious apostolate.

The State Charities Aid Association's Committee on the Prevention of Tuberculosis will hold a conference in Albany, March 18 and 19, to start the movement: "No uncared-for tuberculous in 1915." President Taft and Governor Hughes will speak. Since the Association began its campaign against the disease in 1907, 125 cities and villages have been visited by exhibitions, 1,500,000 pieces of literature have been distributed, and 400 meetings have been held with an attendance of 250,000. On October 1, 1907, the State had only 164 beds for patients; now it has just double that number. Outside New York City there was not a single county hospital and only one city hospital; now there are 8 of each. Then there were but 2 free dispensaries and 2 localities providing special relief; now there are 13 of the former and 8 of the latter besides 6 camps, 29 visiting nurses and 60 special committees working in the State outside the city. The conference will demand a hospital for every county, at least one visiting nurse for every city and village, a free dispensary in every town of 5,000 people, the reporting of every living case and its adequate care, and the disinfection of every room that has been occupied by a patient.

Archbishop O'Connell of Boston announces that he is about to inaugurate a series of meetings at which the social question, from a Catholic standpoint, will be studied, with the intention of opening the eyes of working men to the dangers now so prevalent, of pernicious principles in the field of social science. They will begin after Easter, when, on four consecutive Sunday afternoons, meetings will be held simultaneously in four centres of the city, and the audiences addressed by priests and laymen who have made a serious study of their subject. The greatest success has attended the series of nine similar addresses that Archbishop Farley has arranged for every Wednesday evening, here in New York, under the direction of the Rev. W. B. Martin, in the hall of Cathedral College, as part of the work of the Institute of Scientific Study.

At the annual meeting of the Father Mathew Total Abstinence Association, in Father Mathew Hall, Dublin, the Lord Mayor presiding, Mr. Mooney, J.P., the Secretary, reported extraordinary progress in the temperance movement through the year. The united action of the Hierarchy had made it almost universal in the west, and effective provision was made for its permanence. The "catch-my-pal" movement had made great headway among the Protestants of the North, and St. Patrick's Crusade was spreading rapidly in every part of Ireland. The Lord Mayor's temperance banquet in the Mansion House on St. Patrick's Day had set a salutary example. The effects of the movement were noticeable everywhere in the domestic, social and national life of Ireland. Steps were taken towards the closing of all licensed houses on St. Patrick's Day.

During January 50,242 immigrants entered the country. The Poles and the Italians each numbered over 7,000, and there were 5,000 Hebrews. Of English, 2,123 came in; of Scotch, 901, and there were only 747 Irish. During the six months ended with January the number of English, Scotch and Irish immigrants respectively were 27,376, 10,969, 17,349.

The Census Bureau states that a large part of the population is possessed with the idea that to answer the questions of the enumerators correctly will bring about an increase of taxation, and that by giving information concerning their property the people may expose themselves to many annoyances. The Bureau asks all persons of influence to help in getting rid of these ideas. Everybody engaged in the Census is sworn to secrecy, and the penalty of violating this oath is serious enough to make one reflect.

Councilor Michael Doyle, the new Lord Mayor of Dublin, said in his inauguration speech that the city had spent during the year $600,000 on the purchase of sites of houses for the poor. The enactment of the Housing Bill, which the city had now before Parliament, would enable them to develop the work and renovate the slum areas more economically. By improved sewerage conditions they had reduced the high death rate to normal. Reports circulated abroad against the City Council were slanderous. Its members acted without fee or personal advantage, and, unlike some public bodies of Great Britain, none of them ever stood in the dock for conspiracy for their own aggrandizement or to the detriment of the ratepayers. He stood for economy and retrenchment.

ECONOMICS.

At the meeting of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company in which it was resolved to issue bonds to pay for the new steamers to be built to connect at Buenos Aires with the Trans-Andean Railway, the chairman pointed out that the great cost of ships on account of size, power and furnishing, made this method of paying for them necessary. Their ships would, he said, be of very moderate size as this is reckoned to-day, yet they would cost £350,000 each. A few years ago first-class ships came to about £100,000 and could be paid for out of reserved profits. These ships will have to earn at least £20,000 a year above all expenses before a penny of their profits can be given to shareholders.

Lord Pirrie, the Belfast ship-builder, by his acquisition of the Alfred Jones shipping interests, now controls 245 ocean steamships, with an authorized capital of $100,000,000. He is a director in the International Mercantile Marine, including the Dominion, American, Red Star and White Star lines, in the African Steamship and Leyland Companies, the Union Castle Company and many others. Lord Pirrie commenced as an ordinary worker with the Harland and Wolff Company, Belfast. He is a Home Ruler in politics and takes an active interest in the development of Irish industries.

The London money market seems to have gone wild over rubber companies. Every day new prospectuses are brought out and investors think they will make their fortunes, just as in the Kaffir days they thought to do so in South African mines.

In January, 1909, the food imported into the United States was valued at 103 million dollars; the exported food was worth 156 million dollars. In January, 1910, the imports were 133 million dollars, and the exports, 144 million dollars.

SCIENCE

Comet A 1910, which appeared so suddenly in our western skies after sunset during the latter part of January, is causing considerable trouble to computers. At least four orbits have been proposed, and not one of them represents all of the comet's positions correctly. The cause of the discrepancy was the difficulty of measuring its position with sufficient accuracy in the twilight far away from visible stars and low down in the sky in the haze and unknown refraction. Photographs also were difficult to obtain for the same reason. The spectroscope showed bright bands, especially the third cyanogen band with bright sodium lines.

At Omaha the tail was seen to be fully thirty degrees in length, that is one-third the distance from the horizon to the zenith. At other places it was traced to certainly forty degrees, or possibly fifty or more, being lost in the zodiacal light, and scarcely distinguishable from it. The tail was considerably curved. The comet had come up to perihelion from behind the sun, says Popular Astronomy for March, swept around swiftly at about one-tenth of our distance from the sun, and is now going almost straight away from us, while our motion is carrying it behind the sun again. By the time we get around to the other side of our orbit it will be so far away from us that it will be only a telescope object, if it is visible at all.

The discovery of this great comet shows that even common laboring men may take a hand in finding such bodies. R. T. A. Innes, director of the Transvaal Observatory, writes under date of January 17 to the Astronomische Nachrichten, No 4387:

"On the 15th inst., the Leader newspaper of Johannesburg informed me by telephone that they had received a telegram from the railway stationmaster at Kopjes (Orange Free State) as follows:

"'Halley's Comet was seen by Foreman Bourke, Driver Tricker and Guard Marais at 4h. 45m. rising in front of sun. It was visible for about twenty minutes.' Warned by this we kept watch on the next morning (Sunday), but it was cloudy. This morning was also very cloudy, but there was a break just above the place of sunrise. At 5h. 29m. Standard Time, the comet was seen independently by Mr. W. M. Worsell and myself, but by the former a few seconds earlier.

"At the earliest opportunity we informed the South African observatories by telegraph and sent you the cablegram announcing the discovery. Later we secured circle positions with the 9-inch refractor checked by observing Altair, . . . upon which we sent the second cablegram.

"If the railway officials at Kopjes were the first to see this comet (which they thought was Halley's), will you please put the fact on record."

The editor of the Astronomische Nachrichten, in the same number, gives a new ephemeris of the comet, and says that in the beginning of November, more than two months before it was first sighted, it had been in a most favorable position for discovery without being detected.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The non-magnetic cruiser Carnegie, sent out by the Carnegie Institute of Washington, to make a magnetic survey of the Atlantic Ocean, has just returned. The survey included the whole of Long Island Sound and the Atlantic Ocean to the English coast, as well as the waters near Madeira and Bermuda. Commander W. T. Peters, in charge of the expedition, states that its reports will, in all likelihood, bring about considerable modification of marine magnetic charts.

Dr. Marage, the eminent French physiologist, has succeeded in artificially producing notes of every frequency from the larynx of a cadaver. The underlying principle of his method is the one which was discovered as far back as 1786, by Galvani, namely, that the muscles contract when subjected to the slightest electrical influence. In order to produce different sounds it is found that different muscles need energizing. Dr. Marage has perfected a method by means of which he is able to photograph the muscles when energized, and so he is able to ascertain, by comparison, which muscles produce notes of different pitch.

Dr. C. Sowers, who was sent out by the Carnegie Institute of Washington to gather magnetic observations, has returned after a journey of 4,000 miles through unexplored China and Chinese Turkestan. It is stated that much valuable information was obtained, which will shortly be published in the report of the Institute.

Dr. Vaughan Cornish recently communicated to the Royal Geographical Society his estimates of the dimensions of ocean waves. With a heavy gale blowing these reach a height of 42 feet in any position not less than 600 nautical miles from the windward shore. In his report he exonerates of any exaggeration sea captains who have reported waves of from 80 to 100 feet in height, by stating that they reported the altitude of large waves of broken water flying aft from the impact of the steamer's bow on a head sea.

It has been estimated that the Great Black Pitch Lake of Trinidad yields annually 80,000 to 90,000 tons of asphaltum.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Rev. John E. Burke, Director-General of the Catholic Board of Mission Work Among the Colored People, has resolved to raise annually the sum of one hundred thousand dollars for the conversion and education of the colored people, with the aid of every Catholic young man and woman in the United States.

"I want to give the young men and the young women an opportunity," he says, "of showing their seniors what they can do in an emergency. I have pledged myself to raise a fund of one hundred thousand dollars every year that I shall remain in this office, because I have heard the cry of a people in need of spiritual and intellectual light. The fund is to be contributed apart from the usual donations to this work which come from our collections in church and the annual appeal made by the American hierarchy. Of course, the heads of families may contribute to this fund, but I expect that it will come from the young men and women who are working in the stores, the mills, the mines, the innumerable offices, and various professions. Catholic College or University students are included in my appeal, because they must realize the benefits of a condition that gives them an opportunity to enjoy the Catholic educational advantages denied their less fortunate, though colored, brethren. I shall try to make the young contributor realize that he is an associate laborer with me in this field, in which the Church is determined to labor more than ever." The office of this mission is at No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Four new dioceses have been created in the Philippines: Zamboanga, Tuguegarao, Lipa, and the Islands of Samar and Leyte. An Apostolic Prefecture has been established for the Island of Pelavan.

To fill the vacant see of Nueva Cáceres, the Rev. Dr. John B. MacGinley, of Philadelphia, has been appointed Bishop, the third priest from Philadelphia to preside over a diocese in the Philippines, Bishops Dougherty and Carroll being the others. Dr. MacGinley was born in the County Donegal, Ireland, and after making his collegiate studies in his native land, went to the American College, Rome, for his theology as a subject for the Diocese of Philadelphia. He was ordained there in 1895, and coming to Philadelphia, after several years in parish work, joined the faculty at the Overbrook Seminary. In 1903 he was one of the little band of priests from the Seminary who volunteered to go to the Philippines with Bishop Dougherty to help to reorganize the Diocese of Nueva Segovia. He spent two years there as Rector of the Seminary and then returned to Philadelphia, where he has been working since as assistant to his uncle, the Rev. James P. Sinnott, Rector of the Church of St. Charles Borromeo. Two of his brothers are priests: the Rev. Dr. Leo P. MacGinley, Secretary of the Apostolic Delegation, Washington, and the Rev. James C. MacGinley, Senior Dean of Maynooth College. Three of his aunts were nuns.

It is announced from Rome that the Very Rev. Dr. Patrick R. Heffron, Rector of the Diocesan Seminary of St. Paul, Minn., has been appointed Bishop of the Diocese of Winona in succession to the late Bishop Cotter. The Bishop-elect was born in New York City, in 1860.

A new diocese, Regina, and a new Vicariate Apostolic, Keewatin, both suffragan to the Province of St. Boniface, have been created in Canada.

Right Rev. Bishop O'Donaghue, the new Bishop of Louisville, Ky., and former auxiliary of Indianapolis, will take possession of his see on March 30.

The centenary of the birth of Cardinal McCloskey occurs on March 20, not on March 10, as many current notices have put it. He was consecrated Bishop Coadjutor of New York on March 10, 1844, and born on March 20, 1810, hence the probable confusion of dates. Archbishop Farley has decided to postpone the commemoration of the centenary until the fall, when it is hoped that the long-desired ceremony of the consecration of St. Patrick's Cathedral, the building of which his Eminence completed, will take place. The two events will then be properly celebrated at some date following closely upon the ending of the Montreal Eucharistic Congress. It is hoped to thus secure for the New York ceremony the added prestige of the presence of the foreign Cardinals and prelates who have been invited to attend the Montreal Congress.

PERSONAL

Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Professor of Psychology and Director of the Psychological Laboratory of Harvard University, has been nominated to the Exchange Professorship in the University of Berlin. The appointment is well received in German circles, and Professor Münsterberg's course, to be given during the year 1910-1911, will add much, it is thought, to the growing popularity of the exchange system introduced between Germany and the United States some years ago. Professor G. F. Moore, Exchange Professor during the past year, will return to his Harvard post at once. As representative of the German Universities in Harvard next year

Professor Friedlander, well known in the United States, has been named. His course will take up the subject of Musical Art and Musicians.

Dr. Maurice Francis Egan, United States Minister to Denmark, has been awarded the Latere Medal, which Notre Dame University bestows every year on some distinguished Catholic. Dr. Egan returned to Denmark on March 3. He will meet ex-President Roosevelt in Berlin and journey with him to Norway, when Mr. Roosevelt goes to receive the Nobel prize.

Monsignor M. M. Hassett, D.D., Rector of St. Patrick's cathedral, has been appointed Vicar-General of the Harrisburg Diocese to succeed Monsignor Gilbert M. Benton, who died recently. Last November Dr. Hassett was raised to the dignity of Domestic Prelate by His Holiness Pius X.

It is announced that George Cabot Ward is to be appointed Secretary of the Commission which will represent the United States at the Argentine Exposition in Buenos Aires. Mr. Ward has resigned as Secretary of Porto Rico, the resignation to take effect April 1. The Argentine Commission will be headed by Henry White, former Ambassador to France.

Mrs. Morris K. Jessup has presented the American Museum of Natural Arts with three huge meteors which Commander Peary brought with him from some of his trips in quest of the North Pole. It is stated that these were obtained by the donor from Mrs. Peary for a consideration of $50,000.

Before his departure from St. Louis for his post, Richard C. Kerens, the newly-appointed ambassador to Austria, presented to Rev. P. J. Dunne, Director of the Newsboys' Home of that city, a check for $20,000. The money shall go towards the purchase of a farm to serve as an outing place for the newsboys.

The London Common Council has adopted a resolution conferring the honorary freedom of the city on Theodore Roosevelt in recognition of "the distinguished manner in which he filled the office of President of the United States, and for the eminent service which he rendered the cause of civilization and the promotion of amicable relations between foreign nations."

A press cable from Rome states that the Pope has appointed Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli Legate to the Eucharistic Congress which will be held at Montreal in September. Cardinal Vannutelli will take this opportunity to make a tour of Canada and a large part of the United States.

OBITUARY

Rev. Dr. Peter J. McCullagh, Pastor of St. Mary's Church, Lancaster, Pa., died on March 1, aged fifty-eight years. He was born in the County Tyrone, Ireland, and emigrated to Philadelphia before his majority. He was ordained priest in 1875, and then spent two years of study in Rome. In 1881 he was appointed to St. Mary's.

Rev. Edward O'Reilly, Pastor of St. John's Church, South Waverly, Pa., died on February 24, aged fifty years. He was the last of four brothers, all priests, to pass away. Their uncle was the late Rev. John V. O'Reilly, one of the pioneer priests of northern Pennsylvania.

Very Rev. Dean Patrick A. Walsh, for more than twenty-seven years Rector of the Church of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, Astoria, L. I., died on February 26. Born in Ireland sixty years ago, he was ordained in Waterford in 1873, and came to Brooklyn immediately after.

The Rev. Francis P. Coyle died in Philadelphia on February 27. He was born in St. Michael's parish in Philadelphia, in 1860, and was ordained to the priesthood by Archbishop Ryan in 1887. For more than twenty years Father Coyle labored as assistant at the Church of St. Thomas Aquinas.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

A. V. W., Waldwick, N. J.—Who was "T. H.," a convert who wrote a remarkable book on prayers for the dead, and published the same in the year 1600?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I think I can in part answer the question of your correspondent, A. V. W., which appears in your issue of March 5.

Early in the seventeenth century there was published a work bearing the following title:

"The First Motive of T. H. Master of Arts and Lately Minister, to suspect the Integrity of his Religion: which was detection of Falsehood in Humfrey D. Field & other learned Protestants, touching the question of Purgatory, & prayer for the Dead. 1609."

Doubtless this is the work sought. A copy of this clever and well arranged book is to be found in the library of the Union Theological Seminary in this city, among a very wonderful collection known as the "McAlpin Donation," consisting of Protestant and Catholic books, sermons and tracts to the number of 10,000 or more titles, published just before, during and subsequent to the so-called Reformation. In this library there are many books which are unique, most of them very rare, and all of them of the greatest value to all who are studying the Tudor and Stuart periods of English history. By the way, in this collection there are a number of works of the celebrated Jesuit, Robert Parsons.

The T. H. of "The First Motive" is probably one Theophilus Huggons, a sometime minister of the Established Church, but ultimately a fervent Catholic.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"A Son of the People," The New Theatre.—If the title of this play were "A Son of the Peepul," it would more appropriately fit its contents and theme. How it ever managed to get into the repertoire of "The New Theatre" can be accounted for only on the supposition that the management was asleep. It is fundamentally absurd and consistently ridiculous from beginning to end. Mock-heroic on the level of opera bouffe best describes it. Its time is that of the French Revolution, and its gist is that one man substitutes himself for another who has been condemned to be shot.

A young nobleman, a returned refugee, has just been married to a young woman of his own class. Immediately after the wedding the house is surrounded by the troops of the Republic, and he is captured. He is to be executed in the morning. The bride succeeds in infatuating one of the Republican officers, a son of the people, in command, and promises him anything he wishes if he will permit the bridegroom, who is delineated as an arrant coward, hysterically frightened at the approach of death, to escape.

The son of the people accepts the bargain; exchanges costumes with the dreadfully frightened aristocrat, takes the latter's place, and with the utmost complacency awaits death in the morning for the price agreed upon. The bride at first rebels at the terms of her own bargain, but disgusted at the cowardly flight of her husband, as well as struck with admiration for the heroic substitute, she suddenly realizes that she loves this "son of the people."

When morning approaches she points out a way of escape by a secret passage, but he grandiloquently refuses to flee and is in consequence grandiloquently shot. The element of eroticism in "The Son of the People" is simply disgusting, and would condemn it outright with people who have an iota of self respect. Its utter ridiculousness, however, damns it hopelessly.

"Everyman," Garden Theatre.—This play is being given on Friday afternoons by the Ben Greet Players, and is appropriate for the Lenten season. It is a fifteenth century morality play, originally in Dutch, and is in fact a homily on Death.

Death summons Everyman and he is not prepared. But Death grants no stay. Everyman must come when he calls. In vain does Everyman seek assistance from his relatives and friends. They cannot and will not accompany him on the dreadful journey. He must tread the way alone. He summons Wealth, Love and Power to succor him, but they are impotent. He calls upon his Good Deeds to aid him, but Good Deeds lies prostrate and cannot even rise to her feet, so weak is she from sheer lack of exercise. Penance alone comes to his assistance at that dread hour, and after she has shriven him Grace alone goes down with him into the tomb.

"Everyman" is presented by the Ben Greet Company as it was wont to be played in the time of its original production, with the scenic surroundings and costuming of the fifteenth century. Crude as these may seem to a modern audience, the dramatic effect is profound and convincing.

Miss Irwin's performance of Everyman is most satisfactory, though she lacks the remarkable elocutionary power of Miss Matheson, who originally took the part in this country several years ago. It is a most trying characterization, as Everyman is on the stage throughout the entire performance, which takes some two hours without intermission.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

WHAT DARWIN WROTE ABOUT.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been very much interested in Father Graham's letter on Darwinism in your issue of February 26th. Father Graham thinks that the expression "it is indeed of preservation and not of origins that Darwin has anything to say" is too general and could easily be taken to imply that origins were not a subject of his thoughts and theories. It seems to me that there is only one person, and that Darwin himself, who had the right to decide what Darwin wrote about. The secondary title of his book, "The Origin of Species," was "The Preservation of Favored Races in the Struggle for Life." The term "The Origin of Species" was a source of so much misunderstanding that he afterwards expressed regret that he had not called his book by the second title alone. He did not call it "The Origin of Species" but, and this is extremely important, "The Origin of Species by Natural Selection." Over and over again in his letters written shortly after the publication of the book he insists that his theory of "Natural Selection" is not a theory of origins, but of preservation.

On October 11, 1859, he wrote to Charles Lyell, the geologist (the letter may be found in "The Life and Letters," New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1898, Vol. II, page 9), "Natural selection acts exclusively by preserving successive slight useful modifications." On June 5, 1860, he wrote to J. B. Hooker, "I have never hinted that natural selection is the efficient cause . . . the very term selection implies something, that is, variation or difference to be selected." Disciples and critics have always insisted on Darwin as talking origins. Lamarck at the beginning of the nineteenth century talked origins by environment, by effort, by desires. Darwin was constantly insisting that his work should not be confused with Lamarck's, and he even went so far as to talk of Lamarck's work as quite trivial. It is rather interesting to realize that the great defection from Darwinism among the zoologists has come among followers of Lamarck, who call themselves Neo-Lamarckians.

Herbert Spencer had emphasized survivals, and his phrase "the survival of the fittest" is very often in the mouths of Darwin's disciples. Darwin, however, preferred the milder set of words, "the preservation of favored races." His theory is entirely negative. It is really a question not so much of preservation with him as of the removal of the unfit, or as he would doubtless have preferred to put it, the elimination of the less favored races. Living things come into existence, according to Darwin, in great variety because of the principle of variation. He assumes the existence of this, and the beings it brings into life. Natural selection comes in merely to keep certain favored beings in existence, and these are species as we now know them. That is the theory of the origin of species. My dear old Professor Cope used to say: "Who cares about the survival of the fittest? What we want to know is the origin of the fittest." Hence he was a Neo-Lamarckian, not a Darwinian. Even "The Descent of Man," if Father Graham will read it again, will be found not to treat of origins but of the preservation of various races which came into existence through the principle of variation, which Darwin assumes but does not attempt to explain, and then were selected until now we can trace, as he thinks, a line of descent for man.

If Darwin himself were read more, and not his commentators, it would be much easier to understand why a distinguished German authority spoke not long ago of his hypothesis "as crude and superficial," and added that had it not been crude and superficial it never would have attained the popularity it did.

"SECULARIZING" CHURCH PROPERTY IN FRANCE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Not so long since, the New York Sun, in its usual New Year's resumé of things in general, referred to the "secularization" of French Church property—blessings on the man who thought up that mollifying word! Why do people persist in using such coarse and vulgar words as "robbery" and "murder," and the like, when suave and calm near-synonyms would almost do as well? And how much nicer and agreeable it is that the Sun and other papers, in referring to the momentous transaction, do not only refrain from using vulgar if accurate words, but omit to refer to the disappointment the people in France must have experienced in the carefully cultivated hope that the "secularized" property would afford a fund for old age pensions and even help in reducing taxation.

Zealous "friends of the people" assured them that the two hundred million dollars worth of Church property would, if taken from its unworthy and unpatriotic owners and restored to its rightful owners, the people, bring back to la belle France the Golden Age—the stern fact turning out to be, however, that property torn from its proper owners and suitable uses degenerates into little better than junk, and must be sold at junk rates. Any burglar who ever converted gold and silver loot into bullion could testify how some splendid article of gold or silver became, as bullion, only half or third as valuable, and even then had to be sold at low rates, because of the difficulty of disposing of "secularized" goods. The French "secularizers" could many a tale unfold of the extraordinary shrinkages in value they witnessed and caused, like the swimmer who grasps a shimmering jelly-fish, and finds he has a repulsive morsel to gaze on when the beautiful creature is detached from its normal place.

It was a cause of wonder to me that the Sun, usually so keen and apt to use an illustration, did not refer to the pitiable result of the "secularization" of two hundred millions. 'Twas a good, round sum, containing the potentiality of many an old age pension, etc., but, torn from its surroundings, it dwindled away to but a fraction of itself, and the expense of the official liquidators in the "secularizing" actually consumed all but some six hundred thousand dollars. This sum has been turned into the treasury of the proud Republique Française, and bids fair to be eaten up by other "secularizers."

Can anyone doubt what would be the result in this country if the Government should actually undertake to "secularize" corporation property, beginning with that of railroads? Not a few "friends of the people" have suggested that the property of wicked corporations should be taken by the Government. What else was the famous, or rather infamous, $29,000,000 fine but an indication of what practical men, bent on "reform," would do if they had a chance? And suppose some other practical reformer could "secularize" the billions of railroad property, suppose he could induce the people to sanction this by appealing to their cupidity, their wishes for old age pensions and present freedom from taxation, would he and his precious crew get billions or merely some parcels of junk and streaks of rust; and would the people, deluded into a dream of Aladdin-like wealth, not lose such little as they may previously have had? Perhaps the Sun could return to the "secularizing" done under our eyes in France, and draw, in its usual excellent fashion, a picture of the absolutely certain results of confiscations, whether called "secularizations" or otherwise. Less than a month ago some thinker (?) with Professor attached to his name, proposed the "confiscation of the property of corporations" which disobeyed the law—and he particularly specified railroads. The best safeguard of the railroads, however, after the dishonesty of the "secularizing" process is admitted, is the reflection that "secularized" property, whether church or railroad, melts away to nothing.

ROBERT P. GREEN.

MONTREAL'S BIRTH RATE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A few words of mine were responsible for a hostile comment in your columns, on the City Improvement League of Montreal. I can see, now that misunderstanding has arisen, that the words are not clear. But the writer of the Sociology notes in your issue of the 19th inst., has, by a slip of the pen (transposing the words birth rate and death rate), grievously altered my meaning.

The footnote (for which I alone am responsible) was in support of a plea for the better care of our little ones, of whom so large a proportion in this city die for mere lack of "pure milk; knowledge on the part of mothers, midwives and nurses; pure water, pure air." I pointed out how in some places these conditions had been improved and a heavy death rate reduced. Then in the misquoted sentence I meant to say that this increase in the number who survive infancy means a progressive increase in the population far more than compensating its slight natural tendency to check the birth rate: the healthier the condition the more numerous the survivals, and therefore the larger and better the succeeding generations.

If I had dreamed of the possibility of misunderstanding, I would have expressed myself differently. I must ask you to believe that it never occurred to me till I saw it in your columns; that never in one single word or one moment's thought have I advocated restriction of the birth rate; that such a thought is as abhorrent to me as to you. I deeply regret the unfortunate chance by which words of mine became the occasion of offence, especially at a moment when this city seems at last to be realizing its motto—concordia salus—in the comradeship of French and English, Catholic and Protestant, for which the League stands. It is because of this, and because of the influence which your paper has attained, that I venture to ask you to publish this letter, and may I express the hope that you will glance over the Report (of whose fifty-five pages one unlucky footnote all but monopolized your contributor's notice) to see how misleading the comment must be to strangers, and how distressing to members, especially those of your own Faith, who would have welcomed your powerful support.

J. A. DALE.

Montreal, Feb. 21.

[Professor Dale's protestation that the restriction of the birth rate is abhorrent to him is at variance with his remark in the printed note that the reduction of the death rate and the birth rate is "doubly blest," and with his final exclamation in the same note—mercifully omitted by our contributor—"Who can measure the drain of motherhood?" The transposition of "birth rate and death rate," though affording a grievance to Professor Dale, does not affect the argument at all. In fact, it is easier to understand how the reduction of the birth rate reduces the death rate than to understand how the reduction of the death rate reduces the birth rate, except on the supposition that the greater care of infants tends to make their mothers restrict their number.—ED. AMERICA.]

I take this occasion to congratulate you and your colleagues on the splendid success of AMERICA, which we read here with very great pleasure, finding in it, as we often do, not only valuable information about events in America, but also interesting European news of literary and scientific interest which had escaped our attention in periodicals nearer home. I shall do what lies in me to make it known in Ireland.—Rev. William Delany, S.J., Dublin, Ireland.

America is going to be, if it is not now, the moving center of the world. If you keep on, it will be the thought center also. Any way, AMERICA is a great time-saver, and time is money. You have supplied a long-felt want. You have struck the right chord.—Right Rev. Mgr. Edwards, New York.

CHRONICLE

Standard Oil in Supreme Court.—During the week a case of highest moment came before the Supreme Court of the United States with the filing of the Government brief asking that the Standard Oil Company be dissolved as in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. In submitting its reply the company laid the foundation for a legal controversy which promises to become historic. The questions directly involved in the issue now before the highest court of law are in brief: What constitutes a monopoly; what authority the Government has over the affairs of corporations; whether acts in restraint of trade vitiate the characters of organizations that commit them, and whether the intent to monopolize a particular branch of industry is sufficient to invalidate the enterprise. The case marks the beginning of a new epoch in constitutional interpretation, the importance of which can hardly be overestimated. At the very moment the Standard Oil Company is fighting for its existence before the Supreme Court of the United States, its founder and head is seeking from Congress protection for a trust to dispense the bulk of the money made by this monopoly.

Philadelphia Car Strike.—The Philadelphia street car strike, which gave signs of weakening, received fresh impetus from the action of the State Federation of Labor Convention in Newcastle, Pa., which passed resolutions asking that, in the event that plans for ending the strike fail, the American Federation of Labor call a nationwide strike of organized and unorganized workmen.

The general situation remains unchanged. The estimates as to the number of workers who responded to the call of a general sympathy strike vary from 20,000 to 75,000. It was hoped that President Taft, the bankers of Philadelphia, the National Civic Federation, or the local councilmen would find a way to effect a settlement. Word came from Washington, unofficially, that the President could not see his way clear to intervene. The reason given was that the trouble is purely of a local character. The President of the Philadelphia Clearing House Association took a strong stand against interfering unless the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees agreed to recede from its stand on the question of exclusive recognition of the organization. The National Civic Federation declined to act unless both parties appealed to it. Whether the city councilmen can be forced to take action remains to be seen. Even the National Board of Arbitration, under the Erdman Act, is without jurisdiction, as its duties deal with the settlement of controversies affecting interstate commerce, and an appeal to it must be made by both parties to the issue. It was estimated on March 12 that the general sympathy strike, the first ever called in an American city, had already cost Philadelphia $8,000,000 in loss of business and the end is not yet.

B. & O. Strike Averted.—There will be no strike of conductors and trainmen on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, thanks to the good offices of Commissioner of Labor Chas. P. Neill, mediator in the wage dispute. An agreement was reached by which concessions were made by both parties. The question of abolition of double header freights was laid aside for future settlement in conjunction with other roads. The agreement includes freight, passenger and yard service, and while not granting all that the men asked, it means a substantial gain to them. Hereafter in the freight service, 100 miles or less, or ten hours or less, will constitute a day's work. One of the points conceded is the equalization of wages throughout the system, the advances obtained running from nothing, for some of the highest paid men, to 13 per cent. for some of those at the other extreme. It was tacitly understood that whatever was done by the Baltimore and Ohio would be taken as a basis of settlement by all other roads interested. These include practically all the railroads east of the Mississippi River.

Postal Savings Bank Bill.—This administration measure passed the Senate by a vote of 50 to 22—forty-nine Republicans and one Democrat voting for it. The Democrats took the position that as this is a Republican measure the Republicans should take the full responsibility for the legislation. As it goes to the House the bill authorizes the various money-order post offices to accept sums of one dollar or more from depositors, and to deposit these sums in the local banks, where the money is to remain unless withdrawn by the President in case of war or other exigency. In the event of this withdrawal the funds are to be invested in Government securities, with the proviso that such securities shall not draw less than $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. interest. The control of the funds is vested in a board of trustees composed of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General. The aggregate balance allowed to any depositor is \$500, and no person is allowed to deposit more than \$100 in any one month. The Government is required to pay 2 per cent. interest and must exact not less than $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. from the banks, the extra quarter of one per cent. being required for the payment of expenses and losses. It is estimated that such a law will bring much money out of hiding and result in a fund ranging from five hundred million to one billion dollars.

Statehood Bill Progressing.—The Senate Committee on Territories voted for the bill admitting to statehood Arizona and New Mexico and instructed the chairman to make a favorable report at the first opportunity. The bill adopted is the Hamilton measure passed by the House with certain amendments put on by the Senate committee. It is so amended as to enable all those who have lived within the proposed states for a twelve-month to vote, thus forestalling a provision which it was feared would be construed to disfranchise the Mexican and negro residents.

Great Britain.—The acceptance of office by the sitting member, Mr. Wedgwood Benn, necessitated an election in St. George's-in-the-East, London. He was opposed by Mr. P. C. Simmons, Unionist, who contested the division last January, and was returned by a slightly increased majority, 509, in a total vote of 2,687, as compared with 434 in a total vote of 2,702. This, with the results of the County Council elections does not encourage the Unionists to believe the tide of popular favor to be turning towards them.—Mr. E. S. Montague, Under Secretary for India, said in a public speech that the result of the general election was a bitter disappointment to the Government, who clearly have no mandate to reform the House of Lords. He foretold a general election in the near future and recommended the education of the public with a view to it.—Sir Ernest Shackleton sails for the United States on March 19 to receive the Gold Medal of the National Geographic Society. He will lecture in Washington and New York and afterwards make a lecturing tour through the United States and Canada.—Enthusiasm for the territorial forces is dying out and recruiting is deficient. The trades unions oppose this part of the Government's military policy very strongly.—Mr. John Parr, a survivor of Sir John Ross's Antarctic expedition of 1839, has just died, aged 94.

Ireland and the Budget.—What is called "the Cabinet's climb-down to the Irish Party" does not appear to be complete. Mr. Lloyd-George's statement does not make it clear that the Budget will not be put through independently of the Lords' action on the veto resolutions. Recent returns showing that out of an expenditure on naval construction of $100,000,000, Ireland receives only $750,000, or three-fourths of one per cent., while she contributes 6.23 per cent. to the amount, has accentuated hostility to the increased taxation of the Budget. Mr. Healy has stated that the Budget will go through as both parties are equally averse to dissolution. If the Irish Party votes against the Government the Unionists will vote in its favor and vice versa. Mr. O'Brien seems in a mood of general opposition, but particularly to the Budget and the Land Purchase policy of the Irish Party. The fact that the late Land Bill, as amended by the Lords, has arrested land purchase outside of the congested areas, has somewhat strengthened Mr. O'Brien's position in his own county. The seat which he vacated, North Cork, has returned Mr. Maurice Healy unopposed.—The judges at the spring assizes, opening March 1, have all delivered favorable charges, declaring the condition of the country practically crimeless. The only "crime" they have adverted to as serious is cattle-driving and even that practice has considerably diminished.—The death of Mr. T. M. Harrington, M. P., March 13, is a serious loss to the Irish Party. As Secretary of the National League he showed a remarkable gift of organization. His legal and financial knowledge, with his sound sense and moderation, gave him a weighty influence in Parliament and in the country.

British Colonial Notes.—General Botha has expressed a hope that the elections for the Federal Parliament will not be a battle between Dutch and English, but that the best men will be chosen. He is said to be in favor of a Coalition Government, but is hampered by the action of Mr. Merriman, leader of the English section of the Bond.

—Lord Kitchener has finished his inspection of the defences of New Zealand. As in Australia so also there he finds the material good, but he finds great fault with the system. He advocates a joint military college for Australia and New Zealand modelled on West Point.—The population of New South Wales on December 31 last was 1,645,445. The increase for the year was 40,436, of which 4,323 were assisted immigrants. The birth-rate was 26.94 per 1,000, higher than the average for the last five years. But it must be noted that marriages have also increased.

Canadian Naval Bill.—The Canadian Naval Bill passed its second reading on March 11 by a majority of forty-one. The total vote of the House of Commons is 221; but, as 24 members were absent, the entire vote on this measure was 197, of whom 119 voted for the bill and 78 against it. With the exception of Mr. Verville, a Liberal who voted with the Conservatives, it was a strict party vote. The ordinary majority of the Government being 47, this slight reduction to 41 may be due to the strong attacks made on the Bill by the Conservatives, seven of whom were the only speakers on the last day of the debate, which lasted more than five weeks. This vote on the second reading is equivalent to the adoption of the Bill, which can only be modified in detail by the House sitting in committee. Two votes were taken, one on Mr. W. B. Northrup's motion for the six months' hoist—a well-known parliamentary device for killing a bill—and the second on a direct motion for the second reading. The figures were the same in both cases.

Alberta Cabinet Crisis.—The Rutherford ministry was first formed September 2, 1905, the following being the members of the Cabinet: Hon. Alex. Rutherford, premier, president of the executive council, provincial treasurer and minister of education; Hon. Chas. W. Cross, attorney-general; Hon. T. Finlay, provincial secretary and minister of agriculture; Hon. Wm. H. Cushing, minister of public works; Hon. L. G. De Veber, without portfolio, resigned his place in the Cabinet on being promoted to the Senate of Canada, March, 1906. At the first election in 1906 the Liberals had twenty-five members and the Conservatives two. The general election of 1909 resulted in the return of thirty-eight Liberals and three Conservatives. The Provincial Government's dealings with the Alberta & Great Waterways Railway provoked a crisis, owing to which Premier Rutherford tendered his resignation. Later advices say that it has not yet been accepted by the Lieutenant-Governor of Alberta, and that a straight vote of want of confidence in the government on March 11, resulted in the defeat of the insurgents by seventeen to twenty. Since 1906 Premier Rutherford's colleagues in the Cabinet have changed and have been reduced to two, Hon. Duncan Marshall and Hon. P. E. Lessard, who tendered their resignations on March 10.

Canadian Orangemen Rampant.—The Loyal Orange Lodge, in session at St. Catharines, Ontario, attacks the French Canadians of the eastern part of that province for trying to put their language on a footing of equality with English in the public schools of Ontario. The Orangemen contend that this is the first step in a campaign which aims at driving the English-speaking electors out of the eastern counties of Ontario. They say that official permission to use French in these schools would result in English being neglected and ignored, and that the French Canadians want to accomplish in the eastern counties of Ontario what they have already achieved in the eastern townships of Quebec, and that this means practically the extension of the Quebec system to Ontario and ultimately to the whole of the Dominion. A deputation of nearly one hundred Orangemen waited on the Premier of Ontario and complained that the French Canadian Catholics in the eastern counties are securing control of the public schools. The Catholic Record, of London, Ont., protests against the Grand Lodge of the Orange Society interfering in such a public matter. "By what precedent," says the editor, "does a government receive a deputation of sworn enemies to Catholic institutions complaining about Catholic schools? The only precedent for the government to copy is the action of His Majesty the King, when visiting this country as Prince of Wales—not to recognize this secret society."

French Liquidation Scandal.—A Paris press despatch, dated March 13, says that the party in power is inexcusable for its conduct with regard to the liquidation scandal, which was sure to become public sooner or later. During more than a year a senatorial commission has been examining the books and has had much trouble in understanding them. One after another, liquidators have been removed because of suspicious manoeuvres. Enormous sums, frequently amounting to one-third and sometimes to one-half of the liquidation proceeds, were entered on the debit side under the vague designation of "other expenses." The magistrates in charge of the investigation were careless in the performance of their task and are not free from suspicion. A rapid and energetic intervention of the Government, as soon as the first frauds of certain liquidators were discovered, would have prevented the scandal from embittering the coming electoral contest. Unfortunately for the Government, the administrative system of France is a prey to corruption, as the naval and army frauds prove. The same despatch relates that Martin Gauthier earned two hundred francs —not quite forty dollars—a month before he became secretary to Duez, who confesses to have stolen two million dollars, and that, since he has become secretary to the magnificent looter, he has lived on a grand scale, bought an automobile, and had just purchased a château when he was arrested. The Government protests that it will expose the scandal fearlessly. With its usual adroitness in finding a scapegoat, it has intimated that the religious congregations were party to the frauds, though Duez's confession in no wise implicates them. Evidently the Government regards the situation as desperate when it accuses the men and women it has despoiled of appropriating their own possessions. The Echo de Paris, on March 14 stated that the liquidations of the property of religious congregations showed a credit balance of ninety-five million francs, of which only five millions had been handed in to the treasury, and twenty-four millions had been deposited against claims. This would leave sixty-six millions unaccounted for. Duez confesses that he stole ten million francs. L'Echo asks, "Where are the other fifty-six million francs?"

Prussian Electoral Reform Act.—The opening of the debate in the Prussian Landtag on the second reading of the Reform Bill as submitted by the Electoral Commission led to a renewal of the stormy scenes its discussion has always occasioned. The Social-Democrats offered an amendment that "the franchise in Prussia be granted to all persons, male and female, who had reached the age of 21," and one of their leaders, Hirsch, was so revolutionary in his speech in favor of this amendment that he was called to order twice by the presiding officer. The amendment was rejected by the votes of all other parties, the Social-Democrats alone standing for it. The Compromise form of the bill, as reported in the Chronicle of last week, was finally accepted.

American Institute in Berlin.—The foundation of an American Institute in Berlin, which was foreshadowed in the recent address of the German Ambassador Graf Bernstoff before the Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, is well on the way to realization. The purpose of the foundation, as explained in the memorial regarding it published March 10, by the Minister of Religion and Education of the German Empire, is to strengthen and broaden cultural relations between America and Germany. This aim will be attained through the interchange of official, scientific and educational publications, through intimate relations to be brought about between American universities and the higher schools of Germany, through assistance offered to American students and professors who study in Germany's schools, and finally through help extended to German students working in American institutions. Means to accomplish this purpose will be found in the Koppel bequest, a very considerable fund made over to the Minister by the will of L. Koppel, to further the intellectual relations of Germany with foreign lands. The income of the Speyer fund, too, will be utilized to the same end. This fund, as is known, was bequeathed to the German Emperor some years since by James Speyer of New York in order to make possible the system of interchange professors between German and American universities.

National Dissension in Austria.—As announced, the representatives of the various German parties in the Empire have united to defend their interests against the Slavs. One of the first results of the union is an energetic protest to the Imperial Prime Minister, Freiherr von Bienerth, against Graf Stürgkh, Minister of Worship and Education in the imperial cabinet. The protest adduces a number of instances of ministerial action in which Graf Stürgkh, though himself a German, is charged with favoritism to the Czechs such as not even a member of the Slavic union would show. The Prime Minister promised to investigate the charge and to take fitting action should the favoritism be found to exist. Another evidence of this dissension, which makes for evil in the empire, is the reported action of German students of the Art and Industrial School of Prague. Alleging favoritism to Bohemian students on the part of the governing body of the school, the Germans have formally entered upon a "strike." Their chief complaint asserts that the proceeds of bequests left in trust for students of their nation have been used in favor of Czechs attending the classes.

New Military Service Laws.—The National Defense Committee of the House of Representatives has accepted the proposed bill looking to a large increase in the number of recruits to be called in for service each year. The bill was immediately signed by the Emperor as King of Austria. The disturbed conditions in the Hungarian Parliament make it impossible to act upon this measure as well as that prescribing a two-year period of service in future just now. Pending such action the execution of the two new regulations will be deferred. It is probable that Hungary will insist upon certain concessions before assenting to the new measures.

Mexico's Destitute Laborers.—Hundreds of workingmen who had been lured by hope of high wages to come to the United States were stopped at El Paso, Texas, and other border towns by emigration agents and forbidden admittance. As they were without work or means, the Mexican Government was petitioned to assist them to return to their homes or to reach some place where employment could be found.—Señora Doña Carmen Romero Rubio de Diaz, wife of the President of Mexico, has received from the Spanish Red Cross Society the Star of Honor and Merit in recognition of her interest and zeal in works of charity and beneficence.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Catholics and Public Libraries

The question of how Catholics may avail themselves of the advantages offered by the public library, an institution to which as taxpayers Catholics contribute their share of maintenance, is one that has received some attention of late in the Catholic press. The point mainly discussed has been the compilation of lists of books by Catholic authors to be found in local libraries, and the distribution of these lists by sale or donation among the Catholic schools, colleges and the Catholic public generally. It has been pointed out that by this means hundreds of volumes of fiction, history, travel and literature may be placed in the hands of Catholics without any burden of expense to them aside from what they are already paying in their quota of taxes; and at the same time, by such selective lists the reading of the young and of those of immature mind may be safeguarded. Much interest has been manifested in this plan, and the good work begun as long ago as 1898 by the Rev. John O'Donovan, S.J., in Baltimore, the Rev. F. S. Betten, S.J., for the Catholic Federation of Buffalo, and other zealous Catholic men and women in Boston, Brooklyn, Toledo, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Philadelphia and Seattle, the printed results of which are being distributed by various councils of the Knights of Columbus, has come into well-deserved prominence.

The time seems ripe, therefore, to take up the matter of Catholic use of public libraries more in detail, with a view to formulating certain lines of procedure which may be followed by Catholics in securing all the benefits which the modern public library is offering in the way of lending books not only to individual holders of cards, but also to schools, colleges, institutions and clubs. The first step in that direction is to ascertain from the libraries themselves what they can do and are doing for schools, especially Catholic parochial schools, and to what extent Catholics are using the public library. For the purpose of obtaining authentic data AMERICA has recently addressed a circular letter, embodying the points to be covered, to all the principal libraries of the country.

Out of the sixty-seven addressed nearly fifty have, up to the time of writing, replied. The tone of these replies is in some cases cordial in the extreme, indicating the lively interest felt by most librarians in circulating the books of the public library to all classes of the community alike and their willingness to apply the resources at their command in furnishing Catholic schools with books just as, in many cities, they supply books to the public schools. Even if the tone of some replies received is a trifle cool, it manifests in every case an evident desire on the part of librarians to be fair in their treatment of all classes of the community. In one case the scruple of a librarian who reiterated his inability to tell "a Catholic reader" from any other was somewhat amusing, but his desire to be impartial was obvious enough. The reply to the query whether Catholics use the public library was affirmative in every case although the extent to which the public library is used by them seems to vary in different localities. Such phrases as the following were used in answering the question of Catholic patronage: "Yes, to a large extent;" "very generous use;" "especially by Catholic teachers in public schools;" "to a large extent and more each year."

Mr. Charles F. Lummis, librarian of the Los Angeles Public Library and a writer who has been uniformly fair and even sympathetic in his treatment of things Catholic, writes as follows in answer to the query: "It is scarcely possible to be aware of a Catholic reader unless books of doctrine or dogma are called for. These have a good circulation. In the Reference Department our Catholic readers are numerous, members of the Catholic Bible class making constant and special use of our commentaries. Members of clubs and individuals who are interested in special subjects are always to be found in this department." In one or two cases information was proffered that some of the reference attendants in the library are Catholics; and this fact was emphasized in reports from libraries circulating books through Catholic schools.

The attitude of Catholics toward public libraries has not been, as we all know, one of uniform approval; and in some instances priests and bishops have felt it incumbent upon them even to denounce the public library as a source of danger to the faith of Catholics who use it. How far this is the case may appear in the course of our inquiry and we need not pause to discuss it here. But it is important to know what non-Catholics believe to be the Catholic attitude toward the public library; and we may gain some insight into their point of view from a letter written us by Mr. James I. Wyer, Jr., librarian of the State Library, Albany, New York.

"From a wide experience with library work throughout the country," says Mr. Wyer, "I know that in some places the Catholic people have a feeling that the library administration is unsympathetic, if not in a few instances, positively averse to acting upon suggestions from Catholics. In other cities I know, on the other hand, the library works with the Catholics in perfect harmony and increased effectiveness. Librarians have sometimes told me that Catholic children were instructed by their priests or teachers not to use the public library, and that the Catholic clergy or educators have sometimes been disposed to criticise sharply the books bought by the library on grounds that have seemed to the librarians either unreasonable or wilfully malicious, grounds certainly which would not be assumed or maintained by other churches. My knowledge of these matters inclines me to believe that there is probably no settled policy of the Catholic Church to disapprove or work against public libraries, and I am even surer that there is no disposition on the part of public libraries to slight or oppose Catholic interests in the conduct of American libraries. Where there has been friction, it has probably resulted from misunderstanding or tactlessness from one or both of the parties."

While some at least of Mr. Wyer's phraseology grates unpleasantly upon a Catholic ear, yet his sincerity is evident, and he has no doubt correctly described the impression which an occasional warning, uttered by a Catholic priest against some book deemed a menace to Catholic faith, makes upon those in the community to whom certain principles cherished by Catholics are matters of indifference. Mr. Wyer's allusion is, however, the only one of the kind to be found in any of the fifty reports sent in and no other librarian has even hinted at any friction between the library administration and the Catholic public.

Our next article will deal with the circulation of public library books through Catholic parochial schools.

Bequests for Masses

Are bequests for Masses to be said for the soul of the testator legally valid? In England there was for a long time no doubt in the legal mind: the Statute of Charities had declared such Masses superstitious and unlawful. In the United States this reason is worthless. Still opinions are divided for other reasons. In some States such a bequest is taken to be valid. In others it is looked upon as an attempt to create a private trust for the benefit of the deceased without anyone to enforce it, and consequently invalid. Perhaps a short exposition of the doctrine and practice of the Church with regard to such Masses may help to do away with this false view of the case.

I.

The Mass for the dead is an integral part of the funeral rites of the Catholic Church. These differ from those of any Protestant denomination in this, that they are primarily for the benefit of the departed. The Church teaches that the souls of the just cannot enter heaven so long as the smallest obligation in the way of penance for past sins remain unfulfilled. Until this be done they are retained in Purgatory where, by virtue of the Communion of Saints, the living can help them by their prayers. To give them this aid is, therefore, the first object of the funeral service, in which nothing can be so efficacious as the Mass. But as the purifying of the soul in Purgatory is not the work of an instant, but rather, of its very nature, a progressive one, the Catholic funeral rites do not end with the deposition of the corpse in the grave. The Church, as may be seen in the missal, provides for their resumption on the third, the seventh and the thirtieth day, and yearly on the anniversary of death. Hence are heard in our churches announcements of the "Month's Mind" for the dead, and of anniversary

Masses for souls long passed away, while in accordance with the practice of the Church, the custom has always prevailed of having other Masses celebrated for the departed. All this may justly be considered to be only an extension of the obsequies begun immediately after death; and the providing for all these Masses, whether by the deceased in his testament or by the survivors, is a definite act of the Catholic religion. Wherefore, to interfere with it is to restrict the practice of religion, no less than to interfere with any other act of worship founded upon the Catholic belief.

II.

That a stipend be required for the celebration of these Masses is not in the eyes of Catholics a mere human convention, but a corollary of the doctrine of St. Paul: "Know you not that they who work in the holy place, eat the things that are of the holy place; and they that serve the altar, partake with the altar? So also the Lord hath ordained that they who preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel" (I. Cor., ix, 13, 14). Its amount, always very moderate, is determined by ecclesiastical authority, and varies in different places according to the cost of living and the provision made for the clergy's support. On the continent of Europe it is generally about twenty cents; in England, about sixty cents; and in this country, a dollar. The Church guards most strictly the fulfilment of obligations arising from the accepting of a stipend. He who receives one binds himself in justice to say the Mass required or to have it said; and, moreover, he is obliged to fulfil the formally stipulated conditions of time, place, rite, etc.

If no time be fixed he must say the Mass within a reasonable time unless the party asking it excuse him. The Holy See has determined the reasonable time to be one month when the number of Masses promised to one individual be ten or less; for twenty, it is two months; for forty, three months; for sixty, four months; for two hundred, a year, and so on. The Masses one cannot say within the appointed time, he must turn over to his bishop or to the Holy See, to be distributed to others, or he may himself give them to other priests; but in this case he remains responsible for them until they are said. Should he give them to priests of another diocese, he must do so through their bishop, or, at least, he must obtain their bishop's consent. Whenever a priest transfers a Mass to another, he must give him the entire stipend received for it. Thus it would be unlawful for one who has received in America a stipend of one dollar, to have the Mass said in Europe for twenty cents. These examples show how rigorous is the legislation in the matter: the penalty of violating the law is proportionally severe.

III.

A priest, therefore, accepts a stipend, not as a private person, but in his official capacity, subject to all the laws governing him in the matter. It may be asked whether the one giving the stipend acquires an exclusive interest in the Mass to be said. To answer this question satisfactorily one must observe that, as there can be no proportion between the Mass, a purely spiritual, supernatural good, and any goods material and natural, the contract between the giver and the receiver of the stipend is not one of exchange. Hence, by giving a stipend one does not acquire a right in the Mass, but only a right that the Mass be said and applied according to his intention. This application must depend upon the nature of the Mass itself. If it can be applied exclusively to him, he gets it all: if it can not, then he gets only that application that the nature of the Mass allows. According to the teaching of the Church and the nature of the sacrifice, the sacrifice of the Mass is offered (1), to pay supreme worship to God; (2), to thank Him for all his benefits, especially for that of Redemption; (3), to appease Him offended by man's sins; and (4), to obtain for men the graces profitable for salvation and perfection.

These are general, and the dignity of the sacrifice identical with that of the cross, and that of the sacrificer, Christ, of whom the priest is but the representative, require them to be so in the fullest sense; and it is not in the power of the priest to restrict them, although, as we shall see, he may make some special application to some particular need. All Heaven, and everyone on earth have an interest in the Mass. This being so, we may go on to inquire what are the fruits of the Mass for men. These are, (1), the meriting of grace and glory by him who offers it aright, and by those who with due dispositions cooperate in it, either by having it said or by assisting at its celebration; (2), the obtaining of divine blessings for them and for all for whom it is offered; (3), the turning away of God's anger and of the punishment both temporal and eternal, of our sins; (4), the satisfying of the temporal punishment due to sins forgiven as to their guilt, on behalf of both the living and the dead. But the application of these fruits depends upon their nature. Thus, since merit is something personal, the first accrues to those only who are personally engaged in the offering of some particular Mass.

The second, third and fourth fruits do not directly involve merit, but the efficacy of the Mass itself before God. Consequently they are shared in by all who according to Christ's institution are benefited by the Mass. With regard to them, therefore, there is the general fruit of the Mass, inasmuch as the whole Church has its profit from it. That the whole Church profits by every Mass is clear, since the prayers of every Mass include all the faithful, living and dead. The Mass has its special fruit for those who concur in it by their presence or by procuring its celebration and also for those they pray for. It has a most special fruit for the priest, who in offering it is intimately associated with Christ. And lastly it has another fruit for those to whom in particular the priest applies it. This is called the ministerial fruit, because in applying the Mass in this manner the priest acts on behalf of Christ and of the Church. It may be the turning away of God's anger and the punishments due to sin, the gaining of graces of conversion or of sanctification, or the winning of temporal blessings, as regards some definite living person, or it may be the relief of some definite soul in Purgatory. This only is the fruit one has in view when he gives a stipend for the celebration of Mass for the dead.

IV.

The Mass is usually celebrated in public. The people have a right to assist at this, the greatest office of the Church, and an important part of the ministry of the clergy is to enable them to do so. Nevertheless, even though it be celebrated in a private chapel with only a server present; even though it be celebrated by some missionary, absolutely alone, in the solitude of his cabin or the loneliness of the wilderness, it is essentially a public function. The priest acts in his public official character: his action reaches through the whole world, and beyond it into Purgatory, and above it to the height of heaven touching its term only at the throne of God. All men are helped by it: angels and saints rejoice at it: the Holy Trinity is glorified by it.

A bequest for Masses for the testator's soul, then, is an act of religion; it may be regarded as an extension of the order for the payment of his funeral expenses. The stipends involved have their origin in the Lord's ordination. The priest receives them in his official capacity. The Church watches jealously over the execution of the obligations that accompany them. The Masses offered benefit, not only the soul of the testator, but also the priest himself, those who are present at them, those for whom they pray, every Christian living or dead, sinners of every class and degree, and the Universal Church. They differ from any other Mass only in the application of the ministerial fruit.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

How Ferrer Was Tried

I.

One could not well be in Barcelona for a very short time without seeing the terrible destruction wrought by the mob last July. We rode around through several parts of the city and gazed upon the blackened, and in some instances, crumbling, ruins. The authorities had in many instances built temporary walls to close up gaping doorways and windows, and to prevent tottering parts of an edifice from coming down. Many of the churches, convents and schools were so far destroyed that not even the shell remains which can be rebuilt. In the many bookstores and news-stands throughout the city, books with and without illustrations dealing with the destruction and the events caused by the rioters are freely on sale, and one enterprising firm has published a set of one hundred post-cards containing views of the ruined buildings.

Altogether the rioters burned and wrecked the following buildings: Churches and chapels, 22; convents, 14; schools and colleges, 20; asylums, homes and charitable institutions, 22; official buildings and private houses, 19; making a total of 97. In doing so, they killed 102 persons and seriously wounded and maimed 312. Besides this they disinterred in Barcelona and Sabadilla 38 bodies of nuns and left them lying in the streets. It was one of the fiercest riots of modern times, and chiefly so because war was made upon defenceless women and old people in unprotected situations, and represents the largest total of destruction in the shortest time in any city of Europe. We have heard of the Jewish massacres at Kisheneff and other places in Russia, but there was nothing in them to equal Barcelona in fiendishness and destruction, either of life or property.

When the military got actively to work in repressing the mob, they made numerous arrests, and it was said that at the end of the "bloody week," as it is called, they had made some fourteen hundred prisoners for from the pettiest to the most serious crimes. The arrested parties were placed in the police stations, military posts, and in the model prison on Calle de Provencia and in the military prison in the fortress of Montjuich. All except about one hundred of them were released during the following week or so. The others were tried and sentenced to terms of from one to six months, whilst several of them received terms of from one to ten years, according to the gravity of their crimes. They were still trying some of the minor ones as late as the early part of December last—one I remember, a woman who carried kerosene to the rioters to dash upon the woodwork of the buildings to be set on fire. Of the ringleaders, seven were executed, and of these some were Frenchmen who had left France for their country's good, and to escape the courts of their native land. Only one of these executions has produced any world-wide or vociferous criticism of the Spanish authorities at large, or in trial of the rioters—that of Francisco Ferrer y Guardia, who was shot on the morning of October 13, 1909.

The names of the others who were executed were never mentioned outside of Spain, but the execution of Ferrer seems by preconcerted design to have been trumpeted abroad immediately. Not only that, but I read in the French, English and Italian papers that his execution was a predetermined event by the order of the Spanish autocratic government, at the special behest of the church authorities who were vindictive and determined against Ferrer. But those same papers did not seem to care to publish any other side to the story. On the 16th of October, 1909, Señor Torcuato Luca de Tena, the owner of the illustrated paper, A. B. C. of Madrid, sent at his own expense a telegram of a half-column to the Matin, Journal, Figaro, Gaulois, Temps and Petit Journal of Paris; Berliner Tagblatt of Berlin;

Tribuna of Rome; Corriere della Sera of Milan; O Seculo of Lisbon, and The Times, Daily Telegraph and Daily News of London, saying that such statements made about Ferrer's trial and execution were untrue, that:

"Ferrer was judged by a lawfully constituted tribunal which proceeded according to legal methods and that the accused had all the guarantees accorded by the courts of civilized peoples. He was not tried for his ideas, but as one implicated in the acts which the revolutionists and rioters committed in Barcelona, in arson, murder, plunder and assassination of women and children. The sittings of the court-martial were public, and Ferrer freely chose his counsel, who had entire liberty in complying with his duty, etc."

This telegram was never published except in the Gaulois, The Times and the Daily Telegraph. The other journals to whom it was addressed suppressed it and continued their former statements. The owner of La Ilustracion Española, of Madrid, also sent a shorter telegram, confirming the statements made by his colleague, but it, too, was never published.

When I came back to America I was astonished to find that the same thing was said in the press here as had been said in the European press. And among other things which were particularly unpleasant, one was a squib in Life, entitled "We Wonder," containing much venom:

"The Catholic Church in Spain made a political mistake when it caused the murder of Ferrer," it said. "The murder cannot be undone. But the crime can be made less hideous by destroying the good name of the victim. This is now being accomplished. It is being well and thoroughly done. . . . His unforgivable crime was, of course, the effort to lift a little the black pall of ignorance with which the Catholic Church for generations has enveloped Spain. And the Catholic Church knows how to handle such criminals."

The other was a particularly unjust article in McClure's Magazine, which, by a suppression of facts aided by positive misstatements, gave an entirely incorrect account of the Barcelona riots and the execution of Ferrer; even its illustrations were incorrect. But its venom, too, was there:

"The Government and the Orders," it alleged, "had lost the first round of the fight. But they had gained experience which served them well when Ferrer again fell into their hands. This time they improved on even a special court and no jury; they abolished witnesses and limited the discretion of the man they themselves nominated to conduct the defense."

We have been told that such a thing as Ferrer's execution could not have happened in the United States. However, we had the Haymarket riots in Chicago in 1886, where there was far less damage and loss of life than at Barcelona, and yet seven persons were there executed. Chicago has had peace ever since, and the Barcelonese think they, too, will have things quiet for a time. In this connection it is well to consider that under the law of the State of New York, Ferrer would have been liable to the death penalty had he been tried here with the evidence adduced against him there.*

It was also said in the publications that the trial of Ferrer was secret and that he was "railroaded" to execution. On the contrary, his trial was held in a large court-room; I have seen in Barcelona a large double-page illustration giving a view of his trial, from which it could be easily seen that there were from one hundred to one hundred and fifty persons present, among them several newspaper men. It must be remembered that Ferrer's trial was by a military tribunal, which is usually in all countries unhampered by mere technical objections or by repeated adjournments. Yet Ferrer's trial commenced early in September and was not concluded until October 8, 1909, when he was found guilty. In all it lasted twenty-eight days, ten of which were an express adjournment to enable the defense to summon witnesses and rebut the proof offered by the government.

The court martial before which he was tried was composed (according to the Military Code) of a colonel, as presiding judge and six captains. These men, who bid fair now to become historic, were: Colonel Eduardo de Aguirre and Captains Pompeyo Marti, Sebastian Calleras, Marcelino Diaz, Manuel de Llanos, Aniceto Garcia Rodriguez and Julio Lopez Marzo as judges, and with them Captain Eduardo Laguilla as assessor, and never at any time, or in any journal, has their competency or integrity been assailed. The prosecutor (fiscal) was Captain Jesús Maria Rafáles, of Vegara Infantry Regiment, and the counsel chosen by the defendant was Captain Francisco Galcerán y Ferrer, of the Regiment of Engineers, who made a most determined effort for his client.

The Military Code under which Ferrer was tried was passed by a Liberal Parliament in 1890, and was framed by the Extreme Left of that party. Among other things it provided that the formation of the court martial is automatic, through designations of a number of officers made six months in advance (Art. 41, 58), so that a special court martial cannot be formed to try a prisoner. The accused is at once notified of the persons who compose the Court Martial, and may object to any of them (Art. 568) when another one from the list of designations will take his place. The hearing is public (Art. 575) and the accused must be present (Art. 571) and it is begun by the reading of the charges against the prisoner (Arts. 576, 577), then the examination of witnesses (Art. 578), of experts (Art. 579) and the identification of objects and documents (Art. 580); afterwards the charges and the defense to them are read and amendments and corrections may be made (Art. 581), and then the accused (who need not testify under oath) may take up his side of the case and present what he deems necessary in his defense (Art. 583). In their method of taking testimony, the Spanish have two modes somewhat different from ours. One is the careo or confrontation of witnesses: when two witnesses have contradicted one another they are placed face to face and the same questions put to each of them. The other is the rueda or identification of persons. Here it is usually made by standing up the accused in a line of people, but in Spain it must be in a circle of more than six persons of the same height, build and general appearance as the person sought to be identified, so that the identifier may not judge that it is a person who stands near the head or the foot of the line. The testimony of the witnesses is taken at the sumario, while the full trial is had at the plenario, when all the judges and officials are present.

Francisco Ferrer, during his residence in Barcelona prior to July 28, 1909, wore a full beard; when he was captured by the police on August 20, 1909, he was smooth shaven. All through Barcelona the book-shops sell portraits of him before and after taking, and I have them both by me as I write.

Two or three members of the Civil Guard (the country constabulary) were patrolling a road some fifty miles away from Barcelona on August 20, when they came across a smooth-shaven man with a kodak who was unknown to them, and as his answers to their replies were unsatisfactory they took him into custody. He said he had been in Barcelona, was there before the riots, and perceiving where that admission might land him, said that he had been a delegate to the Esperanto Congress held at Barcelona in July and was now making a walking tour of Cataluña. He was not recognized at first as Ferrer, and it was some days before his identity was established. All the delegates to the Esperanto Congress were known; they were all photographed at their great dinner on the summit of Tibadabo, and Ferrer does not appear among them. Nor was he known as an Esperantist, his knowledge of languages being confined to Catalan, Spanish and French, with a very little English learned in London.

Before he had been captured the police and military authorities had searched his country villa, "Mas Germinal" at Mongat, a village six miles from Barcelona, and found therein a quantity of telegrams, correspondence, circulars and memoranda of advice, which, together

*The penal law of the State of New York provides (Sec. 2) that a person who aids or abets in the commission of a crime, whether present or not, or who counsels, commands or induces another to commit a crime is a "principal." It further provides (Secs. 160, 161) that the advocacy of criminal anarchy is a felony, and that any one who publishes or distributes printed matter, or organizes or becomes a member of any society to advocate such doctrine, is guilty of a felony. Also (Secs. 1044, 1045), that murder in the first degree is punishable by death, and that any person who, even without premeditated design, while committing or attempting to commit a felony, causes the death of another is guilty of murder in the first degree. It defines treason (Sec. 2380) as "a combination of two or more persons by force to usurp the government of the State or to overturn the same, as shown by a forcible attempt made within the State," and that (Sec. 2381). "treason is punishable by death."

with those found at the Solidaridad Obrera at the Casa del Pueblo (a successor to La Escuela Moderna, were produced at the trial. They made up fifty-four packages or files, arranged according to subject matter and dates, and comprise most of the documentary evidence produced against Ferrer.

St. Marcellus, Pontifex Maximus—310-1910

I.

In this old city of Rome, in the year 1910, the well-worn question comes to mind with striking significance: Why are some of the saints so neglected? For here, on this spot, one of the most glorious in the annals of the Church gave his life for the Faith just sixteen hundred years ago, the holy saint and pontiff Marcellus. He is virtually ignored, whereas the debt that the Christian world owes to him can never be repaid, for he was the means used by Almighty God for the firm establishment of the Christian Faith and the downfall of Paganism. There is no need to lessen the honor due to the Emperor Constantine; but in the brilliancy of the setting of his valorous deeds, and their extraordinary significance politically, the world is so dazzled that the work accomplished by the martyred Pope who died for the Faith before that time is well nigh forgotten.

The story merits being retold with the hope of awakening to a new sense of loyalty to Pope St. Marcellus some of the many indifferent Christians who never give him a thought.

St. Marcellus, from whatever point of view he is studied, whether as the valiant hero in the strife, never quailing in the face of imminent torture or most cruelly inflicted death; or, as the wise administrator of the affairs of the Church; as stern admonisher of the faithless ones; or as a tender father to his people; or when performing the most servile tasks with humility and without murmuring, the great saint stands out always a model of supreme faithfulness. Though not actually dying under the sword of the executioners, he is none the less enrolled among the martyrs who died for the Faith. All this glorious record is compressed into a space of less than ten years.

Marcellus was born of an illustrious family in the region of the Via Lata, now the Corso, the very heart of the city in ancient as in modern times. His name first appears in history in connection with the martyrdom of St. Marcellinus, who occupied the Chair of St. Peter from 296 to 304 A.D. After witnessing the splendid testimony to the Faith of multitudes of martyrs, the Pope himself fell into the hands of the persecutors, who cut off his head. The barbarous Emperor Maximian had issued orders that the bodies of the martyred Christians should lie unburied in the public square, subject to the scoffs and scorn of the populace.

St. Marcellus, full of love and veneration for the saintly pontiff, and ignoring wholly the danger to himself, succeeded in rescuing by night the body of the martyred Pope, carrying it for honorable burial to the cemetery of Priscilla in the Via Salaria. From this and other historical facts it is justly concluded that he was the first priest of Pope Marcellinus; and the care of the Church then fell naturally upon the shoulders of our saint.

It was a time of most cruel persecution, for the three emperors, Diocletian, Maximian and Galerius, had published four solemn edicts for the total extermination of the believers and the destruction of their religion; indeed, the banishment of the name of Jesus from the face of the earth. Pagan as well as Christian writers recount the heartrending cruelties practised upon these faithful followers of Christ.

Galerius was a prime instigator of this unrelenting war to the death, and on Good Friday, in the year 303, he caused the Basilica of Antioch to be set on fire when it was filled with worshippers of every age and condition. The whole multitude perished in the flames, or in the ruins, while the mob outside exulted in the names of the heathen gods, shouting praises of the greatness and power of their emperor.

It was at this period when this same spirit prevailed throughout the pagan world that St. Marcellus undertook the charge of the Church. He had staunch helpers at his side, notably among them St. Melchiades and St. Sylvester, later his successors to the papacy. The streets and squares of Rome were streaming literally with blood, but St. Marcellus never flinched. He was in the midst of the carnage, encouraging the brave and faint-hearted, caring for the weak and helpless ones, hiding them when possible, but never failing in his admonitions to all, not, from fear of torture or death, to offer incense to idols. Marcellus was in perpetual personal peril, but for the time he was spared for the greater good of the Church.

Suddenly and unexpectedly, in the year 305, came a lull in this ferocity towards the Christians, the first gleam of light and peace in Rome and throughout the provinces of Italy, though not in the East. None of the cruel edicts were withdrawn formally, so that the Christians with Marcellus at their head still used extreme caution, thinking it not yet prudent to hold any great religious ceremonies in public. Galerius was now the sole reigning despot since the forced abdication of Diocletian and Maximian.

In 306, Maxentius succeeded his father Maximian. He inherited neither the superabundant energy of his father nor his hatred of Christians; in fact, he showed towards them apparent good will, and in time acted in such a manner that the Christian people began to believe seriously that persecutions in Rome had actually ceased forever. In 308, though no formal edict for the cessation of persecution had been issued, Marcellus decided that the time had come for the election of a Pope, and he was himself chosen after the Chair of St. Peter had been vacant for more than four years.

Maxentius must have been well aware that the Christian community had chosen a Supreme Pontiff. It is natural to conclude that there must have been some outward rejoicing on the part of the Christians. The Emperor not only showed no signs of hostility towards them, but rather, an especial confidence in these subjects upon whose faithfulness and loyalty he felt that he could rely in time of need against a foreign foe.

Marcellus, thus encouraged by the Emperor's apparently benevolent intentions, turned his activity towards a reconstruction of the Church. First and above all, his care was directed towards the recalling to their duties of those unhappy Christians who, in a time of terrible stress, had been false to their faith and had sacrificed to the heathen deities. However much the tender heart of the Pope might have been naturally disposed to condone as far as possible the lapse of these persons, often weak rather than wilful, yet he was obliged to insist on their confessing their sin and submitting to the public penance then imposed by the law of Holy Church.

He succeeded in reclaiming many of them, but at the same time arose a new source of sorrow to the Holy Father and harm to the Church of Rome. These "lapsi" so called, were by no means disgraced or unimportant persons in the eyes of the world. Pope Marcellus had no regard to human respect in this matter, but kept his eyes fixed solely on the glory of God, loyalty to the Faith and the real good of souls.

Then happened what comes to pass sometimes in our own day. Some of the lapsed ones refused to submit to the conditions imposed. They protested, they organized demonstrations, and finally caused tumults and rebellion, and even in some instances actually shed the blood of some of their brethren who had escaped the sword of the persecuting emperors. Finding themselves powerless before Marcellus, their next step, worse even than apostasy and rebellion, was to denounce the Christians to the Pagan emperor.

Maxentius, being a vain and light-headed man, and urged on by these fanatics, proceeded to interfere in the affairs of the Church. Then began the strife between the two powers which govern the world. Marcellus stood firm. The Emperor must not intervene in matters of conscience; while at the same time the Pope turned over to the civil powers those disturbers of the peace of the Christian community who had shed innocent blood.

Maxentius, indignant at this uncompromising stand of the Pope against what he considered his own dignity as Pontifex Maximus, promptly sent him into exile. Fortunately the Pope did not stay away long, for his own people clamored for his return, and with the consent or tacit connivance of the Emperor, who preferred to keep on good terms with his Christian subjects, he was brought back.

Diocesan Congress in Paris

Owing to the grave crisis that the Catholic Church is, at the present moment, going through in France, the recent Diocesan Congress in Paris had special importance. The subjects under discussion were naturally those that are uppermost in the minds of French Catholics at this turning point of their history: the separation of the Church and State has erected new conditions and the action of the Government with regard to the schools suggests difficulties that must be faced and problems that must be solved without delay.

The Congress opened on February 14 and lasted four days. It was presided over by the archbishop, Mgr. Amette, whose attitude during the recent floods has considerably increased his popularity. He was surrounded by many members of the Paris clergy and by a large number of laymen, actively interested in the social and religious questions that are under discussion.

As may readily be imagined, the education question was much to the front, indeed it was treated, from different standpoints, almost daily during the Congress. Attention was drawn to the necessity of improving the instruction that is given in the Catholic or free schools. The boys and girls that are trained in these schools form the nucleus of the Catholic party in a near future; the Church has a free hand in their education and it behooves her to see that they are given a teaching in every way excellent, up-to-date, solid and thorough. "We have in our schools," said one Curé, "forty-five thousand children, who attend Mass and who receive the Sacraments, because we take them to Church; how many of them will continue to do so in ten years' time?"

Mgr. Amette developed the speaker's meaning by insisting that it is now more necessary than ever, owing to circumstances, to train solid, thorough-going Christians, not merely men and women who observe certain religious practices, more from habit than from conviction. In times such as ours, Catholics must possess the virtues of a soldier in time of war.

The question of the duties of parents with regard to the Government schools was also gone into; the joint letter of the bishops clearly pointed out to them where their duty lies; but, in individual cases, the parish priest must decide what they may or may not do. Colonel Keller enlarged upon the subject by urging the foundation of associations that bind the fathers of families together for the defence of their children's soul; these associations exist in many places; their influence is an important factor in the present struggle.

Some apt remarks, suggested by recent events, were made as to the Catechism used in the Diocese of Paris, which is excellent in a theological point of view, but somewhat obscure in its expressions. One Curé proposed that certain chapters should be added to it to teach children the new duties that the separation of the Church and State entails upon the faithful, who are now obliged to support their churches and priests. Another suggested that greater importance should be given to Church history, in order to counteract the false historical statements that are brought forward in the Government Schools, where the Church is depicted as a narrow, tyrannical and mischievous institution.

A reminiscence of the recent inundations was brought into the Congress, when M. l'Abbé Aubert, curé of Javel, rose to take part in the discussion. The archbishop appropriately reminded his hearers that M. Aubert, whose parish was sorely tried by the floods, had behaved like a hero, but his own dwelling was under water during twelve days and the notes he had prepared for the Congress were unavailable in consequence. M. Aubert's remarks confirmed the observations already made by some of his colleagues on the importance of improving the Catholic schools: "The best way of filling our schools," he said, "is to make them better than the others." He also spoke of the necessity of constantly keeping a watch on the teaching given in the Government schools in order to counteract its effects. "When I hear that in my parish a lay teacher has attacked the Church, I take up the subject and explain to my children where his statement is false. I try, if possible, to illustrate my meaning by an anecdote that helps them to grasp it."

The same desire to make Catholic schools excellent in every respect was enlarged upon by a well-known layman, M. Jean Lerolle. He insisted on the importance of creating professional schools, "we must train our school children to become Christian workmen," he said, and he went on to explain how, if the Catholics wished to win the day, they must assert, not only their moral, but also their technical superiority.

These brief extracts suffice to show the spirit that reigned in the Congress. If in the past French priests have been somewhat blinded to the rapid changes that have lately taken place in the world of ideas, now they are beginning, at least, in Paris, to break through the old-fashioned methods that are no longer in keeping with the needs of the day. They keep an impartial and attentive eye on the different manifestations of public opinion and are ready, in all matters that do not involve a sacrifice of principle, to fall in with its new development, for the honor of the Church and the good of souls.

Among the curés, who for some years past, have grasped the necessity of adopting new methods to suit present necessities is the Abbé Soulange-Bodin, pastor of Notre Dame de Plaisance; he is a prominent figure in the clergy of Paris. His parish is inhabited chiefly by workmen and when, as a young priest, he began work in his new post, he had to face much ignorance, prejudice and ill will.

Le Abbé Soulange-Bodin is distinctly opposed to the old-fashioned idea prevalent during many generations, that the French priest must carefully keep aloof from his people, except when called upon to exercise his ministry. In spite of all obstacles, he took up his position as a citizen, possessed of rights and duties and, although he is, first and foremost, a priest, the people of Plaisance have learnt to look upon him as their fellow-worker, their friend, as one keenly interested in the material and moral well-being of the crowded suburb, ever ready to promote its interests.

At the Congress, the Curé of Plaisance touched on a delicate and timely topic. He drew the attention of those present to the love of reading that is now strongly developed among young and old, rich and poor. It is no use fighting against this tendency, better far to provide wholesome food for those whose unrefined taste will otherwise lead them to devour depraved books and papers. The Curé of Plaisance spoke of the children of his flock, and it is for them that he wishes to provide healthy amusement. With this object in view, he has started an illustrated paper, Ma récréation, an undertaking that was warmly commended by the archbishop. As practical conclusion to his speech, M. Soulange-Bodin pointed out the duties that, in his opinion, are incumbent upon priests and laymen. First, as far as lies in their power, they should wage war against the indecent books and papers that fill the shop windows; second, if they possess the necessary talent, they should write wholesome, bright, interesting stories for the children of the people; third, he proposes that a catalogue should be made of the books most suitable for this purpose and that these books should be given as rewards and prizes to those children who are regular in their attendance at Catechism.

M. Loutils, vicaire of a Paris church, well known in the literary world as "Pierre l'Hermite," then took up the subject; in a brilliant and amusing speech, he proved that what are called "good" books are often hopelessly dull, and that there is in this respect a wide field for improvement. M. Feron Vrau, the well-known Catholic director of the huge enterprise called "la bonne presse," laid stress on the fact that as the books given as prizes in the Government schools are often used to propagate evil, those written and published by Catholics should aim at being, not merely safe, but well written, up to date, and in every way fitted to enlighten and convince. The Diocesan Congress closed by a splendid demonstration that took place on Saturday, February 18, where fifteen thousand men assembled to meet the archbishop. After several striking speeches, the last of which was made by Mgr. Amette, the Credo was sung by those present. The archbishop reminded his hearers that, owing to the approaching election, in a few weeks they will have a powerful weapon in their possession. "Whoever you may be," he said, "I remind you that your duty is to ascertain that the man for whom you vote, will respect the Faith of your children, the rights of your families, and liberty of teaching," and he quoted the prayer of the Belgian Catholics, which is singularly appropriate at the present crisis: 'From schools without God and from teachers without faith, deliver us, O Lord!'"

CORRESPONDENCE

France Will Be Saved

PARIS, MARCH 1, 1910.

If all the parishes in France are like St. Roch, the Faith is not dead among the French. I called on the Abbé Peuportier one morning about 9 o'clock, after attending two Masses in St. Roch's, of which he is the Curé. I found both Masses nearly as well frequented as in any of our New York churches. There was a fair number of men in the congregation, some of them apparently wealthy, but others evidently poor. The Abbé is a man about forty-five years of age, vivacious, quick in action and practical. Although very busy attending to his parochial duties with a number of people waiting to see him, he received me with the greatest courtesy, and at once made me feel at home. I happened to ask him if he knew one or two of the clergy who had been my classmates fifty years ago, and finding that I had studied in St. Sulpice he became specially interested.

"Oh," said he, "you will find several of your old schoolmates still living in and around Paris. One, De Violaines, Curé d'Issy died a short time ago, and although he was curé of a bad district, yet when he died the whole population, including the Radicals, turned out to honor him. Even the Atheistic mayor was in prominence at his funeral."

"Why was this?" I asked.

"Because," he replied, "he was a man of great zeal and took good care of the poor."

I was about to leave, knowing M. Peuportier to be a very busy man; but "No, no," said he, "I'll give you a list of curés and canons whom you will know." Then he took down a directory and went through it from beginning to end, giving me the names that I was very glad to get. But I felt ashamed to give him so much trouble, and to take up so much of his busy time.

"Oh," said he, "it is nothing, it is a great pleasure!"

I confess that he gave me a lesson in politeness that I shall not soon forget; for I would not have given him so much of my time in New York, nor do I know any one there that would. How charming, how captivating is patient politeness in a strange land!

The next day, being Sunday, I said Mass in St. Roch's. Before doing so, I assisted at the special Sunday Mass for men. There was a large number present, every one with a prayer-book; and they sang all through the Mass, a low Mass. The curé read the Gospel and preached a short, good sermon, and I felt as if I were at home at the monthly Communion Mass of the Holy Name Society. Then I began my own Mass in a large chapel of the church; a special Mass at half past eight for the grown-up boys and young men up to the age of twenty, or thereabouts. These two Masses are special every Sunday and women or girls who go to them must take a back seat. Two of the vicars took care of the boys and young men. One of them before the Mass told them that an American priest from New York was going to say it. That was a good point, for it made them think of the universality of the Church. They were all good-looking, clean and intelligent young fellows, very dignified and respectful and numbered probably one hundred and fifty. At the Gospel a vicar read it and preached a short sermon. Another of the vicars, standing in the rear, answered the different parts of the Mass, the Credo, the Sanctus, the Communion with a word of exhortation for each.

Evidently the Curates of St. Roch watch carefully over the religious training of the boys; and I suppose they do so in the other churches of Paris, as they all do in New York. I left St. Roch's with the remark to the vicar that the Faith is not dead in Paris yet.

"Certainly not," he replied with emphasis.

"But," I added, "it is due to the zeal and devotion of the clergy."

"Ah! monsieur," he answered with a blush, "one does only one's duty."

"The zeal and devotion of the clergy;" yes, that's the cause, and to-day there is not in the world a more zealous, a more devoted or a more united clergy than the clergy of France. The Revolution reformed them in the eighteenth century, and destroyed the race of Louis XIV's flunkey bishops and the Abbés de Cour of Louis XV's reign. Buonaparte tried to corrupt the French Church in the nineteenth century and had partial success, but the other revolutions of 1830 and 1848 and the recent "separation" have made them heroes. Compare the Gallican bishops of the seventeenth century, all ready to go into schism with their king, and the great Bossuet, worse than any of them, with the modern prelates all united and devoted to the Holy See, and you will realize the difference. Paris, in which the Gallican poison was working even fifty years ago, is now free from it; and, thank God, all is now pure Roman.

But here's the old seminary that has done so much to help the good work; old St. Sulpice! I went over to see it and first entered the church near by. Nothing is physically changed there; but on Sundays it is shorn of its crown. The three hundred bright seminarians who sang the praises of God in it are banished. I stood in the Place St. Sulpice, and looked at the old Seminary building. The cage is there but the birds have been driven out by the Tomcat, who has taken the place of the Goddess of Reason. Yes! the cruel, ferocious and lecherous Tomcat is the best symbol of the heartless, cruel and impure governing class of modern France!

The statues of Bossuet of Meaux, Fénelon of Cambray, Fléchier of Nîmes and Massillon of Clermont are still on their throne in the centre of the square, but how sad they look, in the centre of solitude. The business houses that lived on the Seminary also wear a gloomy look; and the people of the neighborhood feel and resent the change. I found a respectable man washing his hands in the fountain under the feet of Bossuet.

"What do they do with the old Seminary building?" I asked.

"Ah! who knows? monsieur," he answered.

"It was an act of brutal barbarism," I said, "to drive out the innocent and unoffending Sulpicians, who could never be accused of meddling with politics."

"You are right, monsieur," said he. "We are governed by barbarians."

I went over to the old Seminary and found a man on guard.

"What do they do with this building now?" I asked him.

"Ah!" said he, "it belongs to the Beaux Arts."

"Yes," said I, "the Government has taken it from Christ and transferred it to Venus." I was surprised to find that the Government employé did not resent my remark.

"Monsieur," he said, "you are an American. I see that; for an American bishop was here looking at the Seminary and he spoke as you do. As for me, monsieur, I say nothing."

In that Seminary lived in my time, Carrière, a very great moral theologian; Gosselin, who wrote the classic work on the temporal power of the Pope; and Le Hir, the greatest orientalist in France in the nineteenth century; to say nothing of the old and the young saints that made of it the holiest place in France. If the Sulpicians could point to no other records than those which they have left at St. Sulpice in Paris and in Issy, they would rank as the best directors of seminaries in the world.

A visit to Issy confirmed me in this conviction. There the Sulpicians have their present schools and there they devote themselves to their vocation of training the young levites. All the directors assist at all the spiritual exercises from the early morning meditation to the night prayers. The most edifying men in the Seminary are the directors; some of them venerable, retired professors of seventy, may be seen on their knees at the morning meditation; and they are with the students in recreation as well as at the spiritual exercises.

If a student leaves St. Sulpice without being a saint, it is not the fault of the training or of the example which he has received in the holy house. The Sulpicians are the men who have formed the modern French clergy. France will be saved. OLD ST. SULPICE.

Italy's Ministry

ROME, FEBRUARY 18, 1910.

After discussing neither deeply nor at great length its proposed program, the Italian ministry submitted it to the Chambers for a test vote, which resulted in a majority of 109. The significance of this vote of confidence rests on the fact that it does not show trust in the present ministry so much as it betrays among the conservative followers of Giolitti and Sonnino a dread of paving the way for a cabinet composed of wholly anti-clerical Radicals and Socialists. The President of the Council has given satisfactory assurances to the Catholics that he is not aiming at oppression of the Church; the test vote therefore was somewhat misleading, for his declaration won the adhesion even of some of the Opposition. However, it brought out the Government supporters and placed in a strong light the part-colored Opposition which is fundamentally anti-clerical and even subversive.

Although not all that could be desired to secure the permanency of the cabinet, it suffices for the time and responds to the country's call for political peace. The discussion of the proposed appropriation for public instruction followed the vote of confidence. It was awaited with some curiosity, for the anti-clericals had been noisily in favor of lay schools and against the Church; but the result did not meet their expectations as the discussion came to an end without noteworthy incidents. In the course of the debate, a Socialist, aided and abetted by the excommunicated priest, Murri, who is one of the deputies, clamored for certain reforms in the seminaries; but two Catholic deputies enlightened their ignorance by proving that what they were contending for had been done by the Pope three years ago.

The question is probably settled, for the Minister of Public Instruction is a lukewarm Freemason and has not belied the spirit of free toleration which he professed when a member of the communal council of Turin. But the whole matter may be brought up again by the Minister of Grace and Worship, who is an active Freemason and may not be as conciliatory in his statements as his colleague was. Strife is in the air, and the Catholics are vigilant, for the heterogeneous composition of the ministry, its program, and the little confidence inspired by the non-Catholic premier do not win their full sympathy. Fortunately, the Catholics are not now a negligible quantity as they once were; but they are in a position to do something more than make a simple protest against the wily proceedings of a certain liberal school of the Cavour type, whose resuscitation is being attempted.

L'EREMITA.

On the occasion of the sacerdotal jubilee of the Holy Father, the Association for Poor Churches of Rome, initiated the work of collecting for the Holy Father a quantity of sacred articles, which would be helpful to the poor churches. The answer came quickly from all parts of the world, and it was equal to the numerous demands for help, that came to the Vatican. From June 1, 1909, to the last day of December, there were distributed sixty thousand objects for ceremonial uses; 2,242 parochial churches profited by it, also 275 missions, 260 monasteries, and 305 convents. The distribution has yet to finish and it is being continued generously.

The Holy See recently divided Egypt into two vicariates, detaching the ancient one, which extended over the whole length of the Delta, and forming a new one with the title of the Delta of the Nile. Whilst the first ancient vicariate had its see at Alexandria, the new one is located at Cairo, and the first bishop will be Mgr. Auguste Doret, from the Mission of Lyons, who will receive consecration at the end of the month. He will return for Easter and take possession of his new office.

During Lent all the Pontifical Court, and all the cardinals, are present in the Curia every Friday to assist at the preaching which takes place in the Vatican by the apostolic preacher, who, for this year, is the Rev. Father Luca, of Padua, a Capuchin. The Holy Father assists, but privately. The first sermon was delivered on February 11.

After the grave document dispatched last month to the President of the Catholic Economical Union of Bergamo, which cut off authoritatively the controversy, that has for so long agitated the Catholic Italian camp, on the subject of the alliance of their political opinion with their religious faith; another Pontifical document on the same subject is a letter of the Cardinal Secretary of State to the Federation of the Rural House of Italian Catholics. It repeats strongly the ideas already expressed in the preceding document and urges this association to take on an open and frank Catholic character, which should constitute the mark of all its actions, socially and economically. Nor must it ever cease, it says, to be first and above all, Catholic. In importance this document surpasses evidently the limits of the occasion which inspired it, and constitutes a judgment and a general rule. Besides, it is well understood that in particular cases it is intended to leave the solution of the difficulty to the judgment of the local bishop. It is certain that in regard to the Italian movement, the Pontiff's skilful and seasonable admonitions constituted the remedy of many dangers, which without blame to anyone, were beginning to take root to the evident damage of the life itself of the same movement.

Princess Marie of Denmark

STOCKHOLM, MARCH 1, 1910.

Among the three Scandinavian kingdoms, Denmark is the smallest, possessing, however, a real importance, on account of the members of its family who have occupied, and still occupy, many of the most prominent thrones in Europe. It is a Danish princess, who is Queen of England, and her elder sister is the Empress Dowager of Russia. A brother of the present king reigns in Greece, and a son of King Frederic has been called to reign on the Norwegian throne.

We find, in this family, united by affection, and cosmopolitan in their acts, all the leading countries of Europe represented, and it is not astonishing that France also has its place. When in 1885 Prince Waldemar, son of the fiery King Christian, and brother of the present king, married in Paris, the Princess Marie d'Orléans, it not only carried French traditions into Denmark, but it also broke the prejudice, which for three hundred years had not allowed any Catholic princess to become a member of the Royal House of Denmark. The Princess Marie's cousin is that generous Queen Amélie of Portugal, famous not only for her intelligence and her energy, but for the tragedy which tore from her her husband and eldest son, and gave her the opportunity to show once again her magnanimity and her many Christian virtues. Her brother, Prince Henri d'Orléans, is universally known for his daring and clever voyages of exploration, for whom, unhappily, death came too soon.

When Princess Marie arrived in Denmark it did not take her long to gain all hearts; her father-in-law, the old King Christian, showed particularly a deep affection for his daughter-in-law. It is said the princess exercised a great influence with the king on political questions, but it was not so much in this domain as in his private life that her influence is found. Some small acts of her life are sufficient to show her great popularity.

The Parisian newspaper, l'Éclair, relates that when a French squadron was anchored off Copenhagen, the princess one morning saw a sailor in a grocer's shop yelling in French, the shop-keeper answering in Danish. Seeing the distress of her humble compatriot the princess came to his help.

"Well, my friend, it is not easy to make yourself understood," she said to him, and placing him quickly at his ease, offered to interpret for him. Side by side, they made their purchases. In leaving the good lady the sailor thanked her warmly, after having confided that he was the chef of the admiral's ship and had been sent to buy the provisions for a grand gala dinner that was to be given on board. That same evening the dinner came off on the ship, and among the select party present was the princess. At the beginning of the meal, the admiral offered her the menu, which she pushed away gently with the remark: "Useless. I know all that it contains," and went on to enumerate the courses.

The admiral was puzzled, but thought it best to observe a diplomatic silence. The princess ate with a good appetite and praised the cooking with such enthusiasm, that at the end she asked if she could congratulate the chef. Judge the surprise of the latter, when presented he recognized that she was his gracious interpreter. His confusion was equalled by the admiral's astonishment in learning the answer to his previous curiosity.

Among the poor of Copenhagen, or more exactly, of all Denmark, the princess was truly loved, because they soon understood that she gave not only her gold, but also her heart full of ardor and generosity. Every year she donated considerable sums to a society in order to organize Christmas feasts for the poor children, and she would assist personally at all festivals where the children were gathering together, resembling a Christmas angel herself. The princess would disappear during the hours she passed with the little ones, there only remained a woman with a large heart.

One day, six years ago, she arrived at a Christmas-tree party just as the children were starting to eat. Separated from the other children was a little girl, seven years old, eating alone, and crying because she was not allowed to be with the others, as she was very dirty and clothed in rags. The princess sat down on the bench beside the poor child and talked so amiably that the little one was cheered, and when the meal was finished, the child placed her arms around the princess' neck and kissed her to thank her. The next day the princess sent her valet to the child's parents, and had her placed in a children's home, where she still is, and she is known under the name of Princess Marie's protégée.

One rainy day, some years ago, Princess Marie, in returning from a riding school, took, as she frequently did, the tramway, in order to get home; all the seats were occupied, when an old woman got on, but none of the men inside got up to offer her a seat.

"There is room on the outside," said the conductor.

"Then I will go up," said the princess, and turning to the old woman, she added, "and you can sit here." At once a dozen well-dressed men got up but the princess refused to accept a place, adding: "You have no need to get up on account of me," and in spite of the rain, stood all the way back on the outside of the tramway.

In the history of the charities of Copenhagen, Princess Marie occupied a place apart, and a sale at which she was not present, was not considered a success. The Catholic institutions at Copenhagen were an object of great solicitude to her, particularly the "Mariahemmet" (Home of Mary), founded by the well-known convert, Baron Stampe Charisimo. One evening when a hundred poor women and Catholic mothers were gathered together for a "Mariahemmet" meeting, the princess, in a most amiable manner, served tea and cakes, and talked with the old people.

In the same way the princess gained by her kindheartedness all hearts. She knew how to act with tact in all delicate situations, and that tact was often put to the proof, as she was the only Catholic princess in a Protestant court. Her religious duties as a Catholic she fulfilled conscientiously, and gave the Princess Marguerite, her daughter, a good Catholic education.

"In spite of everything," writes the Catholic newspaper, the Nordisk Ugeblad, "it is a particularly consoling remembrance for her relatives, and for us, her co-religionists, that the last words of Princess Marie were a cry for a benediction. May God give His blessing to her also, and give her his light and peace."

BARON G. AVONFELT.

Hon Richard D. Kerens, Ambassador to Austria, has given $20,000, for free beds for the poor in the hospital of the Medical Department of the University of St. Louis. This is in addition to his recent gift of a similar amount to the Newsboys' Home. Mrs. Kerens, who was manager of a bazaar for the Industrial School of the Sisters of Charity, has presented the Sisters with $30,000 as the proceeds of that enterprise.

Do Catholics Buy Books?

Frequently the complaint of the Catholic publicist and publisher is heard that Catholics do not support the press—that they do not subscribe for newspapers, periodicals, or buy books on Catholic subjects. We could never comprehend the reasons for this complaint. We have known several men who have grown rich by selling books to Catholics, and they were not always very cheap books, but, as a rule, rather expensive.

Not long ago we had occasion to notify our readers that a firm, selling a work of two volumes under one cover, with the title of "Catholic Encyclopædia," was only giving, for a high price, a medley of things which had already been published, some of them many years ago. So confident was the purveyor of this book of a sale among Catholics that he had ordered 5,000 copies from the publishers!

Now comes another publication on a more grandiose scale—a reprint of de Montor's "Lives and Times of the Roman Pontiffs," in ten volumes, at $10 a volume, and an edition de luxe, limited to fifty sets, at $100 a volume.

De Montor died in 1849, and yet his name appears on the circular announcing this reprint of his work, along with the names of living persons, as though he were still the living author of it. The book appeared as early as 1843, and in 1867 it was announced in D. & J. Sadlier & Co.'s catalogue of new books as a publication in two octavo volumes, with forty steel engravings, varying in price from $14 to $25, according to the quality of the binding.

De Montor was a distinguished Catholic publicist, but his work was simply a collection of biographies of the popes, written in a popular style, without pretense to much learning or research. Since his day the history of the popes may be said to have been written in a scholarly and scientific manner for the first time, and it is a great pity that publishers should be content with a work so long out of date, and so inadequate for a subject of such vast importance.

Usually, when the sellers of such books offer them to possible purchasers, they insist very strongly on the fact that the works bear the nihil obstat or imprimatur of some prelate, as if an imprimatur implied anything more than that the contents of the book are satisfactory, so far as doctrinal or moral teaching is concerned. An imprimatur is not meant to be a certificate of scholarship or of research, and much less does it imply that a work published before the era of historical study and criticism can satisfy the scholarly inquirer of to-day. Least of all is it fair to the prelates who, in the line of their official duties, affixed their imprimatur and signature to any book, to appeal to these as a justification of fancy and extravagant prices, which are altogether out of proportion, not only to the contents, but even also to the material make-up of such books.

So long as high-priced subscription books of this nature find a sale among Catholics, it is unreasonable to complain that Catholics do not buy books, or support the press.

French Frauds

France has suddenly, on the eve of the general election, discovered a gigantic fraud which our predecessor, The Messenger, in its issue of February, 1908, had already adumbrated in unmistakable terms.

"Seven years ago," then wrote Father Campbell, "the Prime Minister of France, Waldeck-Rousseau, had a vision. He saw the Goddess of Plenty rise above the ruins of the confiscated estates of the Religious Orders, and he promised the nation that prosperity would pour down in showers upon the people; the dissatisfied workmen would revel in the riches which were waiting for them behind the convent walls; and every old person in France, respectable or otherwise, would be provided with a pension. There were at least a billion of francs available in the properties of the congregations, which had no legal right to exist. They had never been authorized. He was a lawyer and he declared that the seizure would be strictly in accordance with law. The Government had only to reach out its hands and help itself. He died before he realized his scheme. . . . The world had almost forgotten about the seizure of the convents in the spoliation of the churches that has since supervened. The memory of the first crime now comes back to us in the lurid figures of a report just presented to Parliament. It is a revelation that makes one gasp, and wonder how a Government that not only permits but authorizes such proceedings can stand. This work of confiscation has been going on for six years, and not one word had so far been vouchsafed by the looters during all that time, as to what they were doing. At last, after reiterated demands, a report addressed to the President of the Republic, has been handed in; but it stops at December 31, 1906; that is one year ago. What they have accomplished during these twelve months is absolutely withheld from public knowledge. But what the report admits with regard to the time it is supposed to cover ought to send a shiver down the spine of every Frenchman. It acknowledges, in the first place, that the Government has advanced to the spoilers, to accelerate the work, the amazing sum of 8,368,241 francs. Moreover, on December 31, 1906, when all the accounts were closed, the results of the liquidations were as follows: The liquidators had paid into the Public Administrator's Office 14,227,770 francs. They had, besides, on hand, 445,000 francs, plus a certain number of Government certificates belonging to different congregations. But it was declared that up to December 31, 1906, the sale of the property of the congregations had produced 32,380,000 francs. What has become of the 17,717,230 francs not paid in? Had that vast amount been absorbed in the cost of liquidation, and how?"

Father Campbell proceeds to show that the enormous lawyers' fees run up to 1,000,671 francs. "One of the most barefaced things in this so-called report," he writes, "is that there is no way of finding out what the liquidators got. In fact, they resent being asked for an accounting. But if the lawyers gobbled a million, it is clear that the liquidators demanded and got much more."

A Paris despatch to the New York Times, dated March 10, confirms Father Campbell's forecast of two years ago, for it states that the Government has accepted an interpellation regarding the scandal which developed with the discovery of a shortage of two million dollars in the accounts of M. Duez, one of the liquidators of the Church properties taken over by the State. The Paris Journal gives some interesting figures regarding the deterioration of the property of non-authorized congregations and teaching orders which former Premier Waldeck-Rousseau originally estimated would realize two hundred million dollars—le milliard—for the State. After inventories were made the estimated figures were reduced to one hundred million and subsequently to fifty million dollars, when the Church issued a decree of excommunication against the purchasers. As a matter of fact the gross receipts thus far from this property amount to only nineteen million dollars, of which sum $13,200,000 has been expended in the adjudication of claims against the property and in other costs, including attorneys' fees, expenditures and commissions to the liquidators. After two years' work, the French Government found that it had made a profit of only $38,000 from its efforts during that long period to sell property which was supposed when the Law of Associations was originally passed to be worth, roughly, two hundred million dollars.

These disheartening figures confirm the forecast made over and over again by French Catholic journals and reviews in the past ten years that the spoliation of the Religious Orders would be of little or no profit to the Government, because these communities were generally poor, living cheaply from hand to mouth, having heavy mortgages on their property, because litigation would absorb large sums, and because the liquidating agents of a robber government must be expected to rob for themselves. To all these unanswerable forecasts the secular press turned a deaf ear until the colossal robberies of Duez, Lecouturier, and Martin Gauthier, which have lately created a sensation comparable to the Panama, Dreyfus and Boulanger affairs. What new catastrophe is needed to open the eyes of the non-Catholic world to the fact most clear to all well-informed Catholics, the tremendous pecuniary loss inflicted upon France by the suppression of religious congregations. What the proletariat of that benighted country gets out of all this plunder is a great increase in taxation due to the necessity of providing new schools, new orphan asylums, new charitable institutions of all kinds, with well-salaried officials in place of unsalaried religious, and above all, now that religion is taboo in France, new prisons and many of them.

One Kind of Fishing

Some fish appear in great shoals only at certain seasons where at other times they are so scarce that they hardly appear in the net or nibble at the hook; others are protected by the game warden from dynamiters or unlicensed trollers. But, alas, others there are with no effective protection at any season and they seem to be always present in shoals. They are the fish that gulp down greedily whatever a flaring advertisement may offer as bait. In comparison with them, the frog, which bolts a bit of red flannel and the crab which clings to a ham-bone are paragons of prudence.

A periodical has its advertising rates, which are steeper as its circulation increases, yet how many columns are devoted to clap-trap advertising often masked as the most altruistic philanthropy!

The old style of hoaxing the dear public consisted in an offer made by a "returned missionary" to send positively without charge, a prescription which he picked up among the head hunters of Borneo or some other outlandish people. The remedy from so worthy a source offered so charitably must be worth having, it must be sent for. And when it came, it proved to contain various familiar ingredients—and one ounce (more or less) of pulverized zip-boom-bah root, or its near relation.

Further correspondence brought out the fact that the "missionary" had brought back with him a quantity of the precious drug, which he was willing to part with at cost, purely out of love for his fellowman. The inquirer would forward the exact cost and receive in return a package which could be refilled at the nearest sawmill. Fish number one.

Nowadays, the dear public are taken more into the advertiser's confidence. Anybody suffering from rheumatism, chilblains, ossification of the brain pan, neurosis or galloping senility will learn, free of charge, of a safe, sure, speedy specific upon writing, etc. Finding in himself many if not all of the advertised symptoms, he writes and learns what he should have known already, that Professor Bleedem's boomite (to be had of all druggists) will do the job for him. Fish number two.

Some good soul, who must have had an annual celebration on December 28, saw a cure assured under promise of a money payment in case of failure. If our memory serves us, he lived in Ohio, or possibly in a nearby State. Buoyed up by the promised cure, he invested in the remedy and waited more or less patiently for the cure that did not come. Then he demanded the forfeit and went to law to get it. Of course, he had no case. When small boys are drowning out a gopher, the number of pailfuls of water required to effect the desired result is regularly "one more." The healers had a similar argument at hand. Who told him how much of the cure he had to take?

They stood by their guarantee, but they had never pretended to say how many bottles or how much time might be needed to restore his health. Why did he drop the medicine and thus spoil the treatment? He should have kept at it until he was cured or dead, and then lay the facts before the defendants. Fish number three.

Since health is so precious it is easy to understand how poor invalids will clutch at a tiny straw, but the ghoulishness of those that prey upon them defies description. What costs us nothing is worth what we pay, says the sagebrush philosopher. Very few sane people are earnestly bent on throwing away privately what they have honestly obtained. Extraordinary offers of goods at far less than cost when made by unknown and irresponsible people may well make us pause and think, lest we fall victims to the attractive bait, and thereby qualify for membership in the mighty shoal. Yes, one kind of fishing always flourishes.

A Divorce Judge on Divorce

In England proceedings for divorce are confined to a division of the High Court of Justice. They are, therefore, somewhat expensive; and a few months ago it was proposed, in the interest of the poor, to grant jurisdiction in the matter to the county courts. The proposal was referred to a Royal Commission for examination, and Sir John Bingham, President of the Divorce Division of the High Court, has been giving testimony worthy of being pondered carefully. He expressed his decided dislike for the law he administers; and, stating explicitly that he was regarding the matter, not from the viewpoint of religion, but from that of public policy, he asserted that, if the welfare of the community at large be considered, the breaking of the marriage-tie is a much greater evil than the enduring by individuals of many of those things on which pleas for divorce are based. He held that religion could make this possible, and called attention to the small number of Catholics appearing in his court. He added that the condition of Ireland to which the English divorce laws did not extend, seemed to him at least not less happy than that of England. The remarriage of divorced persons is to his mind contrary to the public welfare. He considered the proposed extension most undesirable, since it would set up so many different standards of judgment in the matter, the tendency of which would be to admit more and more readily pleas altogether sentimental, and amongst such he included "mental anguish," with which we are so familiar in parts of this country. He was utterly opposed to the making of a sentence of five years' imprisonment, a ground for divorce. To expose the criminal who had received the strict sentence of the law, to the additional penalty of the loss of his wife, would be unjust; and he thought that this view would prevent judges from imposing adequate sentences on crime.

An English Sacred Concert

Good Friday is celebrated in London in various ways. Last year Mr. H. Bernhardt determined to help the celebration. He is a concert-director, and he applied to the lessees of the Lyceum Theatre for their house for a sacred concert. He was told he could have it for fifty pounds, if the concert was to be really sacred. He assured them it was, and the bargain was struck. Mr. Bernhardt then put up his bills, setting forth the names of the performers at the sacred concert. Among these were Miss Marie Tempest, Mrs. Lewis Waller, Mr. Lionel Brough, Mr. Bransby Williams and others, excellent artists, but not associated in the public mind with things sacred. The managing director of the Lyceum cancelled the contract on the grounds that Mr. Bernhardt's idea of a sacred concert was evidently not one likely to be approved by the Lord Chamberlain and that its realization in their house would cause his company the loss of their lease and get them into other difficulties. Thereupon Mr. Bernhardt sued the Lyceum Company for damages. Mrs. Lewis Waller testified that Mr. Brough and Mr. Williams were quite capable of giving a performance that would be acceptable to an audience on Good Friday. This, no doubt, is perfectly true; but whether their performance would have been acceptable to the Lord Chamberlain's office, is another question. We are not told what Miss Tempest's turn was to have been. Mrs. Waller was to have recited: "How Old Harry won the Victoria Cross," as something quite in harmony with the day. Mr. Richard Temple stated that he was to have recited a Psalm of David. He could recite psalms very well, he added, but he was also good at comic pieces, and he thought the public preferred to hear him in these. The trial did not bring out how Mr. Brough and Mr. Williams were to have done their sacred turns; though the Secretary of the National Sunday League thought they might have given suitable selections from Shakespeare and Dickens without offence. The jury gave a provisional verdict for the concert-director; but the judge reserved the decision on points of law.

An Anglican Oversight

The London Church Times gravely informs an inquirer that, though Pius IX by his bull, "Ineffabilis Deus," settled for Roman Catholics the question of the Immaculate Conception, the English Church has made no declaration on the subject. To those who recognize the vigor of the Church of England as a teaching Church, this must be a surprise, yet an examination of the long series of doctrinal decisions with which, since the Reformation, it has protected the purity of its primitive faith, will show the Church Times to be strictly correct. Could not a case be prepared for the Court of Appeal or for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to which dogmatic definitions seem to belong? Or at least could not a resolution be carried in the English Church Union? Evidently something should be done to remove this stain upon its faith and to protest against the errors of Rome.

Away From Ireland

Though I'm far and very far away from Ireland—

There's a knot of purple thistles on a cliff above the sea,
Like a silver censer flaming between the sky and me,
The blood-red bells of fuchsias swing around a cabin door

Where the yellow sunlight showers down to flood the earthen floor—

Far away and very far away in Ireland.

Though I'm far and very far away from Ireland—

There's a grey rock 'mid the heather where the bees hum all the day

Across its mossy shoulder trails a crimson briar spray
Like a craobh of ancient Ogham locked beneath Time's magic key

But the beauty of its message is as clear as dawn to me—

Far away and very far away in Ireland.

Though I'm far and very far away from Ireland—

There's a turf-cart standing idle in a quiet village street,
The hens roosting on its axle in the shadow from the heat;

There's a barefoot boy beside it looking out across the sea,

And the birds have far more trouble for the morrow's morn than he—

Far away and very far away in Ireland.

Though I'm far and very far away from Ireland—

If the black hand of misfortune had gripped my heavy heart,

If the red blisters of disgrace had made my pale cheeks smart,

I'd little heed the trouble or the blame that lay on me
If climbing on a white road between golden whins I'd be

Far away and very far away in Ireland.

CAHAL O'BYRNE.

LITERATURE

Eight Essays on Joaquin Sorolla y Bastida. The Hispanic Society of America, New York, 1910.

These two volumes contain pretty nearly all there is to be said concerning the great modern Spanish master. They make pleasant reading for his admirers, yet the material, with one exception, is not new, and one gets a little tired of the repetition in various languages of facts and opinions with which one has been familiarly acquainted. The appreciations are written in English, French, Spanish and German. The value of the work lies in its comprehensiveness and in its exhaustiveness of the subject. Seven essays from the pens of Spanish, French and American critics make up the first volume. The second contains one lecture, unprinted up to the present, excerpts from the daily papers, a complete account of the attendance at the Sorolla Exhibition in New York (February 4 to March 9, 1909: total number of visitors, 159,831), and a detailed catalogue of the paintings shown at this exhibition. The books are illustrated throughout with numerous reproductions, not all equally satisfactory. The first essay, by Aureliano de Beruete, the Velasquez authority and Sorolla's friend, is marked by careful, thoughtful, discriminate investigation and scrutiny. Historically and critically, it deserves the place given it. ("Joaquin Sorolla y Bastida," La Lectura, Enero, 1901, Madrid.) Next in order, as in value, is Camille Mauclair's: "M. Sorolla y Bastida" (Art et Décoration, Octobre, 1906, Paris), also the production of a thinker, and of one who has profound and wide knowledge of the matter in hand. Henri Rochefort's "Un Astre qui se lève" is brief, enthusiastic and falls rather flat. (L'Intransigeant, 28 Juin, 1906, Paris). Leonard Williams' is good but rather diffuse (Introduction to the Catalogue. The Art of Joaquin Sorolla, New York, 1909) and the lengthy excursion into the past history of Spanish painting, in the way it is treated, does not seem to bear a direct enough relation upon the main subject. Elizabeth Luther Cary's estimate is intelligent and appreciative (New York Times, 14 February, 1909); James Gibbons Huneker's (New York Sun, 14 February, 1909), picturesque and slightly—picaresque. Christian Brinton's contribution, from the International Studio, March, 1909, a valuable and judicious article, is one of the best in our own tongue, though we take some objection to his appraisal of Sorolla as a portrait painter. Certainly, portraiture is not Sorolla's strong point, his likenesses are impressions like all his work, but he stamps these faces with an incredible air of alertness and living life: fleeting as the expression may be, at the moment of painting it stood for a vivid and intense actuality. Hals alone similarly arrests this transient flash of quickened being. William Starkweather, with his lecture in print, adds to the sum total of information some pleasant and intimate details of Sorolla the man, his working habits, his tastes, his children, his scholars. He takes us to Valencia, to the Cabañal, and to far, world-sequestered Jávea. In the way of description and criticism the essayists leave us exactly where we were before.

In 1910 one knows one's Sorolla by heart. He is the great light of modern Spanish painting, "peintre and rien que peintre" and, in saying that, we mean that he owns a power so great no man draws it forth out of his own treasure. He is an impressionist in the best and truest sense of the word. He works out of doors, as the men of 1860 discovered one must necessarily do, if one is to command the earth and the waters thereof, the sunshine and the winds of heaven. He draws miraculously (which is part of his gift as a painter), he has attained, through incessant practice, to abnormal skill and fearlessness of the brush; his color would be marvelous were it not so simple: a clear, light palette of pure tones, with deeper vibrations for robustness; and he is so in love with sea and sky, youth and life, "the feast and holiday of the waters and the sunshine," that he conjures up for many of us a world of long-dead summers. Camille Maclair looks almost with wonder on the beautiful wet bodies, the shining flesh and the innocent idylls on the shore: "Pas de volupté," is his comment. "La joyeuse chasteté, préférant le renforcement des jeux physiques à l'usure de l'amour, conserve, affine et exalte ces corps imprégnés du sel de la mer salubre et cinglés par le vent du large."

Why have none of these critics said what a strong influence Sorolla has had on our own painters, when the frequenting of exhibitions of contemporary painting demonstrates this simple fact to the naked eye?

G. F. P.

The Last American Frontier. By FREDERICK LOGAN PAXSON, Junior Professor of American History in the University of Michigan. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.50 net.

More than ordinary interest attaches to an historical account of what so recently was yet can never be again. The last war-like stand has been made by the wretched remnants of the Indian tribes which, almost within the memory of the living, roamed at will from the Alleghenies to the South Sea. Less than a century ago Detroit was waiting to hear the war-cry of the savage, and seventy years ago Illinois was the scene of Indian hostilities. But, decade by decade, sometimes year by year, the Indians, continuously driven forward from the East, and as continuously pressed back from the Pacific, found their freedom of movement gradually restricted until now they are penned in like the buffalo, a few scattered here and there, the objects of a mild curiosity, now stabled and foddered by hands once raised against them.

This is the story of "The Last American Frontier." Great names appear on its pages, names made famous in the halls of Congress or on the battlefield. Too often names cannot be given, for they were of the hardy pioneers whose memory survives only in the deeds which they accomplished. Full of the romantic life of the Wild West, yet written with sobriety and precision, the book preserves tales of daring which are still recounted by a few hoary veterans around the firesides in what was to children sixty years ago the Great American Desert. The Oregon emigrants, the Mormons, the Forty-niners, with the gold-seekers of later days, the prairie schooners on the Santa Fé trail and the Pony Express, all receive notice for their share in changing the ever-varying position of that frontier, until it wholly disappeared with the advent of the transcontinental railways.

The Dominion of New Zealand, by SIR ARTHUR P. DOUGLAS, Bt. Boston: Littlefield, Brown & Company.

This is not an easy book to classify. It is not descriptive, though it is not without its pleasing descriptions. It is not historical. It gives some of the history of New Zealand; but it omits much, especially concerning the great native revolt and the collapse of Anglican missions. It does not deal professedly with the natural history of the islands; nevertheless it gives a good deal of information on the subject. We would put it in the class of useful books compiled, rather than written without any pretence to literary quality. It gives one a fairly comprehensive view of New Zealand as it is, and of its development during the last thirty years, and particularly of the peculiar industrial legislation in which it has been the pioneer, and which has made its name famous. The book seems to have been designed for the benefit of agricultural immigrants, rather than for the outside world. To the former the abundant statistics, of the appendix especially, will be most helpful. The latter would be glad to learn more of the commerce and finance of the Dominion, and of the two great steamship companies, the Union and the New Zealand Shipping, remarkable enterprises in a people that do not yet number a million. We should like to see statistics of the cities, of their population, buildings, etc. The pictures are not calculated to flatter the patriotic New Zealander. For example, that facing page 22 cannot give a fair idea of the port of Auckland. The foreground is taken up with the sterns of two small coasting steamers of about a thousand tons with a small warehouse between them; in the middle distance are two steamers still smaller; but not even a suggestion is given of the great ocean liners that sail from it. This is the more remarkable, as the author is a sailor, a retired lieutenant of the British Navy. Still, as we have said, the book is a useful one and will well repay perusal.

Ireland's Great Future (Dublin: Sealy, Bryers & Walker) has been discovered by CLARA SMITH in the apocryphal Book of Enoch, a compilation of rabbinical legends and apocalyptic extravagances, interpolated and colored by early Christian sectaries. But Mrs. Smith is sure that Enoch was the source of all revelation and Ireland was his central theme, though Halley's Comet and the North Pole divided his attention with Orange and Green, Old Age Pensions and the drink traffic. We gather that Irishmen are the true seed of Jacob, and Ireland, the seat of Judgment and the holy mountain, will, with the aid of ozone from her American daughter, "rise from her present position, receive the homage of the world and solve the riddle of the universe." This she will do by means of true science, but what this is, or why the Dublin firm published this marvelous mixture, remains unsolved.

El Hombre tal cual es por EL PADRE RODOLFO J. MEYER de la Compañía de Jesús, Traducción del Inglés por el P. MANUEL PEYPOCH de la misma Compañía. St. Louis: B. Herder, 70 cents, net.

This is a Spanish version of the first volume of "The Science of the Saints" from the pen of the Rev. Rudolph J. Meyer, S.J. The Spanish language being so justly famed for the theological soundness, abundance and variety of its ascetical literature, it is no slight testimonial to the worth of this precious volume that it should be selected to appear in the company of such masterpieces of the spiritual life.

The distinguished author needs no better introduction to Spanish readers than this one book, which is sure to call forth a demand for the translation of the whole series. Beginning with the knowledge of self, the most difficult to acquire, as it is at the same time the most necessary knowledge, the learner advances step by step along the way of perfection to the goal of the new life, the life of charity, which perfects in us the divine likeness. We are impelled to commend with special earnestness the lessons on character (pp. 211, ff.), which reveal exceptional skill in reading and sifting souls. The translator has made all devout readers of Spanish his debtors by the fidelity with which these lessons on the interior life have been clothed in sonorous Castilian.

The Life of the Blessed Julie Billiart, Foundress of the Institute of the Sisters of Notre Dame. By a Member of the Same Society. Edited by the late FATHER JAMES CLARE, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net, $2.50.

No more appropriate memorial of the beatification of the Venerable Julie Billiart could have been given us than this second edition of her life. That an unlettered peasant should have planned the organization of one of the great teaching bodies of the Church and achieved a work in the educational world that has withstood all the attacks of a hundred years of novelty and still maintains its vigor is truly a miracle. Her holy life—an illustration of her favorite saying: "How good the good God is!"—is full of incident more romantic than the three-volume novel of former days. We recommend this life to all teachers, lay as well as religious.

Panama and the Canal. By ALFRED B. HALL and CLARENCE L. CHESTER. New York: Newson & Co., 27-29 West Twenty-third Street. Price, 75 cents, postpaid.

Although 'modestly styled a book for young readers, it will impart a world of information to the majority of American citizens. Tracing the history of the isthmus from the days of Columbus through the vicissitudes of the rule of the Spaniards, the raids of the buccaneers, the ill-advised attempts at colonization and the disputes of cabinets to final independence and the threshold of a bright future, the authors give us a series of pen pictures as thrilling as any child could crave; but they have done even more, for they have embellished the already attractive text with photogravures which it is a delight to study. The book is intended for supplementary reading in schools; we desire and expect for it a much wider scope of usefulness and pleasure. It contains a wealth of knowledge ready to be assimilated. Though not burdened with dry statistical tables, it gives us such an insight into Panama as it is to-day, its people and prospects, and the progress on the interoceanic canal, with some details of the labor involved, that old and young may derive knowledge and enjoyment from a perusal of Panama and the Canal.

Blessed Mary of the Angels. By REV. GEORGE O'NEILL, S.J. New York, Cincinnati, Chicago: Benziger Brothers.

This is a life that recalls the combination of faith, fervor and literary skill of Montalembert's "St. Elizabeth of Hungary." It is more difficult to tell, for the Carmelite nun, spending forty-one of her fifty-six years of life in a single convent, offered no such brilliant contrasts as the royal daughter of Hungary and Princess of Thuringia; and the inner court of the King of Kings in which she dwelt demanded of her biographer a more intimate knowledge and delicate appreciation of the niceties of the spiritual life than was possessed even by Montalembert. Father O'Neill has met the requirements in a way that will make his work a practical handbook for followers of the spiritual life and profitable also to those outside the walls, to whom its artistic grace cannot fail to commend it.

Born in 1661, of a family doubly ennobled—her father, Count of Fontenella, was first cousin to St. Aloysius of Gonzaga—Marianna de Fontenella had shown, with practical ability, strength of character and humble piety, an intense love of the Crucified Saviour that compelled self-crucifixion, when at fifteen she overcame all opposition to enter the Carmelite Convent of Santa Cristina at Turin. Her extraordinary mortifications thereafter and her intimate converse with the Unseen, her miracles and prophecies and the marvellous influence she exercised on the outer world of kings and courts and people, even in battle-fields and sieges, may seem strange to a pleasure-loving and skeptical age, but the writer, wisely indifferent to worldly standards, faithfully sets down the life she lived, trimming in naught the wings of truth to the measure of those who witness its flight on lower levels.

It was an age of faith, and a breath from its atmosphere is a refreshing and not unneeded stimulant. Mary of the Angels found also in the Novitiate Louisa of Mercy, who as Louise, Duchess de la Vallière, had fled from the frivolous court of Louis XIV to find peace in penitence under the coarse habit of the Carmelites. Mary of the Angels could promptly wake from ecstasy at the call of obedience to give practical directions on domestic details or wise counsel to the princes of Savoy on high affairs of state. "She did not lead armies, but she stayed them, and all her power was in peace." Her promise, soon fulfilled, that King Victor of Savoy would obtain a favorable treaty of peace from Louis XIV, if Turin were consecrated to St. Joseph, originated the Consecration of the whole Church to St. Joseph and the Feast of his Patronage.

But the true interest of this biography, the first in English of this remarkable saint, lies in the soul-battles waged and the treaties of celestial peace established within the cloister walls. It was a drama of Divine Love, and as far as language can set it forth, it has found a fitting setting. It is a happy omen that a Professor of English Literature in the new National University of Ireland should signalize the assumption of his chair by the publication of such a book.

A New Commandment. By MARY FOOTE COUGHLIN. Chicago: The Sisters of the Good Shepherd.

The charity of the Church is all-embracing, for it is the charity of Christ. The helpless and destitute infant, and the not less helpless and destitute grandame, draw from its inexhaustible sources, as do the wounded soldier on the battlefield, and the pest-stricken artisan in the lazaretto. Yet, though woman's noble heart is most responsive to the wail of suffering humanity, there is one form of charity which demands of her not only sympathy and sacrifice, but a self-renunciation which in its heroism is closely akin to the baptism of blood. Many, indeed, rise above the reproach of man's inhumanity to man, or woman's greater inhumanity to woman, and minister to the victims of bodily or spiritual ills; but the Sister of the Good Shepherd finds her lifework in caring for those who too often receive scant sympathy, little encouragement and less help from even the generously disposed. In her the "New Commandment" of Our Blessed Saviour finds one of its most heavenly portrayals. The endangered lambskins of the flock are her special care. What the spirit of the Good Shepherd has accomplished in one great centre of human activity and misery is summed up all too briefly in Miss Coughlin's sketch of the work of the Sisters during the sixty years since their Order was introduced into Chicago by the lamented Bishop Duggan. The humble beginning, the pinch of poverty, the havoc of the Great Fire, the dawn of better things, and the present vast establishment are fondly dwelt upon by one whose heart must be warm with the all-consuming love of the Good Shepherd. The photogravures liberally scattered through the book tell us in their own eloquent way the story of the success that has gloriously crowned the labors of so precious and venerated a part of the Church's cloistered auxiliaries, the daughters of Blessed Eudes, whom we know as the Sisters of the Good Shepherd.

Occasional Sermons and Addresses. New York: Joseph F. Wagner. Price $1.50.

First published in the earlier issues of the Homiletic Review, these sermons and addresses have now appeared in one substantial volume of nearly 400 pages. Great names appear among the authors—Archbishops Ireland and Montgomery, Bishops Horstmann and Bradley, and others not in the hierarchy but famed for their pulpit eloquence. The subjects are outside the beaten track and therefore the book is all the more likely to be in demand on some special occasion. Religious professions, graduating exercises, jubilees of priests and parishes, addresses on opening new schools, and three notable addresses to non-Catholics will give a hint of the usefulness of the compilation as a work of ready reference. It is a fine appendix to any series of sermons on the Sunday lessons and gospels.

The March Catholic World is a well-filled and varied number. There are three excellent biographical sketches, admirably illustrating three different spheres of religious activity: "Mother Mary Veronica," by Father Elliot, C.S.P.; "Coventry Patmore," by Katherine Brégy, and "The First American Cardinal," by Thomas F. Meehan. Father Grafton, S.J., gives a vivid picture of the Tyrolean fight for Faith and fatherland, and Father Searle shows that the Spiritualists' problem is solved only by the Catholic Church. The opening paper, "The Celtic Element in Philosophy," is contributed by Dr. Turner, of the Catholic University, who is happily qualified racially and philosophically to treat a subject so comprehensive and elusive. He shows that the Celt, whether pagan or Christian, Gael or Gaul, was an idealist, visualizing the unseen, believing the immortality of spirit and realizing the other world more vividly than other peoples. Hence, Irish philosophers were strong partisans of Plato, the only Greek who gave Ideas a supra-mundane origin. The Celtic demand for clearness and precision led to disputatiousness, a characteristic that Cæsar noted in the Druids, and has been always attributed to the Irish in the European universities and even elsewhere. Dr. Turner is sure that Duns Scotus was a Celt, but cannot decide with the documents at his disposal whether the great Franciscan was Irish, English or Scotch. What documents, then, decide that he was a Celt? The only admittedly genuine and decisive document on the subject is the recently discovered Franciscan catalogue of 1381, which enters Scotus as "of the province of Hibernia." The doctor's reticence on this point would indicate that combativeness, the defect of Celtic philosophical qualities, is dying out, but his paper is proof that the qualities persist.

SOCIOLOGY

The Rev. Philip J. Magrath makes an appeal for funds for the Catholic Seamen's Mission of this city. Like all our Catholic social works, this aims at reaching the soul through the body; the spiritual through the material. It seeks to keep the sailor out of evil resorts and the jail by providing for his comfortable amusement. But it does not stop here. It goes on to care for his soul. During the past year 35,457 men visited the Mission rooms. The average number at Mass on Sundays was 225, and at Sunday night services, 140. 820 Confessions were heard; 225 pledges administered; 756 scapulars given. 38 entertainments were held. 685 packages of reading matter were sent to ships, and all this at a cost of only $2,272.60. Who, then, dare say that we Catholics are incapable of social works? Just think of what could be done with $22,726. A benefit will be held for the Mission at Palm Garden, April 19, 1910. Business men can help it by advertising in the program to be distributed at it. Cards should be sent to Hiram M. Kirk, 130 Fulton street, New York City.

Some years ago a clever swindle was worked from Spain. It is once more being attempted and is briefly this: Some one in the United States receives a letter telling him that a Cuban patriot dying in a Spanish prison claims him as a distant relative. The patriot has a daughter, and a certificate of deposit for a large sum in a secret receptacle of a valise. If the person in the United States will take charge of the daughter, he may have for his reward a quarter of the money. The valise is in the hands of the Spanish authorities, and to get at it money is necessary. If he will send a certain sum to the prison chaplain all will be arranged. Sometimes the writer is a Russian, but the scheme is the same. We publish this to put our readers on their guard. At the same time we have but little sympathy for one who, in his anxiety to get money for nothing, falls into the trap laid for him.

A committee with Lord Milner at its head declares that the boys and girls of Great Britain are deteriorating, physically and morally. It lays the blame on street trading, and the employment of children in a way that hinders their education and teaches them no trade. Street trading puts them on the streets; an employment leading to inevitable discharge when manhood and womanhood is reached throws them on the streets. Commercialism, seeking cheap production for a wide market, has destroyed the apprentice system, and many places of skilled workmen and workwomen are filled by foreigners trained in Germany and France. The committee recommends compulsory attendance at continuation schools and the reduction of working hours up to seventeen years of age; the raising of the school-leaving age, which is now fourteen, and the prohibiting of street trading by children under seven-teen.

The Census Bureau is most anxious for an exact enumeration. The President shares in this anxiety. He has issued a proclamation to the people of the United States calling upon them to answer the questions of the enumerators faithfully, and pointing out that the refusal to do so is a punishable offence. He also assures all that their fears, to which we alluded in a late number, are utterly groundless; that the census has nothing to do with taxation, army or jury service, compulsory school attendance, immigration or anything of the kind, and that every employee is forbidden under heavy penalty from disclosing to any but the Census Bureau the information he receives.

Some years ago the Zionist movement was set on foot. It is now stated that since the proclamation of the constitution in Turkey, which made more easy their reentrance into Palestine, a large number of Jews have returned to the land of their fathers. Four-fifths of the inhabitants of Jerusalem are said to be Jews, and the lands about Lake Tiberias, the Plains of Sharon and Esdraelon are filled with their farms.

The St. Paul Mining Company has settled fifty claims for the deaths of miners in the Cherry Mine at from $800 to $1,200 each. It is negotiating to settle a hundred others at $1,800 each.

The Department of Commerce and Labor tells us that the advance in the price of meat so severely felt in this country is found all over the world. The increase is greater in mutton and pork than in beef, and in preserved and salted meat than in fresh or frozen. This is true of the export trade from Australia and New Zealand as well as in the markets of Germany, Russia and the United Kingdom. In connection with this it may be mentioned that the annual statements for 1909 of two large English importers from New Zealand and Australia, Nelsons Limited and the Bovril Company, make a most unsatisfactory showing. In one case there was a large loss; in the other a reduction of profits to almost nothing. In both cases the disorganization of the market is held accountable.

The early Spanish missionaries introduced the olive into California, where its cultivation has long been on a commercial scale; but in Arizona the work, though past the experimental stage, is still capable of much greater development. The Agricultural Experiment Station at Tucson, in its Bulletin No. 62, gives some valuable data on olive culture in Arizona, as well as results in the quality, quantity and value of the oil produced under local conditions. The tree cannot successfully withstand greater cold than 20 degrees Fahrenheit, but in resisting drought it is second only to the date palm. Lack of water for a year would destroy citrus trees, while the olive would simply bide its time. Like the peach and deciduous fruits in general, the olive does not come true from seed. Valuable varieties, therefore, must be propagated by grafting, budding, or cuttings. When the tree is ten years old, a fair yield is one hundred pounds to the tree. The consumption of olive products is far in excess of the domestic production and will remain so indefinitely, for the wages of unskilled labor in the United States are about three times as great as they are in Italy, from which country the heaviest importations are made. As a rule, the fruit produced in Arizona is larger than that of the same variety cultivated in California. It is worthy of remark that in competition with famous French, Spanish and Italian varieties cultivated in the Territory, the old mission olive from the California missions is placed at the head of the list in the production of oil.

The Western Union Telegraph Company announce that in future, from five in the afternoon till midnight, they will send telegrams of fifty words to any of their offices in the United States at the same rate that ten-word messages are sent during the day. Code words or words from foreign languages are excluded. For every additional ten words one-fifth of the present day-rate will be charged. The messages may be left at the transmitting offices at any time. The messages will be sent by mail from the receiving offices. Eventually arrangements will be made to telephone them from the receiving offices to the persons addressed when possible.

The British Exchequer returns from April 1, 1909, to February 26, 1910, show a decrease in the total revenue, compared with the same period of the preceding year, of some $60,000,000. The spirit duties for the United Kingdom have fallen 11 per cent. and for Ireland alone about 40 per cent. The falling off in the export trade is a loss to Ireland of $4,000,000 per year.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The will of the late Rev. J. J. Healy, of Gloucester, Mass., was admitted to probate on March 4. To the Archdiocese of Boston, for the seminary at Brighton, is bequeathed $6,000 for scholarships for worthy and indigent candidates for the priesthood. Boston College receives $3,000 to found two scholarships and $3,000 more is given for two scholarships at Holy Cross College, Worcester.

He wills $5,000 to St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, for a scholarship to one who will devote his life to the negro mission, and $2,000 additional for two scholarships for the negro mission in some suitable school or college. Carney Hospital, Boston, receives $5,000.

Other bequests are: the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, $3,000; Home for Destitute Catholic Children in Boston, $5,000; Gloucester Public Library, $10,000; Gloucester City Hospital, $5,000, and to the City of Gloucester, $50,000, to be known as the Father Healy Fund, to be invested in United States bonds or other government securities, the income to be devoted to the support of the poor and needy. The Rev. William J. Dwyer, Pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Medway, has been appointed Father Healy's successor at Gloucester.

Archbishop Farley has directed a diocesan collection to be taken up on Easter Sunday for Cathedral College, which is now an integral part of the diocesan Seminary. There is a mortgage debt on it of $280,000. The College, which is finishing its seventh year, has a staff of seventeen professors in charge of one hundred and seventy students.

A press cable from Rome says that the Right Rev. Thomas F. Lillis, Bishop of Leavenworth, has been transferred to Kansas City, as the coadjutor with the right of succession to the venerable Bishop Hogan of that see. Bishop Lillis was born at Lexington, Mo., in 1862, and ordained priest in 1885. He was Vicar-General of the diocese and Pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Kansas City, when he was consecrated Bishop of Leavenworth, on December 27, 1904.

On February 4 the Most Rev. Joseph Colgan, Archbishop of Madras, celebrated the sixty-sixth anniversary of his arrival in India. The sole survivor of the missionary band of which he then formed a part, his Grace, in spite of his eighty-seven years and long stay in the tropics, is in the full enjoyment of health and faculties.

OBITUARY

Right Rev. Mgr. William Heinen, V.F., of St. Joseph's Church, East Mauch Chunk, Pa., died on March 3. The deceased prelate was born at Willich, Germany, November 16, 1839, and his early manhood was spent as a law student and as a soldier in the Prussian army. During a military manœuvre in 1860 he was accidentally wounded and made a vow that if his life was spared he would devote it to the service of the Church in the foreign missions. He recovered, and later offered himself as a subject to Archbishop Wood, of Philadelphia, where he arrived in August, 1869. Having completed a course in theology, he was ordained in April, 1871. After ministering in various mission stations he was sent to East Mauch Chunk in 1874, and since then his labors there have been as unceasing as they were successful. He built several fine schools, and for the use of the Poles, Hungarians and other Slavic Catholics who flocked into the mining region, a number of churches in different neighboring centers, his efforts among these people being so fruitful that the Archbishop made him the Vicar over all the Slav population within his jurisdiction. The office entailed immense difficulties, but Mgr. Heinen met them with the utmost prudence and patience. He also did much for the Italians, and visited Europe for the purpose of obtaining priests for them and the other non-English speaking congregations. On the day of his funeral, March 8, business was suspended in Mauch Chunk and the whole population, Protestant and Catholic, vied in paying honor to his memory.

Rev. William A. Stanton, S.J., died in St. Louis, on March 11. Father Stanton was born in St. Louis in 1870, and after his classical studies in the St. Louis University entered the Society of Jesus in 1887. On the completion of his course in philosophy and science in 1894 he fulfilled the duties of a professor in Detroit College for a brief interval before assuming a similar task in St. John's College, Belize, British Honduras. He returned to St. Louis in 1899 and entered upon the study of theology, but before the end of his course was sent to the Philippines, where, in 1902, he was the first American priest ordained in those islands. In the following year he went to Spain to make his tertianship, and on his return to St. Louis was assigned to a lonely post in the distant jungle of the Honduran mission. He remained there without a single white companion until last December, when ill-health, brought on by hardship and privation, drove him back to civilization. He was sent to a hospital in St. Louis for the recovery of his strength; but the drain upon it had been too great, and after a lingering illness, borne with characteristic cheerfulness, the heroic missionary passed away at a comparatively early age.

Father Stanton found time, whilst in the Philippines, to pursue his favorite study of entomology. His communications on that subject to the Smithsonian Institution were received with high official appreciation, and his name was given to a classification of insect life on which his observations threw new light.

Dr. Carl Lueger, Mayor of Vienna, Austria, died in that city March 10, after a month's illness. Born in the Austrian capital, October 24, 1844, and finishing his university studies at the law school of the Imperial University there in 1874, Dr. Lueger has ever since played a prominent rôle in the politics of his native city. From the beginning he was a leader of the Anti-Semite party and a zealous antagonist of the Liberal element in the empire. In 1885 he was chosen to represent the Anti-Semite movement in the Imperial Reichsrath, and in that body, as well as in the Landtag of Lower Austria, of which he became a member in 1890, he proved a more ardent partisan than any of his followers. His advocacy of repressive measures against his political enemies caused, in other lands, bitter criticism of his leadership; but, as frequently happens in such criticism, much of the bitterness rested upon a lack of understanding on the part of his critics of political and social conditions in Austria. With the development of the Christian Socialist party in Vienna and Lower Austria, Dr. Lueger became the idol of his followers. Repeatedly he was chosen Mayor of his native city by the Vienna Town Council. Several times the Government, once the Emperor himself, refused to sanction his election, because of his claimed violent partisanship, and he resigned the office. Once or twice his resigning was followed by riots caused by his followers rising in protest against it. In April, 1897, he was elected to the post for the fifth time, and the strength of his party was such as to force the approval of its action by the Government. During his administration of the office, which he has filled continuously since that date, the city has been transformed not only in its administration and architectural appearance, but also in morals, and is now one of the most beautiful capitals in Europe.

Writing of his last election in 1909, an impartial critic of Dr. Lueger's administration says: "The history of Lueger's seven elections to his present post is of unusual interest, for it is the history of one of the greatest victories over graft and corruption in the records of modern municipal politics." Dr. Lueger, as is well known, was a fervent Catholic, fearless in his profession and practice of the Faith.

James O'Connor, M.P., died in London, March 12. Born in the Glen of Imaal, County Wicklow, 1836, he joined the Fenian movement at its inception, contributing prose and verse to the advanced organs of Irish opinion. He was on the staff of The Irish People, the official Fenian paper, when he was arrested with Thomas Clark Luby, John O'Leary and Charles J. Kickham, and sentenced to seven years of penal servitude. On his release he renewed his attacks on the Government in The Irishman, The Flag of Ireland and the Nation, and was one of the founders and strongest advocates of the Land League. Arrested with Parnell in 1881 and imprisoned in Kilmainham, he left jail to resume the editing of United Ireland, which had been suppressed, and continued on its staff until it was seized in 1892 by Mr. Parnell, whose policy he strongly opposed. Elected Member of Parliament for his native county in 1892, he has been returned without opposition at every subsequent election. An ardent patriot and forcible writer and speaker, he was respected by all parties, remaining on friendly terms with his political opponents. He was an exemplary Catholic and exercised by his character a harmonizing and healthy influence in the councils of his party.

Colonel John A. O'Neill died in Franklin, St. Mary's Parish, La., March 10, aged eighty years. Born in Clonmel, Ireland, in 1830, he received a good education in his native town. Having traveled extensively he settled in New Orleans and served all through the Civil War with distinction. Removing with his family to Franklin, he established a large plantation and mercantile business in St. Mary's Parish. An editorial in the New Orleans Picayune describes him as "of sterling integrity, unflinching courage, untiring industry and high ideals, a soldier and citizen without fear and without reproach, a shining example to contemporaries and posterity alike." Always a devout Catholic, he saw to it that the eight children and forty-six grandchildren who survive him were educated in Catholic colleges and schools. He was deeply read in Catholic and Irish literature, and contributed financially and by personal influence to the interests of his Faith and country.

Colonel William H. Byrnes, President of the Hibernia Insurance Company, of New Orleans, died in that city, March 8, in his sixty-third year. Born in County Cavan, Ireland, he settled in New Orleans in his youth and attained prominence in business and financial circles and in public life.

He was an active member of the St. Vincent de Paul Society for forty years and served as vice-president and president of the central council. He was a Knight of Columbus and prominent in every Catholic movement.

Dr. Frank V. Cantwell, one of the foremost surgeons of New Jersey and for many years head of the surgical staff of St. Francis' Hospital, died recently in Trenton. His brother is the Rev. Dr. William P. Cantwell, Rector of the Church of St. Mary Star of the Sea, Long Branch, and editor of the Monitor of Newark. Dr. Cantwell was born in 1862.

Thomas J. McMahon, well known in New York business circles, and a brother of the Rev. Dr. Joseph H. McMahon, Rector of the Church of Our Lady of Lourdes, died, after a brief illness, at his home, this city, on March 13. Mr. McMahon, who was fifty-one years old, was secretary for a number of years of the Board of Trustees of St. Patrick's Cathedral and of Calvary Cemetery.

DRAMATIC NOTES

On Thursday evening, March 31, at 8.30 p. m., the Georgetown University Dramatic Association will present the comedy, "All the Comforts of Home," in the Astor Gallery of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. They gave the play in Washington for the benefit of the Christ Child Society, where it met with remarkable success and the papers proclaimed it the best performance of college amateurs in years. As the play was originally written it contained numerous female characters, but these have been entirely eliminated, and those who witnessed the play in Washington were unanimous in declaring that they were at a loss to see where women characters would fit in. The young Thespians have been rehearsing faithfully and are determined to show their friends in New York what they are capable of. The play will be given as a benefit for a fund to erect a statue in Washington to John Carroll, the first bishop of the hierarchy of the United States. The patrons include His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, His Grace Archbishop Farley, the editors and Board of Directors of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," and many prominent Catholic ladies and gentlemen. Tickets are on sale at the Waldorf, Tyson's and McBride's Theatre Ticket agencies, and by the manager of the play, at 39 West 38th street. The entire production is under the auspices of the New York Chapter of the Georgetown University Alumni Association.

"The Turning Point," Hackett Theatre. —There is little to recommend "The Turning Point." Its material is stale and its construction crude; clearly the work of a novice. There is the conventional villain of melodrama, the conventional betrayal of innocence, the conventional intrigue, the conventional comedy element, and the conventional triumph of the hero, put together as weakly as a primitive cart without springs, which bumps and jolts heavily over the conventional melodramatic highway. A sophisticated young Virginian, the careless and ignorant possessor of valuable coal lands, is about to sell his property for a song to a sharp and unscrupulous speculator from New York. He is fortunately awakened to a realization of the enormous value of his lands, by a hint from his lady-love, goes to New York and finally beats the speculator at his own game, and wins the lady in spite of the deceit and intrigue which has been woven around them by the villain, who is at the same time the speculator brought to book at last by the superior skill of the victorious hero. So runs the tale, and the sooner it gets to the end of the run the better.

CHARLES McDougall.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Right Rev. Abbot Gasquet, President of the Vulgate Commission, at the invitation of the Oliver Plunket Society of Rome, lectured in the Irish College, on February 17, on the work of the revision of the Biblical text confided to the Benedictine Order by the Pope.

The object of the Bible Commission, he said, was to return to the version translated by St. Jerome in 382 at the request of the Pope. Shortly after the time of St. Jerome it was found that owing to incorrect transcription no really reliable version existed, for which reason a Council held under Charlemagne in 789 decreed an improved edition. Of this version several copies exist still, one being preserved in St. Paul's, Rome. Years went by and copies were made anew, but transcribers again caused such confusion by adding in good faith notes and interpretations to the text that Roger Bacon wrote to the Pope in the thirteenth century suggesting a revision of the Bible.

After no little delay a Commission came to be appointed and forty years were passed at the work, Sixtus V publishing the manuscripts, which are to be seen at the Vatican even to this day. According to the knowledge of that day, this revision, notwithstanding the censures which some now seek to cast upon it, was done in a scientific manner. However, as many errors were found in the edition, it was recalled and rewritten by Clement VIII in 1592. Even in this edition again errors were not absent. Hence the decree of Pope Pius X to obtain a work drawn from the purest sources.

Dom Gasquet then illustrated his lecture by a series of slides, viz., that of Pius X, the initiator of the Vulgate Commission; St. Anselm's on the Aventine Hill, where the body holds its sittings; the consulting room of the Commission; the page of a book showing the method of procedure; several slides on the method of correcting words, and especially the Psalms; illustrations on Biblical remains in the British Museum; the room in St. Anselm's dedicated to the storing of the New Testament and of several bound volumes of parts already corrected. Slides followed showing an ancient manuscript from Florence, the Codex Alexandrinus, a manuscript used by Sixtus V and Clement VII, which had been brought to Rome from North Italy despite the protest of the monks who held it, and is supposed to have the date marked 541. After close examination the great Roman archaeologist, De Rossi, noticed certain erasures in this work and succeeded in tracing the word "Fridus" or "Alfridus" and another like "Anglorum." A slide of another page of a Bible which Abbot Alfridus took to Rome in 715 from Northumberland as a present to the Pope was also presented.

In the Irish sources whence he hopes to derive much help in his work, illustrations were given from the Book of Kells, belonging to the ninth century; the Book of Armagh, and other ancient remains, in which the beautiful penmanship and marvelous coloring of the old Irish scribes is so wonderfully evidenced.

At the conclusion of the lecture a vote of thanks was proposed by Father David Fleming, O.F.M., and seconded by Chev. P. L. Connellan. On putting the vote from the chair the Right Rev. Dr. Clancy, Bishop of Elphin, drew attention to several points of the lecture in which he felt special interest, one of which was the fatuity displayed by the so-called Reformers of the sixteenth century in pinning their faith to the Bible, seeing there were so many different versions in vogue. The other point noted by Dr. Clancy related to the large number of Irish documents mentioned by Abbot Gasquet as being of help in the revision of the Vulgate. Only a few days previously he (Dr. Clancy) had occasion to peruse certain papers showing that only a few centuries after St. Patrick had brought the Faith to Ireland, Irish monks were to be found toiling in Belgium, Germany, France, England, Scotland, and North Italy, and spreading the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

BLUE MONDAY IN "THE LIVING CHURCH."

II.

The examination undertaken by a writer in the Living Church of the mental and moral make-up of the convert to Rome from High Anglicanism results in a most unfavorable picture. Several types are set before us, all with some mental or moral twist. These men are, it appears, in many cases, morally bad. We do not stop to make any remark on this further than the very obvious comment as to the questions of charity, good taste and truthfulness here suggested. This writer states a little further on: "We have no pleasure in that sort of controversy which finds its chief weapons in the mud-bank." We place this statement alongside the above and leave the question to the judgment of the reader.

But they are not all bad. There are, we are told, some "good men, who have acted conscientiously and of whose sincerity there is no question." Morally this class may pass, but as for mental strength and sanity, they are, oh! so grievously lacking. Impracticable visionaries possessed with the idea of a glorious and perfect Church, which they seek and, of course, do not find, in Rome. Such are the great mass of Rome's recruits from this quarter of the ecclesiastical world. We do not propose to impugn this writer's justice or good faith. We content ourselves with saying that his knowledge of converts seems to have been singularly limited and unfortunate.

Accounts of conversions have been written in great numbers since the Tractarian movement, some three-quarters of a century ago, set in motion this great stream of converts to Rome, from the immortal "Apologia" down to that most interesting account of the conversion of Father Benson, son of a late Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury. They set before us men and women in all ranks and conditions of life. They give us a record of spiritual struggles of peculiar and sometimes thrilling interest. They show heroic sacrifices made for the truth, often fortune and position and friends resigned, and the tenderest ties with the past sundered at the bidding of conscience.

Amongst them all we fail to trace the characteristics sketched by our critic. True, he may reply that the number of those who have written is small compared to the total, and that naturally the moral failures and the disappointed ones do not care to record their experiences. So it is, but we turn, for instance, to the pages of the "Catholic Who's Who," or the columns of "Rome's Recruits," and we see hosts of names of converts, many of them distinguished, crowds of others honorably known in the Church, in society, in literature, the bar, the legislature, the army, the navy. True, they are not all converts from Ritualism, but many of them—we may safely say the majority of them—are. What, then, are we to say of our critic's conclusions? Is it possible that he is prejudiced and having, à priori, made up his mind that a convert to Rome must of necessity be such and such, sees simply what he wants to see?

We do not propose to follow this writer's example in dragging the names of living persons into the discussion. The consideration of their motives in their conversions and re-conversions is not at all germane to the matter in hand, leaving out of question considerations of good taste. It is otherwise, however, when he comes to speak of the illustrious dead, and, naturally, he cannot pass Newman by. No one can who writes on this subject. It is difficult, however, adequately to characterize the conduct of those who, like this writer, go on repeating the statement, in spite of Newman's well-known, reiterated and indignant repudiation of it, that the illustrious convert did not find in Rome the satisfaction and peace he had expected.

To say that Newman's experiences after his conversion "made him realize that he had not attained to unity by submission to Rome" is, emphatically, to make a false statement. The writer may not know of Newman's own statements on the subject, but if so, what is to be thought of his competence for writing on it at all? And consider, dear reader, what is the cause herein assigned of Newman's disillusionment as to the boasted Roman unity. It is his disagreement with Cardinal Manning. Because these two distinguished men did not see eye to eye, and were not as cordial in their relations as might be desired, therefore, Rome does not possess doctrinal unity. Q. E. D. Could there be a more absurd non-sequitur conceived?

Men, even the most distinguished and the most saintly, have, all through the Church's history, disagreed, and that often vehemently and permanently, as to questions of practical policy, even as to matters of doctrinal opinion, in that wide latitude allowed by the Church, so long as defined doctrine is not trenchoned upon. We need do no more than cite Bossuet and Fénelon as a case in point. But what has all this got to do with the Church's unity? or, when did anyone ever conceive that the Church's doctrinal authority had broken down because of such personal differences?

But not only, it seems, does Rome fail to give the deluded convert the ecclesiastical unity he seeks, she has a deteriorating effect upon him both spiritually and intellectually. "People" say that those who have become Roman Catholics "have deteriorated generally rather than advanced."

An attempt is made to give instances, and once more we are confronted with the immortal name of Newman, ever "a sign to be contradicted." When did he do most for God's glory? we are asked, in St. Mary's, Oxford, or, in what this writer is pleased to call "the long years of comparative obscurity" after his change? Well, it all depends on our decision as to what part of Newman's work resulted most for God's glory.

Naturally, when it comes to awarding the palm, we, as Catholics, have no hesitation as between his long-continued and, if able, pathetically futile attempts to establish a via Media between Catholicism and Protestantism and the solid and enduring works of Catholic apologetic and controversy which marked the second period of his life. It was this second and Catholic period of Newman's life which saw the production of such works as "The Idea of a University," the "Apologia," the "Grammar of Assent," "Difficulties of Anglicans," "Present Position of Catholics in England," "Loss and Gain," "Callista," "The Dream of Gerontius," and several volumes of sermons. Most of us would be content to be "obscure" on such terms.

But what is to be thought of the state of mind or the information possessed by a writer who thus calmly marks with the stigma of comparative barrenness the period of Newman's life which saw produced works, one of which at least, apart from religious consideration, is an acknowledged English literary classic, and many others which are amongst the first, both as to style and depth, and originality of thought? Take even his sermons. To an Anglican, doubtless, Newman as a sermonizer suggests only "Parochial and Plain," but Newman wrote sermons also as a Catholic, and sermons which are away ahead of those of the Oxford days in warmth and sympathy, in tenderness and unction. It is no mere Catholic prejudice which leads us to say so.

The most striking testimony to this effect which we have come across we find in a little book entitled "Newman, an Appreciation," by the Rev. Alexander Whyte, D.D., a Presbyterian minister of Edinburgh, Scotland, and a writer of some distinction. Dr. Whyte's intense Protestantism does not hinder his being a fervent worshipper at the shrine of Newman, and, judging from his case at least, it would seem that Calvinism exercises a less blinding influence upon the eye of critical judgment when things Catholic are in question than does Anglicanism of the "High" variety. For Dr. Whyte does not fail to be struck by the contrast between the somewhat cold and academic tone of the Anglican sermons, and the richness, warmth and human sympathy of the Catholic Newman—the sermons as of a man whose soul had been liberated and who had found his true spiritual home.

S. P. MACPHERSON.

THE CAUSES AND CURE OF UNBELIEF.

ARCHDIOCESE OF BALTIMORE, CHANCERY
OFFICE, 408 N. CHARLES STREET.

March 4, 1910.

In justice to all parties concerned, and in order to remove all misunderstanding, I feel that I should make the following statement concerning the book entitled "The Causes and Cure of Unbelief."

The book was originally written by the Reverend N. J. Laforet, an eminent and learned Professor and the Rector of the University of Louvain.

The original title of the book was: "Why Men Do Not Believe; or, The Principal Causes of Infidelity."

It was first published in this country by Kehoe's Catholic Publication Society, and more recently by Fr. Pustet & Co., of New York.

Assurance was given me by Father Downing that the book would be no longer published under its former title, and that it would be consigned to oblivion. Hence, with some omissions and improvements to suit our times, I authorized its re-publication, because I considered it superior to anything that I could write on the subject.

The mistake in the exterior title obviously came from some misunderstanding, and was promptly corrected when I called attention to it.

I have known Father Downing for thirty years, and can bear testimony to his high reputation for zeal, piety and priestly virtues. Within the last ten years Father Downing has put on the market thousands of copies of excellent books which otherwise would be lost sight of on account of prohibitive prices.

As to the book now in question, originally by N. J. Laforet, I consider its value beyond price, and hence I highly recommend it to all, especially in these days of doubt and denial.

Father Downing will see that the proper title be put on the next edition.

J. CARD. GIBBONS.

[Our readers will no doubt recall that in No 17, Vol. II, of AMERICA, we expressed our perplexity over the publication of this book, with its present title. This letter of His Eminence, the Cardinal, explains the error. In publishing a work already published by Pustet & Co., under its original title and still for sale both by them and other Catholic book-dealers, Father Downing used a different, though equivalent, title, thus leading to the confusion, which is now cleared away.—Ed. AMERICA.]

CHRONICLE

Crisis in the House.—A crisis in the fight against the Speaker enlivened the proceedings of Congress all week. The complications were highly dramatic and unprecedented in the annals of that body. The members who on January 6 deprived the Speaker of authority to name the personnel of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy again united in a still more powerful demonstration of hostility. It began when certain independent or insurgent Republicans combined with the Democrats to strike out the appropriation for an automobile for the Speaker's use. Several other defeats on minor matters of procedure followed, the climax being reached when Representative Norris, a Republican insurgent from Nebraska, offered a resolution, which he claimed was entitled to recognition under the constitutional privilege, proposing the creation of a new Committee on Rules and making the Speaker ineligible for appointment to the new committee. Owing to a previous ruling in which he maintained that the majority should rule in every contingency the Speaker was face to face with a dilemma which spelled inevitable defeat. To decide against the resolution would bring on an appeal from the decision of the chair, to decide in its favor would be to surrender to the opposition. To enable his party to come to his support the Speaker withheld his ruling as long as parliamentary procedure would allow. A continuous session of twenty-six hours was followed by a brief recess during which unsuccessful attempts were made to reach an agreement. Supported by some twenty-five or thirty Republican members and the Democrats, the resolution was passed. When they had removed the Speaker from the Committee on Rules, the insurgents turned squarely around and helped to give him a vote of confidence which was tantamount to re-electing him to the Speakership by a majority of thirty-six, ten more votes than the majority had given him on his election to the place a year ago. Only eight insurgents voted against Mr. Cannon on the last roll call. The regular Republicans regard the result as a long step toward harmony in the Republican ranks and the election of a Republican House next November.

Raising the Wreck of the Maine.—The House Committee on Naval Affairs has decided to report a bill providing for the raising of the wreck of the battleship Maine from Havana Harbor. The remains of sixty-seven American sailors which have lain so long in the sunken ship will be buried with military honors in Arlington Cemetery. The sum of $500,000 is appropriated to meet the estimated expense. Ever since the Spanish-American war efforts have been made to induce Congress to make an appropriation to raise the wreck and to transfer to the United States for interment the remains of the American bluejackets who lost their lives in the destruction of the battleship.

George Washington University.—Opposition to the enactment by Congress of any legislation which will divert funds from the National Treasury into the coffers of George Washington University appears to be gaining ground, says the Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune. The fight against the proposition was begun by the University of Illinois, but it has now been taken up by the Universities of Ohio, Tennessee, Iowa and Alabama, as well as other States, which have joined in a petition to Congress against the plea of George Washington. It is pointed out that the Federal Government has invariably demanded as a condition of receiving assistance under the Morrill bill that a pledge be given not to devote the funds to any other than a purely State institution.

Nicaraguan Imbroglia.—Assistant Secretary of the Navy Winthrop announced the withdrawal of 350 United States marines from the west coast of Nicaragua, indicating the desire of the Government to recall its entire force from the theatre of Nicaraguan trouble. The marine strength in Nicaragua was 1,459 men. March 15 was the date set for the departure of an American commission to Nicaragua to determine what the people of that country want in the way of government. The commission did not sail and from present appearances will not sail. There is no indication that the Madriz government will sanction any proposition to the United States to intervene, coming from the Estrada faction in Nicaragua. Señor Corea, the representative of Madriz in Washington, maintains that Madriz is a constitutional president, and while this contention may be rejected by Secretary Knox, the latter will probably bide his time until Madriz may have been elected by a regular election or until his successor has been chosen. Estrada and Madriz are now haggling over the terms that shall restore peace to Nicaragua. Shortly before his complete defeat, Estrada received one hundred and fifty recruits from Panama, but while nearing the capital his troops became alarmed at the renewed activity of volcanoes near Lake Managua and deserted by the wholesale. A Nicaraguan paper asserts that the American war correspondents sent out false reports of insurgent success, to induce certain New York bankers to advance funds to Estrada.

Tariff Negotiations with Canada.—President Taft has paved the way for the averting of a disastrous tariff war between Canada and the United States by inviting the Dominion Minister of Finance, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, to meet him in Albany. The President and Mr. Fielding had a two-hours' conference on Sunday morning last, after which the former granted to Dr. J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Toronto Globe, then present in Albany, the privilege of transmitting a special message from the President to the people of Canada. In the course of that message Mr. Taft says: "My whole difficulty has been with the interpretation of a statute of Congress which never before was interpreted. After my conference with the Hon. Mr. Fielding I am hopeful of finding a solution which will have regard for my judicial responsibilities as President of the United States and will also serve the trade interests of both countries."

This conference, though, of course, not settling the difficulty, puts it on a basis of friendly negotiations which will go on after the President has returned to Washington and Mr. Fielding to Ottawa. Speaking of it afterward, Mr. Taft was most appreciative of Mr. Fielding's spirit and attitude and of his presentation of Canada's position. The Albany banquet last Saturday, where Earl Grey, the Governor-General of Canada, and President Taft complimented each other and each other's countries in charming generalities, engendered an atmosphere of good humor conducive to tariff peace and to the success of the conference with Sir Wilfrid Laurier's representative.

Opening of Quebec Legislature.—The second session of the twelfth parliament of Quebec was opened on March 15, with the usual ceremonies by Sir C. A. P. Pelletier, Lieutenant-Governor. The program of this session, as outlined in the speech from the throne, comprises the determining of provincial rights in connection with the incorporation of companies, the annexation of Ungava, the enforcement of the revised statutes of the province, the abolition of toll-gates, the fight against tuberculosis, increased appropriations for primary education, larger grants to the agricultural college of Sainte-Anne de la Pocatière, the improvement of dairy produce, the creation of a new judicial district in the northwest of the province, the creation of a juvenile court, the reorganization of civil and criminal courts, the founding of a forestry school, and regulating the flow of certain rivers.

Montreal Eucharistic Congress.—The rumor having spread some weeks ago that the Montreal City Council intended granting fifty thousand dollars for the reception of distinguished visitors to the Eucharistic Congress next September, the Presbyterians of Montreal and the Protestant Ministerial Association protested. Though their protests were published in such respectable non-Catholic dailies as the Gazette, Star and Herald, these journals carefully avoided all comment that would have been offensive to Catholics. Yet the Toronto Daily Star, of March 17, said: "Not for a great many years has there been such opposition to any plan proposed by the City Council of Montreal," as to this proposal of a fifty-thousand-dollar grant. This supposed, but not at all proved, anti-Eucharistic feeling induced Alderman Boyd to explain, at the first meeting of the Civic Reception Committee, held on March 16, that when Alderman Resther moved a vote for a grant to receive the Eucharistic Congress delegates, he seconded the motion, but there was no mention of any sum of money. Alderman Dandurand, who was elected chairman of the committee, said the only thing the city had to do was to receive the delegates properly.

The British Crisis.—Lord Rosebery has introduced his resolutions into the House of Lords. They lay down as principles of reform the necessity of a strong second chamber, that this is to be best obtained by a reform of the House of Lords and that a necessary preliminary to such reform is to declare the mere peerage is no longer to entitle one to sit and vote. The Government has developed its plan of action. Until supplies have been granted it is always necessary to obtain a temporary vote for current expenditure. It asks for a vote for six weeks only from the end of March which will carry it on to the middle of May. By that time it will have submitted the budget to the Commons and sent up its reform resolutions to the House of Lords. The rejection of either will enable it to resign and leave a Unionist Government without the means of carrying on the public service. The idea is that the fear of such a disaster will compel the Commons to pass the budget and the peers to accept the resolutions, or, should they fail to do so, to force the King to yield in the matter of the creation of the large number of peers necessary to out-vote them. Should the Unionists, the peers and the King remain firm, the Liberals and their allies will refuse even temporary supplies; and will oblige the Unionist Government to dissolve Parliament and enter in a general election with the country's affairs in utter confusion. Moreover, some of the extreme Radical newspapers inform the King, that by siding with the Peers, by which they mean, refusing to swamp them with new creations, he will share in their ruin. The Unionists are almost in dismay, and say that the times of Charles I have come again. Sir Walter Foster, returned at the late election for the Ilkeston Division, Derbyshire, retired to make a place for Col. Seely, one of the chief Liberals of the last Parliament, defeated in his own constituency. The Unionists contested the seat and in a total poll of 17,075, differing from that of the general election by only 11 votes, reduced the Liberal majority from 4,200 to 3,333.—On March 21, Mr. Asquith introduced his resolutions on the House of Lords and Parliamentary reform. The first recommends the abolition of all power of the Lords over a money-bill; the second, that any bill passing the House of Commons in three sessions shall become law without the concurrence of the Upper House, provided two years have intervened between its introduction and its third passage; the third, that Parliaments shall last for only five years.

Irish Opinion.—There is a lull in the parliamentary situation but the present state of Irish sentiment in regard to it was well expressed by Rt. Rev. Dr. Gilmartin replying to addresses of his people in Balinasloe: Liberty within just laws was their fundamental right, and to secure it they needed in the House of Commons a pledge-bound, united party, who, however, should take cognizance of the views and sympathies of their constituents. English parties, whether Liberal or Tory, will give only as much as they must, and the Irish party may be trusted to make the most of its present advantage. There would be no regret if they felt compelled to reject the Budget and support a government that was prepared to protect agricultural interests, but they should have a free hand to deal with the situation as circumstances demand. He would not judge the few independent Nationalists who had broken with the party, but it was a pity that all honest Irishmen did not lend to their ranks the solidarity and power of disciplined organization. All agree that depopulation, industrial stagnation, oppressive taxation and expensive government are the result of alien rule; that if Englishmen are the best judges of what suits England, Irishmen know best what suits in Ireland. They wanted, therefore, Irish government: "A measure of Home Rule that would enable Irishmen to control the finances of Ireland and to adjust national expenditure to the resources and needs of the country." Meanwhile they should extract all they could from the British Parliament and at home develop their native industries and customs, wear and patronize Irish goods, and cultivate their native language in elementary, secondary and university schools and in social life. This is a Sinn Fein policy on which all can and should unite, "a policy of supporting ourselves along every available avenue."

French Frauds.—The French Premier, M. Briand, having, thanks to his promise that such things would not happen again, secured a large majority of the Chamber of Deputies in the vote on the recent Duez scandal, had to defend himself once more before the Senate, on March 17. There M. Provost de Launay, Senator for Côtes-du-Nord, deplored the fact that Duez and his accomplices were defended by lawyers who had held high positions in the Government. For instance, M. Millerand, ex-Minister of Commerce, had accepted this odious function. In a speech that was frantically applauded by the Left, M. Briand, tried to justify the Government, whose system of control had brought about the arrest of Duez. The Republican régime cannot blame itself for the crime of a swindler. But, he added, the work of laicizing the Republic had let loose the hatred of its adversaries, who try to involve the Government and the Republican party in the Duez affair. "However," M. Briand concluded, "I distinctly wish to proclaim that the Republican party has done nothing to dishonor or humiliate Republican souls. The honor of the party remains above all these polemics." And the Senate by a large majority voted its confidence in the Government. As an earnest of its intended radical reform of the judicature, the Government, on March 18, decided that the liquidation judges must be debarred from all share in the awarding of the proceeds of property belonging to the religious congregations. Henceforth, only the official agent of each property shall be charged with the actual liquidation thereof.

Bishop of Nancy Acquitted.—On March 18 the court of Nancy, France, dismissed the suit brought against the Right Rev. Charles F. Turinaz, Bishop of Nancy, by the public school teachers' association. The judges, while holding that parts of the pastoral letter signed by him were unjust, accepted the opinion of the public prosecutor that the action should have been instituted by the State or by individual teachers rather than by the public school teachers' association.

Orleans Manifesto.—The Duc d'Orléans, not hitherto popular in France, where his actions during the past sixteen years have provoked more blame than praise, has, to some extent, retrieved himself by the manifesto he published on the 19th inst. Addressing the French people, the heir to the throne exhorts his adherents to limit themselves to legal agitation. He distinctly condemns the line of action adopted by the monarchist group of the Action Sociale of Paris, led by M. Léon Daudet. He also disavows the Camelots du Roy, whose chief exploits so far have been the mutilating of statues and fistful encounters with the police. The consequence of this manifesto is that the Gaulois, edited by M. Arthur Meyer, now becomes the official organ of the French royalists. All the Republican newspapers, while congratulating the Duke, call him a loyal pretender.

The Week in Germany.—Mass meetings arranged by the Socialist party in protest against the details of the Reform bill in the Prussian franchise continued throughout the kingdom. In Kiel and Halle violence marked the demonstrations and the police and soldiers were called to quell disturbances. The efforts of the opponents of the measure were without effect, however, and on March 17 the Reform bill, as drawn by the General Commission to which the preparation of the act had been entrusted, was passed on its third reading in the Landtag by a vote of 238 to 168. The affirmative vote was made up of the German-Conservatives and the Centrists, all the other parties in the house opposing the bill.—During the discussion of foreign relations carried on in the Imperial Reichstag last week Graf Kanitz, leader of the Agrarian party, sharply criticized the recent commercial agreement approved between the Empire and the United States. He affirmed that the agreement contained no evidence whatever of a desire on the part of the United States to foster reciprocity, and that it had been accepted by Germany notwithstanding the strong opposition of chambers of commerce like those in Bochum and Düsseldorf.—The American Art Exhibit was opened with great ceremony in Berlin, the Crown Prince, representing his father, the Emperor, presiding. The exhibition contains works of art from seventeen States and the paintings are in great part loaned by the artists themselves. Of the 96 artists represented, 89 are still among the living. Critics note with regret the absence of what may be termed a distinctive American Art in the paintings and speak of the influence of the schools of Paris, Munich and Düsseldorf, notably of the Paris school, in all the work that is on exhibition.—The March celebration of the Socialists in Berlin, held yearly in commemoration of the bloody street fight in the capital on March 18, in the revolution of 1848, was a quiet affair, although there had been fear of an uprising due to the heated discussion of the electoral Reform Bill now being considered in Prussia.

Croats and Slavs in Hungary.—Great excitement followed a recent declaration of the leader of the peasants' party in the Croatian-Slavic Landtag. A despatch from Agram speaks of its widespread effect in political circles as manifesting a strong anti-Hungarian attitude. The Croatian leader openly made a bid for an alliance with the Slavs and protested that his followers will not recognize the Hungarian Crown. The incident, coming as it does, just as the struggle is on in preparation for the new elections in that kingdom, is evidence of conflict and opposition existing between the Magyars and the leaders of the recently annexed provinces.

Dr. Carl Lueger's Funeral.—The burial of the fearless Catholic leader, Dr. Lueger, whose death was chronicled last week, was the occasion of an imposing demonstration such as Vienna has not witnessed since the funeral rites of the Empress Elizabeth. The business of the city was suspended generally and half of the population thronged the streets through which the funeral cortège of the great Christian Socialist passed from the cathedral to the cemetery five miles distant. At the impressive church services in the cathedral, the vast congregation included the Emperor, Francis Joseph, the archdukes, archduchesses, the papal nuncio, and the members of the diplomatic corps.

Mexican Centenary.—The National Catholic Press Association of Mexico, under the presidency of Sr. Lic. Victoriano Agüeros, editor of the able Catholic daily, El Tiempo, have resolved to commemorate the centenary of the declaration of Mexican independence, September 16, 1910, with a solemn renewal throughout the republic of the consecration of Mexico to Our Lady of Guadalupe as patroness of the nation. The bishops and cathedral chapters have warmly approved of the project. New Spain was consecrated to Our Lady of Guadalupe on April 27, 1737. The basilica of Our Lady, which is the only church in Mexico that has not been despoiled, is three miles from the capital. It was erected on the site of an apparition of the Blessed Virgin to a Mexican Indian in 1531. In connection with the anniversary festivities, there will be held an exposition of all kinds of native handiwork.

Italian Ministry Resigns.—Premier Sonnino's cabinet, which was formed December 10, 1909, resigned March 21, without provoking a vote. Sonnino had refused to inaugurate an anti-clerical policy, thus estranging the Radicals, and advocated ship subsidies which were generally unpopular. Ex-Premier Giolitti has declined to form a new cabinet.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Catholicism in Western Canada

The Rev. A. G. Morice, O.M.I., already widely and favorably known as the author of the "History of the Northern Interior of British Columbia," of a valuable historical dictionary of the French Canadian and French Halfbreed celebrities of the West, of several articles in "The Catholic Encyclopedia," and of many learned monographs on local western history and on the language of the western Dénés, among whom he was a zealous missionary for many years, has now given to the world the first complete "History of the Catholic Church in Western Canada from Lake Superior to the Pacific (1659-1895)" in two fine volumes (Musson Book Company, Toronto). It is the first book of its kind, containing much original matter drawn from unpublished manuscripts or first-hand sources of information.

Many books have been written on the history of the Canadian West, mostly by Protestants, several of whom have minimized, distorted, or even positively ignored Catholic influence. Moreover, the books hitherto written by Catholics were limited in their scope and occasionally inaccurate. It was high time, therefore, that a trained historian, with a passion for accuracy, a knack of unearthing valuable documents, long experience in mission fields, a vast store of collateral knowledge, a rare faculty of impartial judgment, and an absolute fearlessness, should grapple with the problem of making the true past live again in a country where the first governor of the Red River settlement was a staunch Catholic, where the first missionaries, churches and schools were Catholic, where Catholics saved the land from Indian massacres such as for so long a time made Minnesota tremble, where Catholics were the first to break the fetters of a commercial monopoly and to establish, later on, the first responsible government in Manitoba. All this Father Morice has set forth in the clearest, most convincing and graphic manner. That it was high time he should do so is evident from the fact that two of his most important witnesses of the Riel movement in 1869-70 are Fathers Lestanc and L. R. Giroux, who, in the ordinary course of nature, must be nearing their heavenly reward.

On the other hand, so outspoken a defence of Riel's government of the Red River could hardly have been effective at an earlier date. It has taken all these forty years to calm the seething fanaticism that branded Louis Riel as a rebel and his sympathizers as the worst enemies of Manitoba. Even now the Orange faction makes a martyr of Thomas Scott and calls Riel his murderer. But Father Morice proves by unimpeachable testimony that the Riel rule was a legitimate provisional government, recognized as such by Sir George Cartier at Ottawa; that, being the only publicly recognized government of the Red River, its head had the power of condemning hardened criminals to death; that Thomas Scott was an incorrigible rebel against that government and that his outbreaks of violence threatened the stability of that government; that his execution was consequently quite regular, though regrettable and opposed by Father Lestanc, the Administrator of the Diocese of St. Boniface, and that after this execution the Provisional Government went on peacefully for nearly five months until the arrival of Colonel Wolseley. That brilliant soldier, now Viscount Wolseley, cuts a sorry figure in Father Morice's pages, where no less than seven quotations from him betray ignorance and prejudice that are truly astounding.

A striking feature of Father Morice's second volume is his altogether original version of the attempted Fenian raid into Manitoba in the autumn of 1871. This account is based, as to its most vital part, on records discovered by accident in Riel's house, then undergoing repairs. These records prove that the French halfbreeds, though repeatedly persecuted and even murdered by new settlers from Ontario, and especially that their leader, Louis Riel, for whose capture a large sum was offered, remained loyal to the British Crown and saved the Canadian West from annexation to the United States. As early as March 8, 1868, shortly after the acquisition of Alaska, the Legislature of Minnesota adopted a resolution protesting against the proposed transfer of the territory between Minnesota and Alaska to the Dominion of Canada, and urging that the President and the Congress of the United States represent to the Government of Great Britain that such action cannot be regarded with indifference by the people of the United States.

The Fenians, "who," writes Father Morice, "were but the tools of the American people of the North," felt that an invasion of Manitoba would be certainly successful if the French population, exasperated by triumphant Orangeism, joined the invaders. Only eighty soldiers remained at Fort Garry "to preserve the peace of half a continent," as Governor Archibald, of Winnipeg, put it. The French halfbreeds could easily muster eight hundred excellent horsemen, skilled in the use of arms. Two thousand workmen, many of whom had seen service in the Civil War, had finished their work on Minnesota railways and were spoiling for a fight with the hated Britishers. The Fenian leaders assured the Manitoba halfbreeds that they had already enlisted 3,560 men, had plenty of money, could declare the independence of all the Canadian West, and could soon "introduce into the country five men as against Canada's one."

The fate of the new province and of all western Canadian territories rested with Riel. But he could not show himself in public without danger of death from Orange bullets, until the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba vouched for his safety and himself reviewed some three or four hundred halfbreeds led by Riel who, with all his followers, threw in his lot with the defenders of Canada. Lieutenant-Governor Archibald afterwards said before the Select Committee: "If the halfbreeds had taken a different course, I do not believe the province would now be in our possession." On hearing of this loyal stand taken by the French halfbreeds, the Fenians, who had already advanced several miles into Canadian territory and were planning a very serious attack, lost heart and retreated. A fuller account of this little-known but most important episode is to be found in Father Morice's articles in La Nouvelle France (Quebec, 1907-08), "Aux Sources de l'Histoire Manitobaine." The author ought to translate these articles into English and publish them separately.

LEWIS DRUMMOND, S.J.

(To be continued.)

Italian Immigration

Signor G. Preziosi has an admirable article in Rivista d'Italia for February, in which he discusses at length certain phases of the Italian immigration problem in the United States and corrects many erroneous views of Doctor Luigi Vallari, who, after a short visit to this country, has delivered lectures in several Italian cities on the results of his observations during his hasty trip. Signor Preziosi has in his favor a long residence in this country and an intimate personal acquaintance with social and economical conditions both here and in his native land. His conclusion against Doctor Villari is that Italians better their lot by coming to the United States, and that the preponderance of adult males among the immigrants shows, as in the case of the Chinese and Japanese, a purpose to acquire a modest competence and return to their native land to enjoy it. Thus in 1901, women and children constituted only 29 per cent. of the whole Italian immigration; in 1905, only 26 per cent.

In no year in which statistics are available have married or marriageable women reached one-third of the annual immigration. In 1908, for every hundred Italian immigrants, there were 123 who left our shores. To the charge that Italian physicians in the United States are below mediocrity and that a few are ignorant and unprovided with a diploma, Signor Preziosi replies that our boards of medical examiners in the various States keep a watchful eye on quacks, charlatans, and fraudulent practitioners. Even in the matter of peonage in the South of which complaint has been made, he finds that the fault often lies with the employment agents who send to the plantations tailors, barbers and others who know nothing about farming, and these often try to decamp without reimbursing the planter for the railway tickets which he has furnished to them and their families.

"Our self-love is wounded," says Doctor Vallari, "when we see all our countrymen in dependent and humiliating positions, doing the hardest and most degrading work, such as Americans and less recent immigrants will not do." Signor Preziosi retorts that as 70 per cent. of Italian immigrants are farm hands and day laborers, they are employed in America as they were in Italy, with the difference that the wages which they receive here in an hour are equal to the pay for a full day's work in some parts of Italy; and, moreover, that while in Italy they would have lived and died day laborers, of the thousands of Italians in the United States who are now merchants, storekeepers, or at least petty dealers, 99 per cent. have risen from the ranks of unskilled labor. They have used their mother wit and have seized opportunities which they never could have known in Italy.

Even the condition of the very poor in the cheap tenements of New York, which so grievously afflicts the doctor, finds in the reviewer a ready answer. "Whoever has gone about in Calabria, the Basilicata and the interior of Sicily knows that it is not unusual to find a family of human beings living together with cattle and swine, and it is not rare to find caves in the earth used as human habitations. What wonder if in America six persons sleep in the same room when in Italy men and beasts slept in the same stall? What wonder is it that in America they fill the bathtubs with earth and start a garden if in Italy they did not undress for whole weeks at a stretch, used water only for face and hands, and, especially in the southern provinces, considered a bath something improper? Those men have learned to wear shoes, starched goods and gloves; their chief food is no longer black bread; they may even glory in a small bank account."

They become naturalized citizens and take an active interest in public affairs; without the ballot their number and strength would amount to nothing; their language would not be taught in the public schools and in the city college. "The natural and instinctive affection of these poor laborers for Italy, for their native land, for their king, will not be destroyed by American citizenship. When they return to Italy, do not ask them whence they come or whether they have acquired another citizenship. If by birth and origin they are, say from Udine, they return Udinesi and Italian citizens." Their sojourn in America should not affect their standing after their return to Italy.

St. Marcellus, Pontifex Maximus, 310-1910

II.

After his return from exile Marcellus set himself systematically to reorganize the internal administration of the Church. He made a redistribution of the Titles, assigning to each parochial church of the city its titular or cardinal priest. He appointed two deacons for the administration of the property of the Church and the care of the poor, the sick and the aged; he selected and consecrated bishops for the various dioceses, caring also for the eastern churches still suffering from the cruelty of Galerius. All this was accomplished with extraordinary wisdom and success, and his ministry was practically unfettered.

Maxentius' next move showed that he was becoming well aware of the increasing power of the Christian body, for he made two propositions to Marcellus. the latter was asked to declare explicitly that he was not at present and had never been the Pontifex of the Christians; and secondly, that he, Marcellus, should personally offer incense to the pagan deities. The emperor was instigated to make these diabolical propositions by the perfidious lapsed Christians. In how many ways these men resemble the arch-enemies within the Church to-day!

The despot of Rome was withstood again by the Head of the Christian Church, and foiled in his attempt to humiliate him before the world and in the eyes of his own people. Then went forth the imperial edict—that the Shepherd of the Christian flock, the real Pontifex Maximus of the universal church, should be thrust into the catabulus, or public stables, to tend the beasts of burden, the horses, mules, oxen and buffaloes—and there St. Marcellus was incarcerated on the spot off the Via Lata, near the present Piazza Colonna.

The old cry had been: "The Christians to the lions"—now it was to thrust the chief of them all into the midst of the animals in the filthy common stable. Though the outward condition of the saint was changed, the spirit within was the same. From his noisome surroundings and irksome tasks, he kept in touch with the faithful and was their ruler and guide as before. Though a caretaker of brute beasts, it is the same sovereign pontiff who had lived through the persecution of Diocletian, had stood unmoved before the threats of Maxentius, who still continued to rule his people by means of his priests. Maxentius ignored all this, taking his satisfaction in his apparent humiliation.

The Christians could not endure such ignominious treatment of their Father, and soon succeeded in rescuing him by night and conducting him to the palace near by in the same street, belonging to the noble Roman matron Lucina. It was nearly opposite where St. Paul had been imprisoned. The saint would not even allow himself a well-earned rest, but at once set himself to work. The principal salon in the palace was dedicated as a church, and there the saint offered the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, and preached to his people.

This church was the first opened and dedicated publicly for divine worship after the Great Persecution, for until that time the Christians had worshipped either in the catacombs or in private oratories, and the latter had all been destroyed, so that we may hold for certain that on this spot where the church of St. Marcellus now stands, is the only place in Rome where the Sacrifice of the Mass has never been omitted. This period of comparative peace was soon broken in upon by Maxentius, who promptly ordered all the cattle from the public stables to be driven into the palace of Lucina, into the same room which had already been converted into a chapel.

There in a short time, in January, 310, death came to St. Marcellus as a merciful release, for he was exhausted by unceasing physical toil under most unhealthy conditions, worn out, too, by his own vigils and unceasing work for his own people under such distressing conditions. But he did not die in vain, for with his death, that of the thirty-first pope from St. Peter, came the close of those bloody persecutions of the Christians, not only in Rome, but in the rest of Italy and in some of the provinces. In others, some blood was shed for some years to come, but the end was in sight. In Nicomedia, Galerius lay dying, smitten with a fearful malady, and in the very same place where in 303 he had instigated Diocletian to publish his decree for the extirpation of all Christians from the face of the earth, there in 311, the same Galerius, after eight years of unspeakable horrors committed, issued an edict putting a stop, legally, to all persecutions. Therefore, in 311, Christianity obtained its complete triumph.

The body of St. Marcellus was carried by his faithful followers to the cemetery of Priscilla not far from the burial place of his predecessors, St. Marcellinus. In the ninth century the precious relics were placed in a basalt urn where they now repose beneath the high altars of "San Marcello al Corso," on the same spot where the saint himself offered the Holy Sacrifice in the chapel which he had dedicated in the house of Lucina, and where later he breathed his last among the beasts of burden.

To sum up: St. Marcellus lived to see the cessation of the last persecution of the Christians which had been set on foot to accomplish their complete destruction. He was the last of the popes to give his life for the Faith. He was the one who began in Rome the open and solemn worship of the Holy Eucharist, which has never been interrupted since his day.

St. Marcellus was the first champion of the liberty and independence of the Church which were menaced by the civil arm instigated by unworthy and rebellious Christians.

St. Marcellus asserted publicly and explicitly the universal supremacy of the Chair of St. Peter. He was also the restorer and organizer of ecclesiastical administration, the fruits of which work have come down to our day.

In the face of this record of an extraordinary life, it certainly behooves all Christians to do honor to this great saint, especially in this sixteenth hundred anniversary of his death—for the sacrifice of his life marked the end of the era of persecutions and the inauguration of the triumph of the Cross.

In less than two years the Emperor Maxentius was celebrating with great pomp the sixth anniversary of his reign. Vain and lighthearted he gave little thought to the army of Constantine so inferior in numbers to his own, which was approaching Rome. Probably trusting with a fatal blindness to his own good fortune thus far, he went on amusing himself with games and sport at the Circus Maximus, but at last was urged on by his subjects to go out to meet Constantine. He had a superstitious horror of going beyond the walls of Rome, but he consulted the Sibylline books and the augurs, and trusting himself to his hitherto invincible Pretorian guard, he went outside the gates with a serene confidence of returning to Rome that evening as victor.

This victory might have brought back the days of Nero to Rome and the world, but God willed otherwise. On the Milvian Bridge the forces of the Christian Constantine triumphed completely and put to rout the emperor and his pagan subjects. In their utter rout, crowds of them were driven into the Tiber and drowned, Maxentius among the rest.

Religious Science

The first number (January-February, 1910) of the new French Jesuit review, Recherches de Science Religieuse, has already been mentioned and its first article reviewed in AMERICA (Vol. II, p. 538), but its importance calls for a detailed statement of its contents. The title itself, "Religious Science Researches," is an indirect and welcome protest against the now prevalent tendency to restrict the word "science" to the knowledge of natural phenomena. Religious science is in a very true sense the greatest of all sciences, the only one that carries with it everlasting conclusions of incalculable practical import.

The first article of this new review, "La foi au Seigneur Jésus dans l'Eglise naissante," is by Father Jules Lebreton, who, while proving by an exhaustive comparison of Scripture texts in the original languages the nascent Church's belief in the divinity of Christ, puts into the statement of his proofs so much light and warmth that the reader thinks less of pitying the Modernist error than of rejoicing in the possession of the splendid truth. In "Qoran et Tradition—Comment fut composé la vie de Mahomet," Father Henri Lammens, writing from Cairo, examines into the pretension of modern Islamists that the "hadit" or Moslem Tradition throws much light on the personality and biography of Mahomet. The writer proves, on the contrary, with a wealth of quotations and learned foot-notes, that the vast library of Arabic books on the doings of Mahomet, a library greater in extent than any similar occidental collection, is based solely on the Koran and that the so-called Tradition is one of the greatest historical frauds in the annals of literature. However, since that Tradition has been the main factor in perpetuating the Islamic fable, it is worth delving into in the hope that it may ultimately furnish some meagre data that may help to clear up the as yet impenetrable mystery shrouding the life of Mahomet.

Zacharias, XII, 10, is the subject of a suggestive exegesis by Father Albert Condamin, of Hastings, England. He shows, by collating Hebrew and Greek texts, that the most probable interpretation of this difficult passage is that of M. van Hoonacker, who punctuates the verse thus: "They shall look upon me. Whom they have pierced, they shall mourn for him." The insuperable difficulty of supposing that Iahvé (the Jewish Jehovah) should be pierced and should die is thus removed. Father Condamin points out that the learned Louvain professor does not seem to have been aware that his punctuation was first suggested by St. Cyril of Alexandria in his commentary on the Prophet Zacharias, where he considers this interpretation as traditional among the Greeks. Ten texts from Isaias show that Zacharias borrowed from the earlier prophet and this leads to the conclusion that he "whom they have pierced" is most probably none other than the Servant of Iahvé, whose passion is so graphically foretold in the fifty-third chapter of Isaias.

Father Alfred Durand compares the epithet "first-born" applied six times in the New Testament to Christ with the use of the same expression in several texts of the Old Testament and with the use of a similar word by Philo and concludes that in all the passages of the New Testament where "first-born" occurs, it means an absolute attribute expressing Christ's universal and sovereign primacy.

Father Joseph Huby discusses the words St. Mark added to the recital of Christ's temptation as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke. These words (Mark I, 13) "and he was with beasts" are supposed by some commentators to be an allusion to II Mac. V, 27, where Judas Machabeus is said to have lived amongst wild beasts; but the similarity of the situation disappears when one reflects that Christ was alone with beasts in the desert, whereas the mere perusal of the entire twenty-seventh verse of the fifth chapter of the second book of Machabees shows that Judas Machabeus "lived among wild beasts in the mountains with his company, and they continued feeding on herbs, that they might not be partakers of the pollution."

"Notes d'Epigraphie Chrétienne," by Father Jalabert, mentions several cases in which lapidary inscriptions discovered in Africa and Greek-speaking countries contain extracts from the Bible. The testimony of these inscriptions in imperishable stone may be more valuable than that of the oldest known manuscripts, exposed to alteration through long centuries of transmission. Exegetes know that the text of Luke II, 14, is uncertain. The manuscripts give two readings: "to men of good will" and "good will to men." Critics generally decide in favor of the former reading, which is supported by all the best manuscripts, while the other is to be found only in second-rate sources. The latter is the more favorite reading in the East, the former in the West. In 1899-1900, and again in 1904-1905, an American archeological expedition discovered in Syria two inscriptions containing this text with the Oriental reading "εὐδοκία," "good will to men." It is therefore certain that at the time these texts were engraved (fourth or fifth century) the 14th verse of the second chapter of St. Luke was commonly read in Syria as follows: "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, good will to men," the "and" between "peace" and "good will" being omitted.

C. C. Martindale contributes a short paper suggesting a natural explanation of a miracle attributed to Apollonius of Tyana by that most unreliable of biographers, Philostratus. X. Le Bachelet critically examines what Cardinal Bellarmine said of the Bible of Sixtus V in 1591. He first states the objection drawn from the discrepancy between two documents written by Bellarmine, the Preface to the Sixto-Clementine Bible of 1592 and a passage from his Autobiography (1613), both reproduced in parallel columns, and then he proceeds to quote an extract from an unpublished autograph MS., which he himself discovered and which is the original text of the "Votum" written by Bellarmine under Gregory XIV in 1591, one year before his Preface and twenty-two years before his Autobiography. This extract proves, first, that Bellarmine really spoke in 1591 as he said in his Autobiography that he did; and secondly, that one year only after the death of Sixtus V, in the presence of Gregory XIV, of cardinals and consultants who had been in Rome during the last months of Sixtus V's pontificate, Bellarmine proposed that there be inserted in the corrected Bible of that Pontiff the statement afterwards appearing in the Preface, that Sixtus V, having noticed imperfections in his work, had determined upon a revised edition.

Father Frédéric Bouvier devotes eighteen pages to a "Bulletin d'Histoire Comparée des Religions," in which he reviews various methods of conducting researches into the history of religions. He dwells especially on the a priori methods of M. Loisy, M. S. Reinach, Mr. L. R. Farnell, M. G. Foucart, M. Victor Henry, MM. H. Hubert and M. Mauss and pits them one against another, exposing with quiet humor their contradictions, their baseless hypotheses, their pretence of impartiality while they are all the time postulating the first principles of blind rationalism. He concludes with an eloquent example of the only way in which these researches should be conducted, the experimental way, that is to say, observation of living exponents of strange religions, as exemplified in the first hand descriptions of the religious views of the natives of New Pomerania or Neupommern, in the Bismarck Archipelago. These descriptions, based upon observations made in the best possible conditions by Catholic missionaries who study patiently on the spot conditions of religious evolution that are impenetrable to the superficial and hasty observer, are full of interesting and well ascertained facts, many of which point to a belief in a Supreme Being. None of these missionaries yields to the temptation of building upon these particular religious data synthetic systems as vast as the universe, but content themselves with statements that tell their own story.

How Ferrer was Tried

II.

In order to give a consecutive and detailed account of the trial of Ferrer, I obtained the judgment and proceedings, "Juicio Ordinario seguido ante los Tribunales Militares en la Plaza de Barcelona contra Francisco Ferrer y Guardia." The conservative ministry by Señor Antonio Maura y Montaner, the premier, upon the assembling of the Cortes or parliament, gave orders to publish the entire testimony and proceedings of the trial of Ferrer in extenso, but the Liberal party which immediately succeeded under Señor Francisco Moret y Prendergast, refused to do so, and hence the Juicio Ordinario or judgment-roll giving accurate references to each page of the testimony, the findings of the court and the sentence, is all that was ever published. Yet even General Luque y Ferrer, the late Liberal Minister of War, was obliged to say: "The case of Ferrer is no more than an episode of that repression which we consider a political mistake; but legally and judicially Ferrer was well tried. The guilt of Ferrer was absolutely demonstrated, not as a propagandist of ideas, but as a director of sedition."

At the trial two features are especially noticeable: one was that no member of the clergy or religious orders, or any one connected with religious institutions was called as a witness, and the only one against whom Ferrer and his counsel raised any positive objections was Domínguez, an occasional correspondent of El Siglo Futuro, a Catholic newspaper, who testified to the progress of the riots; and the other was the fact that no testimony was received concerning La Escuela Moderna or its teachings, or the activity of Ferrer in promoting it. But for the mention of it in the documentary evidence, it would not have come in the trial at all.

The majority of the witnesses who testified against Ferrer were practically of his side; they were Republicans, Liberals, revolutionists, labor leaders and Anarchists, and it was their testimony which demonstrated the activity and participation of Ferrer in the riots of July last. About seventy witnesses in all were examined, and of these, fifteen gave precise testimony as to the doings of Ferrer during the period of the riots. The remainder were persons who testified to various documents, the progress of the riots, hand-writing experts and others, who made up the various collateral proof necessary to present the whole case.

In the matter of the revolutionary type-written circulars which were found in Ferrer's residence, the experts testified that certain corrections therein were in the handwriting of Ferrer, and they also identified other letters and documents as his writing. In a letter to Don Odon de Buen, Ferrer writes: "I pray you, do not use my name, because I have to remain in obscurity, nevertheless—and will tell you about it the first chance I get—I am always ready to help in the coming of the republic," and in another to him he says: "I am disgusted with politics; my rooted conviction is that with Rationalist teaching and Socialist education I get further, much further indeed, than with electoral contests." In a letter to Dr. Gariga of Buenos Aires, he repeated over and over again that the most intense and assuredly revolutionary work would be education in the form set up by him.

The prosecution adduced proof which followed Ferrer's acts throughout the riots, until the troops began to subdue the rioters, when Ferrer disappeared from the city—covering three days in all. On Monday, July 26, the day when the rioters began to clash with the police, Ferrer was seen by the witnesses, Angel Fernandez Bermejo, Claudio Sanchez and Manuel Cabro, among certain riotous groups in formation in the Plaza de Antonio Lopez, at about six o'clock in the afternoon. Shortly afterwards a detachment of cavalry dispersed these rioters and Ferrer thereupon went towards the Puerta de la Paz, where he was again engaged in forming another group, and on the police coming towards them, left them and continued on down the Rambla where the witnesses lost sight of him. The proprietor of the Hotel Internacional, on the Rambla, testified that Ferrer dined there but did not know whether he stayed all night. Francisco Domenech, a barber from Masnou (just outside Barcelona) and a partisan of Ferrer, testified that he met him at the Hotel Internacional at half-past nine that night, that from there they went together to the editorial office of El Progreso to "see how the comrades were getting on," and then to Café Aribau where he and Ferrer met Calderon, Ponte, Tuban and Señor Litran and his wife. Then they went back to El Progreso, saying that he did not want Iglesias (the editor) and the others to sign a protest to the government against the war in Melilla, "because the revolution will be here, and the signers will be marching at the front of the populace." On the way back they went down the Calle de la Princesa where two men met them; to one of them named Moreno Ferrer said that the Solidaridad Obrera should take sides with the rioters, for "they were already compromised," and Moreno added, "if they don't, we will treat them like traitors are treated in Russia," with Ferrer's approval.

That same evening, July 26, after the rioting of the day, Lorenzo Ardid, who was a semi-Anarchist and close companion of Ferrer prior to the riots, was taking his coffee in the Casa del Pueblo (the successor to La Escuela Moderna), when Ferrer entered and after salutations said, "what do you think of the events of to-day?" Ardid answered, "that is over, but it is a kind of protest that ought to go no further." Then Ferrer turned on him sharply: "Don't you believe that this will go no further!" Ardid then commenced to answer him sharply, Ferrer grew heated, and Ardid turned his shoulder and said, "you are taking the wrong road." In the careo (or confrontation of witnesses) Ferrer admitted that he visited the Casa del Pueblo and talked with Ardid, but denied the specific language testified to by Ardid.

On July 27, the day of the burning of so many churches, schools and convents, Ferrer left his suburban villa, "Mas Germinal," quite early, came to Masnou and then took breakfast with Francisco Domenech in a café at Badalona and proceeded into Barcelona. During the day, Claudio Sanchez and Miguel Calvo saw a man dressed in a blue suit and a straw hat, with the front brim drawn down, in Barcelona, haranguing a group of rioters. Sanchez went up to him and said, pointing to the proclamation on the wall, "can't you read that?" and dispersed them. Both of these afterwards identified Ferrer in the rueda, as the man, on three different times when they were examined. Francisco de Paula Colledorns testified that between 7:30 and 8:30 that same evening, he saw a group of rioters on the Rambla in front of the Lyceum, led by a man whom he had closely noticed, and as soon as he afterwards saw the photograph of Francisco Ferrer, he recognized him. On the examination he was able to at once identify Ferrer in the rueda. He heard Ferrer tell the rioters to march on from there by way of Calle del Hospital. Ferrer was dressed in a blue suit and a straw hat, he said.

On the 28th, the second great day of the riots and pillage, Ferrer was exceedingly active, according to the witnesses. In the morning he came to the barber-shop of Domenech and told him to go and get the President of the Republican Committee, Juan Ventura Puig, alias Llarch, and see if he could do something. Puig came and Ferrer proposed to him to go to the city hall and proclaim the Republic, but Puig refused, saying that he would not compromise himself. Puig as a witness, went even further and declared that once before in a café in Calle de Porto Rico, when he objected to doing such things, saying that the people must be behind him in such a movement, Ferrer insisted that "he ought to begin by stirring up the people so that lots of them would go out and burn churches and convents." Puig then said that he did not understand how the republic would come by that means, but Ferrer cut him short with, "The republic doesn't matter, the question is, there will be a revolution," and a little later, "Very well, we will have to destroy everything."

Esteban Puigmollens testified that later in the day he saw Ferrer haranguing a group of rioters, and Salvador Millet said that a group entered the mayor's office at Masnou and commenced addresses to the populace in the name of Ferrer. On this same day, the witness Francisco Valvet says that at half-past twelve at the club house of the Fraternidad Republicana at Premiá (near the outskirts of Barcelona) two persons presented themselves, one of whom was Puig, and the other a man in a light suit and straw hat, who later on said, "I am Ferrer Guardia," and then he sent for the Mayor, Domingo Casas Llibre, who came there accompanied by the witnesses, Antonio Mustarés and Jose Alvarez Espinosa. When they arrived, he announced to them that he was Ferrer, and turning to the Mayor said, "I come to tell you that you must proclaim the republic in Premiá." The Mayor replied, "Señor, I won't take those orders." Then Ferrer said, "Why not, when the republic is proclaimed in Barcelona, Madrid, Valencia and other cities?" The witnesses to these facts were not only the persons named, but also Jaime Comas, Pedro Cesa, Lorenzo Arnau and Jamie Calvé. There were three careos (confrontations) between Ferrer and the witnesses Puig, Ardid and Casas, the mayor, and in each of them Ferrer had to admit that he met them and had conversations at the time mentioned, although he denied the rest.

In addition to this, there was the testimony of Jose Canés and Pedro Pagés that certain bicyclists and workmen stopped carriages and people on the shore road on the 27th, and obliged them to go back, saying they did so under orders from Ferrer, and of Puigdemont who was present on the 28th at the Mayor's office in Masnou, while there violent addresses being made to the people, and one of the orators explained that he had just come from Ferrer and that Ferrer could not assist at the speech-making. A carpenter, Rosendo Gudas, testified that on July 27th, he was fixing a door in Ferrer's house, and Ferrer stopped in passing and said to him, "Now, what does Tiana (a nick-name for the village) think? It's about time now to burn down everything." Colonel Alvarez and Captain Ramon Puig, both of the Santiago Dragoons, testify that on July 28, they had a skirmish with the rioters behind the overturned street-cars at the Ronda de San Pablo, and captured several who were armed with new revolvers, which they said were given to them by a leader, whose name they did not know, but who was dressed in a blue suit and straw hat. A multitude of other pieces of circumstantial evidence, pointing to Ferrer's presence and activity during those days in different parts of the city, were adduced, but the recital is too long to be given here.

Francesco Domenech, the Masnou barber, also testified that on the morning of July 29th, he shaved Ferrer completely, taking off his beard. Bruno Humbert said that on that afternoon he found Ferrer's villa, "Mas Germinal," locked and bolted. Among others who testified to Ferrer's activity preceding the riots were Manuel Jiménez Moya, a newspaper man of radical opinions like Ferrer's, Marciso Verdager, Baldomero Bonet, himself prosecuted for arson, Modesto Lara, and Alfredo Garcia Magallon, all of whom had come in contact with the accused, and they further pointed out that several things had been done by the rioters in the way in which Ferrer had advised his adherents to do.

Against this mass of testimony Ferrer offered no witnesses, except one to the effect that he did not belong to the school of militant anarchy. No attempt was made to prove what Ferrer did from the 26th to the 29th of July, or to give his version of what his acts were during those fateful days. He did not even undertake to prove that he never wore a blue suit and a straw hat. In fact, he was wearing them when he had the interviews with Ardid and Puig. His counsel, Captain Galcerán, wanted the trial suspended, however, until he could get declarations from abroad, in France, Italy and Belgium, from eminent philosophers and thinkers like Reclus, Kropotkin, Duchemin, Fabbri and others, that "the ideas of Ferrer are opposed to every kind of act of violence," and that these declarations would prove him incapable of participation in the events of July. The court properly rebuked Captain Galcerán, that such line of defense was not proper and that Ferrer was being tried for his acts and their consequences, not for his ideas. The rebuke of Captain Galcerán was magnified afterwards into a report that he had been shot for his too active defense of Ferrer; afterwards this report was toned down to a mere court martial. As a matter of fact, nothing occurred.

The sentence of the court on October 9, 1909, was that Ferrer was guilty of rebellion and treason, under Article 237 of the Code of Military Justice, in being one of the authors, chiefs and participants in said rebellion, and under aggravating circumstances. Under Article 238, the law fixed the penalty therefor as death, with the alternative, in case of clemency, of perpetual solitary confinement. The sentence was confirmed October 10, and sent on to the Ministry, which refused to interfere, after going over the facts involved in the case. Numerous applications, I am told, were made by telegraph to the King for clemency or pardon, in behalf of Ferrer; but I am also told that they were based upon the supposition that he had been tried hastily, and without any knowledge of the facts brought out on the trial.

IN LANDS AFAR

NOTES ABOUT HOLLAND.

On March 4th last, the fifty-seventh anniversary occurred of the reestablishment of the hierarchy in the eleven Northern Provinces of the Low Countries, officially known as the Kingdom of the Netherlands, but commonly designated by the name of Holland. Geographically the kingdom covers less than half the territory of Ireland, and is, therefore, not much larger than many single counties in our Western States. Its population reaches close to six millions, about one-third of whom are Catholics.

The hierarchy of Holland numbers one metropolitan and four suffragan sees, viz., Utrecht, Haarlem, Bois-le-duc, Breda and Ruhrmund, the three last named comprising the provinces of North-Brabant and Limburg, whose population, like their Flemish neighbors, is almost exclusively Catholic.

The Archdiocese of Utrecht is the historical see of Holland, having been first occupied in 696, by St. Willibrord, Apostle of Holland, and, after him for a time by St. Boniface. All through the Middle Ages Utrecht remained the only see of the North until the reign of Philip the Second, King of Spain and Count of Holland, by whose efforts the other bishoprics were erected. When, however, Protestantism became dominant in those parts of the Low Countries, the bishops were driven out and their bishoprics forcibly suppressed. Ever since, up to March, 1853, the Catholics of Holland were ruled by vicars apostolic.

From the latter year, therefore, officially dates their freedom of worship and religious independence of government interference. To what extent they have profited by and taken advantage of it a mere glance through their latest year-book will show conclusively. What impresses the reader most is the multiform display of push and activity on the part of a people whose temperament we of this country have somehow been led to look upon as the very extreme of phlegmatic, whereas, so far as religion and good citizenship is concerned, they should correctly be ranked among the Church's most strenuous children. "Organize" evidently is the Dutch Catholic motto, and how completely it has been accomplished the pages of the year-book tell.

Politically, the whole country is covered with a splendid system of Catholic election clubs, extending itself into every city, town and hamlet and through provincial committees in full touch with a Central Bureau as supreme executive. As a result at every election for municipal, provincial or national offices Catholics cast their votes for candidates of their own selection, and have so far succeeded in returning seventeen of their co-religionists for the First and twenty-six for the Second Chamber of the National Legislature. In addition, through a national Katholieke Volks Bond (Catholic People's Union), Catholics act collectively in regard to all the burning questions of the day, striving in particular through this Bond to safeguard the Catholic working classes against the poisonous influence of the Socialistic propaganda.

Apparently they have succeeded in organizing everybody and everything from a Catholic standpoint, and, in turning the pages of the year-book one would almost fancy the Middle Ages had returned again with their complex variety of Catholic Guilds. Catholic trades in every branch, mechanics of every description have each their own Catholic unions; there are societies for Catholic farmers and societies for Catholic farm and day laborers. Catholic commercial travelers, Catholic clerks in stores and offices, Catholic architects and contractors, Catholic manufacturers and employers of labor of all kinds are each represented in the long lists of denominational organizations.

Worthy of special note are the Catholic Military clubs, in every garrison town of the country, whose object is to provide pastimes and promote social intercourse among Catholic soldiers and to keep them in line for prompt and regular discharge of their religious duties. Charitable organizations are to be found in large numbers in all the principal cities and towns. The St. Vincent de Paul Society is spread out over the whole land, being made up of three hundred and twenty-two conferences and allied Charities, all of which are affiliated with a national committee in The Hague. This national committee counts among its membership some of the most illustrious representatives of the Dutch Catholic laity.

Extraordinarily well supplied also is this small country with missionary colleges. Each of the five dioceses maintains both a seminary and a theological college of its own for the education of priests. Vocations to religious life among both sexes must be abundant in Holland since after fully supplying the home parishes more than twelve hundred priests, sisters and lay-brothers are spared for missionary work abroad. Dutch missionaries are laboring in every clime, including not only their own colonies in the East and West Indies but also Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. In the former the Dutch Dominicans have charge of three large parishes with several chapels of ease; in the latter the Dutch Fathers of the Sacred Heart have fifteen of their members laboring in the province of Surigao. It is scarcely necessary to state that the parochial school system in Holland is highly developed, there being hardly any parishes without a Catholic primary school. Since what may be called its Catholic emancipation Holland has doubled the number of its parishes, trebled its clergy, and spent $240,000,000 on the building of churches. In 1890 it had 2,310 priests and over a thousand organized parishes.

But the most signal proof of religious earnestness and intellectual activity among Dutch Catholics is found in the statistics of the Catholic press. One almost feels tempted to doubt one's visual power while reading the returns on this vital subject of our times. Nevertheless, you find it stated that these less than two million Catholics support fifteen Catholic daily papers, some of which in size, make-up and general information equal the leading secular journals of to-day. To these must be added thirty-one papers, published either twice or three times a week; seventy-six papers published once a week, and fifty-two monthly and quarterly publications, the last named ranging from the humble but effective annals to the more select reviews and magazines devoted to theological, scientific and literary subjects. Catholic editors and journalists, Catholic publishers and booksellers each have their separate societies for the purpose of working in unison for the common good of the Catholic press.

From the foregoing it would seem that Catholicism in Protestant Holland is very much alive, and that Dutch Catholics are entitled to be ranked among the Church's most strenuous children of all lands. The Church in Holland is indeed blessed with an energetic and harmonious episcopate, a well-trained and hard-working clergy, a zealous and responsive laity. Together they present a united front to the enemy, and are advancing toward their high purpose in a phalanx more glorious and irresistible than those of Macedon of old.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Efficient Cause of the Trouble in France

HÔTEL MEURICE, PARIS,

MARCH 5, 1910.

Perhaps this is the efficient cause of the trouble in France:

"The edict of Louis XIV on the declaration made by the clergy of France of their sentiments regarding ecclesiastical authority, an edict published in the month of March, 1682, and registered in Parliament on the 23d of the same month and year, is declared to be the general law of our Empire.

"We command and order that the present decree, sealed with the seals of the State, and inserted in the Bulletin of Laws, should be addressed to the courts, to the tribunals, to all the administrative authorities, to all the archbishops and bishops of our Empire, to the Grand Master, and to the academies of our imperial university and to the directors of seminaries and of other theological schools, in order that this decree should be inscribed in their registers, to be observed and to be caused to be observed, and our supreme judge, the Minister of Justice is charged with the enforcement of the publication of this decree.

"Given in our palace of the Tuileries, February 25, 1810. Napoleon."

This decree was published while Pius VII was in jail at Savona, about the time that the gallant Tyrolese patriot, Hofer, was murdered in Mantua; Josephine divorced by an incompetent tribunal of cowardly theologians, and Maria Louisa given to the French despot by a weak Catholic emperor of Austria with the sanction of a few unprincipled bishops and canonists.

Here is the genealogy of the present status of France:

Napoleon, the Corsican despot, endorses the Act of Louis XIV, the Bourbon despot, to enslave the Church. Indeed, in many respects this monarch and his court bishops were as great enemies of the Church as the Corsican was. Louis' court bishops, with Bossuet at their head, enslaved the Church in the seventeenth century, when even a Vicar General was condemned to death by the Parliament of Toulouse for appealing to the Pope from the decree of the secular court. De Maistre tells the story. Schism de facto for a time existed in France during the dispute between Louis and the Pope, Innocent XI. The bishops, led by Bossuet, were ready and willing to found a Gallican Church after the model of Henry VIII's beautiful creation in England, but the prudence of the Pope and the timidity of the King saved the situation.

"The State, it is I," said Louis XIV. "I accept and endorse," said the Corsican, and to prove that he meant what he said he robbed the Pope, locked him up in jail and put his heel on the bishops' necks. If Providence had not used a great, schismatic power, Russia, and a great Protestant power, England, to crush the despot, he might have become "pontifex maximus" himself.

Now, where did those two despots of France get their idea that the State was supreme in religion as well as in politics, that the State, in fact, is God? Evidently from Nero and the other pagan emperors who imagined themselves divine, insisted upon incense being offered to their statues, and on putting the Christians to death on the charge of high treason for maintaining that the emperor's jurisdiction was limited by the power of conscience and religion. To assert that there was an infinite and omnipotent God above the emperor was high treason, and those who asserted it paid the penalty by loss of life. Louis may have believed in God. If so, why did he say: "The State, it is I?" Why deny the popes' jurisdiction over the Church? And if Bossuet and his companions had a living faith and were not blinded by the glamor of the court or the love of honors, would they have favored a schism in the Church of Christ? The Corsican, of course, had no religion but the gratification of his ambition. Nothing that he did surprises us.

From Nero to Louis XIV and Napoleon to Waldeck Rousseau, Combes and Briand, the jump is easy. It is a descent from giants to pygmies. But it is the same race and the same breed. The efficient cause of the persecution of the Church in France is clearly atheistic Caesarism. Will it conquer? How fared it with Nero? Where are all the Bourbons, and where is the Napoleonic dynasty? Waldeck Rousseau is dead and judged; Clemenceau and Combes have been kicked out of office, and Briand and his associates are trimming their sails. The new spring is blooming all over France. I have read popular novels in which the Christian religion is called effete, worn out. I beg your pardon. This is not true of the Catholic Christian religion. A man or a nation may lose it, but it is always a renovator. It is eternal. When the storm is over it raises its head again and the very ruins and rubbish only fertilize the soil for a larger and better crop. It is rising into power again amid the atheism and impurity of Paris. Visit the beautiful church of St. Clothilde as I did yesterday morning and see the crowds at the sermon; visit St. Sulpice or St. Roch or the Madeleine. I cannot visit them all. But what I see indicates a revival, zealous priests and genuine Catholics.

Yesterday, M. Gardey, the curé of St. Clothilde's, who is also a Vicar General of Paris and one of my old esteemed classmates, gave me a breakfast at which I met the Count of Chambrun, a Catholic deputy of the corps législatif, a name well known in America. Some of the Parisian clergy were present and we talked of the religious situation in France and in America.

I pointed out to them that we have a written constitution, not only in the United States, but in each separate State, guaranteeing the right of property which cannot be taken without compensation by the State. And then we have freedom of worship and freedom of education guaranteed by these written constitutions. I showed them that even so-called despotic Russia has these three constitutional rights guaranteed. A mere majority vote cannot take them away. The canceling of any one of these rights cannot be done in a fit of temper or by an accidental majority, or even by a great majority.

Now in France or in Italy there is no such guarantee as we have in our republic. For them the State is legally God, and a majority, often the result of a fit of passion, is God, or rather the devil, who robs and persecutes the good and tries to damn the souls even of children. Until France and Italy draw a sacred circle—as Richelieu does around Julie in the play—around the right of property, freedom of worship and freedom of education, the statesmen of France and Italy will continue to act like semi-maniacs and mountebanks. Assent followed the American views.

Presidential Election in Brazil

For the first time in the history of Brazil the religious question played a part in the elections for President. Until now the Brazilian Presidents maintained religious liberty in a very royal manner. Rodrigues, Flores and Alfonso were even suspected of "clericalism." The writer of these lines has himself heard Alfonso, in an address to the students of St. Catharine's College, boast of his having been educated in a religious institution, namely, in the college of the Lazarists of Caracao. Neither of the two candidates actually in competition for the presidency could be looked upon as "clerical."

Marshal Hermes is a well-known Freemason. At the last election for the headmaster of the Brazilian Lodges he received some votes. The Freemason press loudly praises him as the incarnation of its tendencies. This affirmation was made in a circular addressed by the Brazilian Freemasonry to its adepts and published in the Jornal do Commercio at Rio, January 21, 1910. On March 1, Marshal Hermes da Fonseca was elected President. Let us hope that in his future government he will avail himself of the sage counsel of the defeated candidate.

Ruy Barbosa, candidate of the Civilists, is well disposed towards the Church. The first reason for this can be found in the fact of his being a man of the highest intelligence. His sons were pupils of the Jesuit college at Nova Friburgo. In his platform Ruy Barbosa has lately stated his opinions about associations of worship.

The following paragraphs, taken from the Deutsches Volksblatt for 1910, No. 5, reproduce the principal thoughts in this matter:

"As a Catholic I have always been a partisan of religious liberty, always fighting in the front rank for religious liberty, and under the provisional government I was one of the first promoters of the Act tending to the separation of Church and State. . . . The principle of a free Church in a free State has been interpreted both in America and in France but in two different and almost contradictory ways. In America, the government does not interfere with the expansion of Catholicism, which is to-day the most numerous of all confessions in the United States. In that country of real liberty, Catholicism is considered as one of the most powerful factors of civilization and social stability. France, on the contrary, seems to be continually haunted by the phantom of clericalism and the government there restlessly goes from reaction to reaction in fierce and relentless persecution. So that the French interpretation of the above-mentioned principle brings about terrific consequences. That is the reason why, in the twentieth century, they fall back on the unlimited power of royalty, and we see with stupefaction that under a régime of republican liberty all religious associations have been banished from France, whilst in America, by a liberal interpretation of the same principles, those same religious associations, exiled from their own country, are allowed to develop and expand freely, flourishing and full of benediction, without the smallest cloud on their horizon. Roman prelates and members of the Sacred College dine at the table with Mr. Roosevelt, a Protestant, who never neglects on Sundays to perform his religious duties in a temple of his own creed.

"And this same religious liberty we have engraven upon the Constitution of Brazil. We have copied it from the North American and not from the French source. Not to France but to America must we turn for instruction, look for decisions and solutions which would be violent, hurtful and reactionist beyond measure according to the French republican politics, whereas, according to the liberal American principle, they will be just, correct and pacific.

Anti-Clerical Activity in Rome

ROME, FEBRUARY 26, 1910.

Despite the ominous mutterings of a week ago, on the eve of the Giordano Bruno demonstration, things came off on Sunday with an unwonted lack of violence, both during the procession and the speech-making. Instead of the hundred thousand participants expected by the anti-clericals, some six or eight thousand marched in line down the whole length of the Via Nazionale into the Campo de' Fiori. The spectators seemed far more numerous than the actual participants, but spectators and all were numbered in the estimates of certain blustering periodicals.

When the parade halted in the broad piazza, all were grouped about the famous Bruno monument, and here the annual denunciations of clerical aggression and imposture were rolled forth with characteristic volubility. Three deputies in the Italian Parliament were the orators of the day. Their cry was the crushing of all bodies of religious, the uprooting of all Catholic teaching from the schools, and the renewal of systematic persecution of the Church. One sad feature of this truly stupid celebration was the large number of boys and university students in the parade.

But the Catholic societies were not asleep this year. During the day some sixty thousand circulars were distributed among the throngs, stating the manner of man Giordano Bruno was and exposing the silly assertions of the mob that was celebrating. These same Catholic organizations sent a joint message to the Holy Father, assuring him of their loyalty. They have begun to realize how acute the situation is becoming, the more especially as no week passes without vilifications of religion and of the Pope appearing in the numerous anti-clerical papers of the city. Most of these yellow sheets flaunt their despicable caricatures in a riot of ugly colors before the public at every corner, and gazing at them can always be seen the young as well as the old. But it is not alone the Italian papers, for the gaudy French sheets are everywhere in evidence and these are in several respects more loathsome still.

The Lenten sermons at the various churches are listened to by very large crowds. The pulpit of the vast church of San Carlo al Corso is filled by an eloquent Franciscan, Father Norberto Seguini; and after hearing him the first time I little wondered at the immense throng gathered at his feet. The English-speaking Catholics of the city, and they seem to be here in large numbers this winter, are enjoying an excellent course of sermons by the Rev. Canon Higgins, of London. Quite a few non-Catholics go to hear him at S. Silvestro in Capite.

The Duke of Abruzzi a short time ago gave a lecture before the King and Queen at the Roman College on his recent trip.

Some days ago a bitter attack was made on the seminaries by some members of the Chamber of Deputies, special emphasis being given to the lack of up-to-date, adequate training of priests. The ex-priest, Murri, was prominent, making a bitter attack on teaching sisters.

The Masons and Socialists are making every effort to wipe out the last vestiges of religion in the public schools.

Affairs in Spain

TORTOSA, SPAIN, FEBRUARY 24, 1910.

The downfall of the Moret cabinet was due to internal dissensions in the Liberal party. Sr. Moret's weakness in allowing his policy to be guided entirely by the trust papers of Madrid and by the dangerous revolutionary element caused many prominent Liberals, who had been excluded from office, to foresee nothing but ruin for their own interests if the Moret ministers were allowed to continue in power. Though a violent exponent of Waldeck-Rousseau legislation, Sr. Canalejas, who has formed the new Liberal cabinet, seems to have but little sympathy for the newspaper trust which exercised such a strong influence over the Moret ministry. It was amusing to read the violent editorials in these papers, and in the Republican dailies, published after the downfall of Moret. The Pope, the Nuncio, the religious orders, especially the Jesuits, were credited with having brought about the change of Ministers. It seemed a strange conclusion, indeed, when Catholic editors see nothing but peril for the Church in a cabinet directed by Sr. Canalejas and having Count de Romanones as Minister of Public Instruction.

Through the new ministry, the royal pardon has been granted to those who are in prison for participating in the outbreak of July. However, those political prisoners who were found guilty of using arms against the Government forces, and those who are awaiting trial on a capital charge are not included in the royal clemency. This act of the new Liberal cabinet will not be popular with army officers, who realize the full danger of concessions to the revolutionary forces.

As predicted in a previous letter, the lay schools have been reopened. The Moret cabinet, before its downfall, secured the royal decree granting permission to reopen these schools, with the condition, however, that they shall be subject to Government inspection, and, when found teaching doctrines contrary to law and public morality, shall be closed and those responsible for such teaching shall be held amenable to the Civil Code. This permission, in face of the admitted fact that these schools exist purely for the purpose of engendering atheism and anarchy in the minds of the young, has caused even a greater storm of protest than that which was witnessed during the months of December and January. In all parts of Spain Catholics are now aroused. They claim that Government inspection will be superficial and inefficient. In Valencia, the meeting of protest against the Government's action was attended by twenty thousand Catholics, and telegrams approving the meeting were read from mayors and parish priests of almost every town and village in the Province of Valencia. The attending representatives from Catholic societies in the neighboring towns make the formal protest from Valencia that of three hundred thousand Catholics. In Manresa, Zaragoza, Vitoria and a dozen important cities, great meetings have been held which show that Catholics are being actively aroused to support the demand of the hierarchy that these schools be closed.

The ladies of Manresa sent the resolutions of their meeting to the Queen, and asked her majesty to present their wishes, which doubtless are hers, to the Government. The ladies of St. Anne's parish in Barcelona have banded themselves into a league of Catholic Social Defense. The ladies' meeting of Manresa has created quite a sensation.

A booklet of thirty-two pages, entitled "La Bandera

y El Soldado" (The Flag and the Soldier), by Father Remigio Vilariño, S.J., has created an outcry in the Republican press against "Jesuitism in the Barracks." As is well known, when Ferrer and his followers planned the outbreak of July, with its arson and murder, they made a special effort, by pamphlets and agents, to corrupt the soldiers in the barracks of Barcelona, and to induce them to use their rifles against their own officers. Father Vilariño's little work is written to counteract the evil influences at work among the soldiers of Spain. "La Bandera y El Soldado" is admirably arranged and contains a thrilling picture of Marinas, the Spanish hero of Cascorro. It explains the soldier's duty, the meaning of his flag, and the deep love in the hearts of men for the soldier-hero. Ten thousand of these little books have been distributed in the barracks of Spain, and fifteen thousand more copies are now in press. Army officers have warmly welcomed the little work.

Two Sundays ago the inauguration of the house of retreats for working men lately enlarged and refitted at Barcelona took place. This house is attached to the Jesuit College of Sarria, a suburb of Barcelona. The ceremony was held in the College Hall. The head of the diocese, several ecclesiastics, the patrons and friends of the work and a vast crowd were present. The bishop delivered an eloquent speech, followed by appropriate remarks of Rev. Father Puig, the Director of the Sodality, in which he explained the aim, the needs and the blessings of this movement on behalf of the working class.

To promote these retreats of working men not only by counsel but also materially by pecuniary aid, is one of the many works of lay apostolate, to which the members of the Sodality of Barcelona are devoting themselves heart and soul.

These retreats for working men have been going on for the past two years and not less than 700 laborers have enjoyed the benefit of this spiritual outing to Serria. The exercitant is not only lodged free at the house, but also his traveling expenses and even his daily wages, if necessary, are defrayed by the association. Many of course will not avail themselves of such extreme generosity, especially after their spiritual treat.

During the year 1908, 216 laborers made the retreat and the Sodality spent for the purpose 3,064.80 pesetas. The Sodality has promoters of this grand work in different cities of the province. The house proved too small and hence the need of enlarging and refitting it. The Sodality of Barcelona numbers now nearly two thousand members.

C. J. M.

Another sign of the times is the semi-authoritative announcement of the marriage, late in the year, of Princess Clementine, youngest daughter of Leopold II, to Prince Napoleon. The match, which appears to be entirely an affaire de cœur, was forbidden by the late king for obvious political and personal reasons. Much regret is heard in Catholic circles at the news; for the prince comes from a family notorious for its treachery to the Church.

It will be remembered that the new Army Act abolishes substitution, thus calling to military service many young men now at the university or at other higher studies. A new decree grants to students of the universities and colleges of higher studies, among others of the Industrial School at Liège and the Commercial School at Antwerp, directed by the Jesuits, the privilege of serving in a special battalion.

If Ye Have Risen With Christ

Faith is vain, if Christ be not risen from the dead. Even with Christ risen, faith is vain, or, without solid ground of hope in vast multitudes, who know of His Resurrection and affect to believe it, but who still fail to grasp its significance. No man can accept this truth and live as if all were to end here. There is no end to life even in the grave, where our mortal remains await restoration to the spirit with new powers and new qualities exceeding the most extravagant conjecture. As life lengthens the struggle for existence grows more arduous. At one time or other every man quails at the menace of dissolution. Many even young lives are weary with the unequal contest. Some tire of life, others grow disgusted with it, many dissipate it. At best our stay here is brief, as swift as the flight of the arrow, and, when over, as trackless as a ship's furrow in the sea. Death faces, haunts, pursues us everywhere. But for a belief in immortality, life would be a continuous dread of death. With this belief the sting of death is lost. One could reason out a belief in immortality without the Resurrection; but for an abiding, energizing, triumphant faith, with well-founded hope of a happy immortality, the Risen Christ was needed. Not all men necessarily look forward with joy to a future life unending; for not all know happiness in this life. But no one can believe: "I know that my Redeemer liveth," without rejoicing in the prospect: "In the last day I shall rise out of the earth and I shall be clothed again with my skin, and in my flesh I shall see my God. Whom I myself shall see, and my eyes shall behold, and not another; this my hope is laid up in my bosom."

A Death and what it Recalls

News comes from England of the death of Dr. Edward King, Bishop of Lincoln, an amiable man much beloved by the High Church party of which he was a member. His character is well drawn in the "Life and Letters of Father Henry Van Rensselaer," by the subject of that memoir, who was intimate with him during his sojourn in Oxford while still a Protestant. Our readers will probably best recollect Bishop King as the defendant before the Lambeth tribunal in 1890. He had been denounced by the Church Association for using candles on the Communion table, for celebrating the Communion with his face to the table and his back to the people, for washing out the chalice after Communion with wine and water which he there drank in the manner of Catholic priests, for mixing a little water with the wine as we do at the offertory, for not letting the people see him bless the bread and wine by laying his hand upon them, for having the hymn: "Lamb of God who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us," sung at Communion, and for making the sign of the cross when giving the blessing.

After a good deal of manipulation the trial came into the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury. High churchmen flattered themselves that at last they were going to have a real ecclesiastical tribunal. To their chagrin, however, the archbishop would not act until authorized by the Privy Council, and assured on the part of the Crown, of his jurisdiction. His judgment must have been painful to Bishop King. He allowed the candles, the purification of the chalice and the singing of "Lamb of God," etc., on the ground that they had no special doctrinal significance. The mixing of water in the chalice during the service he forbade, but allowed it if done in the vestry before service. He permitted the position with the back turned to the people, provided what was done with the hands could be seen by the members of the congregation, getting over the apparent incompatibility of the two, by adding the words, "who should desire to do so," thus, throwing upon the congregation the burden of getting somewhere, perhaps into the roof, to see what was being done. The sign of the cross he forbade absolutely. The Church Times spoke very disparagingly of the judgment as a compromise and, refusing to recognize the jurisdiction of the court, denied its validity: now it calls it a "statesmanlike and judicious decision." Is it possible that "compromise" and "statesmanlike and judicious decision" may for Anglicans be synonymous?

Virtue of Economy

Economy is in the air. Men who used to live on profits are now trying to live by savings. Waste, high living, extravagance are the deadly sins for a time; thrift, self-denial, modesty the cardinal virtues. From a period of lavish expenditure we have passed to one of cautious reserve. With promise of prosperity, no one thought of saving money; with prosperity deferred no one dares to spend. Many a virtue has been made of necessity during the past season. Thousands who never heard of Lent, or who surely never observed it, have gone without meat this year. Thousands who despised self-denial as a religious practice have learned its economic value. Few have regretted that Lent came, with its cheaper and more meagre food, to spare the purse strings. All have learned by actual experiment the advantages of virtues they had regarded as monkish, mediaeval and fanatical. As in every reaction, some have gone to excess in their very virtues and have carried their economies to an untenable limit. They have forgotten the golden rule of moderation even in virtue, Ne quid nimis! Especially forgetful are they when applying the new code to others, by cutting off work that might be made productive and by reducing salaries too low to sustain the energy needed for vigorous work.

Zelaya Still Active

Ex-President Zelaya, who has returned to Paris after a three-weeks' stay in Madrid, gave out an interview on March 14, in which he makes known that he is about to publish a statement on recent affairs in Nicaragua. The book, which is already in the printer's hands, will be graced with facsimiles of various important documents, which, Zelaya asserts, prove that Estrada and the United States were solely responsible for the revolutionary attempt. Estrada sought political power; the United States wished to establish a protectorate over Central America. "The United States," continued Zelaya, "fearing the failure of the Panama Canal, tried to make sure of a concession by the Nicaragua route, to shut out Great Britain, France and Germany. As I steadfastly opposed the proposition, the Americans, wishing to get rid of me, were ready to utilize anybody. Estrada was simply a tool in their hands, and it was he that unchained all kinds of calamities against me. The sentiment of Nicaragua is plainly anti-American. I shall remain in Paris or Brussels for a year or two and then return to Nicaragua, but with no aspirations to the presidency, for I believe I should leave it to younger men." If his book bears out his advance notice, it will find many interested readers.

Editorial Communication

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of February 26th you very kindly gave space to some comment upon that particular kind of non-sectarianism which is animating the board of directors of George Washington University, Washington, D. C. In my remarks upon the letter of the Reverend Mr. England, advocating a Congressional appropriation for the University, I observed that his panicky state of mind over the "intrenched" position of "Rome"—as represented by Georgetown and the Catholic University—might possibly be a reflection of the minds of his colleagues upon the executive board of the institution.

That this was not far wrong would appear from another enlightening communication in the Living Church for March 5th. The correspondent this time is one Richard D. Harlan, who, as he speaks of "our charter," may likewise be presumed to be a member of the executive board of George Washington University. Mr. Harlan is hurt that the Living Church should endorse a protest of President Edmund J. James, of the University of Illinois, against a Congressional appropriation for George Washington University. It may be said here that President James appeared before the House Committee on Agriculture on behalf of the National Association of State Universities, and that he brought a protest against the above-mentioned subsidy signed by nearly all the heads of the State universities and normal schools.

Mr. Harlan says that President James has called George Washington University a "sectarian institution," and at a time, too, when he had in his possession facts which would prove the contrary. In a press report, President James described his own position as follows:

"We are not fighting Washington or the District of Columbia in connection with the allotment of funds under the terms of the Morrill Act, but we are protesting against the pernicious error of establishing a precedent of appropriating public funds for the maintenance of a private institution."

The objectionable epithet is not used here, and whether President James did or didn't apply the term at another time is not nearly so interesting as Mr. Harlan's account of the evolution of the Baptist caterpillar, Columbian College, into the polychrome butterfly, George Washington University. The Baptist trustees were asked to retire—at least a sufficient number—and then, that the wedding feast might go on, guests of variegated garments were called, so that the present board of trustees is composed of 4 Baptists, 5 Episcopalians, 5 Presbyterians, 1 Methodist, 1 Unitarian, 1 German Reformed, 1 Swedenborgian, 1 influential Hebrew.

No table of specific weights or reactions being appended, the proportions are not explainable. Suffice it to say, however, that, having mixed gently and obtained an excellent non-sectarianism, the name "George Washington" was taken, and from that moment the character of the institution was determined forever—or, as Mr. Harlan puts it, ". . . they thereby gave the most convincing pledge imaginable that the reorganized university would be maintained, to the end of time, on a non-sectarian foundation . . ."

Thus, fortified by the name of the Father of his Country and a board of directors of assorted beliefs, George Washington University goes securely on its "non-sectarian" way. But like his friend and confrère, the Reverend Mr. England of Rock Creek Parish, Mr. Harlan can not let well enough alone. He must needs nudge the editor of the Living Church in the ribs and bid him "Come in! It's all in the family." In a last engaging paragraph he says:

"If the editor of the Living Church knew the educational situation here in Washington, he could not possibly put a single stone in the way of the development of the entire work of the George Washington University which would, indirectly, be assured by the passage of this bill. Its largest growth will be a far-reaching, though indirect, advantage to your own church."

That the educational situation in Washington is in need of some illumination, we are quite free to admit; and it is due to the Reverend Mr. England of Rock Creek Parish, and his recent frankness, that we know whom the light would be most unwelcome to. Mr. Harlan is much more of a diplomat than his clerical associate. He is content to tell the editor of the Living Church that there is "something in it" for him and his co-religionists; he does not commit himself in details—he leaves them to the editor's horse-sense. This precaution comes too late, however; the pastor of Rock Creek has let the cat out of the bag.

What one wants to know now is: What trick of looking through one's legs is required to obtain such a conception of non-sectarianism? Here are two estimable gentlemen who are devoting themselves earnestly to the securing of a Government subsidy for George Washington University on the vehemently-asserted basis of its non-sectarian character; one of them has unguardedly admitted that the chief purpose of the University is to oppose the Catholic influence of Georgetown University and the Catholic University of America; and the other—who has the courage to accuse President James of deliberate misrepresentation—has plainly, though less openly, admitted this anti-Catholic purpose of George Washington University, and has urged the editor of the Living Church to help the matter along because there will be something in it for his denomination.

If George Washington University were now exclusively in the hands of the Baptists, and this attempt were made, the affair would be far less sectarian for the simple reason that now practically all the non-Catholic bodies are represented in an effort to build up with public moneys an explicitly anti-Catholic university.

The saddest thing of all, perhaps, is that George Washington should be made sponsor for this most un-American endeavor to pervert public funds to sectarian purposes. We can not help wondering whether Mr. Harlan did not have to wipe a smile away quickly after this sentence of gasconade:

"To have remained sectarian in any sense, after such a rechristening, after taking the name that belongs to all good Americans of every creed, would have been a gross and an impertinent violation of the proprieties of true patriotism."

Washington certainly did nothing to deserve this.

*Spring's in the Abbey Garden now,
Green on the ground and the bush and the bough,
Chatter of birds in the soft new air,
And a stirring and wakening everywhere.*

The Brother he planteth his lily bed
And he placeth his rose trees, white and red, (Lilies and roses shall bloom anon
For the Shrine of the Mother and Cross of the Son).

He unwintereth blithely the ancient Vine
Again on the Northern wall to twine
(It shall yield in the wine press the Altar Wine Ere the autumn goes to its death).
He hath plowed and harrowed a space anigh
For the Wheat of the Singing-Bread to lie.
(And the place of the Wheat and the Vine hard by
He hath called it "Nazareth").

And day by day as the young year grows
He shall lovingly tend his lily and rose,
(He shall number the blossoms, each as it blows,
For a vow he has truly made,
That every day ere the day be done
He shall say an "Ave" for every one.
When they stand before the Mother and Son
Oh, well shall his pains be paid!)

And at eventide when the shadows fall
Athwart the Vine on the northern wall,
Ere is borne from the belfry the Vesper-call
On the twilight's balmy breath,
Awhile he shall linger lovingly
By the Vine and the Wheat, and on bended knee
His sunburned hands his Rosary
Shall tell in Nazareth.

But when brooding night comes tiptoe in
From Heaven on high shall the Mother send (He shall know it not his cell within!)
Angels two his flowers to tend.

Michael in golden armor bright
Shall come to the lily bed,
And at the touch of his lance of light
Each lily shall lift its head.

And to each he shall whisper soft and sweet
The message he bringeth down:
"Ye shall stand in the Shrine at the Mother's feet
And twine in the Mother's crown."

The roses shall thrill at Raphael's hand
Caressing them one by one;
"Yours it shall be," shall he say, "to stand
At the Cross of the Virgin's Son."

And last—doth she love him the best of all
The Mother? Ah, who can tell?
To the Wheat and the Vine on the northern wall
She shall send him her Gabriel.

And he shall tell in the days of spring
Of the wonderful days to be,
And again to Nazareth shall he bring
The message of Calvary.

Green on the ground and the bush and the bough,
Chatter of birds in the soft new air
And stirring and wakening everywhere.*

LITERATURE

The Book of Easter. With an Introduction by the Rt. Rev. W. C. DOANE, and Imaginative Drawings by George Wharton Edwards. New York: The Macmillan Company.

The "Book of Christmas" must have been a success since the publishers have ventured upon a similar experiment in the present volume. With dainty binding in white and gold, decorative Ascension lilies, and numerous drawings and reproductions of famous pictures, all the external appearances of the little book suggest the wild, happy clash of Easter-bells. But the fact is driven home to us that the mystery of Easter is a crucial test of the Christian faith when we read into the collection of Easter literature herein contained, and feel obliged to admit that, as an Easter book, this one is anything but successful in justifying its title.

The plan of the book includes a section entitled "Before the Dawn," in which we have some selections on the Passion of Christ and various others on the topic of death. The version of the "Stabat Mater" and that of the "Dies Irae" are Worsley's and Irons' respectively, and therefore above criticism. But in citing passages, showing "how the Ancients thought of Death," why has the compiler quoted Scripture for the apparent purpose of proving that the Old Testament writers did not believe in a future life? It is not true, first of all; and, secondly, even where discussion exists there are two sides to the question, on account of the presence of passages which undoubtedly foreshadow and teach expressly a future immortality. Why did not the compiler choose his selections from the latter class? As for the remaining contents they are strongly marked by mediocrity from a literary point of view; whilst from the Christian point of view they include much impossible material. We are given the myth of Ceres and Proserpine with its subtle instillation of the notion that the Christian Easter is a development of a pagan festival. We have Arthur Hugh Clough's "Easter Day," with its atheistic interpretation of the Christian miracle. The compiler, realizing perhaps that his audacity has carried him too far, has omitted the title of this poem from the table of contents.

Why do intelligent publishers perpetrate mistakes like this? It certainly does not pay. A heterogeneous jumble like the present book is offensive just because it is comprehensive. To unbelievers the Christian tone of some of its contents will be distasteful; to believers the thin solution of Christianity doled out in Hibbard lectures and in extracts from Phillips Brooks and similar "fancy" Christians, not to mention undisguised infidelity, such as that of Clough's poem, must be most abhorrent. The desire of the publishers to please everyone has led them to attempt a combination of warring elements.

Why an Episcopalian bishop should send such a collection forth with his benign approval and blessing, is another question which we cannot answer. The bishop's little essay, of course, puts certain Christian truths in an admirable way. Yet we cannot but be surprised at some of his statements. Bishop Doane says: "While angels heralded the birth of the little Baby and brought the shepherds to the stable, while the new star lighted itself in the sky to lead the wise men to the Holy Child, there was no announcement or outward visible sign of the actual rising; but silently and secretly, just before the day broke, with no mortal eye to see and no witness to describe, He rose again from the dead." St. Matthew says: "And behold there was a great earthquake. For an angel of the Lord descended from heaven: and coming, rolled back the stone, and sat upon it; and his countenance was as lightning, and his raiment as snow. And for fear of him, the guards were struck with terror and became as dead men."

The Bishop tells us, moreover, that resurrection from the dead "is not miraculous—to use a foolish word that only means wonder,—because there is no wonder about it; nor is it supernatural,—to use a still more foolish word,—because we do not know the 'metes and bounds' of nature and cannot say, therefore, what lies beyond them. It is perfectly natural. Every planted thing that has in it a germ of life must come to life again." We do not know which shocks us most in this passage: the bad theology, the bad philosophy, or the bad logic.

American Foreign Policy, by A DIPLOMATIST. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin Co. Price $1.25 net.

Information about desert land reclamation, forest reserves or the improvement of waterways is so readily obtainable from reliable sources that all who take an interest in the subject can be easily gratified. But what about our dealings with other governments? What is done? Why and how is it done? In two hundred pages, A Diplomatist answers these and many more questions connected with our foreign relations. For more than a century the United States was seldom drawn into deep discussions with other nations, but the puny republic of the eighteenth century has now become, as our Latin American friends never tire of repeating, the Colossus of the North. What thought had the early Presidents of the Philippines or Samoa? What trend of events has been such that our country must now not only take cognizance of the great diplomatic contests which rapidly follow one another in Europe, but from sheer self-protection must henceforth be ready to take an active part in those spirited though unbloody battles. The old order has gone, to return no more. The book gives clear and precise information which the American citizen ought to have if he is to be able to form an intelligent opinion of our relations with the rest of the world. The chapters on the Latin republics and the Far East are particularly valuable. The author makes it plain that broken down political hacks ought not to find berths in the diplomatic or consular service. Even a strong and brilliant man may become a failure in statecraft: a successful physician does not necessarily prove a successful lawyer. Diplomacy must henceforth be in America what it has been for ages in Europe, a true profession. A training school for diplomatists, the author says very properly, is one of our needs. Not the least merit of the book is that, while showing the change of conditions that has come over our country, it insists upon the vital importance of rising to the occasions that have resulted from that change.

The Snare of Circumstance. By EDITH E. BUCKLEY. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

Breathes there a man who does not like a detective story? Miss Buckley has given us one with a vengeance. Without crowding horrors, she has heaped mystery upon mystery. In the way of blind alleys and unexpected turns, there is an embarrassment of riches. The only thing the reader may feel quite sure of during the first nine or ten chapters are the names of the book and the author. Everything proves in the issue to be something else. Wherefore, the reading requires close attention. The first chapters are the best. Miss Buckley, towards the end, is so busy disentangling her most tangled skein that she drops completely two of her most interesting characters—the girl in white and the bosom friend of the hero. The book is clean, well written, not at all dull; there are surprises plentiful as blackberries, but the plot, like that of most detective stories, is strained.

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

El Catolico armado contra los ataques de los Protestantes, por PIO DE MANDATO. Obra traducida, aumentada y adaptada por el DOCTOR D. RAFAEL PIJOAN. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price $1.10 net.

The highly commendatory letter with which the Rt. Rev. Felipe Ortiz y Gutiérrez, Bishop of Zamora, Spain, has honored the translator tells us that no praise of the book is needed except to encourage its circulation, for it is its own best recommendation as any attentive reader will see. Six chapters are devoted to a discussion of the nature, rise and spread of Protestantism; five chapters and an appendix state the Catholic position with special reference to points of controversy and modern conditions. As the Protestant propaganda is now active in many Spanish-speaking countries, and especially in our colonial possessions, we trust that the clergy and enlightened laity will see to the distribution of a large edition of a book whose timeliness and merit it would be hard to overestimate.

The Christian Instructed and the Christian Consoled. London: Catholic Truth Society, 4 Paternoster Row, E. C. Price each, cloth, one shilling; paper, sixpence.

These two little volumes translated from the Italian of Father Quadrupani, a Barnabite of the eighteenth century, are for the instruction and encouragement of those devout souls who, while not called to the religious life, study their personal sanctification. Little chapters on slander, friendship, amusements, and human respect are typical instructions. "There are many who are gracious and obliging in the company of strangers who are harsh and insupportable in the bosom of their own family" is the introduction to some pointed advice on home life. The sources of spiritual strength and the way to sanctify one's duties and derive spiritual advantage from daily trials are some of the subjects treated in "The Christian Consoled." Directors of sodalities will find both volumes full of appropriate suggestions.

Do It to a Finish, by ORISON SWETT MARDEN. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.

Through fifty odd pages, the author addresses himself in strongly worded counsels with frequent illustrations from life to the great work of driving home to our young Americans the need of conscientious thoroughness in whatever they undertake. The lesson is sadly needed, for "short cuts" in everything seem to be the order of the day. He insists, and with reason, that natural cleverness, or Yankee "smartness" is no fair substitute for the patient mastery of a trade or a profession. The chapter on the relation of work to character and that on second-class men show a boy why, with so many wide open avenues to success, failure and consequent discontent blight lives which were once filled with brilliant hope and promise.

La Joven Catolica en familia y en sociedad, por MARIA DE LOS DOLORES DEL POZO. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price, 55 cents, net.

We do not know of a more desirable keepsake that a Spanish maiden could take with her when leaving school for good than "La joven Católica." Full of prudent counsels for her conduct at home and in society, it gives a sensible chapter on her personal and private life, warning her against that worldliness, frivolousness and idleness to which girls are so prone. An introduction on woman's influence in society and a closing chapter on some illustrious Catholic women of history complete the valuable contents. Cardinal Gregorio Maria Aguirre y Garcia, Archbishop of Toledo and Primate of Spain, has written in terms of high approval of the book and its aims. In paper, print and binding the publisher has added to the attractiveness of a book that is so desirable in itself.

Reviews and Magazines

The Easter number of the Rosary Magazine is rich in matter and well abreast in literary excellence of the best reviews of the day. Two remarkable dramatic productions, "The Passion Play" and "St. Patrick at Tara," both composed and enacted in San Francisco, are minutely described and copiously illustrated. "The Passion Play," adapted and directed by Rev. J. Kraus, O.F.M., was enacted four nights in the San Francisco Coliseum before immense audiences, and though "St. Patrick" was presented by the Bohemian Club, and the dramatist, Professor Stephens, is neither Irish nor Catholic, the representation was sympathetic and reverent. D. J. Donahoe gives an interesting account of the Easter Church hymns, which he translates in fluent verse. The songs of Alleluia are particularly well done. F. T. Furey, M.A., has a well-informed, thoughtful article on "Papal Infallibility and its Aftermath," and P. J. Coleman, besides several other excellent contributions in prose and verse, gives the best picture we have seen of T. A. Daly, the poet and the man. In his literary notes Mr. Coleman pays handsome tribute to the article in AMERICA on Father Tabb. The author is not usually known as "Mr.," being the Rev. T. S. Duggan, editor of the Hartford Catholic Transcript.

In the Month we note interesting articles on "Some Old Churches in North Wales" and "The Paris Floods." Harold Binns writes on Montaigne with an enthusiasm which, though it does not surprise one in Andrew Lang, seems excessive in a Catholic writer. There is no warning word; and so any reader of the Month might end the article exclaiming: "I must get Montaigne." Were we editing the Month we would not like to share in the responsibility for such a resolution. The Hon. R. Erskine begins what apparently will be a series of articles on The Scottish Gaels and the Reformation. As he tells us the subject is not comprehended by many, a fuller explanation of certain points would have been useful. Thus we read: "By reason of . . . the repeated suppressions of the Lordship of the Isles, Gaelic Scotland had been brought to the verge of bankruptcy." For the many whose information concerning the Lord of the Isles is confined to the fact that Scott wrote a poem they probably have not read, with this title, the statement is not illuminating, nor will they see the connection of its parts. On the other hand, the defence of the learning and of the morals of the Gaelic clergy is particularly useful. Father Sydney Smith writes learnedly, as usual, on the Divinity of Christ, as does William Keane on "Pragmatism, Scholasticism and Truth."

The Catholic University Bulletin opens with a sermon by Rev. D. J. Kennedy, O.P., on the Immaculate Conception, showing that, in spite of the doubtfully adverse opinion of St. Thomas Aquinas, the Dominicans generally were strong advocates of the dogma. Rev. George Sauvage, C.S.P., continues his criticism of the "New Philosophy in France" as expounded by Bergson and Leroy. He takes them seriously, devoting much intellectual power to the refutation of a system that presupposes the inadequacy of intellect. Dr. Shields has a suggestive paper on methods of imparting religious instruction to the young. He finds all our American Catholic readers unsuitable for this purpose, and approves of the Munich system of first capturing the child's interest with a well-selected story and following with questions thereon coordinated into a connected lesson. We see in the book notes that Dr. Shields, in conjunction with Dr. Pace, is getting out a series of textbooks on Religion in accord with his principles. Professor Lennox, in completing his exposition of the Constitution and Courses of the National University of Ireland, predicts for it a successful future. The reviews of books, especially those dealing with philosophy, are informing and judicious, though the reviewer of Dr. O'Sullivan's brilliant refutation of Kant's and Hegel's Criticism and James' and Dewey's Pragmatism seems to hold him partially responsible for the monotonous ponderosity of his subjects. One would hardly expect to find enlivenment in such a quarter; even Coleridge, a poet, was dull when dealing with German metaphysics.

In the latest issue of the International Journal of Ethics W. R. Sorley, of Cambridge, says: "If the biological process is to be taken as the final account of things, reason included, then certainly we have no right to speak of the truth of ideas in any other sense than this, that to hold them is of use to human beings within that little range of experience which preserves our life. How, then, can we justify ourselves in making any assertions about evolution or the universe as a whole?" A system that produces such a paralyzing effect is not likely to dominate philosophy; inevitably error must be lurking in it somewhere. The same issue contains a sample of the Evolutionist's habit of avoiding the facts of history when they are found inconvenient. Thorstein Veblen, of Stanford University, comparing Christian morals and the competitive system, takes non-resistance as a characteristic principle of Christian morality, and then endeavors to demonstrate its existence in the first years of Christianity: "The lower orders of the populace formed the main body of the early Christians. These were men who had acquired, under high pressure, the conviction that non-resistance was the chief of virtues if not the whole duty of man." Thus concludes evolution, though the stubborn resistance of the early Christians is one of the most obvious facts of history. If they were marked by this spirit of non-resistance, what was the need of condemning them to rack and wheel and scourge, and killing them off by the millions? If the historian has to repeat with the Cambridge professor that the evolutionist has no grounds for his theory, the attempts of Darwinians to fit their theories into mind as well as matter will scarcely be crowned with success. J. C.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Harold Cox, one of the ablest members of the last Parliament, consoles himself in his defeat by giving his idea of the way the political machine, which seems to be at a deadlock, may be set running again. Ameer Ali writes on the experiment in government now being made in India under Lord Morley's Act. In twelve pages he manages to say very little. Nevertheless he brings out his idea, often expressed, of the temporary nature of British rule. As Ameer Ali is looked upon as a model loyalist, has been banqueted and sworn of the Privy Council as such, this is worth noting. The indefatigable Mr. Morel, the ally of Vandervelde, the Belgian Socialist leader, and of the Liverpool African merchants, harps away on the Congo. He proves his theory of abuses this time from statistics of trade and armaments, which avail nothing against the testimony of disinterested witnesses. William O'Brien demonstrates to his own satisfaction the impending overthrow of those who now control the Irish party, and by implication, the succession of himself and his friends. Evolutionists, really persuaded of the truth of their theories, should read Sir Frederick Treves' article with dismay. He holds the multiplication of machinery to be the occasion of our losing the use of our hands, or rather of our fingers. If this be true, every evolutionist must admit our fingers to be doomed. Fortunately we have buttons and buttonholes left, and morning and evening we all use our fingers on them. Among the other articles is a noteworthy one by W. S. Lilly, on the "Will of the People" as manifested by the voting at elections. It is rather a gloomy one; but at the present moment

English publicists have every reason to be gloomy.

The Contemporary Review puts in the first place two articles on the general election, which undertake to explain how it all happened. Such articles may interest the practical politician: could the wise after the event only agree upon its causes, they might interest the general reader; as it is, they only bewilder him. The Rev. J. G. James has a distressing article on "Faith, Fact and Experience." It is distressing, not so much for its matter, for many a worse has been written, as on account of the evidence it gives of the mental cloudiness of one who apparently would like to be orthodox. Dr. James has dabbled in German theology and criticism, and is fond of such expressions as "psychosis," "volitional processes," etc., but he does not seem to have a clear idea of Faith. He sees that it depends upon the will and treats this, which is as old as the Gospel, as a new discovery. But this does not make it a "volitional process," nor a "fully developed will," nor "specifically the organ of conduct so to speak." Indeed, when one, undertaking a definition by genus and species, completes it with the expression "so to speak," he bears testimony to the intellectual fog in which he is plunged. The Protestant notion of Faith may have something to do with Dr. James' bewilderment: his lack of training has much more. After all, he is only a doctor of letters, which are not an introduction to theology. How deficient he is in this science may be seen from this: "If God has uttered His Will in the Logos, and that Logos has assumed the form of a human personality," etc. It has not occurred to Dr. James that he might draw from Catholic philosophy and theology distinct, fundamental notions which would enable him to discuss intelligently the subject of his paper. Mr. G. Valentine Williams contributes a not very illuminating article on the Press Bureau in the office of the German Chancellor, in which he undertakes to show the working of the department and how the Chancellor uses it at home and abroad. Monsignor Barnes flays a certain Canon Hammond who, to overthrow the Pope, denies the authenticity of the text: Thou art Peter, etc. (Matt. xvi, 18), regardless of consequences to his own creed. These, Monsignor Barnes proves, would be the uprooting of the foundations upon which the doctrines of the Church of England rest; while the Catholic Faith would remain unshaken. Monsignor Barnes is, perhaps, a little too liberal with regard to modern criticism. What he seems to admit may be "data sed non concessa" for the sake of argument; but this does not appear clearly.

EDUCATION

The Independent criticizes AMERICA for the statement that the benefits of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of teaching are limited to institutions from which Christian influence is debarred. The report of the president and treasurer of the fund (1909) offers more than sufficient evidence of the truth of the statement criticized. On pages 4 and 7 of that report is the story of a conference between the executive officers of the Fund and a group of thirteen gentlemen, presidents of colleges associated with religious organizations. These colleges have been thus far debarred from participation in the privileges of the accepted list recognized by the Foundation because certain weighty reasons, in no sense sectarian, forbid a change in their charters legally binding them to religious organizations. In order to enjoy the benefits of the Fund these gentlemen agreed to accept all the conditions required for such participation, specifically affirming that their institutions "do not prescribe denominational tests for administrative officers, faculty or students, and do not require the teaching of denominational tenets." The Carnegie Committee did not "feel justified in recommending the removal from the endowment intrusted to the trustees of the restrictions concerning institutions which are organized in legal dependence upon religious bodies." Mr. Carnegie concurred in their opinion, and the plea to be placed on the Fund's favored list of such colleges as Brown was rejected. And yet a committee of Brown men, "appointed to consider possible changes in the charter of Brown University," declared that no trace of sectarian influence is ever seen in the assembly of its trustees and fellows, in the meeting of its faculty, or in the instruction of its classroom. In the face of the absolute elimination of religious influence and control, which this action imports, the off-hand affirmation that the Fund does not forbid or mean to forbid Christian influence hardly merits attention.

Through the generosity of E. Francis Riggs, Washington, a member of its Finance Committee, the Catholic University has received a copy of the famous "Paléographie Musicale," edited by the Benedictines of Solesmes in France. This superb work, so far in ten large quarto volumes, is destined to contain many of the great plain chant manuscripts of the Middle Ages, reproduced phototypically, in the most scientific manner. Among them are the ninth or tenth century Antiphonal of St. Gregory that represents the traditions of Metz and St. Gall; the Responsory-Gradual "Justus ut Palma" compiled from various ninth to seventeenth century manuscripts, and representing the richest collection of musical manuscripts yet published (Italian, Lombardian, Aquitanian, Messinese, English, French); the Einsiedeln Antiphonal of the tenth to eleventh centuries; the Ambrosian Antiphonary (Codex Add. 34,209 of the British Museum), probably the most ancient of all those which preserve the tradition of the Milanese plain-song, and through which it first became possible to distinguish accurately between the Gregorian and Ambrosian melodies otherwise so full of resemblances; the Montpellier Antiphonary of the eleventh century, with its valuable double notation above the text, i. e., alphabetical notation and neum accents; the Antiphonal of Blessed Notker (St. Gaul, tenth century), a very complete monastic antiphonary, with over 2,200 anthems and more than 800 responses, whose St. Gall neumatic notation is very beautiful and clear, and is accompanied by Romanian letters and signs. For the history of medieval music, in itself no small province of mental culture, these phototyped manuscripts are invaluable.

The University Collection for 1909 has proven so far considerably in advance of last year's, a very gratifying fact, as it gives tangible evidence of the interest taken by the Catholic people and their clergy in this great central educational institution. John McDonough, of Evansville, Ind., recently left the University the sum of $500.

SCIENCE

In AMERICA, Vol. I, No. 4 and Vol. II, No. 12, mention was made of the discussion, in which several astronomers were engaged, concerning the absorption of light in space. Tickhoff has lately offered another proof on the affirmative side. "Photographs of the same constellation," says Herbert E. Ives in the March number of the Astrophysical Journal, "were made through differently colored glasses. In a 'red' photograph the faint stars were more numerous than in a 'blue.' Therefore, since the faint stars are on the whole more distant, and since blue light is scattered more by passage through a turbid medium, than is red, this could mean that an appreciable scattering of light takes place in space."

He then recounts a number of varied experiments he had himself made on the photography of red and blue objects, and feels convinced that Tickhoff's results were owing to his photographic films and the manner in which they were handled. He says:

"The conclusion from this work is that the assumption underlying Tickhoff's experiment—that scale of gradation of the photographic plate is the same for all colors—is not true. The relative photographic action of different colors depends upon the time of exposure and the absolute intensity. The experiment performed by Tickhoff has meaning only if the scale of gradation of the plates employed is known for each color, under the conditions used, and allowance made for it. . . .

"It is evident that a difference in the relative photographic densities of faint and bright stars by differently colored light may be entirely a photographic phenomenon, and hence no evidence for scattering might, therefore, equally well however, the effect be found to be real, when tested under conditions as indicated above, there is another possible explanation. According to Tickhoff's reasoning the faint stars are, on the whole, more distant. Now we know that many faint stars are as near as some of the brighter ones; certainly in many stellar groups faint and bright stars are grouped together at about the same distance from us. Could we not then state with equal justification that the faint stars are, on the whole, the smaller ones? Being smaller they would in any group of common origin be farther along in their life-history and so, it might be argued, cooler and more yellow.

The same photographic test which has been applied to the question of light scattering, might therefore equally well have been called upon to test the hypothesis that faint stars are as a class smaller than the bright ones—had such a hypothesis been necessary to astronomical problems. If this reasoning is correct, positive photographic evidence of the kind we have been considering would not alone be sufficient to prove scattering of light in space. Reliable conclusions could be drawn only by knowledge of the size and distance, as well as the color, of a large number of stars, the line of investigation which Kapteyn is now pursuing."

THE CANALS OF MARS AGAIN.

In AMERICA of January 29 and February 5 it was stated that several European astronomers with superior telescopic equipment have never been able to see the canals of Mars, and that they all denied the objective existence of these markings. In a belated number of Nature of February 3, received on March 7, Lowell replies to his critics, and claims that a smaller lens may define much more accurately than a larger one, and that his own 24-inch glass gives the best images ever given by any lens. A week later, February 10, he adds: "It will prove of interest to students of the subject that this optical shattering of lines, due to a large lens, is precisely what M. Antoniadi observed at Meudon in his observation of Mars. He saw in the canals, in place of lines, a tessellated series of dots. His observed mosaic effect is the exact theoretic effect that a large aperture should produce on continuous lines such as the canals, and always does produce in the case of the rings in the images of a star."

SOCIOLOGY

The Barat Industrial School is a work on behalf of the girls of the Italian Mission of Our Lady of Loretto, Elizabeth Street. It is carried on by the Children of Mary of the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Manhattanville, who in February, 1905, rented for the purpose two floors of a small house in East Houston Street, but after some time moved to the second floor of a new factory building directly opposite the Mission. The ladies of the Children of Mary not only provide quarters for the school, furnish them and defray the cost of competent teachers, but also take part in the work themselves. Those who can do so visit it weekly even during summer, coming from the country for the purpose. There are classes in sewing, dressmaking, embroidery, cooking and millinery, and many entertainments and recreations are provided for the pupils. The expenses are about $1,000 a year. It is surprising how far such a sum has gone in the hands of good managers and self-sacrificing workers. Still there is so much left undone that the managers appeal for aid in money, to be sent to the Treasurer of the Children of Mary, Manhattanville, New York City, or materials for dresses or underclothing, to be sent to the Italian Mission, 303 Elizabeth Street, New York City, and marked for the Barat School. This work should appeal to all who have zeal for the Sacred Heart's reign over man.

Twenty-one families of Holland Catholics arrived at New York on March 20, from Antwerp, en route to Butler, Minnesota. They brought with them not only their smaller household belongings, but carts and tools and other articles for farm use. The families will be settled on small farms in the timber district of Minnesota, under a colonization project begun by Bishop James McGolrick, of Duluth. With the immigrants was the Rev. August Van den Heuvel, a Dutch priest who settled in Minnesota some time ago, and through whose influence the families have come to the States.

Three other Dutch priests, who had charge of the immigrants in Holland, accompanied the party. The largest family was that of Nicholas Elsen, who brought over his wife, eleven children—six boys and five girls—and a servant. Mr. and Mrs. Petrus Van der Kolk had eight charges to watch over, and Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Brouwers cared for five. One of the families had more than $6,000; none of them had less than $300 in cash, and the land company from which they will buy their homesteads will lend, at a reasonable interest, all the money they may need to stock their farms. In a short time one hundred more immigrants will join the colonists. The immigration officials said that the newcomers were as fine a class of aliens as any that had come in many years.

To save the Indian race from extinction, the Bureau of Indian Affairs has sent Dr. Joseph A. Murray on a tour of investigation of the reservations and schools of the West and Southwest. The mortality among the Indians is equal to twice that among the whites, and half their deaths are from tuberculosis. Trachoma, or as it is popularly known, granular lid, is another scourge of the red man. In New Mexico, Arizona and California from 11% to 68% of the children in the Indian schools were thus affected. In one school in Oklahoma 74% were afflicted with this disease of the eye. As it is contagious and results in impaired vision or even blindness, the Bureau has undertaken a vigorous health campaign. The sudden change from life in the open to indoor life with little regard for ventilation and sanitation is assigned for the prevalence of these two diseases among the Indians; but this could hardly hold for the Pueblos of New Mexico and Arizona, who live substantially as they did when the Spaniards first entered the country.

The "No Uncared-for Tuberculosis in 1915" Conference of the State Charities Aid Association began in Albany March 18, with great enthusiasm. Hon. Homer Folks, Secretary of the Association, opened it by dwelling on the fact that it differed from ordinary conferences in this, that it had a precise definite purpose. They did not merely hope to carry their plan into effect, but were resolutely determined to do so. Dr. Duryee, Mayor of Schenectady, dwelt upon the law of 1908, saying that it made tuberculosis a matter of social responsibility, and the health officer the depositary of this responsibility. He recommended all health-officers to study the law and gain from it a clear idea of their obligations. Dr. Shaw, of the Albany Committee, insisted on the obligation of physicians to report their cases, and showed how neglect on their part must necessarily stop the beneficent work of the Association. In the evening a banquet was held at the Ten Eyck, during which Tuberculosis in the schools was discussed.

Recent notable bequests to Catholic charities and institutions in New York include those of Ann Cronin, who leaves $2,000 each to The Servants for the Relief of Incurable Cancer, the Church of Our Lady of Perpetual Help, the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, St. Joseph's Seminary, The Literary Society of St. Vincent Ferrer, The Sisters of St. Dominic, The Home for the Aged of the Little Sisters of the Poor, The Sisters of Charity, Mount St. Vincent; $500 each to the Ladies' Benevolent Society of the Church of St. Vincent Ferrer, and the St. Vincent de Paul Society of the same church; $1,000 to the Church of St. Stephen, and $500 to have Masses said for the repose of her soul.

The late Judge William H. Kelly left bonds of an electric light company as follows:—Immaculate Conception Church, 25; St. Vincent de Paul Society, 25; Little Sisters of the Poor, 5; Paulist Fathers, in furtherance of temperance work, 10; Association for befriending Children and Young Girls, 10; for the purpose above mentioned, 10; Mgr. John Edwards, rector of St. Joseph's Church, for the establishment of a home for the poor, 25. The residue of the estate goes to Archbishop Farley to aid poor parishes and to promote the cause of temperance.

King Albert of Belgium is making a grant of $200,000 for the purpose of combating the sleeping sickness. Stations for the study of the sickness will be established, the number of doctors will be doubled, and missionaries will be trained in its treatment at Leopoldville. The king will also give $100,000 for the building of hospitals for the natives.

Testifying before the British Royal Commission on the Law of Divorce, Sir John Bingham, President of the London Divorce Court, said that divorce probably did more harm than good. There were not more divorces proportionately, among the rich than among the poor, nor was their morality any worse, though their scandals got more publicity. The divorce laws did not extend to Ireland, which got on very well without them. This he attributed chiefly to the Catholic clergy. "There the great influence of the priesthood over their congregations is a factor in their moral life."

ECONOMICS

The Senate Committee on high prices is hard at work. Senators Smoot and Flint put the blame on the retailers, bringing figures to show that these sell their goods at double or treble the wholesale price. As a general rule, however, their examples were taken from goods sold in shops that are expensive both as regards rent and salaries. The retailers of food make the farmers and wholesale dealers responsible, and claim that they are being crushed to the wall. Mr. James J. Hill, in an address made at Minneapolis, lays the blame on extravagance, public, private and commercial. The world must recover, he said, from its financial delirium; the Governments, the individuals and the man of business must recognize that after conservation of the land comes conservation of capital, and that a dollar spent unprofitably marks a crime against posterity just as much as the dissipation of material resources. The question is very complex. One thing is clear from the various contributions to its solution: the responsibility touches one way or another every class, and we may almost say every individual.

The problem of transporting live fish in bulk seems to be solved since experiments have shown that the essential point is not so much the change of water as its proper aeration. To effect the purpose a specially constructed car has been invented which carries the necessary apparatus. It contains a tank, which is divided by wire screens into several compartments, thus providing if desirable for several varieties of fish. A pump keeps the original supply of water in constant circulation. Compressed air is admitted through tubes. A small gasoline engine furnishes the power and also runs a dynamo for electric lighting, thus permitting loading and unloading at night.

The points of difference in the Canadian tariff controversy are the following: The Taft Administration holds that the Franco-Canadian tariff agreement, which admits into Canada a number of French commodities at a reduced rate, constitutes undue discrimination against the United States. The Administration says that, before the President can proclaim Canada entitled to the Payne minimum rates, Canada must grant the United States the same rates as those of the French treaty. Canada, on her side, denies that the French treaty is unduly discriminative, and does not see why she should give substantial concessions in return for the Payne minimum rates, which do not confer adequate advantages.

According to official returns published on March 17, the immigration into Canada for last February was 10,162, as compared with 4,791 for February of last year, an increase of 112 per cent. The total immigration from the United States for the eleven months of this fiscal year was 175,729, as compared with 130,444 for the eleven months of the last fiscal year, an increase of 25 per cent. The total immigration from the United States for the eleven months was 86,488, as compared with 50,650 in the previous fiscal year, an increase of 71 per cent.

The total production of coal in Great Britain for 1909 was 263,758,562 tons, an increase of nearly 2,250,000 tons as compared with that of 1908. The iron-ore raised amounted to 8,039,441 tons, about 150,000 tons more than in the preceding year.

The National Advisory Board of Spain has been commissioned by royal order to discuss and formulate a projected law covering five important points of social reform. They contemplate the establishment of a national corporation of actuaries, insurance against death, accidents and sickness, including a provision for nursing mothers, and strikes and lock-outs. Finally they are to study the question of insurance in favor of retired public functionaries.

With the object of assisting the poor and helpless to obtain legal advice, a number of Catholic professional and business men in Cincinnati have organized a Catholic Legal Aid Association.

DRAMATIC NOTES

It is said that the seating capacity of the New York theatres is 123,795; London follows with 120,950, and Paris comes third with 83,331. Clearly the theatre fills a large place in modern life, and its influence for good or evil is not to be taken lightly. If the character of the plays given during the present season affords us any appreciation of the moral result of the theatre's influence in this community, there is little ground for congratulation. With rare exceptions, the scale tips heavily in favor of the decadent type, the morbid and the shameful, or else the frivolous and the ludicrous. If this is the kind of play the public demands, and this is the excuse of the managers, then the public is simply degenerate. But we witness a phenomenon that would seem to contradict emphatically such a conclusion. When a good play, namely, with an uplift in its moral, well constructed or at least with a well-devised point of interest is presented by the managers, the public takes to it even with avidity. "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," which answers to the above, is the only play that has endured through this entire season. The success of Mr. Sothorn and Miss Marlowe in their Shakespearean repertoire—so striking that they have returned for another engagement—shows that the public can and does appreciate good plays when they have the opportunity. The Ben Greet Players, now at the Garden Theatre, are another case in evidence with a repertory of the highest type of dramas. Clearly the decadent drama is not to be put altogether on the shoulders of the public. The public does respond generously to the better things when the better thing is placed within its reach. The rottenness in Denmark is not wholly amongst the people.

In addition to the interesting notes on Holland printed in another column this week, it may be stated that a Catholic theatre, with a stock company under the name of "Het Roomsche Tooneel," and directed by M. L. Van Dom Burg, is to be opened at Amsterdam.

All over the country the serious inroads the moving picture shows are making on the patronage of the popular-price theatres is engaging the attention of those interested in theatrical enterprises. The ethical regulation of these attractions is also being considered seriously in a number of communities. In Cincinnati Rev. Francis Finn, S.J., has installed a moving picture machine in St. Xavier's parish school hall, and another parish is preparing to follow this example. In an interview on the project Father Finn is quoted as saying:

"Many thousand persons attend the moving picture shows each day, and in view of this enormous attendance these shows are bound to have an effect on the lives of our people.

"The moving picture is a good thing for the average man and woman. All classes of people have begun transferring their patronage from the vaudeville shows to the five-cent theatre, and as there is less vulgarity and suggestiveness in a month of moving picture shows than in one ordinary vaudeville performance, the change is undoubtedly for the better.

"Could we only do away with the excess of sentimentalism and the overemphasis, at times, of the sensual, this newest form of amusement, with its tremendous possibilities, would be almost perfect."

Several of these concerns are now exhibiting throughout the country what they claim to be films representing the Oberammergau Passion Play. In answer to a query in regard to the genuineness of these pictures, Mgr. Joseph Schroeder, Pastor of Oberammergau, writes to Mr. Anthony

Matre, Secretary of the Catholic Federation of America:

"Upon your friendly inquiry regarding moving pictures of the Oberammergau Passion Play, permit me to give this brief reply: Never and at no time were moving cinematographic pictures of our Passion Play taken, either directly or indirectly, and all such requests were absolutely refused. All such moving picture performances are, therefore, if advertised as original Oberammergau representations, a gross deception of the public."

Mr. Matre also says that the "moving pictures which are exhibited in profusion at the various odeons, were taken in Hortic, Bohemia, in Philadelphia, in France, and on one of the roof gardens of New York, and do not resemble the great scenes of the world-renowned Passion Play of Oberammergau." It is stated further that the peasants were offered $50,000 for permission to take a few of the important scenes, but the offer was promptly refused.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

According to a report in De Tyd, of Amsterdam, the oldest and most influential of Dutch Catholic dailies, Rev. Dr. Beysens, professor of the Diocesan College of Haarlem has been appointed to a professorial chair at the National University of Utrecht. His public installation in the Aula of the University took place February 7th in the presence of the Curators and the entire professorial staff. The Archbishop of Utrecht and the Bishops of Haarlem and Ruhrmund assisted in full pontificals, supported by a number of distinguished priests and laymen. Dr. Beysens took for subject of his inaugural address "The Dualistic Theology Considered as a Philosophic Theory." This is the second time in late years that a Catholic priest in Protestant Holland has been appointed to a professorship in a State University; the first being the selection of Rev. J. V. de Groot, O.P., for the chair of philosophy at the University of Amsterdam. A straw, showing which way the wind is blowing in Calvinistic Holland.

The greatest success has attended the Easter retreats for men in the large cities this year. In Boston the number of those attending exceeded three thousand; in New York the Xavier Alumni Sodality had more than two thousand communicants at the closing Mass on Palm Sunday. In Cleveland, two thousand two hundred men made the Easter retreat preached by the Rev. Edward Donnes in the Cathedral. At Bishop Farrelly's instance the Pope sent them a special blessing.

The Right Rev. Louis S. Walsh, D.D., Bishop of Portland, Maine, arrived home on March 9 from his first canonical visit to Rome. On the following Thursday the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception was filled to overflowing with the faithful, who came to hear the Bishop's interesting story of his trip, and especially of his audience with the Holy Father. Bishop Walsh gave the Papal Benediction, and the services closed with the singing of the Te Deum.

Rt. Rev. Mgr. Joseph W. Hendrick, brother of the late Bishop of Cebu and of Judge Hendrick of this city, has returned from the Philippines. He made an extended tour in the East and says of the Filipinos: "I was favorably impressed with future prospects of the Philippines, with the gentle and loving disposition of the Filipinos and their well-known hospitality. They have sincere faith, and are the only Christian people in the Orient."

Mgr. Hendrick, who is in charge of the parish at Ovid, N. Y., was honored by Pope Pius X by being made a domestic prelate during his visit to Rome. He was in Cebu at the time his brother, Bishop Hendrick, died suddenly on the eve of a proposed visit to this country.

Right Rev. J. J. Carroll has been appointed Bishop of Lismore, New South Wales, to succeed the late Bishop Doyle. Born in 1865, in the County Kilkenny, Dr. Carroll was educated in Mount Melleray, Waterford, and Carlow College, Ireland, where he was ordained 1890, for the Australian mission. The diocese of Lismore is of recent formation, consisting of 24 priests and 22,000 Catholics, scattered over an area of 30,000 square miles.

New York's organized polyglot Catholic community has an addition in the St. Ansgar Society, which will meet once a month, and look after the Norwegians, Swedes and Danes.

The Miriam Guild, named in honor of the Blessed Virgin, has been organized for the graduate nurses of New York.

In Philadelphia the annual diocesan collection for the seminary amounted to $56,703, an increase of $3,793 over last year's figures.

President Taft has assigned Father Eugene McDonald, U. S. N., to be chaplain on the battleship North Carolina, which is taking the body of the late Senhor Nabuco, Ambassador from Brazil, back to be buried in his native land.

PERSONAL

Major Gen. Thomas H. Barry, commanding the Department of California, will, on August 31, become Superintendent of the West Point Military Academy. General Barry was in command of the American Army of Pacification during the military occupation by the United States of the Island of Cuba; he will also be remembered as the Grand Marshal of the parade that formed so notable a feature of the centennial celebration of the New York Archdiocese in 1908. Gen. Barry's rise to fame and position is a brilliant example of how a poor boy, without fortune and influential friends in this country, can reach the highest military distinction.

Born in New York City, in what is known as the old Greenwich Village, young Barry was a pupil in one of the grammar schools, where his fine record was rewarded with an appointment to West Point. In 1877 he was graduated from the Academy as a Second Lieutenant of Cavalry. His promotion to a First Lieutenancy followed in quick order, and passing through all the grades, General Barry, in August, 1903, twenty-three years after his graduation, was a Brigadier General in the regular army. He became a Major General in April, 1908. Commenting on General Barry's appointment to the Military Academy, the New York Sun says:—"His qualifications are of a high order. He has served in the cavalry and infantry, and for many years on the staff. If there was a more efficient chief of staff than General Barry in the Philippines we do not know who he was. In the Boxer rebellion General Barry served with great distinction, and as commander-in-chief of the Army of Pacification in Cuba the whole service must have envied him his brilliant success, for he had to be both diplomat and soldier. Of handsome presence, pleasing address, keen perceptions and uncommon resolution, General Barry, athletic and a fine horseman, will bring distinction as well as accomplishments to West Point. It is not to be doubted that the Academy will benefit greatly by the administration of a soldier of his rank and experience."

The Times of Ceylon says that Mr. C. S. Medhurst, who was sent out to Ceylon by Mrs. Annie Besant, as her representative in the island, to watch the interests of the educational movement among the Buddhists of Ceylon which was set on foot by the late Colonel Olcott, and to help the Buddhists in general in their advancement by means of the Theosophical Society, has identified himself with the faith of the Buddhists. Mr. Medhurst began his career as a Baptist missionary in China, confining much of his attention to educational work among the "Celestials." Here he studied Confucianism and Buddhism. Theosophy came in his way and he became an ardent student of it, and finally left the Baptist Mission and joined the Theosophical Society to work for its cause.

OBITUARY

A very remarkable religious, Sister Mary Charles Curtis, died on March 4, at the Sacred Heart Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, Belmont, N. C., in her eighty-sixth year. She was born in Cork, Ireland, and came here in 1841, at the request of Bishop England. The then Father Kenrick, afterwards Archbishop of St. Louis, met her and her companions at Philadelphia and escorted them to Charleston. She spent the succeeding sixty-nine years in arduous labor in the missions in the Carolinas, and during that time met and knew all the bishops and most of the priests who have ministered in that extensive field.

Rev. Eugene V. McElhone, founder of St. Joseph's House for Homeless Boys, Philadelphia, and for thirty years chaplain at Blockley Almshouse, died on March 14. He was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, and emigrating here was ordained priest in Philadelphia March 15, 1874. He gave the three following years to parish work, and then began at the almshouse the truly charitable labors for which he showed himself so fitted, and in which it might be said he spent his whole sacerdotal career.

Rt. Rev. G. M. Lenihan, D.D., Bishop of Auckland, New Zealand, died recently in Australia after a short illness. Born in Liverpool of Irish parents, Dr Lenihan entered the New Zealand mission soon after his ordination and helped greatly to upbuild the Auckland diocese, of which he was elected bishop in 1896. At the time of his death it had 50 priests, 92 churches and chapels and a Catholic population of 31,000.

Rev. Marius A. Leautier, S.J., died at the Jesuit College, New Orleans, March 12, on the fiftieth anniversary of his birth. A native of Basses-Alpes, France, he was educated at Avignon, and came to America in his seventeenth year, entering the Jesuit province of New Orleans in 1877. Soon after his ordination at Woodstock College, Md., 1892, his remarkable oratorical gifts made him a noted preacher in New Orleans and through all Louisiana, where his equal facility in French and English, combined with fervid eloquence and warm sympathy, gave him an exceptional influence over the people. Though suffering intensely for several years from a complication of diseases he was always genial and amiable and continued his labors to the last.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The Rev. William H. Ketcham, Director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, spoke recently in behalf of the Indians, before the Senate Committee of which Senator Beveridge is chairman.

The Senate Bill for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States of the Union provides that "the Constitution shall be republican in form and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed." The Territory of Arizona has a law which prohibits the intermarriage of Indians with whites or Mexicans. Moreover, at present in Arizona there is an educational test for suffrage which requires the voter to read a certain passage from the Constitution in English in a certain specified manner, which places the power of determining who may or may not vote in the hands of those who may possibly abuse this power by disfranchising those who belong to a political party other than that of the one who determines the eligibility of the voter.

Father Ketcham urged that the expression "except as to Indians not taxed" be stricken out of the bill, to which he also proposed the following amendment: "That said Constitution shall contain a provision to secure to the people of the proposed State the right of intermarriage between white and Indian races," arguing that the only real solution of the "Indian problem" is that of absorption into the white race; that under present conditions the State of Arizona will have practically for all time within its boundaries a distinct Indian population of over 30,000; pointing out also the moral consequences, as miscegenation will not be, in fact, prevented by law.

He also pointed out that our people do not seem to have any repugnance to the intermarriage of Indian and white, instancing the Indian Territory, where the Five Civilized Tribes, who come from the Southern States, have intermarried in great numbers with people of the Southern States, so much so that the full-blood population of these tribes is but a small proportion of the total population. As there are two Senators on this Committee of mixed Indian and white blood (Senator Curtis and Senator Owen), this amendment will probably be favorably reported.

Father Ketcham advocated that the Enabling Act prohibit the application of an educational test for the exercise of suffrage in these two States for twenty or thirty years, in order to give the Indians and Mexicans time to acquire an education. He argued that they have not in the past had sufficient opportunities to secure an education and to learn the English language, and that admitting these territories to Statehood, and imposing upon all the people the burdens and duties of Statehood, it seemed very harsh and unfair to deprive the "children of the soil"—the Mexicans and Indians—of any voice in their Statehood affairs. Father Ketcham also favored the creation of a temperance zone around the Indian Reservations of the proposed States.

The Lenten pastoral of the Most Rev. Mariano Antonio Espinosa, Archbishop of Buenos Aires, is taken up with the subject of priestly vocations. He sees an explanation of many of the evils which afflict modern society in the fact that many individuals are not in the places where they would be if they were to carry out the designs of God in their regard. They do not find peace and happiness in their own lives, and therefore can contribute nothing to the peace and happiness of the community. He then points out the causes of the small number of vocations to the priestly life in his archdiocese: The shallowness of the religion of those who profess it from a certain ostentation, but do not practice it to the extent of making any sacrifice. Worldly-minded parents see in the social pleasures and distinctions of public life so much to tickle their vanity that they guide their sons towards such pursuits, with no thought of a missed vocation and its sad consequences. Others, who may be possessed of very modest means, begrudge their sons to the Church, for they view them almost as an investment in livestock on which they hope to realize a large cash profit. If after having successfully run the gantlet of parental commercialism and snobishness, the youth is sent to schools where the teachers are openly or covertly hostile to religion, he is likely to fall beneath the stealthy thrusts and blows delivered by the professorial arm during the hours of history and physics. The archbishop exhorts parents to take a more Catholic view of life and of their parental responsibility, and urges the priests, and especially the pastors of the archdiocese, to discover and foster vocations to the ecclesiastical state.

Rev. Robert Kane, S.J., preached the Lenten lectures in St. Francis Xavier's Church, Dublin, his subject being "The Rights of Man." In the second of the series he said man must be free to make and mould his own life according to his own talent, his own opportunity, his own energy, his own ambition, his own merit, and his own will, according to the circumstances in which Providence had placed him. Socialism makes the man of genius no better than the dunce; it would put the outcast on an equal footing with the heroine; and as it could not lift up the stupid, the sensual, the lazy, or the coarse-grained types of human nature, it would have to drag down to their level the fairest and most beautiful characters. In Socialism there could be no healthy public opinion, no public opinion at all except that artificially cultivated by demagogues. There would be no liberty in the Press under Socialism, no liberty even of speech, for the monster machine of officialdom would be labeled "The Will of the People," which would be nothing more than the whim of the tyrant mob, the most ruthless tyrant of all because it was blindly led by blind leaders.

The Rev. A. P. Doyle, C.S.P., Rector of the Apostolic Mission House, preaching in St. Paul's, Washington, on "The Family and Its Preservation," declared divorce to be "America's national nightmare." "There were nearly a million divorces in the last twenty years," said Father Doyle, "about three times as many as in the previous twenty years. There are about 3,000 courts whose time is principally occupied in disrupting the family life of the country. The American people salary 3,000 dignified judges to blacken their fair name among the nations of the earth and bestrew the pathway of progress unto a higher civilization with the wreckages of a million families. There are two other nations that outrank America in this abomination: one in Algeria under the blight of Mohammedanism, and the other in Japan under the shadow of Shintoism. But among Christian nations we are incomparably the lowest in this regard. Make but one comparison—America destroys one family in every fourteen, while in Ireland there is one divorce in every 4,438 marriages. Divorces in this country are increasing three times as fast as the population."

A bill was recently introduced in the Maryland legislature appropriating $10,000 for the erection of a fountain at Annapolis as a memorial of the establishment of religious toleration in the colony. The proposed design included a group of statues in which Lord Baltimore was conspicuously absent. His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, addressed the following protest to Senator Campbell, of the Maryland legislature, on March 15:

"At the time when the question of erecting a fountain to commemorate the establishing of civil and religious liberty in the Maryland colony was brought before me and my sanction and approval asked in my capacity as representative of the Catholic community of the State, to my knowledge no reference was made to any figures to be placed there. Imagine my astonishment on learning now that figures are to be erected and no mention made at all of Lord Baltimore.

"I am unalterably opposed to the erection of any figures on the fountain, except the figure of Lord Baltimore, to whom we are indebted for the priceless boon of civil and religious liberty. I beg of you to call the attention of the honorable members of the legislature to the matter."

Among other things Bishop O'Dwyer, of Limerick, Ireland, says in his Lenten pastoral:

"The country, thank God, is looking up; there is a general stirring as of coming life; and we may hope that we are only in the beginning of a new era of greater activity, more successful development of the country's resources, and, as a prime mover in such progress, an improvement in all our educational methods."

* * * *

"The first step in Irish modern progress must be the deepening of the religious sentiment of her people. Without this, as a nation, they will come to nothing. There is no greater mistake than to think that what is called modern education, science, industrial pursuits and habits might, by themselves and as an alternative to religion, lead to prosperity amongst us. It is a profound mistake. There never was a nation of whom it is truer that 'not in bread alone doth man live,' and the day that Ireland puts her faith in her material, to the neglect of her spiritual resources, would be the first in her final overthrow. An Irishman who has lost the spirit of his religious faith, is a futility for all the higher purposes of life. If we hope to progress as a nation, it must be from within. We may use modern methods and avail ourselves of all modern resources, but the vital force by which we use and assimilate them must be in ourselves."

Denver Council, No. 539, Knights of Columbus, have founded an annual "Knights of Columbus Gold Medal" at the College of the Sacred Heart, Denver, Colo., for the encouragement of the students in oratorical skill and debate. The first debate was held March 8, 1910, in Knights of Columbus Hall. The decision was against the proposed federal income tax. A committee of five awarded the medal to Mr. William H. Higgins, a New York boy.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

WHAT DARWIN WROTE AND THOUGHT ABOUT.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It did not enter my mind that my simple letter would arouse such a critic as Dr. James J. Walsh, to whom we owe and from whom we expect so many highly profitable works. I know my own limitations too well to wish any controversy with one of his calibre. George Eliot's writings are to me now not much more than a memory of a few pleasant hours, but one, "The Impressions of Theophrastus Such" left an indelible imprint and readers, familiar with it, will appreciate the allusion to it in the present circumstances. The dispute seems to turn mainly about a verbal distinction, and it is in itself of no great importance, but, since Dr. Walsh has taken it up, and he is by far too useful an author and too valuable a Catholic apologist to have his authority weakened even by a diluted dash of carelessness in statement, traces of which are found in some of his admirable volumes, it may be of interest and an advantage to see if any justification can be offered for the criticism I made, a criticism made, indeed, partly for its own sake and partly to hang a few remarks upon. At the risk of seeming merely captious, it may be observed that Dr. Walsh's interesting letter contains a minor example of almost the same kind of slip, to which attention was drawn in the editorial under discussion. After writing of variation and of selection, he continues: "That is the theory of the origin of species." A person might lawfully enquire, to what does this sentence refer? To the theory of species in general or is it, as the context implies, to the theory of Darwin's work, "The Origin of Species"? (Italics in the following are all mine.)

The question, as stated above, seems to turn on the term "origins." As this word is used in contradistinction to the word "preservation" (of favored races), it does not refer to the beginnings of things in general but to the beginnings of some species, as Huxley remarks: "Strictly speaking, the origin of species in general lies in variation: while the origin of any particular species lies, firstly, in the occurrence, and, secondly, in the selection and preservation of a particular variation" ("Darwiniana," New York: Appleton ed., 1896, p. 289). At page 71, in the same work just quoted, he writes that Darwin "first endeavors to prove that species may be originated by selection," and elsewhere (p. 288): "To say that Darwin has put forward a theory of adaptation of species but not of their origin is . . . to misunderstand the first principles of the theory." And he points out the time when selection originates nothing, i. e., when profitable or favorable variations do not occur.

Dr. Walsh would doubtless reply to this: "Disciples and critics always insisted on Darwin talking origins," and that Darwin himself is the one to decide what Darwin wrote about. Let him bear with me if I still think that the disciples and the critics were, in the main, correct, that Darwin did talk (some) origins; but as Dr. Walsh appeals to Darwin, we will go, with an apologetic bow on the way, to the critics of Jansenius! It may be remarked here that Darwin's regret, if I remember correctly, about the title of his book, was not precisely because it was erroneous in itself, but because it gave rise to some misunderstanding. A title may be to some extent misleading without being quite a misnomer.

In the very introduction of his "Origin of Species," Vol. I, p. 6 (Appleton ed.), Darwin writes that the view that each species has been independently created is erroneous, and in the conclusion of the same work, Vol. II, p. 295, he mentions our natural unwillingness to admit that one species has given birth to other and distinct species, because we do not see the intervening steps. In a note on page 95, Vol. II of his "Life and Letters" (same ed.), he speaks of the explanation, which he has offered, of the origin of species, under the name of "natural selection." At page 528, of the same volume, occurs this comprehensive sentence. "Grant a simple Archetypal creature like the Mud-fish or Lepidosiren, with the five senses and some vestige of mind, and I believe natural selection will account for the production of every vertebrate animal." About his "Descent of Man," to which Dr. Walsh also refers, Darwin tells us expressly: "But when I found that many naturalists accepted the doctrine of the evolution of species, it seemed to me advisable to work up such notes as I possessed and to publish a special treatise on the origin of man." ("Life and Letters," Vol. I, p. 76), and in the work itself, p. 607, he informs us that "The grounds upon which the conclusion [man's descent from some less highly organized animal] rests . . . have long been known, but until recently they told us nothing with respect to the origin of man."

Father Gerard, S.J., in "The Old Riddle and The Newest Answer," a very able and at the same time a very enjoyable book—I wish it was in every library of the country—writes at p. 60: "Darwinism by its own confession knows nothing of Origins, not even of the Origin of Species itself;" but he does not exclude all origins, as he states, at page 56, "In it (Darwin's "Origin of Species") he undertook to show how from one species of animals another, quite dis- tinct from it, may be derived," etc., and in a footnote on the same page: "Although at first Darwin appeared to restrict his system to species, very soon, as was natural, it was extended to the production of new genera and even of divisions of the organic kingdoms yet wider asunder. Thus, apart from the most famous example of all, treated by himself in his 'Descent of Man,' etc."

"All I did was growl a little" at the assertion—It is indeed of preservation and not of origins that Darwin has anything to say—and I believe the few quotations just made justify the little growl, as they show that Darwin wrote and thought about origins of new species and did not limit natural selection to merely keeping certain species as best fitted for survival. If Professor Ritter, quoted by the genial Doctor himself, could say, without speaking nonsense: "The verdict of inexorable time will refuse to Darwin the glory of having really explained the origin of new species of organisms," it is clear Darwin labored at this explanation. If only preservation of species was his theme, the hullabaloo kicked up by geologists, zoologists, physiologists, botanists, theists and atheists was certainly, even more so than is commonly admitted now, a "Much Ado About Nothing"—an effect without a cause. To sum up, Darwin, I think, wrote about some origins and not merely about their preservation, and hence the expression in the editorial was too general. The tendency of Darwin's work is too obvious to need comment.

If it would not seem too presumptuous on my part, I would say that, while giving Darwin high credit for his patient collection of facts, I agree with the distinguished German authority (Driesch?) quoted by the Doctor, that Darwin's hypothesis is "crude and superficial." I would like to go further and add, that underneath nearly all the evolutionary systems in vogue at present, there lies hid a fallacy and that, if ever all the facts are gathered together, the logical conclusion will be a surprise, a kind of going so far west that it is east. An article in the London Tablet, the other day, wound up with a remark, which I will adopt as the last sentence in this amicable interchange of letters: "Meanwhile, we may be permitted to point out that a little friendly criticism does no harm to any man or any institution."

EDWARD P. GRAHAM.

I have read every number of AMERICA so far, and in all sincerity I congratulate you and your able staff on your successful attempt to supply the English-speaking world with an up-to-date and really Catholic weekly. It is the first Catholic-weekly that I have seen that is really Catholic; all others are merely local and are meant to supply local wants. Even the English Tablet, which in many respects is excellent, is altogether too much filled up with local topics that have little or no interest for Australian readers, whereas there is not a paragraph in AMERICA that one would wish to see omitted.

Another feature of AMERICA, which I think will be pleasing to most readers is that it rigidly excludes all merely personal items, sermons, local news about converts, presentations of addresses, etc., etc., which generally make up more than three-fourths of the reading matter of most Catholic weeklies. And I venture to hope that the example set by AMERICA will have the effect of raising the tone of other Catholic weeklies in this respect. I have more than once heard editors of Catholic weeklies complain of the unreasonableness of their subscribers in insisting that whole columns of merely local or personal interest be inserted. And if the editor uses his discretion, and holds them back, or even cuts them down, the next post will likely bring him an indignant protest, and a peremptory order to send his "rag" no more. This, I think, in most cases, accounts for the low standard of most of our Catholic weeklies, and I trust the example of AMERICA will strengthen the hands of many editors in checking this abuse.—J. Ryan, S.J., Melbourne, Australia.

I desire to take this opportunity to express the great pleasure and profit I have derived from AMERICA since the publication of the first number. If circumstances compelled me to drop all newspapers and periodicals that come into my home, except one, AMERICA would remain, and I would feel I was still in touch with current events of major importance throughout the world. It certainly deserves to rank with the leading reviews of the world, and you are not only to be congratulated upon its success, but are entitled to the gratitude of all Catholics for supplying such an able, complete and dignified exponent of their interests.—M. H. Ducey, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Editors of papers and magazines must be delighted to find the most reliable reports of the current historical events of our times, the true solutions of the important questions of the day, and other very valuable information in your AMERICA.—Rev. F. Eberschweiler, S.J., Havre, Montana.

I would do anything in my power to forward the interests of AMERICA. I propose to announce it from the altar, and give it a reading notice in our Calendar. I am interested in AMERICA very much. It seems to me to improve with each issue.—Right Rev. Mgr. Charles McCready, D.D., New York.

CHRONICLE

Two Congressional Elections.—The Fourteenth Congressional District, one of the Republican strongholds of Massachusetts, elected Eugene N. Foss, of Boston, to succeed in Congress the late William C. Lovering, of Taunton. A Republican plurality at the previous election of 14,250 was turned into a Democratic victory by a margin of 5,640 votes. It was the first contest to be decided by Eastern voters since the passage of the tariff measure, and had a peculiar interest on that account. The issues were high tariff, Canadian reciprocity and the high cost of living. The Fourteenth District never before elected a Democrat to Congress. The first election since the new tariff went into effect was in the Sixth Missouri District, February 1, where a Democrat was elected by the biggest plurality ever given in the district. The results of these elections are considered ominous.

Philadelphia Strike Waning.—The Central Labor Union of Philadelphia, at a meeting of the organization held on Sunday, March 27, voted unanimously to call off the general strike in that city and agreed that all union men should return to work on the following day. The report of the Committee of Ten recommending that the general strike end at once was received and approved without comment. In the statement issued by the committee the union men were urged to continue their moral and financial support to the striking carmen. Although no definite plan as to the financial support was decided on, members of several unions agreed to contribute one day's wages each week to the support of the carmen as long as the strike continues. As a result of many conferences within the past few weeks, the actual differences between the carmen and the railroad company have been reduced to the status of the 174 men discharged and the recognition of the union. The men insist that they alone shall be recognized as union men, that no other union be considered and that all employees must belong to their union. The company absolutely refuses to accept this position. From present indications the strike is likely to die of inanition.

Railroad Strikes in the East.—The officials of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company refused the request of the 7,000 conductors and trainmen for an increase in wages. A vote will now be taken on the question of a general strike. If the majority of the men are in favor of going out, recourse will be had to arbitration under the Erdman clause of the Interstate Commerce Act.—In the strike of the trainmen, conductors and yardmen of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad a satisfactory settlement was reached on Monday. Every demand of the employees was granted. A liberal wage increase and a shortening of the hours of work were agreed upon. The concessions will mean an additional expense to the road of about $500,000 a year.

No Tariff War.—In a special message on March 28, President Taft informed Congress that negotiations under the maximum and minimum clause of the Payne-Aldrich tariff act were now substantially and satisfactorily completed with all nations of the world. The German market is open to a trade in oleomargarine which will amount to about $2,000,000 a year; American pork will not be subjected to microscopic tests, and concessions have been made to a great variety of manufactured articles. France grants her minimum rates on American products to the amount of $37,000,000 out of a total importation of $40,000,000. Among the items so favored are petroleum, lard, coffee, agricultural implements, typewriters, adding machines, furniture, tools, sewing machines, locomotives, traction engines and a host of other manufactures. Greece will open her markets to American cotton seed oil, and Servia has promised to do the same. In the case of Austria a great number of concessions are promised which the legislative situation prevented her from granting immediately. In every instance discriminatory legislation which seemed imminent has been averted and the concessions obtained fully warrant the expectation that under the Payne law the export trade of the United States will be materially increased.

Death of Justice Brewer.—Associate Justice David J. Brewer of the Supreme Court of the United States died suddenly of apoplexy on March 28. He was born in 1837 and began the practice of law in Leavenworth, Kan., in 1859. In 1884 he was appointed by President Arthur Judge of the United States Circuit Court, and five years later was called to Washington as Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. He was a strong supporter of State Rights and held that the Tenth Amendment reserved to the State all the powers not delegated expressly to the Federal authorities.

Canadian Tariff Agreement.—The negotiations between President Taft and the Canadian Minister of Finance, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, which were begun at Albany on March 20, were concluded at Washington on March 26. Until the official announcement is made full details of the agreement cannot be given. But the fact that a definite agreement, which removes all the points of difference between the two countries, has been reached, is made clear. The Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, has issued a statement to the effect that intermediate rates have been accorded to a sufficient number of American imports to remove the imputation of undue discrimination and that the American minimum rates will be granted to Canadian imports after March 31.

Canadian Waterways Treaty.—The International Waterways Treaty, which has been held up by the United States Senate for nearly two years, is now approved by the Canadian Government. The point of dispute that has hitherto delayed the agreement was the right to use for irrigation the water of the Milk River, which flows from Montana into Canada and then doubles back into the United States. This right had been disposed of in a concession by the Canadian Government, but the treaty arrangement is said to have allotted to Canada a less amount of water than the Dominion had agreed to allow the firm to which the concession had been granted. The first article of the treaty provides that boundary waters, including Lake Michigan, shall be free to both countries equally, and in particular that all artificial channels now or hereafter made on the United States side shall be free to Canadian vessels. This makes the whole chain of canals from the head of the lakes to the Atlantic free to vessels of both nations. Article 3 prohibits any new uses, obstructions or diversions of boundary waters which would affect the natural level or flow of such waters on the other side of the line except by government authority and with the approval of a joint commission consisting of three American and three Canadian representatives. This clause particularly affects the Chicago drainage canal and the Erie Canal projects. Thus, the treaty, which settles the last important disagreement between the two countries, provides for the conservation of water power, especially at Niagara Falls, and for the maintenance of an adequate flow of water in all boundary channels.

English Notes.—Contracts for building the Australian Dreadnought and that of New Zealand have been let on the Clyde. They are to be of the Indomitable type and will each cost ten million dollars. They are to be ready to leave England in July, 1912. The Australian ship will belong to the Commonwealth Navy; the New Zealand one is a gift to the Imperial Navy and will be flagship of the China-Pacific squadron.—The Archbishop of Canterbury, in supporting Lord Rosebery's resolutions, pointed out that hereditary peers have been the chief element of the House of Lords only since the Reformation. In earlier times they were often outnumbered by the spiritual peers of parliament.—Owing to the bursting of a dam which confined the waters which had gathered in an old coal mine on a mountain side, a flood swept through the mining town of Clydach Vale in Wales. Six persons perished, one, a woman, the other five, children under nine years of age. Six hundred children in school were saved through the presence of mind of their teachers.—Prebendary Egerton has just died at the age of 98. He was present at the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway in 1830 and witnessed the accident that caused the death of Huskisson, one of the ablest cabinet ministers of the day.—A parliamentary report shows that the Territorial Force actually enlisted numbers 276,618 men; the establishment provides for 312,490; the deficiency, therefore, is over 35,000.

Irish Party and the Government.—The Irish members speaking in various parts of Great Britain on St. Patrick's Day insisted uniformly that there could be no compromise with the Government and that resolute action, strictly in accord with Mr. Asquith's pre-election declaration, was the essential condition of the Irish Party's support. Mr. Redmond, presiding at the London banquet at which Bishop Auxiliary Anderson of Boston was the chief guest, said the general election had shown, not that Home Rule was dead, as Mr. Chamberlain declared a few years ago, but that British objection to Home Rule was dead. The House of Lords blocked the way to that and other democratic measures and any hedging, hesitation or evasion would be as disastrous to the Liberals as Lord Rosebery's shuffling policy had been a few years ago. The policy of letting go their grip on the Budget before they know what will happen to the Veto is one that Ireland cannot uphold. "We will take part in no sham battle. We will stand for no policy of vacillation. We demand a straight fight and, come weal or woe, we at any rate will stand by our pledges and our words." Mr. Redmond added that the Budget was not their ground of objection. Parts of it were most unsatisfactory but they would accept it without change of a comma if they had assurance that the Government could deal effectively with the Lords, the one obstacle to the accomplishment of the Irish Party's paramount purpose, Home Rule. Mr. Dillon has denied the press report that there is any friction between him and Mr. Redmond or other members of the party. The annual parliamentary collection showed a large increase on previous years. Ten bishops and one archbishop were among the first subscribers; most of them doubled their usual subscriptions and all wrote approving the work and policy of the party.

Indian Affairs.—Seditious agitation increasing in Eastern Bengal has obliged the Government to proclaim several districts under the Seditious Meetings Act. Some of the prisoners lately pardoned are participating actively in the sedition.—At the trials arising out of the murder of Mr. Jackson at Nasik, the examination of a young student elicited the secret revolutionary oath. It is as follows: "Remembering the Arya Mother, my family deity and my guru, I take this oath. I have this day joined a secret society. If I disclose this to the Government then I shall submit to any punishment members may inflict. Like Khudiram, Arabindo, Tilak and Dutt, I will assist in patriotic work." The Dalai Lama has been the guest of the Government, which styles him "His Holiness." This reminds one of the Burmese war that resulted in the deposition of Theebaw some twenty-five years ago, when the Government's official designation of the head of Burmese Buddhism was, "His Grace the Archbishop of Burma."

French Frauds.—French newspapers, discussing the Duez and other scandals in the administration of property taken from the religious orders, are far from believing that the vote of confidence obtained by the Briand cabinet in the Chamber and the Senate ends the difficulty. The general opinion is that M. Combes is back of all these disclosures. Ambitious of resuming the reins of power and nursing revenge against his political rivals, he has watched and seized this opportunity to discredit the Briand Cabinet and compass its downfall. It will be remembered that when Combes was premier, he had to defend his son against the charge of having made an offer to the Carthusians that if they paid in one million francs they would be authorized to remain in their monastery and continue to manufacture their liqueurs. On investigation it was found that the offer had really been made and the million francs demanded, but that M. Edgard Combes' connection therewith was not proven. The affair made a great noise at the time and Combes, who was overindulgent to his son's youthful indiscretions, got it into his head that M. Millerand was one of the prime movers in the "Carthusian million" campaign. Millerand is now Minister of Public Works and so Combes attacks the honor of this man who stands in the way of his return to power. It was expected that Barthou and Millerand might be claimed as scapegoats to save the rest of the Cabinet, but when the vote of confidence passed the Senate by 261 to 13 Combes did not even open his mouth.

German Electoral Reform.—The German Socialists are making their usual boastful claims to influence the masses. According to them the present agitation for franchise reform in Prussia is due entirely to their party tactics, and more particularly to the immense popular demonstrations which the party planned in the great centres. But they are not quite as ready to confess that the agitation has produced no helpful effect whatever and that the fear engendered by these same popular demonstrations is responsible for the failure. The proposition favored by the Government and likely to pass in the Landtag rather strengthens the old policy than mitigates the conditions found fault with in the existing franchise in Prussia. Correspondence from the news bureau of the Volksverein in Munich-Gladbach notes this fact, and the assertion is made that the Socialists were never sincere in their pretended fight for electoral reform. At least, the contention is, that the Socialist party urged the measure not purely and solely in order to better the political situation in Prussia, but chiefly because they saw in it a weapon to strengthen their own policies and to aid them in their purpose to enkindle strife between the classes. A quotation from an article in the Dortmund Arbeiterzeitung of August 13 of last year, announcing the scope of the campaign then beginning, lends color to the Volksverein charges. "When we demand universal, equal, secret and direct franchise in balloting for all elective officers," so runs the excerpt, "we do so, not precisely because this manner of elective choice is alone the right and just one, but because it appeals to us as calculated to further the revolutionary struggle of the workingmen and because we recognize that the clamor for electoral reform is a policy well calculated to rouse the classes from their lethargy and, therefore, a specially helpful weapon in the war of the classes."

A New Move in the Press Apostolate.—The Volksverein, already known for excellent service through its Press Bureau, has begun a new movement in its christianizing influence of the people. The Verein is spreading broadcast a series of leaflets or "Catholic Popular Letters." The latest leaflet, a "Letter to the Parents of First Communion Children," offers in popular phrasing excellent suggestions and advice regarding the religious, moral and the social training and instruction of their children. The purpose of the publication is to meet a state of affairs which conditions of to-day make evident. Young people are commonly enough left to shift for themselves at an earlier age than heretofore and are more quickly called away from the safeguards of home to meet the dangers of the world about them. Hence, as the introduction to these letters affirms, the need of special attention to the home-training of children. The purpose of the latest development of the Verein's Press Apostolate is to make clear to parents the manner in which this all-important home-training is to be secured.

German Chancellor in Rome.—Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, the German Imperial Chancellor, visited Rome last week to have opportunity to confer with the statesmen of Italy and to reiterate his confidence in the success of the triple alliance, which expires in 1914. During his stay in the city he was received in audience by Pius X, who conversed with the German statesman for half an hour. Following the etiquette established years ago by Emperor William in proceeding from what is nominally German soil in Italy, the Chancellor, in making his visit to the Pope, drove first to the palace of the Prussian legation, accredited to the Holy See, and thence to the Vatican, where he was received with the usual ceremony. In a later visit to Cardinal Merry del Val the Chancellor is reported to have discussed the situation of the Catholics in Poland and the matter of the protection of Catholics in the missions of the East and Far East.

Disorder in Hungarian Parliament.—The long continued bickerings of party leaders and followers in Hungary led to a scandalous outbreak in the House of Parliament in Budapest last week. The Premier, Graf Khuen von Hedevar, unable to make headway against the opposition factions, dissolved the Chamber by royal decree. His act was the signal for a riotous outburst by the opportunists, who claimed that the dissolution was unconstitutional. Beginning by shouting down the Premier, they speedily stormed the tribune, and ink wells, books and other missiles were hurled at the heads of the Ministers until these took refuge in flight. Both Graf von Hedevar, and Count Serenyi, the Minister of Agriculture, were struck by flying ink wells and their heads cut open. Count Serenyi may lose the sight of one eye. It was announced at once that the Government would instruct the Public Prosecutor to proceed against those causing the outbreak. The announcement appears to have been followed by active investigation, and on March 25 Representative Polonyi was arrested and charged with chief responsibility in the brutal scenes enacted in Parliament. He is affirmed to have led the violent attack on the Ministers. The wounded Ministers have received assurances of sympathy and regret from every part of the Kingdom. In an ovation tendered to Graf Khuen by the members of the National Labor Party recently organized by the Premier to support his policies, the Premier made known his determination to pursue these policies to the end despite the scandalous agitation of the opposition. His chief regret, he declared, was the likelihood of evil repute coming to his people because of the outbreak.

Chilean Aggressiveness.—The Peruvian province of Tacna, with an area of 8,688 square miles, has been administered by Chile since the defeat of Peru and Bolivia in 1883. It was then arranged by treaty that in ten years the people should decide by vote whether the district should be Peruvian or Chilean territory. The vote has not yet been taken. Chile recently ordered the Peruvian priests in Tacna to leave the province. Peru then closed its legation in Chile and left its interests in the care of the American representative. Chile also closed its legation in Lima. Owing to Peru's weakness and unpreparedness, no hostilities are looked for. The common opinion is that Chile will not submit the question at issue to the decision of the citizens of Tacna, for the province is needed to round out Chile's northern frontier.

Civil Strife in Uruguay.—Bands of guerrillas, some from Argentina and Brazil, have been giving the Government no little trouble. In a manifesto published by the revolutionists they charge the Government with unconstitutional centralization of power, with crippling the pastoral interests of the country, and with preventing free elections. Under the leadership of Manuel R. Alfonso, the "white" Liberals are trying to oust the "red" Liberals who have been in control for the past fifty years. The discovery of a secret treaty between Brazil and Uruguay leads to the belief that a recent loan made by Brazil to Paraguay is for the purpose of establishing a triple alliance against Argentina.

New Italian Ministry.—Signor Luigi Luzzatti, minister of agriculture in the Sonnino cabinet, has been called by the King to form a new ministry. The Marquis of San Giuliano will have the portfolio of foreign affairs and three Radicals will hold office.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Biblical Institute, Rome

The first of the public conferences to be given by professors of the Biblical Institute in Rome was delivered on Thursday, March 2. The President, Father Leopold Fonck, S.J., addressed an auditory of about 800 ecclesiastics on the Bible and Natural Science, a subject which he divided into three parts, to be treated in three successive weeks. The first lecture, of which we will give an abstract, he devoted to general principles; and he threw into the conference an interlude of photographic views taken by himself in the Holy Land on the flora and fauna of the country. He spoke for an hour and a half without notes, in the style of that free and tutorial teaching which has been adopted in the program of the Institute. To us this form of fluent and magisterial discourse, always commendable for its independence of manuscript or notes, was the more gratifying on the present occasion, inasmuch as the professor used the Italian language which was not native to him, and yet his apology for what he called the imperfection of his style proved to be quite unnecessary. A distinguished Italian professor remarked afterwards, that the matter was so interesting as to put out of sight any literary qualities. We are under the impression, however, that such a form of free and unhampered discourse is in Italy an innovation. We put the question on a former occasion to a Dante professor, why had he read a manuscript in a certain public lecture. He was a voluminous author, and must have been perfectly well qualified to deliver his thoughts in proper style without such an incumbrance, which deadens the delivery of the speaker and the interest of the hearer. He answered: "It is a mark of respect for your auditory to have your paper prepared, and to read it." We should be glad to hope that the breach of such formalities, now committed by the Biblical Institute, will have shown a better way of paying respect to your audience than the dead-and-alive method of prosing through a manuscript, and perhaps inducing your hearers to doze.

We presume to give an abstract, more or less exact, of what this first lecture contained. Limiting himself on this occasion to principles, the speaker explained a preliminary distinction between Phenomena and Facts, as they occur in the Bible. Phenomena are the appearances under which natural events show themselves; thus the sun appears to rise, and it appears to set. Facts are positive occurrences which are asserted to have taken place; as, for instance, that a certain day was lengthened at the voice of Josue. As to a knowledge and explanation of the intrinsic causes and conditions which determine the inner nature of facts and phenomena, natural science has advanced much in the course of ages. We are far ahead to-day of where men in the sixteenth century stood, and immeasurably more advanced than people who lived thousands of years ago.

Five principles govern the interpretation of statements, in which the facts or phenomena of nature are recorded.

The first is, that in the narrations of sacred writers there was never any intention to teach natural science. Secondly, the writers tell what sense reported, but do not tell of the intrinsic causes or constituents determining such phenomena or facts. Thirdly, the language used is popular; it is not that of scientific formulas. Even to-day, the familiar language of mankind has it, that the sun moves; it rises; it sets. So Josue said: "Move not, O sun, towards Gabaon, nor thou, O moon, towards the valley of Ajalon." Our Lord said that the mustard seed "is the least indeed of all seeds;" and so it was in popular language. Fourthly, the men inspired by God to write in His name, were men of their age, neither more nor less. The inspiration regarded a message for which they were used. They were the instrumental cause, elevated by God the primary agent for the exercise of that function.

Fifthly, the function discharged by the secondary instrumental cause, operating in the hands of God, was defined and limited. God preserved his messenger from error in the conveyance of the matter to be delivered, leaving him to his own habits of thought in the way of expressing the message. The man with his idiosyncracies, his preconceived notions, or his ignorance, may have had his own opinions on the essence of the phenomena which he alluded to, which he dealt with or used. Like every man of his day, he may have believed that the earth was the centre of our system. He affirmed, for instance, that "the sun and the moon stood still." The phrase was perfectly correct to express in the language of the day the specific character of the fact recorded: "There was not before nor after so long a day." Had he said: "The earth stopped revolving," he should have been understood as little as a physicist or chemist in our age, who should speak of electricity or the ultimate elements of matter in the language of next century, which will know more about them than we do, and probably something very different. In short, the terminology or notions used to convey a message do not enter into the contents of that message, any more than the diverse figures of speech used on an identical fact by a Philadelphia Convention and an Iroquois chief enter into the meaning of the fact. The one says: "Diplomatic relations are broken off with Great Britain;" the other says: "The hatchet is taken up against the Great Father beyond the Big Lake." Obviously, both convey the very same meaning.

Two illustrations serve to bring out this point, that the function, wherein God is the principal agent and man the secondary instrument, is defined and limited. St. Paul treats with the Corinthians of a gift imparted to some among them, whereby these persons spoke unknown tongues; and he distinguishes between the pneuma or spirit, to which the gift was imparted, and the nous or mind, which was the man's natural understanding. He says expressly: "If I pray in a tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is without fruit." Here the double cause, God bestowing the gift of a foreign tongue and man using it, was complete and in full operation; yet the man's natural understanding was obtuse to his own gift; it was "without fruit." Therefore St. Paul enjoins if such a one speak in the Church let there be an interpreter; that he and others may know what he is saying. Similarly, in the matter of the Pope's infallibility. An occupant of St. Peter's Chair may have private opinions of his own on a point to be defined; and these opinions may not agree with the lines of doctrine, if and when defined. But those private opinions embroidered on his mind will never affect the definition which issues from his mouth; for, by the guarantee of infallibility, the Pope when he speaks ex cathedra shall be as immune from error in the precise exercise of that function, as the inspired writer of Sacred Writ was immune in delivering the contents of a message. The phenomenon he stated; the precise noumenon, with which he accompanied it in his own mind, may have been his own, and exclusively so.

THOMAS HUGHES, S.J.

The Pope of the Comet

The comet so long heralded, wheeling at last from that trackless void where for three-quarters of a century unseen it kept its appointed path, has swept into our ken. If the waterfowl, winging its flight to its sheltered nest while the heavens still glow with the splendors of the dying day, has a lesson for our hearts, what a message does this visitor write in flaming characters across the sky? Where has it been so long sailing, that argosy of light? To what uncharted seas will it again turn its flashing prow? What oceans has it crossed? What other craft, fire-wreathed from stem to stern, has it spoken on its way? What isles and capes and headlands aflame with the beacon lights of God has it passed? Not once by towering surges of fiery billows, not once by tyrannous blasts of khamsin winds racing from the fields of space, was it driven from its course. Out of its haven, years ago, it steered into the deep; under the hand of its unerring Helmsman, it has put into port again. It speaks of immensity, of eternity, of God.

Many will correctly interpret the comet's message. Some, perhaps, even in this scientific age, will gaze upon the portent with a secret dread, and see it shaking from its horrid locks pestilence and war. The astronomer who sweeps the heavens not merely with his telescope, but has a brain and heart to understand and feel, as he thinks of those silent, fathomless abysses whence the visitor comes, may exclaim with Pascal: "The silence of those boundless, infinite spaces terrifies me." A few may recall and believe the oft-exploded story of the Pope who, in 1456, is said to have excommunicated the comet, and with bell, book and candle tried to shoo it from the skies. He is worth remembering.

We do not mean to refute the calumny that Callistus III issued a papal Bull against the very comet we are now gazing upon. That task has been time and again completely and thoroughly done. (Cf. AMERICA, Vol. I, p. 689—The Month, Feb., 1907, pp. 151, ss.) Such a critical and impartial historian as Pastor says: "The silly story, repeated by Draper and Arago, that Callistus caused bells to be rung against the comet and excommunicated it does not merit refutation" (Pastor-Antrobus: Hist. of the Popes, Vol II, p. 401, n.). Quite recently, at the request of Fr. Stein (1) of the Vatican Observatory, and aided by him, Dr. Aemilius Ranuzzi, one of the Papal archivists, examined the documents of the reign of Callistus. No Bull against a comet was found; there was no trace of anything like it.

Neither shall we attempt to justify every act of Callistus. Cardinal Hergenröther's principle is a bold but a correct one: "The historian of the Church has the duty to dissimulate none of the trials the Church has had to suffer from the faults of her very children, and sometimes from those of her own ministers." We admit that Callistus III is open to the charge of nepotism. He was a Borgia, and though with one exception the noblest of them all, he had some of the defects of that self-willed, passionate race. His partiality to his nephews, especially to the Duke of Spoleto and to Rodrigo Borgia, the future Alexander VI, is hard to explain. The results were disastrous, but it is only fair to say that could the high-minded and personally irreproachable Callistus "have foreseen the evil which his nephews would do to Italy and the Church, he would certainly, instead of elevating them, have banished them to the deepest dungeons of Spain"—(Pastor-Antrobus: Vol. II, p. 448).

The private character of Callistus was above suspicion. When, as Cardinal of Valencia, he was elected Pope on the death of Nicholas V, all who knew him gave unanimous testimony to the purity of his life, his lofty ideals, his high intellect, his energy and integrity. He was not as learned or as cultured as his great predecessor, but was not without letters. The Vatican Library owes some additions to him. He was especially skilled in Civil and Canon Law, branches which he had taught with success at the University of Lerida. His life as priest and bishop had been stainless. He was simple and unaffected in manners, austere to himself, kind and condescending to others. The poor and the needy never appealed to him in vain. His contemporary, St. Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, bears unequivocal testimony to his sense of justice, to his prudence, penetration and impartiality. He became the champion of the Martyred Maid of France and juridically and officially cleared her name of all the slanders heaped upon it by passion and hate.

(1) Calixte III, et la Comète de Halley: J. Stein, S.J.

This old man—he was now 77—thus lifted to the Chair of Peter, April 8, 1455, had but one passion, one dream, to rouse the princes and people of Europe against the conquering hosts of Islam. During the three years of his pontificate he was the champion of Christendom against the Turk. Immediately after his election he made a solemn vow to oppose the infidel. Europe needed such a leader.

The thunder of Mohammed's artillery, when but two years before his guns had hurled down the ramparts of Constantinople, the battle-cries of the janizaries pouring through the breach, the scenes of slaughter which followed, for a moment dazed and appalled the Christian world. In Venice the terrible news was received with a mournful but eloquent silence. In Rome the people broke into sobs and lamentations. The work of Constantine was undone, the other Rome was no more. The whole West looked up and shuddered; meteor-like the Crescent blood-stained had leapt to the zenith. Constantinople was the breakwater against the oncoming tide of Asiatic barbarism. The breakwater was down, the tide was rushing in. From that day another era had begun. The intruding Osmanli had pitched his tent on shores from which his racial characteristics, his traditions, his religious, ethical and social code excluded him. Constantinople had now become a plague-spot to the West. From that day, the Turkish question interminable, insoluble, had begun.

Byzantium in his grasp, Mohammed swore that he would stable his war-horse in St. Peter's. From his watch-tower Callistus heard the tramp of the Sultan's victorious legions. The spirit of the old Spaniard whose sires had battled with the Moors awoke. He thought of nothing but the Holy War. Every other object almost was forgotten. He realized the magnitude of the danger threatening the Christian commonwealth. In his addresses, in his Briefs and Bulls, in public, in private, he warned, threatened, prayed. He turned naval constructor and engineer, built dockyards on the Tiber and soon launched a little fleet of sixteen galleys to fight the infidel. Its Admiral, Cardinal Scarampo, was commissioned to scour the Ægean. In the course of its protracted cruise the fleet threw supplies and munitions into Rhodes, beat the Turks at Mitylene, capturing twenty-five of their ships, struck the shackles off thousands of Christian slaves, drove the infidel from Imbros, Thasos, Lemnos and Samothrace.

The Pope sacrificed money, costly book-bindings, even Church-plate, for the expenses of the sacred cause. He was willing "to wear only a linen mitre for the sake of defence of the Holy Gospel and of the True Faith." The palm of glory, he wrote, grows nowhere but on the battle-field in the Holy War. His legates crossed and recrossed Europe to preach the Crusade. Carvajal went to Germany. Statesman and almost saint, Juan Carvajal more than twenty times Legate of the Holy See, was one of the noblest men of his age. After his death Cardinal Bessarion built him a monument with this fine epitaph which he fully deserved: "Animo Petrus, pectore Cæsar erat;" "A Peter in spirit, a Cæsar in soul." Nicholas de Cusa was despatched to England and Germany. France, Spain, Scotland, Ireland, Norway and Sweden heard the ambassadors of Callistus summoning kings and people to take the Cross. But in his fight against Islam "the noble old man" was almost alone.

Balmes on the Church in Trial

More than casual interest has been aroused throughout the Catholic world by the preparations for the fitting observance in 1910 of the centenary of the birth of the great Catalan philosopher, Jaime Balmes. Among his papers was found an autograph article on the trials of the Church, with which Razón y Fe for March honors its pages. It is as fresh and timely as if the noble mind that composed it long years ago were here to-day, earnestly active as once it was, in the great work of the Church. Readers of AMERICA may peruse it with no little spiritual profit.

If the clergy cry out against the spoliation of which they are victims, they are called covetous; if they complain that they are deprived of what is left of some privilege, they are charged with pretensions to medieval predominance; if they ask for equal civil rights with the laity, they are reproached with ambition; if they preach against scandals, they are accused of intolerance; if they raise their voices against certain perverse doctrines, they are taunted with obscurantism; if they denounce vice and corruption, they are branded as hard-hearted and inimical to progress; if they promote pious exercises, they are taxed with superstition or exploitation of the gullible people; if they defend dogma and point out those who tarnish the purity of the Faith, they are stigmatized as slanderers; if they maintain the sacred and indisputable rights of the Church, they are howled down for their usurpation of authority over the civil power; if in politics they side with the common people, they are anarchists or regicides; if they side with the rulers, they are partisans of tyranny; if in some question they combat excessive liberty which is license, they are sworn enemies of the rights of the people; if they petition for the application of the principle of liberty with all its consequences, it is denied them under color that they wish to exploit it in their own favor.

How are the clergy to lessen or do away with the animosity with which they are assailed? It is very simple, say certain men. Let the clergy devote themselves to teaching religious truths and morality; let them keep out of worldly affairs and politics; let them utter only words of peace and reconciliation, and show in their conduct all virtues and chiefly charity and disinterestedness, and so forth, and so forth. Fair words these, but only words. Far be it from us to combat the counsels which in this or some similar shape are given to the clergy; but we would like to make a few observations. Do those who advise thus think that all the trials suffered by the Church are to be blamed exclusively on the clergy? It so, we wish to remind them that Jesus Christ our Lord, who was surely a model of all holiness, was hated, slandered, persecuted and condemned to a shameful death. We see in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews how the just were treated before His coming. Now under one pretext, now under another, such has been the lot of the virtuous in all ages. Besides the designs of Providence in thus proving the saints, as gold is tried in the crucible, there are other motives which present themselves in explanation of this fact. The Church exacts faith, and this is enough to raise up enemies cruelly bent upon her destruction. If a writer's works are pointed out by the Church as dangerous, will it not be to his interest to rail at the ignorance, intolerance and fanaticism of the clergy? We have a very recent illustration of this in "The Wandering Jew," in which Catholics, men and women, lay and clerical, are represented as a combination of hypocrisy, perfidy, treason, cruelty, infamy and all kinds of wickedness. And all this is instilled not by calm reasoning but by a succession of dramatic and intensely interesting scenes. Again, the Church cannot consent to live the slave of any power. She is the friend of the civil authority and inculcates obedience to it, but she cannot tolerate that that authority should go beyond its due limits and lay profane hands on the sanctuary. She represents, admonishes, protests and faces persecution. On such occasions there are never wanting vile flatterers who, uniting their voices with those of non-Catholics of one kind or another, prod the civil authorities to harsher measures by blathering about deploying all their forces against "ecclesiastical usurpation."

Lastly, the Church, in fulfilment of her divine mission, must reprehend vice, be it found among the mighty or among the mean. King and vassal, rich and poor, learned and simple, learn one and the same doctrine from her. Where there is iniquity there falls the Church's reprobation; where there is a scandal there the Church condemns. Therefore the Church must have enemies, some even of her own household. The Church's function in the world is like that of reason and grace in the individual, that is, to resist the passions, to direct them, to hold them in check, and to subject them to the rule of the eternal law which is in her keeping. Just as reason and grace continually strive in the individual against his evil inclinations, and this strife will go on while man exists, so likewise the Church, which has truth in her dogmas, holiness in her moral code, wisdom, rectitude and prudence in her discipline and laws, cannot fail to encounter strong and active resistance from those men who are swayed solely by worldly interest, who do not regulate their conduct by the dictates of right reason but rather follow their passions.

If one were to judge of the misfortunes of the Church by the impressions of the moment, or were to heed only the unmerited contradiction which she suffers and the injustice and oppression of which she is the victim, overwhelming sadness would crush the heart; but when one's mind is raised above the storm-racked plain of the passions, and the past and the future are viewed in the light of history and prophecy, when one reflects that the Church is not a human but a divine institution, that unto the consummation of the ages she has the assured assistance of her Founder, Jesus Christ, when one knows that by the unfailing promise of God the gates of hell shall not prevail against her, the spirit is strengthened and the heart is consoled, the days seem less evil, forebodings less dismal. One sees the bark tossed by the raging waves which threaten to engulf it, but he whom it carries, heartened by the word that cannot err, serenely faces the howling tempest, for he knows that the Almighty Hand will save it from the sunken rock, protect it from the angry waters and guide it to the blessed haven of salvation.

How Ferrer Was Tried

III.

I have been asked whether Ferrer's previous character and teachings may not have had something to do with his condemnation. This question cannot be answered by anyone outside of Spain, for certainly he had not kept himself in anywise aloof from the events which counted against him. For instance, there were some six revolutionary events before the July riots; he was on hand at the time of every one of them. It may have been a coincidence, but it was a coincidence that had a sinister aspect. Take the bomb explosion of May 31, 1906, when the King and his fair young bride narrowly escaped instant death on the Calle Mayor, Madrid. The man who threw that bomb, which killed ten persons, and who was executed for it, was Mateo Morral, a professor in La Escuela Moderna, placed in that position in Madrid by Ferrer. Ferrer at that time was on hand in Madrid, was living in the same block with Morral and was visited from time to time by him and various noted Anarchists. Ferrer was arrested along with many others, and was kept for eight months in the Model Prison in Madrid, but while many circumstances pointing that way were brought out, no evidence directly connecting him with the bomb-throwing was discovered, and so he was acquitted. It is absolutely untrue that there was a special court organized to try him on that occasion. But these questionable facts and circumstances may have weighed against him when it came to a question of clemency.

Ferrer was not a man of education. He was the founder of a school, who never wrote a book. His writings in correspondence and verses do not exhibit any reason but rather follow their passions.

type of man who is a leader, by reason of his ability to arrange things and provide the means. Of his life I need say little. He was born in Alella, in the province of Barcelona, and became a railway brakeman, and then conductor, had some trouble in smuggling on the French frontier, and then went to Paris where he fell in with the Anarchist school and imbibed their doctrines. He quarrelled with his wife, deserted her and afterwards obtained a separation, and left her to take care of his three children. All were disinherited in the will which he made at Montjuich, just before his death, and his fortune left to Soledad Villafranca, his mistress, who was younger than his eldest daughter. He died a comparatively rich man, for he obtained from Mlle. Ernestine Meunier, a pious old lady of Paris, money to found children's asylums in Barcelona, which were to be operated under Catholic auspices as religious institutions. He even gave her a statue of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, in token of how he was carrying them on. At her death, she left him property in Paris, upon which he realized over a million francs. She died a Catholic, putting that very expression into her will, and left legacies for Masses for her soul.

After her death he changed his asylums into La Escuela Moderna, the Modern School, a name which he took over bodily from a greater man, the historian, Don Rafael Altamira y Crevea, one of the foremost professors of the University of Oviedo, who had used it for many years and had used it in a religious sense. After the bomb-throwing episode of 1906, the various branches of La Escuela Moderna were closed and a new name, La Escuela de la Casa del Pueblo was adopted for it. A book-selling and journalistic venture was also added to it. Books from the French and new books written in Spanish, in which all mention of God or country were omitted, were compiled. As a rule, these books are inferior to the text books used in the Catholic and government schools, and a comparison of the two sets of books upon any subject will demonstrate that. His chief instructor for the girls' schools was Mme. Clementine Jacquinet. She was a French Anarchist who kept a school at Sakha in Egypt for several years. This school was closed by the British authorities and Mme. Jacquinet banished from Egypt on account of its Anarchist character. She describes herself as "an Atheist, scientific materialist, and anti-religious, because religion, dividing men, constitutes the real obstacle to progress, an Anti-Militarist and Anarchist." She had a large hand in preparing the school books for La Escuela Moderna.

A glance at some of the teachings of the text-books of La Escuela Moderna, intended for the minds of tender young children, would show them a little too advanced for use in the United States. In the Third Reader, known as "Patriotism and Colonization," we read (page 12):

"Drop the soldiers' musket as though it were hot iron! For this refusal (to drill) you will be treated as rebels, as cowards and as lacking in noble sentiments. But what of that? Do not shoulder the musket! If they point out to you that an enemy is invading the country, why, let him invade! Even if they show you that he is tearing down the throne or the presidential chair! What do you care for those trifles?"

On page 15: "Don't get excited for the sake of the flag! It is nothing but three yards of cloth stuck on a pole!"

On page 33: "One's country is not made up by territorial boundaries nor by the citizens who dwell therein, no, they are mere despots who exploit those ideas."

On page 80: "The words, 'country,' 'flag,' and 'family,' do not excite in me more than hypocritical echos of wind and sound."

On page 84, and following: "When I think of the evils I have seen and suffered, which proceed from national hatreds, I recognize that they all rest upon a gross lie, the love of one's country."

"The flag is but the symbol of tyranny and misery."

"Industry and commerce are the names by which they (merchants) cover up their robberies."

"Marriage is prostitution sanctified by the church and protected by the state."

"The family is one of the principal obstacles to the enlightenment of men."

In the "Bulletin of the Modern School," Vol. V, No. 1, page 5 (1908), an article reads: "Religion has retarded the evolution of man, has prolonged his primitive weakness, has made him retrograde to his ancestral brutishness, has cultivated and augmented the terrors arising from ignorance of phenomena, the miseries which those suffer who do not know how to modify natural effects to their advantage, and the injuries which are the results of general incapacity and of various obsessions; and finally it has been wonderfully united with brute force to assist the material and moral authority of the violent and the astute as the oppressors of the great mass of humanity."

And on page 6 following, in speaking of the separation of Church and State, it adds: "Separate two authorities equally hateful! It is imperative to suppress both of them!"

In the "Compendium of Universal History," written by Mme. Clementine Jacquinet, we find the following gems—on page 37: "It is believed that Jesus Christ was a Buddhist monk, who came from Mt. Carmel, and who devoted himself to preaching the religion of Buddha to the Jews."

On page 40: "Would not God have done better to have begun by making man as he desired him to be? Can you conceive of a father communicating to his son a terrible disease for the pleasure of curing it afterwards and then proclaiming himself thereafter as his benefactor? This God of the Christians is a wicked God which every honest conscience ought to reject; or if not, he is a useless one, powerless to prevent evil or to assure the good which one desires."

On page 41: "We desire to observe here that the only act of justice accomplished by this God was to get himself killed as the author of all the evils which men suffer."

On page 42, speaking of the crucifixion: "What does the deed represent? Why the part of a low-minded, ambitious person, infatuated with the very idea of his own wisdom."

On page 46: "We will always see Christianity in the course of history, face to face with progress in order to obstruct the latter's path; with a negation of science because it impeaches dogma; supporting firmly absolutism, inequality of the social classes; as an oppressor of the human conscience in its torture-chamber of false morality, with a hateful flag in whose shadow every crime has been committed, as a vampire always thirsting for blood to whom millions of victims have been sacrificed!"

In the work called "Nature and the Social Problem," written by Enrique Lluria, used in the advanced schools, the preface (page 7) explains the design and tendency of the work:

"At the end of two generations in which catechism is not taught, and it is scientifically explained that what is called creation is but the uncreated existence of the universe, only the atavistic effects of a religious belief will remain. There will be left then only its annihilation, and when its atrophy commences its annihilation will be rapid. For this purpose the Modern School of Barcelona has been founded, its library and free schools created to extend the work."

Other extracts from the various text books might be multiplied to show the animus of the authors, and stabs and side remarks at Christianity and Christian civilization abound all through them. Observe that it is not against the Catholic faith or belief, as such, that these are directed; it is against all religion and religious ideas and against Christianity in the large as the foremost one, that the attack of this remarkable series of text-books and the teaching of the modern school was directed.

The constitution of Spain (Article 13, Section 1) guarantees the right of free speech and free press, and although the Modern School, in its various branches, was founded at Barcelona in 1902, and since in other cities, the teachers and writers of it have never been molested or called before any tribunal for their speeches or writings—nay, more, in the city of Barcelona they have even made application to a Catholic city council for a portion of the public funds for the support of their schools and the application was granted. For eight years, therefore, Ferrer taught what he wanted in his schools and no one interfered with him. Only he and Morral and some militant teachers in the Modern Schools who were in riots, arson and slaughter, were ever taken before the courts and tried. There are plenty of the teachers in La Escuela Moderna who have never been molested, notwithstanding the bloodshed of the Barcelona riots; although even here such occurrences would be likely to turn strongly to their disadvantage.

The movement has turned strongly now to the foundation of anti-Anarchistic schools in Barcelona, and the month of December last saw a great outpouring of teachers, professors and others in the Educational Congress held there in the Palace of Fine Arts the week after Christmas, and the building and equipment of newer and finer schools to take the place of those destroyed by the rioters was unanimously and enthusiastically undertaken.

Catholicism in Western Canada

II.

Last week's review of Father Morice's "History of the Catholic Church in Western Canada" dealt with two important episodes in which Catholics distinctly determined the subsequent history of that country. Other episodes of which the painstaking author gives elaborate accounts are the massacre of Father Aulneau and his companions; Saint-Pierre and his expedient to get rid of the Assiniboine braves; the sanguinary Seven Oaks battle; the rising of the halfbreeds to avenge the assault on one of their fellows, and later on to put an end to the exactions of the Hudson's Bay Company; the murder of Father Darveau; the battle of a handful of halfbreeds against two thousand Sioux; how Bishop Grandin came near losing his life in a blizzard on the frozen surface of Great Slave Lake; the terrible night spent by Father Lacombe in the midst of two contending war parties of Indians; the freezing of Father Goiffon's feet and the consequent burning of St. Boniface cathedral; the awful fate of Brother Alexis; Father Lacombe's intervention with the Blackfeet on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the wanton murder of Bishop Seghers. These are but some of the many incidents which make these two volumes so intensely interesting that the reader passes from chapter to chapter with ever-growing absorption in the panorama of heroic deeds.

Father Morice begins with an historical and geographical sketch of the number, character and local distribution of the various Indian tribes who roamed the plains between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains when Radisson and Desgroseillers, two Catholics, first visited the land of the Crees in 1659. Then he relates the founding of the "Company of Adventurers of England trading into Hudson Bay," and mentions their first posts at Albany and Moose Rivers, Rupert River, and the well-fortified Prince of Wales' Fort at the mouth of the Churchill River. In 1727 Pierre Gaultier de Varennes, who had assumed the surname of De la Vérendrye, which he generally shortened to Lavérendrye, began that series of westward expeditions which led to his discovery of the Red River valley and his reaching the confluence of the Assiniboine and the Red River, the site of the present city of Winnipeg, on September 24, 1738. This was followed by a period of progress and decline, during which Lavérendrye's constant struggle against adversity reveals true nobleness of character.

From 1756, four years before the cession of Canada to the English, to 1810, is an epoch of transition. The reader is introduced to the Coueurs de bois and to the wonderful growth of the halfbreed element, so vital a factor in the maintenance of French influence in spite of British conquest, in the spread of Catholic teaching without the presence of a single priest, and in the development of the fur trade, which enriched a great number of bold adventurers from the east. Most of these traders were Protestants, but there were some exceptions, one of the most notable being John Macdonell, a member of a United Empire Scotch family, a partner in the Northwest Fur Company. He "stands out," says Father Morice, "as a unique figure, stern and conscientious, amid a number of trading officers whose daily lives were in opposition to all laws of justice and decency. He was a strict Catholic, and his men had surnamed him "The Priest," on account of his scrupulous observance of the Church feasts and weekly abstinence, as well as the rigidity with which he enforced it on his subordinates." Mr. Wilson Beckles, historian of the rival company, the Hudson's Bay, explicitly states that John Macdonell was removed from his important post at Ile à la Crosse in 1806 because he was not "inclined to set all principles of law and justice at defiance."

Religion was sadly needed to establish peace between the Hudson's Bay Company, which claimed the rich fur-bearing territory in virtue of a royal charter, and the Northwest Company of Montreal merchants, who based their rights on priority of discovery and considered that the territory had been handed over to Canada at the cession of 1763. God, who knows how to draw good from evil, willed that the very excesses of the traders should be the means of hastening the establishment of peace, and that the instrument for the permanent spread of the Catholic faith in that then remote wilderness should be one who did not belong to the visible body of the Church.

Thomas Douglas, Earl of Selkirk, wishing to improve the lot of Scotch and Irish peasants, purchased a great number of shares in the Hudson's Bay Company, obtained possession of 110,000 square miles of land near the Red and Assiniboine Rivers, and entrusted the direction of his proposed colony to Captain Miles Macdonell, a Catholic, who, though not called "The Priest," as was his brother mentioned above, acted as one, in the absence of any duly ordained priest, marrying couples and baptizing infants. Captain Macdonell was the first Red River resident to petition Mgr. Plessis, Bishop of Quebec, for priests to be sent to the new settlement, and Lord Selkirk strongly supported this request in a letter which accompanied the Captain's petition.

The first band of emigrants left Stornoway, in the Hebrides, on July 26, 1811, reached York Factory on Hudson Bay September 24, and the present site of Winnipeg in the following August. Altogether four bands of emigrants sent out by Lord Selkirk came to the Red River between 1812 and 1815. All Protestant authors, who have written about this early settlement, have represented it as exclusively Protestant and have ignored the Catholic population already dwelling in that region. Now the facts, as brought out clearly by Father Morice, are these: The total of all colonists sent thither by Lord Selkirk was two hundred and eighty, of whom several were Irish Catholics, served by a Catholic chaplain, Father Bourke, who, however, did not get beyond the neighborhood of Hudson Bay and returned to Ireland by the next ship.

When the first of Lord Selkirk's emigrants set foot in the Red River valley, they found there and in the vicinity a white and halfbreed Catholic population which far exceeded in numbers all the emigrants that the earl ever sent there. The total Catholic population within easy reach of the new settlers must have been nearly seven hundred. This preponderance of the Catholic element in the Red River valley continued till 1871, when an ever-increasing tide of immigrants from Ontario set in. As early as 1839, when the entire territory which afterward became the State of Minnesota, did not yet number five thousand souls, there were sixteen hundred Catholics in St. Boniface, which was then the most populous settlement in the Northwest of Canada and the United States.

Joseph Norbert Provencher, the first resident priest in what is now the Middle West, reached this settlement on July 16, 1818. He was accompanied by Father Sévère Joseph Nicholas Dumoulin, who that autumn took charge of the thriving settlement at Pembina, sixty miles south of St. Boniface. This latter name was chosen by Father Provencher in honor of the Apostle of Germany because of the Meuron soldiers who, disbanding after fighting on the British side in the war of 1812-14, had been engaged by Lord Selkirk to quell the disturbances in the Canadian West and having done so, settled on land he gave them on the bank of the Red River. Many were German and Swiss Catholics.

Father Morice's history henceforth enters upon ground familiar to those who have read Father George Dugas' Life of Bishop Provencher and Archbishop Taché's "Vingt Années de Missions;" but Father Morice everywhere throws new light on facts but vaguely understood before, introduces valuable statistics, refutes the calumnies of prejudiced historians, describes in detail the varying phases of the conflict between heresy and integral truth for the conquest of Indian souls, and accumulates texts from non-Catholic writers in support of his masterly array of proofs. For instance, Alexander Ross, a Protestant, is quoted as saying: "The poverty of the Catholics must be admitted to redound much to their honor. Where a new mission is contemplated, and the missionary named, the bishop allows him £10 to fit himself out, then adds his benediction, and the thing is settled."

On the other hand, he adds: "The Protestant mission had funds at its command, with the aid of which Mr. Crowley could feed and clothe his converts, while the poor priest had nothing to offer them but instruction." Another Protestant, Alexander Begg, writes: "The Catholic priests experienced many difficulties, and, being poor, they had not the same opportunity to extend their labors as rapidly as the Protestant missionaries. What they lacked in means, however, they made up by zealous perseverance, and gradually they made their way midst drawbacks and disappointments." And they won out in the long run. Mgr. Provencher wrote in 1842 to the Bishop of Quebec that all the Métis and Indians he met "have abandoned the Methodist ministers to embrace the truth."

Moreover, Alexander Ross relates that Mr. Jacobs, one of the last Wesleyan ministers stationed at Lac la Pluie, said to him: "We have been laboring here for the last eleven years, according to the usual system, without being able to form a school, or make a single convert." The late Anglican Bishop Bompas, "of amusing memory," having written that the number of Indians under instruction of the Catholic and Anglican communions "may not greatly differ," Father Morice applied for information on this score to Right Rev. Bishop Breynat, O.M.I., the present Vicar-Apostolic of the Mackenzie, and received a detailed reply giving statistics of every Catholic and Protestant mission in the North, from which the following summaries are deduced: The native Protestant population professing Protestantism does not exceed five hundred; the Catholic Indians and halfbreeds of the Mackenzie are estimated, in 1909, at eleven thousand, and those of Athabasca at five thousand.

Space forbids us to more than touch on the exhaustive and accurate treatment of the Manitoba School Question, on the splendid career of the young Bishop, and later on, the venerable Archbishop Taché, whom Father Morice rightly styles "the greatest Canadian of the West," the apostolic labors and triumphs of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, that "greatest of missionaries," Mgr. P. P. Durieu, O.M.I., First Bishop of New Westminster, whose methods in dealing with Indians have been more successful than the Jesuit Reductions of Paraguay.

We may, however, be allowed to express the hope that Father Morice will soon add a third to his two already completed volumes, bringing the history of Central and Western Canada down to date, and not stopping at 1895. His plea that "the mellowing influence of time is needed to permit of a faithful delineation of figures and deeds, which, at St. Boniface and still farther west, are still too near our mental vision to be reproduced with the proper degree of accuracy and impartiality," would apply equally well to events long antedating 1895, and is contradicted by his own example in chronicling the appointment of the Right Rev. Alexander McDonald to the See of Victoria on October 1, 1908, and in marking in his Ecclesiastical Map of Canada the limits of the new Diocese of Regina months before the erection thereof was officially announced. In the last twenty years great developments have taken place which call for at least summary statement.

Praise or blame may be withheld, but, surely his readers would like to hear of the great expansion of parochial work in the diocese of St. Boniface, the Ruthenian, Polish and German churches all over the Canadian West, the noble fight for Catholic rights carried on by the Northwest Review and by the late W. F. Luxton, editor of the Free Press, a non-Catholic who sacrificed his personal interests to his devotion to fair play, the manly attitude of the Catholic laity of Winnipeg, Brandon, Regina, Calgary and Edmonton, and the unique later history of St. Boniface College, the only Catholic institution in America which annually competes successfully with all the Protestant educational institutions of Manitoba.

As to the illustrations, which abound in these two portly volumes, they are really illustrative, and two of them deserve special mention. That which represents the poet Whittier's famous cathedral with the "turrets twain" is now for the first time shown in its historic garb, and the portrait of Riel is from a real and lifelike photograph taken when he was in his right mind before Orange persecution had dethroned his reason.

LEWIS DRUMMOND, S.J.

Many years ago Charles Lever used to write the "Cornelius O'Dowd Papers" in Blackwood. About the time of the Alabama arbitration he undertook to prove the thesis that the United States Government got its way in the matter by quiet persistence; and he illustrated his argument by the story of the American traveler, who, not knowing a word of Italian, overcame his Italian landlord and forced him to rescind their contract in the matter of lodgings, by putting the keys before him and subjoining to his every vehement and gesticulatory protest these words uttered in the firmest of tones: "You've got to take those keys." English writers do not like Americanisms. They go further and protest loudly against them. Yet if the Americanism be a good one, it somehow or other insists until it forces itself into the language. Some time ago a new one was coined, "Clubman," and it came quickly into common use on this side of the Atlantic as a short and picturesque word expressing a class of men, new at the time but growing in numbers with the increase of wealth. English purists treated it with contumely; some affected not to understand it. But the word was a good one and had to make its way. "You've got to let me in." And lo! in Blackwood for March, the conservative Blackwood, the Blackwood of Charles Lever, little loving things American, we find on page 409: "A week's growth of beard, the attention of a skilled hair-dresser, and 15s. expended in a slop shop is all that is necessary to turn an ordinary clubman into a ship's steward."

CORRESPONDENCE

The Late Anglican Bishop of Lincoln

LONDON, MARCH 9, 1910.

Dr. Edward King, Anglican Bishop of Lincoln, for many years the leading figure in the High Church party of the establishment, passed away yesterday morning. He was in his eighty-first year and had been in failing health since 1907. Dr. King was born in 1829. He was the son of the Rev. Walker King, Archdeacon of Rochester. His father had come under the influence of Tractarianism and Edward King was a High Churchman when he went up to Oxford as a student of Oriel, Newman's old college. The college was then retrograding from High Churchism, under the reaction that followed Newman's submission to the Catholic Church, and the Provost of Oriel warned young King if anything he was too regular in his attendance at chapel. It was an exaggeration, he said, to be there twice a day, and one should beware of one's religion "degenerating into routine."

There was still, however, among the fellows and tutors of Oriel some who clung to the older ways of Newman's time. One of these, Charles Marriot, gave Edward King kindly help and encouragement, but he disappointed his friends by taking only a pass degree without honors. Examinations, however, are not an infallible test of scholarship. He took orders in 1855 and was appointed to a country curacy near Oxford. He was always a hard worker and sympathetic to all with whom he came in contact. He used to tell with pleasure how a farmer in his first parish told him he could speak quite freely to him for "he was not a bit like a gentleman."

In 1854 Bishop Wilberforce had founded at Cuddesdon (a village six miles from Oxford, where there was an old Episcopal palace), the "Cuddesdon Theological College." It was a High Church imitation of a Catholic seminary, intended to give young men a training for the ministry of the establishment in more congenial surroundings than those of an ordinary university college. In 1858 King was appointed chaplain and assistant lecturer at the new college. Here he was in his element. From 1863 to 1873 he was its principal. It was at Cuddesdon, and in the twelve years later, when he was Professor of Pastoral Theology at Christ Church, Oxford, that he did the chief work of his life.

Hundreds of the future clergy of the Established Church came directly or indirectly under his influence, and that influence all tended to inspire them with Catholic ideals. Dr. King was a man of the most earnest piety, and full of zeal. Besides his work as a professor, he was continually preaching, conducting special services for the students, acting as their director, encouraging them to the practice of confession, and finally organizing retreats on the Catholic model. Many of his disciples passed into the safe haven of the Catholic Church and to the last prayed for the conversion of their teacher, of whom they spoke with admiring enthusiasm. "Cum talis sis, utinam noster esses!" might well be said of him.

He seemed near us, but he was all the time far off. To those who on the eve of conversion spoke to him of their state of mind he would say that he was content to remain in "the Church of his baptism" and make the most of "the means of grace" it afforded. If a historical issue were raised he would not discuss it. It was not his line, he would say. They had better carry their doubts to his friend, Professor Bright, whose specialty was ecclesiastical history. He felt quite sure of his own position. At Cuddesdon and Oxford he would "celebrate" every morning, asking some favorite pupil "to serve his Mass." At Lincoln he spoke of himself as the successor of St. Hugh.

The Rev. Stephen Gladstone, the son of the great Prime Minister was one of these favorite pupils, and a life-long friend, and it was to William Ewart Gladstone that Dr. King owed his promotion to the Oxford Professorship, and in 1885 to the See of Lincoln. His nomination to Lincoln provoked a storm of protests from the Low Church party, who regarded King as something like a "Jesuit in disguise." The storm was increased by his ostentatious profession of his Catholic ideals. Since the Reformation the bishops of the Established Church had always performed their ceremonial duties in a plain black gown with puffy white sleeves of lawn. This was much too "Protestant" for Dr. King. He startled conservative feeling by appearing in cope and mitre with a crosier in his hand. The bishops had always used a mitre as the crest of the coat of arms on their carriage doors, but no Anglican Bishop had ever possessed a mitre till Dr. King wore it at Lincoln. Mr. John Kensit, the ultra-Protestant agitator, circulated portraits of the bishop arrayed in full pontificals with the inscription, "Can this be the Protestant Bishop of Lincoln?" Then came the report that he had set up a crucifix on the "altar" of his private chapel and the highest of High Ceremonial was introduced at the cathedral.

Other bishops have since followed Dr. King's example, some of them with timid reservations. One of the bishops used to have a pastoral staff with a long boss under the crook of the crosier, and niches in the boss. There were little silver images of the saints that could be screwed into the niches, but these were only placed there when he visited a very "High" congregation.

The ceremonial adopted at Lincoln led to prolonged litigation—a petition to the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Benson) to interfere, a trial of Dr. King in the archbishop's court at Lambeth and a judgment by Archbishop Benson (confirmed in all essentials by the Privy Council), which really settled nothing. It was a fine specimen of what Newman once described as the traditional method of the establishment of trying to steer a safe course between the Charybdis of "Yea" and the Scylla of "Nay." Thus, for instance, objection was raised to Dr. King using the "mixed chalice," putting a little water in the wine as is done at the offertory in the Mass. Dr. Benson ruled that if this were done at the Communion table during the service it was illegal, but if water were put in the wine in the sacristy (where no one saw it done) there could be no legal objection. It was objected that Dr. King had lighted candles at the communion table. Dr. Benson pointed out that as they were lighted before he came to it there was no proof that he was personally responsible for the lights. Certain minor practices were condemned. But nothing was settled. Dr. King made hardly any change in the ceremonial at Lincoln and no other Ritualist clergyman paid any attention to the judgment.

The storm gradually died away, and even the most bitter of Low Churchmen recognized that the Anglican bishop was a man of earnest, pious life, busy with good deeds. But it is strange to think of his claiming to represent St. Hugh of Lincoln, the Burgundian monk who came to England from the Grande Chartreuse by Papal warrant to erect the first English Carthusian monastery, and left his cloister to rule at Lincoln as the stern defender of the rights of the Holy See. The medieval bishop, who excommunicated the King's officials when they meddled with ecclesiastical affairs, would have been puzzled to recognize as his successor even the kindest and most pious of men, could he have seen him listening for a moment to the question of the ritual of his cathedral being discussed by laymen in a royal court. Nor could St. Hugh have understood the position of a "Bishop of Lincoln" who "said Mass" each morning in his private chapel, and yet counted among the clergy of his diocese rectors and vicars who believed neither in a Real Presence and a Sacrifice nor in a priestly power of consecration and absolution. The better the man the more difficult is it to understand the Anglican position.

Dr. King never married. Fifty years ago his celibate life would have itself been enough to exclude him from the episcopate of the establishment. Celibacy was then considered a sign of "Popery," and it was held to be the right thing that there should be a lady to preside over the hospitality of the bishop's palace. But without this help Dr. King was a hospitable man and liked especially to gather young people about him at his parties at Lincoln. He was popular even with those who differed most from him. Those of his own views in the Anglican Church had a reverent admiration for him, and many on the verge of conversion have been delayed or held back by the thought that what was good enough for Dr. King must be surely safe enough for them. With the present Government in office and the present state of feeling in the divided establishment it is likely that a more "moderate" man will take his place.

Church Property Frauds in France

PARIS, MARCH 16, 1910.

The event of the day in Paris, the subject of most conversations, are the gigantic and scandalous frauds lately brought to light; M. Duez, one of the three receivers of Church property, is in prison and his colleagues, MM. Lecouturier and Ménage may possibly share his fate before many days are over. The event is one of importance, for beyond the iniquity and rapacity of a handful of worthless individuals, open wider horizons of corruption, incapacity and guilt on the part of the Government; moreover, these sensational revelations are made almost on the eve of the general elections and for this reason alone may have important results.

The general lines of the question are as follows: A short time ago, M. Le Provost de Launay, who represents the Department of Morbihan in the Senate, sounded the first note of alarm; he pointed out that grave suspicions existed as to the manner in which the official liquidateurs of the religious orders carried out their task. As AMERICA's readers know, these men were appointed to collect the proceeds of the sale of Church property.

In consequence of M. Le Provost de Launay's motion, a commission was named by the Senate to sift the matter; among its members was the ex-Minister Combes, the arch-enemy of the religious orders, but who, in this case, seems to have zealously fulfilled his mission of exposing the frauds of the liquidateurs. The Government, having been informed that the commission had discovered numerous instances of swindle and embezzlement, Duez, the chief culprit, was told of the suspicions that weighed upon him, whereupon he offered his resignation. It was accepted, but he was not only permitted to retire without blame but was even praised and thanked by the magistrates to whom he tendered his resignation on the plea of ill health. An administrator, M. Le Marquis, was appointed to take up the work. He did so and soon discovered, on going over his predecessor's accounts, the disappearance of sums varying from fifty thousand francs to two million of francs proceeding from the liquidation of the religious orders. Seventy-four religious congregations, their houses, property and valuables had been put in the hands of Duez!

Le Marquis then called upon his predecessor to explain matters and, after some hesitation and a few contradictory statements, Duez ended by confessing that he had made away, for his own private ends, with five million francs belonging to the religious orders whose property he was appointed to realize for the benefit of the State.

As may be imagined, so gigantic and barefaced a fraud was brought speedily before the Parliament. Duez was arrested and is now in prison; a Conservative deputy, M. Georges Berry, and the Socialist leader, Jaurès, whose party is opposed to the men in power, called upon the Government to explain and justify its attitude in the matter of the liquidateurs. Jaurès is a vigorous speaker and his intervention in the question was much remarked.

It is certain that the Government, if not actually in league with the liquidateurs, has a heavy load of responsibility in the affair. Putting aside the original iniquity of robbing the religious orders of their property, it was folly to entrust so huge a liquidation to three men only, and the motives that dictated the choice of these men are not defensible.

In a circular written at the time, M. Vallé, who was then Minister of Justice, owned that a certain number of magistrates having declined the task "from conscientious motives," their refusal might have a bad effect on public opinion. Therefore, he added, it is necessary to appoint as liquidateurs men who offer "every guarantee from a political point of view," which meant, were without principles, ready to play into the hands of Government. In accordance with the spirit of this circular, the liquidateurs were selected without regard to their morality or honesty. Duez, who was appointed to the post in July, 1901, by the tribunal of the Département de la Seine, had been employed in the Bon Marché, the huge shop that all visitors to Paris know. The facts that have come to light within the last week leave no doubt as to the immorality of his private life. His colleagues were no better, and sickening stories have been published, describing the use to which Martin Gauthier, Duez's right-hand man, turned certain monasteries and convents of which he took possession in the name of his patron. In one case, that of the Monastery of the Picpus Fathers, the scandal was so great that it called forth the protestations of the inhabitants of the quarter and Martin Gauthier was hastily removed.

The ministers are at the present moment in a dilemma that must considerably diminish their influence and perhaps bring about their downfall. Either they were aware, as seems probable, of the swindling that was going on under their eyes, but, for fear of compromising their position they resolutely kept silence until forced to act; or else they knew nothing and are consequently guilty of gross carelessness and incapacity. In either case the responsibility of the Government is a grave one and the far-reaching effect of the present scandal cannot as yet be justly estimated. Moreover, among the huge mass of papers seized at one or other of Duez's residences are lists of persons belonging, it is said, to politics or to journalism, to whom he paid considerable sums of money, as is proved by receipts corresponding to the names. It is, therefore, likely that more accomplices of the liquidateurs will be by degrees dragged before the public.

At the Chambers on last Monday, the Government, by the voice of the Minister of Justice, M. Barthou, made a lame defence. The majority, usually so aggressive, seemed singularly ill at ease and the declarations of the representatives of Government were coldly received. M. Barthou's empty protests, his assurance that the Government was decided to see that the claims of justice were satisfied, did not carry conviction. Jaurès had attacked one of Duez's colleagues, Lecouturier, the liquidateur of the Carthusians (whose enormous property suddenly was reduced to nothing when it passed into the hands of the State) of having committed frauds resembling those of Duez. M. Barthou replied by promising to arrest the culprit if his responsibility were established, and he endeavored to win the sympathy of the opposition by asserting that both he and the President of the Council, M. Briand, had agreed that Duez must be arrested. He omitted to add that the arrest only took place when the Government had been absolutely compelled by the weight of public opinion to act in the matter.

The feeling that is uppermost in the minds of Catholics was expressed by M. Beauregard, a Conservative deputy, who is also a good speaker. He pointed out that in the affair of the Carthusians, not only the liquidateurs, but the State, was the guilty party. "How can we restrain our indignation," he continued, "when we see that men, who are accused of the gravest acts of dishonesty, have built up their fortune with money meant for works of mercy and that they gave nothing or next to nothing to the lawful proprietors. . . . You wished to take the property of your adversaries and therefore you inaugurated a policy of confiscation. A policy of this kind must become dishonest, and out of political passion you allowed it to be so. The whole story of the robbery of the religious orders is a vast swindle. . . . The Government has deceived the country; it excited its rapacity by leading it to believe that it was about to give it a "milliard;" this sum has not been found and will never be forthcoming."

He then answered the childish objection that in certain cases the despoiled religious had compounded with their spoilers, and he victoriously laid the whole responsibility of the gigantic and disgraceful fraud on the present sectarian Government. M. Labori, who is well known as a forcible speaker, added an eloquent note to M. Beauregard's protest. He openly charged the men in power with having maintained Duez at his post after he was open to suspicion and reproached them for leaving in the hands of Lecouturier, on whom rest the gravest accusations, the liquidation of several religious orders whose interests are at the present moment in his hands.

The meeting of the Chambers on the following day, March 16, was scarcely less stormy, and though in the end the Ministry kept its position, its general attitude and defence was miserably weak and two of its members, MM. Millerand and Barthou, are likely to be obliged to resign. The former, because he was compromised, in some measure, in the affairs of the congregations against whom, being a lawyer, he took an active part; the latter, because in a moment of exasperation he let fall the words: "Our lawyers are corrupt"—a significant avowal on the part of a member of the Government, but one which all those who are acquainted with the undercurrents of French law courts know to be absolutely true.

As your readers may judge, the question has wider issues than appear at first sight. They touch, not merely the reputation of a group of dishonest men, they reveal a wholesale system of fraud, corruption and dishonesty and prove, once more, how far sectarian passion and prejudice may lead a government to countenance evils that a mere natural sense of justice should reprove.

In face of these crying scandals the thoughts of many Catholics go forth to the exiled, ruined and starved religious, men and women, whose property has become the prey of these evildoers. In an eloquent article, the Catholic champion, the Count de Mun, voiced the indignation of his party and recalled the memory of the "victims, whom we have all of us seen, mounting their Calvary, dispersed by the storm; wanderers without a home on the roads of exile, begging their bread," while men like Duez and his accomplices feasted in the empty convents and an atheistical and corrupt government calmly looked on.

Australia's Preparations for Defence

MELBOURNE, JANUARY 24, 1910.

The chief topic of interest this month is the visit of Lord Kitchener of Khartoum, who has been specially invited by the Commonwealth to inspect the Australian forces and give advice as to the best method of improving our defences. On January 1, Lord Kitchener arrived in Brisbane, Queensland, and reviewed the local forces. On the 5th inst., he was in Newcastle, New South Wales. About 4,500 officers and men went into camp in Liverpool near Sydney, where the Field Marshal lived for some days with the troops, and tested their capacity for hard work. Tuesday, the 11th inst., witnessed the arrival of Lord Kitchener and his staff in Melbourne.

The Federal Government entertained the distinguished soldier at a banquet in the Queen's Hall, Parliament House. A representative gathering was present to meet him. Among the speeches on the occasion, that which was listened to with the greatest attention and interest was Lord Kitchener's. When the guest rose, the audience cheered him again and again. He thanked the Government of the Commonwealth for its invitation to visit Australia and for the compliment paid him in asking him to give it the benefit of his experience in military affairs. "During my stay in Australia," he said, "I have been much struck by the very strong and widespread determination which exists in the country to have an efficient citizen force. The want of population in many parts of this splendid country is a difficulty that has to be carefully considered; but I think I may say that what you have got is first rate material on which to work. In no other country in the world, as far as I know, do the young men show such natural military qualifications on which to base their military career. There is no reason, as far as I can see, why the national forces of Australia should not make their standard of efficiency on a par with, if not higher than, those of military powers in Europe or elsewhere."

One of the guests was Sir George Reid, a prominent politician, who had been appointed by the Federal Government High Commissioner of Australia in London. In a humorous vein, he said he had proposed to outline a scheme of military defence for Australia, but he was delighted to find that Lord Kitchener had anticipated him in every point.

Theory vs. Fact

Some time last year, Dr. Bode, Director of the Museum of Berlin, bought a wax bust. He said it represented Flora and was the work of Leonardo da Vinci. While he was still congratulating himself on the treasure he had acquired, an Englishman named Cooksey wrote to the London Times that the bust was not da Vinci's but had been made by an English sculptor, R. C. Lucas, who has been dead not quite thirty years. The art-world was amazed at the presumption of a Southampton auctioneer who had dared to contradict a connoisseur famous for his correctness of judgment. Had it been the mere auctioneer against the critic the amazement would have been most justifiable, but it was the auctioneer knowing the facts against the critic with a theory only, something very different. Mr. Cooksey had known the Lucases for years. He knew the history of the bust and was able to demolish the history of it Dr. Bode had received, which, though it fitted in with the da Vinci theory, happened to be untrue. Dr. Bode was mortified, too mortified to admit his error, which his hitherto singularly successful career made only the more painful. The Emperor ennobled him, to show that however this dispute might turn out he had not lost confidence in his servant. The bust was more carefully examined and was found to be built up round a core of modern Manchester cottons. Still Von Bode and his partisans would not yield. These cottons, said they, had been introduced by some one employed to repair the bust. The wax was then analyzed and found to contain spermaceti, which Cooksey's supporters assert was not known until the year 1700. Straightway one rushes to defend Von Bode with a quotation from Shakespeare:

"And telling me the sovereign'st thing on earth
Was parmaceti for an inward bruise."

He might have added that the Oxford Dictionary quotes the Customs Register of 1545 as recording the duty on "parmacete" iii s. iii d. a pound.

Spermaceti comes from the sperm whale of the Pacific and Indian Oceans and the tropical and subtropical Atlantic. Vasco da Gama returned from doubling the Cape of Good Hope in 1499; da Vinci did not die till twenty years later. Moreover, stray sperm whales blunder occasionally into the North Atlantic and dead ones come ashore from time to time on the coasts of Europe. It is, therefore, intrinsically possible that da Vinci knew spermaceti and mixed it with wax for modeling, though one must confess this is not very probable. What Dr. Pinkus, who made the analysis, dwells on, is that the material of the bust is of wax, lac and spermaceti, mixed in exactly the same proportions that Lucas used in works certainly his; a fact that seems to establish thoroughly Mr. Cooksey's case.

All this is very interesting. It is profitable, also. Science, so-called, is full of theories which we do not altogether accept. The men of science clamor and their followers join the chorus: "Who are these that dare challenge the deductions of science?" We answer, like St. Paul: You are wise; we are fools. You are the Von Bodes; we are the Cookseys. You spin the theories; we have the facts.

Liberia's Crisis

An American commission, sent out a year ago at the request of the agitated African republic, has returned and placed its report in the hands of President Taft. Though the tone of the document is moderate, the conclusions reached by the three commissioners indicate a condition of affairs that simply must be remedied. Begun in 1820 as an asylum for freedmen from the United States, under the patronage of men like James Madison and Bushrod Washington, it remained in tutelage until 1847, when it proclaimed its independence, which nobody gainsaid though formal recognition by the United States was delayed until 1861.

With an area of 35,000 square miles, less than that of Indiana, it claims 2,060,000 inhabitants, of whom two million are uncivilized natives, strangers to law and government. Hemmed in on the north and east by French possessions and having the flourishing British colony of Sierra Leone on the west, the lot of Liberia has not been the pleasantest. Politics and finances seem to be equally demoralized. Acting under the direction of British advisers, the government lately undertook a reform of its treasury, judiciary and public safety departments, but the advice seemed to fall short of the needs of the case. Hence, the appeal to the United States. Liberia's failure is conspicuous in finance (the interest on the public debt is much in arrears), in maintaining its boundaries and in developing the interior. Misunderstandings with other nations have resulted, and these have excited a spirit of unrest even among the civilized population. Powerful neighbors and a dissatisfied people combined now threaten to do away with Liberia as an independent country.

The recommendations of the American commission, which meet with Secretary Knox's hearty approval, include the good offices of the United States in settling pending boundary disputes, in reforming finances and in organizing a frontier police force. The commission further suggests a research station and a naval coaling station in Liberia. The natural wealth of the country is considerable and valuable gold deposits are believed to exist, yet coffee is the only noteworthy cultivated crop and manufactures hardly exist. After the failure of British officers to remedy existing evils, the action of the British Government in recently notifying the little republic that it must police its western boundary more effectively does not seem to be exactly disinterested and lofty. Twenty thousand of the citizens, or over one-third of the civilized population, are natives of the United States or their offspring, and therefore they naturally look to this country for protection and help. The Church is very feebly represented in Liberia. The prevailing persuasion is Episcopalianism, but it has not shown much aggressive zeal in evangelizing the numerous savage tribes a few miles back from the coast. The contemplated action of the United States amounts to a protectorate to save the Liberians from their uncivilized neighbors and from themselves.

National Safety

Commenting editorially on the statements of Señor Demarchi, chargé d'affaires of the Argentine Republic in Japan, the Japanese papers have urged their government to promote emigration to the hospitable shores of the great South American republic where all races are welcome. El Pueblo, the great Catholic daily of Buenos Aires, indulges in some weighty reflections, suggested by Señor Demarchi's remarks, which show that Latin America is beginning to wake up to the problems which must needs arise from miscellaneous immigration. Our own experience and that of other nations, it says in a leader, teach that artificially forced immigration is against the industrial and economic interests of the country, and that the stream of immigration should be carefully and prudently watched to prevent the introduction of elements which make for rebellion, lawlessness and social upheavals. The ill-advised incorporation into the commonwealth of ethnical elements, devoid of affinity and homogeneity with those that constitute the nation, is capable of producing grave social and economic clashes that may take on a character of even international importance. While experience and common sense are clear enough proof of these propositions, some people obstinately deny and disregard them as if with malice aforethought they wish to complicate the question of immigration which in itself is delicate enough in all conscience. Thus, and not otherwise, declares El Pueblo, should the conduct of our representative in Japan be designated, for with a haste and energy worthy of a better cause, and with an officiousness until now unknown in such functionaries, he has taken the initiative in heading Japanese and Asiatic emigration in general towards the country. The attitude of Señor Demarchi is characterized as something unusual and inexplicable, for he manifestly compromises the government in a question upon which it has not yet declared itself, namely, the type of immigrant most in harmony with the needs of the nation and therefore to be attracted hither. Since European immigration, especially from Latin countries, is giving such good results, it follows that there is neither opportuneness nor sense nor judgment in opening the channels to another current, or rather to a torrent of immigration made up of another and exotic race, the yellow race, which has already made bad blood and occasioned brawls in other American countries.

It is all very well for organic law to offer refuge, bread and employment to all, but it is neither reasonable nor patriotic to compromise the most sacred interests of the country by applying those fundamental principles indiscriminately. The abstract and idealistic principles of the fathers of the country are tacitly limited and controlled by the rules of prudence and discretion, and chiefly by the laws of self-defense and national safety which are above every requirement and every other consideration.

Methodist Preachers

Some gems from the proceedings of the Philadelphia and Central Pennsylvania Methodist Episcopal Conferences' meeting at Reading and York, Pa., a fortnight ago, sparkle with interest. Bishop Joseph T. Berry, of Buffalo, an official visitor, made the astonishing remark, during an address on "More Evangelistic Fire Demanded," that while the mighty denomination raised $49,000,000 during 1910, the increase in membership was only 65,000. "The investment was entirely in disproportion to the results," he said. "Too much money was spent for such a meagre return in souls.

"While I was informed that the reports of your district superintendents exhibited a substantial increase, the general gain amounted on the average to only two members a church. On the basis of expenditure it cost nearly $754 to bring each soul into the fold. Now what was the trouble? I believe in telling the plain truth. There is a waning of evangelistic fire in the hearts of our ministers. Money is placed above salvation. It is money, money, money!"

Evangelistic fire may be a necessary article for "the feet of them that preach the Gospel," as interpreted by John Wesley, but money is an equal necessity for the ministerial baggage, to provide for the family, for the larger social organization, for the clerks and secretaries, for the printing and circulation of Bibles and tracts and the general upkeep of ecclesiastical machinery. If 65,000 souls have been redeemed by an outlay of $49,000,000, the price is not excessive. A corner lot on Fifth avenue, New York, was sold the other day for $500,000. Another was exchanged for property valued at $2,000,000. Is it not written in the Protestant Bible: "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" The saving of sixty-five thousand souls is cheap at any price. In this instance, the generous Methodist laity take a higher spiritual view of material things than does the man they have called to be their bishop.

The Rev. David G. Downey, D.D., corresponding secretary of the Sunday School Board, deplored that "the Methodist Church is barely holding its own in some places and in other places is simply marking time." But "marking time" is an excellent condition for militant Christians when not engaged in a hand-to-hand conflict with the enemy; it speaks well for discipline even when the "marking time" is a preliminary movement to an orderly retreat. With the Rev. Corresponding Secretary, however, "marking time" appears to have a more sinister meaning, for he adds: "The Church," the Methodist, of course, "is attempting to do its duty with the implements of yesterday." No "evangelistic fire" for him, for that he would clearly class among such antiquated implements. He tells us that "of the total gains made by the Church and its membership, the Sunday Schools have made up the deficit from other sources and caused the increase that now exists;" that is, Bishop Berry's 65,000.

It would be interesting to know how many of these Sunday School children are made up of the children of Italian immigrants, and how much of the $49,000,000 has been expended in the unchristian work of weaning the little ones from the faith of their parents. Superintendent F. B. Lynch, speaking of mission work among Italians, said, that these people seemed to shun mission buildings, being accustomed to worship in fine cathedrals in their own country. As far as Philadelphia is concerned, Superintendent Lynch's difficulty was met by a minister of the Mission and Church Extension Society, who said that Philadelphia had provided a mission Cathedral in St. Paul's Church. Superintendent Wilson made a stirring address on the South Philadelphia situation, including the Italian missions there. "We must settle this question," he said, "and this conference must say to these men: 'You are backed by financial assistance.'"

So Bishop Berry is right. Evangelistic fire has been extinguished. "It is money, money, money!" When will the preacher-ridden Methodist laity open their eyes?

What's What in Pictures?

The admission of clever picture imitators and restorers in the trial now in process in this city will breed a skeptical spirit everywhere in regard to so-called genuine masterpieces. The correct way in future to speak about one's high-priced paintings is: this was sold to me as a Corot; that is said to be by Millet. To the inquiry, "who painted this," and "who painted that," the invariable answer of a venerable connoisseur of our acquaintance was "John Smith." He valued his paintings for their intrinsic worth. Many good artists have painted poor pictures, copies of their best have been sold as originals, and the superficial observer is always more impressed by the name of a master than by the real merits of the masterpiece.

Schools and Schoolchildren

The kindergarten, its enthusiastic advocates were sure, was to be of great help in bringing about the early development of the child and the storing it with information easily acquired, and the making of the road to education pleasant. Most pleasant roads run downwards, and apparently that of the kindergarten is no exception to this rule. An accepted authority in the matter wrote lately: "It is said that a recent census in New York, which for some inexplicable reason is withheld from publication, shows that children who have been to kindergarten are outranked at the end of the school period by those who have not been." The public could have learned this from many practical teachers a good while ago. Almost any experienced teacher is ready to state that it takes at least one year after the kindergarten to make children, used to its easy-going methods, understand that they do not come to school to be amused, but to do some work for themselves. Hence, children directly from the streets are, as a rule, much more satisfactory pupils.

We learn from the same authority that "a comprehensive British census, made in London, Glasgow and Edinburgh, showed that children who entered school a year later than the legal age graduated in advance of those who entered earlier." Professor Cattell, of the Department of Psychology at Columbia University, in reviewing our educational methods two years ago, declared that children between six and eight now acquire, with a good deal of trouble to themselves and their teachers, a certain amount of information that they would acquire with very little trouble if we waited until they were a year or two older and did not attempt to hurry their intellectual development. This question of the pushing of young children is rendered all the more interesting by the facts that have been gathered by Mr. Leonard P. Ayres who, working under the Sage Foundation, has recently published a valuable educational study with the title "Laggards in Our Schools." He confirms, what has been noted very frequently in certain cities, that a large percentage of our school children are above the normal age for the grade in which they are. Mr. Ayres has looked into the schools of twenty-five cities and finds in none the average child doing its eight grades in eight years. In most places it required ten years, in Erie, Pa., twelve and a half years. Pushing children intellectually is not likely to have good results.

Every now and then, when some non-Catholic millionaire makes a big gift to charity or philanthropy, some Pecksniff descants on Catholic parsimony, ignoring entirely the immense sums that are piled up in small doles for our schools, institutions and churches. Brooklyn affords another striking instance of this ill-founded position. When Bishop-Auxiliary Mundelein was consecrated last September he took as his charge St. John's chapel, one of the smallest parishes in the Borough. It has about 3,500 souls within its limits. The chapel accommodates less than 400 people and is most inconvenient for those attending service there. Bishop Mundelein told his people in taking charge that if they would co-operate with him he would erect a new church and school for the parish within two years, and having prepared suitable plans asked the congregation to subscribe to the building fund. The collection was taken up on Palm Sunday and amounted to $47,801. This is the largest single collection ever taken up in a New York parish, and is certainly a flattering evidence of the esteem in which Bishop Mundelein is held by the people of his parish.

A number of priests some time ago organized a society especially to look after their fellow Catholics from Belgium and Holland who are scattered over this country. Several members of the hierarchy in the West have given their sanction to a program this organization has outlined to make its operations take the direction of a national Catholic colonization Society, as urged at the National Farm and Land Congress held in Chicago in November, 1909. What can be done by practical effort for this purpose is shown by the sturdy and most desirable colony of Catholics from Holland who landed here recently en route to a previously chosen location in Minnesota.

From statistics recently published by the Japanese Government, we gather that during the Russo-Japanese war Russia mobilized 1,375,000 troops and Japan 1,200,000. During the first campaign 590,000 Russians and 540,000 Japanese took an active part. The immense loss to industry, caused by the temporary withdrawal of 2,575,000 men from peaceful pursuits, not to speak of the slain, the maimed and the permanently incapacitated, may well make for the preservation of European peace and recourse to diplomatic understandings.

LITERATURE

Mental Suggestion. By DR. J. OCHOROWICZ, Sometime Professor Extraordinary of Psychology and Nature Philosophy in the University of Lemberg. Translated from the French by J. Fitzgerald, M.A. New York: Twentieth Century Publishing Co. $2.00.

Hypnotism: Its History and Present Development. By FREDRIK BJÖRNSTRÖM, M.D., Head Physician of the Stockholm Hospital, etc. Translated from the Second Swedish Edition by Baron Nils Posse, M.G. New York: Twentieth Century Publishing Co. 50 cents.

Though both of these works appeared in the original some twenty-three or twenty-four years ago, they are fairly well abreast of the present-day knowledge of hypnotism and hypnotic suggestion. They contain the usual collection of countless wonderful occurrences, the witnesses in most instances being men of more or less scientific standing. Whilst in no way questioning the learning or good faith of these witnesses, still we must be on our guard against an over-confiding acceptance of all they say. There is a great deal of humbuggy practiced under the cloak of hypnotism and hypnotic suggestion, and many unadulterated deceptions have been swallowed by careful, well-minded scientific investigators of the occult. There is another danger also, that arises from the prejudice, sometimes unconscious, of witnesses who do not believe in the miraculous, and who, on that account, are apt to admit as facts explainable by natural occult forces many things which are not facts at all.

For example, Bernheim and Liégeois, names found in every book on hypnotism, are referred to frequently by both authors. Yet Prof. Bertrin, of the Paris Catholic Institute, in his remarkable book on Lourdes ("Lourdes, A History of its Apparitions and Cures," Authorized Translation by Mrs. Gibbs. New York: Benziger Bros.) does not hesitate to write of them as follows:—"On the occasion of a long dissertation by M. Liégeois, M. Frank said before the Academy of Moral and Political Science:—'I do not attempt to deny the existence of hypnotic phenomena; I only say that those presented by M. Liégeois have no warrant of certainty. M. Liégeois is not the only one whose observations have been severely criticised. In a famous lawsuit at the Paris Court of Assizes, the head of the Medical Faculty, M. Brouardel, poured scorn on the theories of the Nancy professors, who are known as the most advanced hypnotizers in France. 'It seems,' said the great man smiling, 'that these things happen at Nancy, but not in Paris. A well-known upholder of psychotherapy said to me in the Lourdes Medical Office before a score of doctors: 'Bernheim's experiments were badly made. I do not attach any importance to them.' And Bernheim is at this very moment the head of the Nancy school!'"

However, whilst allowing a liberal margin for unconscious prejudice and deception, we must admit as substantially true many of the extraordinary occurrences attributed to hypnotism and especially to hypnotic suggestion. But can hypnotism explain them all? Conservative Catholic writers say "No." Both of our authors answer in the affirmative, and one of them, Professor Ochorowicz, after rejecting all other theories as untenable, advances one of his own. Some points in this theory are plausible enough, but as a whole it must be rejected by Catholic scientists, if for no other reason than this, that it solves all difficulties on the basis of a purely materialistic philosophy.

What is worse still, both of these authors, if not explicitly at least by implication, show a decided inclination to explain away the miraculous. This tendency is quite general in non-Catholic writers on these subjects, and is seen at its worst in Hudson's "Law of Psychic Phenomena," in which book many of the wonderful miracles of Christ are blasphemously pronounced to have been merely the effect of strong hypnotic suggestion.

The cool assurance with which writers such as this last lightly and passingly relegate miracles to the region of myth, and Christ to the level of a base impostor, is only equalled by the dense ignorance they show of a broad and deep knowledge of the philosophy of God's world. On the other hand Catholics should be mindful not to go to the opposite extreme, insisting on the miraculous where there is no miracle, or, at least, where there is no certain proof of a miracle. This course of action is very harmful to the cause of truth, as it gives our enemies a legitimate excuse for attacking us.

Mindful of this point Catholic scientists are only too willing to admit the beneficial remedial effects obtained through hypnotism principally in cases of functional nervous disorders and of some vicious habits. But they insist, and rightly so, that its curative power is extremely limited, and is to be called into play only by a competent medical practitioner of high moral character. And this brings us to the consideration of one of the most important phases of hypnotic phenomena, namely, the terrible control that the hypnotizer gains over the personality of those who frequently, or even in some cases, once submit fully to its power. We have no intention of dwelling on the reasons of such control; but the fact remains, and the dread possibilities of evil both physical and moral that may follow from even a frivolous tampering with hypnotism are only too well known to many of its ruined victims.

On this point Prof. Björnström insists most strongly. The preface to his book opens with a grave warning against meddling with this mysterious force; the same warning is repeated again and again as his work develops; a whole chapter finally continues in the same strain, and his last words to the public are: "From all this we find that hypnotism is not to be trifled with; that it can harm in various ways, and that it requires all the skill and conscientiousness of an experienced physician to properly use this powerful agency." In a previous chapter he had written: "There is such an infernal power in the hands of the hypnotizer that every one ought to be strictly forbidden to meddle with hypnotism except those who assume the responsibilities of a physician, and who have the people's welfare and woe in their hands."

This warning, necessary twenty years ago, is to-day even more necessary. For reading so much in the daily papers and magazines of spiritism and hypnotism and Emmanuel movements and faith-cures, it is not unlikely that many may be led, either through curiosity or the desire of regaining health, to consult some of the many quacks or disreputable physicians given to the use of hypnotic suggestion. Such a course is simply playing with fire, and those that embark in it are exposing themselves to the gravest dangers both to body and soul.

W. J. BROSNAN, S.J.

The Approach to the Social Question, by FRANCIS GREENWOOD PEABODY, Plummer Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University. Macmillan Company. 1909. $1.50 net.

This latest work of Prof. F. G. Peabody deserves the highest commendation for beauty and perfection of style. But it is impossible to bestow praise on it as a treatise on the social problem. The author points out moral idealism as the true approach to the social question. Moral idealism as conceived by him, is obedience to the absolute command of duty. This obedience he considers not as resulting from the enlightenment of reason, but from the weight which the categorical command directly exercises on the will. But though blind and instinctive in itself, it leads to insight and vision.

As morality, according to the author, is essentially social and built upon a social basis, moral idealism is heroic surrender to social service. For this reason it perfectly coincides with social idealism and social heroism. Hence, "the Social question is not a fragment of modern morality, but a summary of it; not an eddy in the stream of modern goodness, but the main current in which goodness flows." Morality, likewise, in the author's opinion, coincides with religion. For religion, which fits the present age, is social. "Emotions which once uttered themselves in prayer, conversion and oral pledges, are now uttering themselves in philanthropy, social service, and industrial reform."

Christianity, too, is nowadays regarded not as individual, but as social redemption. But if religion coincides with morality, because it is essentially social service, it coincides also with social reformation and reconstruction—the social question. The two are "not competitors or alternatives, but successive experiences, logical steps in the education of the human race." Religion is the spiritualization of the social question, and the latter is the socialization of the religious life.

From a Catholic or even a Christian point of view the philosophical speculations of the learned author are not admissible. Moral heroism or idealism, to solve the social question, must be universal, among both capitalists and laborers, among the rich and the poor.

But the universality of heroism, if we consider human nature, is an impossibility. The author is of the opinion that it will be the necessary outcome of human evolution, and that it is already foreshadowed in the present social phenomena. But who can prognosticate its advent from the present class struggle, or who will maintain that, while in all preceding periods egoism and prudentialism were ruling, in the twentieth century heroic self-surrender to social service begins to prevail? And if, in general, moral heroism is not likely to become universal, moral idealism which consists in blind obedience to a categorical imperative, and which does not proceed from reason and insight, is not only improbable as a universal fact, but is a psychological impossibility, an absurdity.

We likewise object to the assertion that morality is essentially social and rests only on a moral basis; for it comprises duties not only to others and to society, but also to self and to God, in such a way that to the duties regarding God all others are subordinate. Still more decidedly must we protest against the modern view that true religion must be socialized, that is, must consist in social service, and that Christianity must be conceived not as individual, but as social redemption. Religion is primarily the subordination of man to God. Christianity, if it imposes only social duties and brings only social redemption, gives up faith and assent to divine revelation, divine worship and sacraments, and disowns the entire supernatural order, so as to become, like the Socialistic Kingdom of God, but earthly and temporal.

Captain Ted, by MARY T. WAGGAMAN. (New York: Ben-ziger Bros.) is a book full of life and exciting adventures which appeal to boys' healthy fancy. Since even girls admire noble, manly boys, they too will follow with deep interest the fortunes of the young hero who gives his name to the book. False friends, green goods men and ghosts try the mettle of Captain Ted, who comes out victorious in the end.

The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, compiled and Edited with Notes, by JOHN BIGELOW. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

This edition, differing in many particulars from the current issues, has the merit of following strictly Franklin's own manuscript. His religious views, which were reducible to belief in God's Providence and man's accountability, seem to have been founded on the mistaken notion that what is not understood in its entirety is necessarily doubtful, as if, forsooth, even the brightest human intellect could be the measure of all truth. His disgust with his pastor, whose sermons on election, reprobation and similar Calvinistic tenets seemed to aim at "making the hearers Presbyterians rather than good citizens and inculcated not a single moral principle" may have occasioned his slipping off the anxious seat. He was most happy in suggesting to one preacher a means of securing attendance at services (p. 283), for it was adopted with great success. At the end of the devotions each one present got a gill of rum! Some of his views on the thirteen virtues (p. 190) are, perhaps, traceable to certain erroneous medical notions which had some vogue at that time. The important part which he took in the public affairs of Pennsylvania includes everything from schools to war with the Indians.

The Fruits of the Devotion to the Sacred Heart, by REV. WILLIAM GRAHAM. New York: Joseph F. Wagner. Price 75 cents.

Conscientious preparation for the due observance of the First Friday will be facilitated by this series of twelve sermons. Full of practical suggestiveness themselves, each is followed by references to other standard works on the subject. If we were to express a preference, it would be for the sixth sermon on the Sacred Heart in the State, although, on second thought, the ninth sermon on the Sacred Heart in the Race might be put at the head of the list. The need of practising religious theory can hardly be insisted upon too strongly. The binding will not withstand much rough usage.

Under the Ban, by C. M. HOME. London: Catholic Truth Society, 69 Southwark Bridge Road, S. E. Price 1s. 6d.

This is a story of the times of England's cruel and irreligious king, John Lackland. Full of knightly deeds and with a flavor of holy sentiment, it gives, along with a stirring tale, a glimpse of English manners and customs as they were seven centuries ago. A slight slip on page 177 gives "Pope John XXIII" credit for what he did not do. Maidens will sympathize with little Petronel, and boys will follow with lively interest the fortunes of the brave men of the lance and shield.

Reviews and Magazines

Philip Hanson contributes the third of his remarkable articles on the problem of Unemployment to the New Ireland Review. He shows that the Labor Exchange system which was adjusted to the needs of English cities, will not suit Dublin or other Irish towns with the possible exception of Belfast. He suggests that besides drafting superfluous laborers elsewhere or putting them in training colonies, the municipalities should abolish bad tenement houses, prevent overcrowding, extend the school period by a course of practical training and retain control of the pupils till they have found a desirable occupation. Rev. G. O'Neill, S.J., gives a very useful review of "The Cross-Roads," a play that is alleged to be an integral part if not a "dynamic factor" in the Irish Literary Revival. In demonstrating that it tends to kill rather than revive sentiment and hope, Father O'Neill lays down some sound directive principles which no good dramatist may ignore. More needful even than unity of action is unity of Impression—"Some one sentiment, idea, view of life educed, fortified and glorified, out of the welter of passions and tangle of events which is life." The lack of it makes even "Wallenstein" a failure, for Schiller, "being too Protestant to side with the Catholic Empire, too rational to glorify the star-guided rebel, finds and leaves us cold." An article by Maude Joynt, M.A., proves that there are more solid workers in the Revival Movement than the author of Cross-Roads. She shows that Ireland had a lexicographer as early as the ninth century in the person of Cormac MacCullenan, King of Munster and Archbishop of Cashel, whose Sanas, an elaborate etymological dictionary, is preserved in the Royal Irish Academy. Hence, "to Ireland belongs the honor among European countries within the Christian era of having produced the first dictionary in the native tongue." Arthur Synan has an excellent and well-deserved eulogy of Dr. McCaffrey's "The Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century."

The Irish Ecclesiastical Record opens with an interesting account, pathetic in its historic significance, of St. Patrick's College, Antwerp, founded in 1629 by an Irish priest to provide for the succession of secular clergy in Ireland, and maintained under Irish management down to the French occupation of Flanders in 1795. It was one of the many institutions by which Irish priests, generously aided on the Continent, kept up the continuity of the priesthood in every diocese of Ireland for two centuries in spite of drastic prohibitive laws. It is a touching story of enduring heroism. Father Conry, writing from Rome, gives a graphic historical picture of St. Peter, his labors, joys and sorrows from Gennesareth to Rome, his martyrdom and final entombment. Dr. McDonald continues his friendly controversy with Dr. Coffey on the Philosophy of Energy in which he takes issue with the neo-scholastics of Louvain, who maintain that a dynamic factor, really distinct from local motion or kinetic energy, is required for the production of an effect. Philosophic readers of the old school will enjoy the predicament in which he places the modernizers, and endorse his statement that "the greatest bane of modern philosophy is that, instead of making use of plain words such as 'pass,' they have recourse to Influence, Dependence, Relation, Education, Production, Illumination, not to mention the vagaries that have come in with the Absolute, Relative, Transcendental, Analytic, Synthetic, Phenomena, Noumena and their congeners." Dr. Hogan's first instalment of a series on Modern Socialism shows that it is in its origin and nature fundamentally materialistic if not positively atheistic. His statement of the Socialist position and of the grievances of the proletariat under modern conditions is impartial and adequate. A Latin ode pays tribute in good Horatian verse to Ireland's apostle.

The Hispanic Society of America has made a happy selection of matter for No. 58 of its Revue Hispanique. A Hispano-Arabic charter of the year 1312, a summary of the feats of El Cid dating from 1498, and some letters of Spanish savants of the sixteenth century bring us to a delightful sketch of a trip through Spain in 1603-1604. The tourist, M. Barthelemy Joly, a Frenchman who describes himself as "counselor and almoner of the king," sets out from Paris on Sept. 22, 1603, in company with the Abbot General of the Cistercians, who is to make a visitation of the Spanish abbeys of his order. Our counselor, who may have been the first "Cookie," the forerunner of hordes of sightseers, carefully traces the journey and jots down every detail that may be helpful to those who follow him. The lay of the country, the roads, the inns, the people with their customs and table manners, the cities, the public buildings, the churches with their treasures, all are passed in review. The description of the visit to the monks and hermits of Montserrat is particularly pleasing. It is patent that the writer is not unalterably predisposed to view the Spanish nation too favorably. So graphic is his quaint description of the haps and mishaps of the journey that we share with the gallant cavalier the pleasures and hardships of his tour.

The Irish Monthly devotes nearly a third of its March number to Sir Samuel Ferguson, whose centenary received fitting celebration in Belfast and Dublin last week. A sympathetic and discriminating appreciation of Ferguson's poetry by the late Hon. Roden Noel is reproduced with an introduction by Emily Hickey. A profound Gaelic scholar and antiquarian, Ferguson was one of the first to introduce to English-speaking readers the epic cycles of ancient Ireland. "Deirdra's Lament," "The Tain Quest," "Congal" and "The Lays of the Western Gael" reproduce the woof and spirit, if not the complex elaboration of verse-technique, of the Irish Bards. "His learned researches led him, a bard of olden time reincarnate, into long silent and deserted halls, into the very presence chamber of the Irish genius, built, like the walls of Ilion, to the sound of song; whereunto he linked new song chambers akin to those enchanted labyrinths of the past." Ferguson was the poet pioneer of the Irish Literary Revival, and his services are being now acknowledged a quarter of a century after his death, but Father Russell can proudly claim that the Irish Monthly paid him due honor while he still lived in two masterly essays by Judge O'Hagan, in Volume XII, 1884. Miss Hickey contributes a fine poem in praise of Ferguson, and Jessie Tulloch gives interesting recollections of John O'Leary, as kingly and almost as pagan as his royal namesake whom St. Patrick failed to convert. There are many other good things, but one fatal omission—the Irish Monthly of March has not a word, good, bad or indifferent, about St. Patrick.

A sketch in the Irish Ecclesiastical Record reminds us that Catholics are often slow to follow the counsel of Ecclesiasticus: "Let us now praise famous men." How few know that John Walker, the greatest English lexicographer of his day, was an exemplary and zealous Catholic? Born in England 1732, the son of a non-conformist parson and brought up in anti-Catholic surroundings while the penal laws were still vigorously enforced, the light of Faith came to him while he was making a reputation as an actor. So famous was he that Garrick wrote a play for him in 1757, and the following year he went to Dublin, then a mecca for theatrical celebrities, whither he frequently returned. It was there he found the Faith, like Campion before him. Influenced by a Belfast merchant named Usher, who relinquished a prosperous business to become a Catholic and a priest, he not only became a Catholic, but renounced the stage for conscientious reasons, "considering how difficult it was to attend to his religious duties in a life of so much dissipation." He became an assistant teacher in a Catholic school which Father Usher opened in London, and published, 1770, in Usher's "Free Enquiry," what Bishop Milner calls "the first work that openly defended Catholics." He delivered lectures on elocution throughout England, Ireland and Scotland with great success to the end of the century, and in the meantime published his "Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language," "Rhyming Dictionary," "A Rhetorical Grammar" and "The Melody of Speaking Delineated," a most original work, which has since had numerous imitators, as is indicated by its sub-title: "Elocution taught like Music adapted by Visible Signs to the Tones, Variations and Inflections of the Voice in Reading and Speaking."

When the "Royal College of St. Patrick" was established at Maynooth in 1794, Mr. Walker was appointed Professor of English Eloquence on the recommendation of Edmund Burke. Resigning in 1797 to give complete attention to a new edition of his Dictionary, which had attained extraordinary popularity, he continued to publish works on Grammar, Elocution and Rhetoric, and in spite of his unpopular religion, of which he was always a good exemplar and resolute champion, he amassed a goodly competence. He died in 1807 and was buried in the cemetery of St. Pancras. He was one of the long and distinguished line of literary Englishmen who, renouncing error, made open profession of the Faith in the dark days of persecution or proscription. Dr. Grattan Flood justly asserts Ireland's claim to him as a convert through Irish influence, and a member of the first professorial staff of the National College of Maynooth.

Literary Notes

The following paragraph from the English Bookman contains interesting information concerning an unusually voluminous and successful Catholic writer: "There are nearly two hundred volumes of biographies, novels, essays, travels and miscellaneous literature standing already to Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's credit in the British Museum catalogues, and he has just added to them a biography of Samuel Foote. He enjoys the distinction of having both written a Life of Boswell and made the bronze statue of him that was set up at Lichfield a little while ago, and he has just completed a statue of Dr. Johnson, whose Life he has edited three times. Amongst other work as a sculptor, he made the sitting figure of Sterne, now in the York Cathedral Library; busts of Dickens that have been erected in Boulogne Town Hall, Bath Pump Room, Rochester Museum, and on the site of old Furnival's Inn; a tablet to Cardinal Manning; a tablet to Goldsmith that is to be seen in Brick Court, Temple; and the Memorial to Irving that has been placed in the hall of the Lyceum Theatre." When in addition to all this we remember that, on leaving Stonyhurst, Mr. Fitzgerald studied law and was called to the Irish bar, we are quite ready to pay him the tribute of our respectful amazement for his versatility and industry.

Esperanto, which seems to enjoy at present greater popularity than any other made-to-order vehicle for international communication, has built up a library of choice selections from European and American authors of note. Among the names occur those of Dickens, Hawthorne, Poe, Shakespeare, Chateaubriand, Cervantes, Fray Luis de Leon and Schiller. Rustiñol's "Leaves of Life" (Folios de la Vivo) is the latest acquisition.

The first Congress of Catholic Esperantists will be held in Paris, from March 30 to April 30. The Congress has the approval of Archbishop Amette besides the patronage of Mgr. Baudillart, the Rector of the Catholic University. The meetings will take place in the convention hall of the Catholic Institute.

It is announced in the English press that Mr. Everard Meynell is preparing an authoritative biography of Francis Thompson.

EDUCATION

A serious problem for university authorities is how to test the mental ability and the scholastic accomplishments of those who would enter a course leading to one of the learned degrees. Commonly enough of late years the "Credit System" has been followed. Admittance to a university is assured to the student who presents a certificate of sufficient credit points for work done in an approved secondary school. Educators are beginning to question whether this "Credit System" merits unqualified approbation. As President Butler in his last annual report to the trustees of Columbia University declares: "It is vitally important to be on our guard against the mechanical, the bookkeeping and accounting element in education. Nothing is easier than to permit students and teachers alike to gain an impression that before attaining a degree or an academic honor one has only to complete so many subjects, to attend so many hours, or to win so many points." The danger in the "Credit System" is that a mere time limit may take the place of the mental ability and scholarly preparedness which ought to form the real test of a candidate for university work.

In The Creighton Chronicle, a review emanating from the Creighton University of Omaha, Rev. William Dooley, S.J., Dean of the Department of Arts, offers a suggestion to meet the growing objection to the system. "Results might become more satisfactory," he says, "if the 'Credit System' and the Entrance Examination System were simultaneously employed. Let universities admit to examination those only who bring certificates from approved schools. Furthermore, let the approval or 'accreditation' of schools largely depend on the standing of their students in the university examinations. In this way school spirit and local pride might be aroused and become strong factors in sending to universities young men and women prepared to follow with profit and success a university course, and fitted to be brought to the crowning consummation of advanced scholastic endeavor, which is knowledge—deep, broad and comprehensive."

A new phase has made itself evident in recent controversy regarding the attitude of many of our colleges and universities towards religion and religious training. The charges made by a distinguished Catholic prelate in June last were met first by sweeping denials, but when categorical statements of the doctrines, commonly taught by professors of repute in the schools concerned, were alleged in proof of the contentions of Bishop McFaul and his numerous supporters, a change of defense was seen to be necessary for the institutions coming under his condemnation. "The college man of to-day has less religion, but is more religious than the college man of forty years ago," is the response of President Thwing of Western Reserve University. "Certain changes in the form of the college men's religions have led outside observers to believe it is dying out. But the religion of the modern college student, while less noisy and emotional, is more effective and practical than that of forty years ago." President Thwing bolsters up his new defense with the statistical evidence he has collected to prove the altruism of college students who "seek to help each other into the best life." The answer is a notable example of the loose reasoning which is due precisely to the decadence of the genuine religious atmosphere in the modern American school. The charges made by Bishop McFaul imply a lapse from true Christian teaching and a tendency to theistic and agnostic standards in many American colleges. To meet the charges satisfactorily it is not sufficient to insist upon praiseworthy ethical standards among college men and moral rectitude of the limited kind that balks at drunkenness and other external delinquencies. Such standards argue but a strength of natural religion far below and different from the Christian life the Catholic Prelate contends for. Christianity implies fixed intellectual and moral principles. Its radical base is the belief in a personal God and an unfaltering acceptance of the divinity of Christ with all the consequent obligations growing out of this belief, binding the will of the individual to a definite course of moral conduct. Until the defenders of the "up-to-date" American school will have shown that the spirit born of this faith is not a stranger to the teachings of the professors in these schools, the pleasant picture of a helpful altruism in which "their students give silent cheer to each other in the upward progress" will in no wise satisfy the demand that our youth be trained in Christian principles and formed in the practice of Christian lives.

The cordial manner in which the Princeton Alumni Association of Long Island welcomed President Woodrow Wilson at a smoker in the University Club in Brooklyn last week did much to clear his plans for the development of Princeton University. The stand taken by Princeton of late years against the inorganic growth of American universities during the last two generations, through "mere miscellaneous, unsympathetic additions to their course of study," appeals widely to educators and shows that its President is in perfect accord with the graduate council of his school. In his address to the alumni President Wilson explained the experiment which he has inaugurated as a reconstruction of Princeton from top to bottom, not because of past faults, but because the university world demands a new example of university life. The growth of the American university up to the present has been, he affirmed, too strongly influenced by German universities. That influence has not been for good because of the different conditions prevailing here. While the German universities, with their functions confined to technical and professional instruction, have no body of students going through the early stages of initiation into the great subjects of study, the American universities have grown up around colleges, so that "a really organic development on their part is impossible unless college and university be integrated in some way that will make them parts of an organic whole." Because the American college has been so great a factor in the enrichment of American life, President Wilson argued, it must not be abandoned but must be made the vital part of the university. To effect this integration is the scope of the present experiment going on in Princeton, and he hoped that the experiment might not be embarrassed or thrust aside owing to lack of harmony among those whose influence in any way counted in the work. To work it out successfully, President Wilson explained, was the reason of the changes he advocated: "the reorganization of the course of study with the establishment of the preceptorial system, in order to bring the students into close association with their instructors; and a reorganization of the social life of the undergraduates which should draw them into little communities in which they would be daily associated in a natural and intimate way with each other and with the older men who are the guides of the university." The scheme is no new one, and the experience of the broad cultural efficiency of somewhat similar plans long in vogue in the great English schools justifies approval of President Wilson's project. The benefit of the plan, if fairly tried, will surely be, as Princeton's President affirms, "to make intelligent, perceiving men of the undergraduates and of the graduates exact scholars, who have not ceased to be genial and comprehending men."

Recently, the new St. Joseph's College of Muskogee, Oklahoma, was formally blessed by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Theophile Meerschaert. It is under the management of the Brothers of the Sacred Heart. Founded at Lyons, France in 1821, by the Abbé Coindre, the Congregation of the Brothers of the Sacred Heart soon spread over the southern part of France.

In 1847, five Brothers departed for the United States to take charge of an orphan asylum at Mobile, Ala. At the present day the congregation possesses houses in France, the United States, Canada, Belgium and Spain. In the Novitiate at Metuchen, N. J., more than forty young men are preparing themselves for the noble mission of becoming Christian teachers; of inspiring by word and example, the love of virtue in the hearts of God's little ones.

SOCIOLOGY

We have taken occasion from time to time to call attention to the work of the Conferences of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in this and other cities. The last St. Vincent de Paul Quarterly is of special interest, since it contains in addition to full accounts of the Golden Jubilee of the Society in New Orleans and of the annual meeting of the New York Society most interesting reports from other centres, and also of general charity work in which, though not under its own auspices, the Society is interested. We read in it of the summer outings given last year to 1,108 children by the Philadelphia Society, and the work both general and particular of the New York Conferences which we have already described. The reports by the probation officers of their successful efforts on behalf of paroled prisoners, of minors especially, are particularly gratifying, as also are those of the visiting committees in the public institutions of the city. These committees are most faithful in their charitable work devoting their Sundays to visiting the hospitals, the prisons and the Islands, teaching Sunday-school and looking after the temporal and spiritual wants of the sick and the prisoners. We cannot commend too earnestly this noble organization. Its work is Christian and supernatural and therefore of the highest efficiency.

The Borstal Association for the reformation of young criminals in England reports that during the last official year, 265 youths between sixteen and twenty-one years of age were subjected to its reformatory discipline. Of these, 157 are known to be doing well, 20 are believed to be doing well, 18 have been lost sight of, 29 are unsatisfactory, 41 have been convicted and 17 are still under discipline. It aims at correcting faults which arise from bad homes, street-corner loafing and others' neglect. The success of its methods has been so marked that Parliament has given discretionary powers to judges by which they may commit to a Borstal Institution instead of to penal servitude young offenders who have been convicted on indictment. It handles young criminals and not boys guilty merely of petty misdemeanors.

The Cremation Society of England confesses itself disappointed at the little progress it is making. Last year the cremations in England numbered 685, an increase of only 8 per cent on those of the preceding year. In Germany the number is four times as great, while in France 94,000 have been cremated in 20 years. At the annual meeting just held the President found this discouraging; still, he added, as the Society is not working for dividends but for a great ideal, it will not close its crematory at Woking.

Dr. Durand, Director of the Census, judges that this will show a population of about 90,000,000. It will show, he thinks, a decline in the average number of the family, which he holds is to be attributed to the growing desire for comforts and luxuries.

President Diaz, through the Secretary of Government, has sent to all the state and territorial governors a circular letter directing their attention to "the alarming increase of leprosy," and calling on them for statistics of lepers and lazarettos, and for suggestions towards combating the disease.

ECONOMICS

A generation ago, lobsters were so plentiful that they were within the reach even of rather slim purses, but the recklessness and improvidence of those engaged in supplying the market have so lessened the visible supply that the toothsome crustacean seemed threatened with extinction. When recourse was had to artificial propagation, the difficulties at first seemed well-nigh insurmountable. It was easy to obtain the eggs, it was easy to hatch them, but there all easiness vanished, for the young lobster displayed cannibalistic tendencies and thrived at the expense of his mates. A method of successful lobster culture has been perfected by A. D. Mead, Ph.D., of the Rhode Island Commission of Inland Fisheries, which has proved to be commercially practicable. The female produces as many as 20,000 eggs, but for three weeks after hatching, the lobsterlings are so helpless that few survive. From the egg to the form of the mature lobster there are four stages, with three sheddings of the outer integument. During the first three stages the young swim about in an aimless haphazard way. If by accident they lodge on the bottom, they are quite helpless for they cannot crawl, and must kick themselves loose or perish where they are. Prof. Mead's method follows as closely as possible the natural way. Tanks ten feet square with openings covered with wire mesh are sustained by rafts which are moored in a sheltered cove. To prevent the young from sinking to the floor and perishing or from preying too freely upon one another, each tank is provided with propeller blades by which a gentle upward current is continuously maintained. Boiled beef finely ground and beaten up in water with an egg-beater gave satisfaction as a diet, although clams, liver and other rations were tried. Feeding takes place every two hours, night and day. About 40% of the young fry can be safely carried through to the stage when they can be liberated and join in the struggle for existence. Although built as an experiment, the plant raised 322,672 lobsterlings to the viable age in 1908; but its chief merit is that it has shown that the work can be made a commercial success. Instead of joining the dodo, the lobster will remain.

The decline of exports and increase of imports still continues. During February, 1910, imports were 238 millions in value: in the corresponding month of 1909 they were 220 millions. The exports in February, 1909, were valued at 234 millions, while in February, 1910, they had fallen to 230 millions. These facts are worthy of the consideration of economists, the more so as our whole economic condition seems to be changing.

AMERICA has already suggested as one probable cause of the rise of the price of food, the increase of urban consuming populations without a corresponding increase of rural producers. The Bureau of Statistics confirms our view. It tells that the population of the United States has increased 12,000,000 in the last ten years, while the available food animals have decreased by 5,000,000. Their number has therefore diminished by 3 per cent while their value has gone up 22 per cent. The same causes explain to some degree the rise of value in grain and other such produce.

The department of agriculture, commerce and manufacturers in Mexico has undertaken to revive and extend an industry which was flourishing at the time of the Conquest four centuries ago, but which has largely fallen into decay. In the days of the Aztec rulers honey was very abundant and highly esteemed even on the tables of the great. The department, whose particular aim is to develop apiculture, will send specialists to the various states of the republic who will explain the latest scientific methods of apiculture for increasing the output. It expects to open up a very wide field for this industry which demands so small an initial outlay, for favorable conditions exist in every state and territory.

SCIENCE

In AMERICA, of March 12, it was stated that Pidoux, of Geneva, Switzerland, had found a comet close to Halley's. In a letter to the Astronomische Nachrichten No. 4392, he gives some details concerning his discovery, and says that on February 20 he was obliged, on account of gradual increasing cloudiness, to limit the time of exposure of a photographic plate upon Halley's comet to fifteen minutes, and that in developing it he found upon it a V-Shaped nebulous object very much brighter than the comet. Before he could verify his discovery by a second plate, he read in the Journal de Genève the information taken from the Standard that a new comet had been found in Cardiff, Wales. The location and appearance of both bodies seemed to be identical. Pidoux then examined previous plates. One taken on February 14 showed no trace of the new comet. But one taken on the 16th had a similar object on the margin. He then announced his discovery.

Wolff, of Königstuhl says that Lorenz had taken a plate on February 10 of the exact spot the new comet should have occupied according to its motion, but found no sign of it.

The discovery of the Pidoux comet as made in Cardiff, Wales, is given in The Observatory for March in these few words: "Shortly after six on February 18 a gentleman in Wales saw a comet for three minutes; it was W.S.W. at an altitude of 25 degrees; it had two tails at right angles, with the junction away from the sun."

The Pidoux comet is therefore most probably a mistake.

WILLIAM S. RIGGE, S.J.

Besides Halley's, two other comets are due to pass through perihelion this year. The first is Temple's second periodic comet, discovered July 3, 1873, at Milan. It has a period of five and a quarter years. It was seen in 1878 but missed in 1883 and 1889, then reseen in 1894 and 1899. Though a faint object it is visible in a small telescope. With each return its light seems to be diminishing. The second comet, due to return during the summer months, is D'Arrest's comet. It was discovered at Leipzig in 1851. Its period is about six and one-half years,

Its light is feeble and observations difficult even with large telescopes.

The present distance from the earth of Halley's comet is about 170,000,000 miles. Setting close upon the sun it is a rather difficult object to see, even in the telescope. In early April it will be visible before sunrise in the east, and, being then nearer the earth, will be more conspicuous than when seen in the southwestern skies.

The Astronomical and Astrophysical Society of America will send out about May 1, to the Hawaiian Islands, an expedition, to observe and photograph Halley's comet.

Profs. Cernovodean and V. Henry report, as a result of their further research in the germicidal effect of ultra-violet light, the following interesting data. The microbe-destroying action decreases more rapidly than the square of the distance. Using a mercury vapor lamp it was found that doubling voltage increased the germicidal efficiency five times. The time required to destroy the colon bacillus is four seconds at a distance of 82 inches and one second for 41 inches. All microbes are not equally sensitive to the rays, tetanus bacilli being the most obstinate.

Prof. Ewell reports that in the recent contest in microscopical measurements held by the Illinois Microscopical Society, the smallest measurement read was 1-2500 of an inch. The readings of Prof. Ewell, of Chicago, and F. T. Kelly, of Philadelphia, were judged to be of equal merit.

The authorities at Dover, England, have sunk into the spot where Bleriot landed a full size representation in concrete of his aeroplane, as a memorial of his daring flight across the Channel.

The Zeppelin north polar exploration committee has published its programme for next summer. A preliminary expedition for studying ice conditions, will sail in the Government vessel Poseidon from Spitzbergen on July 1st. A Norwegian ice-breaking steamer will be used to force an entrance into the polar ice and the expedition will return in August.

The gaseous element neon, isolated from the atmosphere by Prof. Ramsay, though exhibiting no marked chemical properties, has been found by T. Norman Collie to be possessed of a curious physical property. He sealed it up at a low pressure with mercury, and on shaking the containing vessel, found the mercury strongly incandescent. Attempts are being made to utilize this for lighting purposes.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Sister Beatrice" and "Brand," The New Theatre.—We fail to see any satisfactory reason for the production of the fourth act (or rather a fragment of it) of Ibsen's "Brand." Either the whole play or none of it. It is a presumption that everybody in an audience has read "Brand." As a matter of fact few have, and the fewer the better. Ibsen is a dramatic diagnostician of mental diseases and an out-and-out materialist whose dramatic demiurge is Fatality. His plays are neither wholesome nor enlightening, mere pathologic problems without remedies. Nevertheless, if he is going to be produced at all, a fragment is simply bewildering, and when a fragment of a problem play not understandable at all.

Maeterlinck wrote "Sister Beatrice" in his young days, before he had hit upon his philosophy of the Unconscious, and swathed it in Ollendorffian folds of symbolism. It is therefore free from the ponderous implications of his later dramatic work, and does not bother one with the mysterious "ohs" and "ahs" so lavishly interspersed in his period of symbolism.

In fact "Sister Beatrice" is merely a legend of Provence done into dramatic verse and sentimentalized in true Maeterlinckian fashion. It is better read than played. It is the story of a nun who deserts her cloister at the solicitation of a knightly lover. As she leaves for her life of sin, the image of the Blessed Virgin in the convent corridor steps down from its pedestal and takes her place, assuming all her duties and performing all her tasks during the twenty years of her absence without the community ever once realizing that the real Sister Beatrice has departed. In due course Sister Beatrice returns a disillusioned and penitent woman to beg forgiveness and die. In the meantime the pedestal had remained vacant of its statue. But when Sister Beatrice comes back, the image is found in its proper place, much to the surprise of the community, who loudly proclaim a miracle and declare Sister Beatrice a saint. One wonders why another image did not take the place of the first image upon the flight of Sister Beatrice. This would have more completely rounded out the miracle. The absence of the image during Sister Beatrice's sojourn in the world makes a rather disconcerting hiatus. It is needless to say that the play was beautifully staged at the New Theatre, somewhat overstaged in fact, so as to render its setting too theatrical, which distracted somewhat from the illusion. Miss Matheson, in the double role of Sister Beatrice and the Virgin was as effective as the limitations of the Maeterlinckian corruption made possible. The piece, however, is pure sentimentalism and lacks substance. Its note is plainly falsetto, and we plainly feel that the author is out of harmony with the striking simplicity of the original legend, the purpose of which is to show the divine tenderness and mercy to sinners. In Maeterlinck's rendition, the legend is sacrificed to theatricalism and sentimentalism. The legend has its basis in the reality of the divine compassion; the play in the value of the story as a possibly effective piece of dramatic presentation leaving us untouched and sceptical.

"Julius Caesar," Garden Theatre.—It requires more than ordinary histrionic ability to present a Shakespearean tragedy in the Elizabethan style of staging, when there was but one and the same setting for every scene and every act. Under such conditions the entire interest concentrates upon the performers, who, perforce, have no assistance in the illusions which modern staging with its wonderful mechanical appliances and variety of artistic scenic effects produce in the imagination of the auditors. Lacking all this a play comes down to the bare bones of acting, and when the play is a Shakespearean tragedy, it is a histrionic test to which only the strongest can rise. Despite their earnestness and the well-modulated reading of their lines, showing careful training, the Ben Greet Players did not shine in their performance of "Julius Caesar." As a matter of academic moment to show the manner and method of an Elizabethan play in Shakespeare's own day it proved of interest, but beyond this, the "Julius Caesar" of the Ben Greet Players was not calculated to attract the play-goer.

"As You Like It," Academy of Music.—Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe opened their second engagement at the Academy of Music in Shakespearean repertory with "As You Like It," a perennial favorite with the public, as large audiences during the past week have demonstrated. Miss Marlowe, as Rosalind, is always charming. Mr. Sothern essayed a new role in the part of "Jacques," which, however, scarcely gave him opportunity for his powers. The melancholy cynic does not altogether suit Mr. Sothern's temperament, which shows to better advantage in romantic and active types. None the less his characterization was both pleasing and intelligent and in some respects novel.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

His Holiness Pius X, presiding over a Vatican Consistory on March 18, formally approved of the Beatification of Venerable Oliver Plunket, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of Ireland from 1669-1681. Archbishop Plunket was arrested in 1679, on a charge of conspiracy, and after many months of painful imprisonment in Dublin Castle was tried in Dundalk by a jury of Protestants, who nevertheless refused to condemn him. He was then taken to London, where he was tried by an English jury before he was able to summon witnesses in his favor, and condemned to be hanged, drawn and quartered. It was evident that his firm adherence to the Catholic Faith was the sole cause of his condemnation. On July 1, 1681, he was dragged on a sledge to Tyburn and hanged, drawn and quartered in presence of an immense multitude. His head was recovered and is still in a good state of preservation. It is treasured in the Dominican Convent of Drogheda. The process of Blessed Oliver Plunket's Beatification was in charge of Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli.

In December, 1907, the English Court of Appeals reversed the decision of the lower court, which had decided between the Union Agricola of Tarragona, agents of the Carthusians expelled from France and the official Liquidator of the Grande Chartreuse, that the purchasers of the monastery who manufactured a liqueur they called Chartreuse alone had the right in England to the registered trade-mark. The case was carried to the House of Lords, and the Law Lords have unanimously confirmed the decision of the Court of Appeals. Lord McNaghten in giving judgment, after noting that the monks alone could make the real liqueur, because they alone know the secret process, and that the conduct of the Liquidator could not easily be reconciled with a regard for truth, pointed out that his only ground of action was the French Law of Associations, under which the Congregation had been dissolved and its trade-marks sold. He then laid down that a registered trade-mark in England was English property and its ownership was to be decided by English law, not by French. English law knew nothing of French dissolutions, liquidations, etc. Consequently the trade-mark remained the property of the monks or of the Union Agricola to which they had transferred it. Lord Shaw expressed himself more at length in the same sense. The other Law Lords concurred, and costs were given against the Liquidator.

Statistics concerning Catholic Indian work in the United States, gathered by the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, for the year 1909 show that the 147 priests who are engaged in work for Indians have been furnished by the various countries as follows: United States 44, Germany 35, France 18, Italy 9, Canada 9, Belgium 8, Holland 7, Ireland 6, Switzerland 4, Austria 3, Sicily 2, England 1, Scotland 1. Two of the missionaries are natives of Rome, one is a full-blood Indian of the Pottawatomie Tribe.

Of 38 Jesuits engaged in the work for the Indians, 9 are natives of the United States; of 30 Franciscans 15 are natives of the United States; of 14 Benedictines 5 are natives of the United States. All the priests of other Orders and a large majority of secular priests engaged in work for the Indians are foreign born.

Religious engaged in work for Indians are classified as follows: Jesuit, Franciscan, Capuchin, Benedictine, Theatine, Norbertine, Society of the Divine Saviour. The oldest priest on the missions is 81 years of age and the youngest 24 years. The average age of the missionaries is 44 years.

The 44 native-born priests laboring among the Indians have been supplied by the various States as follows: Ohio 8, New York 6, Pennsylvania 6, Indiana 4, Minnesota 4, California 3, Massachusetts 2, Illinois 2, Michigan 2, Kansas 2, Maryland 1, Georgia 1, Kentucky 1, Wisconsin 1, Missouri 1.

The St. Patrick's Day celebrations were conducted throughout Ireland with the decorum appropriate to the occasion. Collections were taken up for the Irish Language Fund and sermons were preached in Gaelic in many of the churches. Protestants observed the day more numerously than usual, their churches also holding services, some altogether in Gaelic. This was not apparently in pursuance of the claim that St. Patrick was a Protestant.

Salzburg, Austria, is making extensive preparations for the Fifth International Marian Congress, which will meet there in July. In connection with this event it is recalled that one of the requirements of the ancient University there was that its professors should make profession of belief in the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. A splendid statue of the Blessed Virgin was erected in the public square of the Cathedral in 1771, and a magnificent collegiate church was erected in her honor.

On Palm Sunday the Sunday School of the Church of St. Paul the Apostle in this city, celebrated its golden jubilee with an imposing ceremonial that included addresses by Mr. David D. Malone and Dr. James P. Walsh. The Rev. Thomas McMillan, C.S.P., has been director of the Sunday School since 1870.

PERSONAL

The Sun's Washington correspondent found that Sir Ernest Shackleton's brilliant lecture "tended to discredit the saying that an Englishman has no sense of humor." The saying will have to be refuted by other evidence, as the explorer happens to be an Irishman. As stated in AMERICA, July 3, he is descended in direct line from Abraham Shackleton, friend and schoolmaster of Edmund Burke, who settled in Ballitore, County Kildare, in 1726, and whose descendants became allied by ties of blood and friendship with the leading commercial families of Ireland. Lady Shackleton is also Irish, being the daughter of the late Dr. Dorman, of Kinsale, County Cork.

Surgeon General Sir Alfred Keogh, K. C. B., up to last year Director-General of the British Army Medical Service, has been appointed head of the Imperial College of Science and Technology. His ability and energy were shown in the organization of the hospitals during the South African war, and in the founding of the Royal Army Medical College. It is superfluous to add that Sir Alfred is both an Irishman and a Catholic.

The Rev. E. Gregory Fitzgerald, O. P., Professor of Scripture and Moral Theology at the Dominican House of Studies, Washington, has been appointed pastor of St. Vincent Ferrer's Church, New York. Father Fitzgerald is a native of Washington, and was ordained to the priesthood in Columbus, Ohio, in 1898. He has been associated with the Dominican House of Studies at the Catholic University since 1901.

The process for the canonization of Mother Theodore Guerin, who founded the American branch of the Sisters of Providence, in Indiana, in October, 1840, has begun. She died fifty years ago.

Colonel Roosevelt and the other members of his family will be received in audience by the Pope, on April 5. If time will permit he will later take lunch at the American College.

Very Rev. Dr. John F. Schoenhæft has been forced by illness to resign the office of vicar general of the Cincinnati diocese.

Rev. E. A. Brodmann, formerly pastor of St. Barbara's parish, Witt, Ill., has been appointed a chaplain in the navy, succeeding the Rev. Edward J. Brennan, of Hartford, who has resigned. The new chaplain is a native of Switzerland, who came here when he was five years of age. He was ordained in 1902, and has since done excellent parochial work in the diocese of Alton.

It is reported that Father Lambert L. Conrardi is dying of leprosy at the colony he established for those unfortunates some time ago on an island near Canton, China.

OBITUARY

Mr. Timothy C. Harrington, M. P., whose death in Dublin on the 12th inst. was chronicled in AMERICA of March 19, deserves more than a passing notice. Born in 1851, in the Bantry district, County Cork, which gave the Sullivans, Healsys, and many other men of ability to the service of Ireland, he became a school teacher, and in 1878, while on the staff of Holy Cross College, Tralee, established the Kerry Sentinel, which soon won a national reputation. His ability attracted the attention of Mr. Parnell, who in 1882 offered him the Secretaryship of the Land League organization, which was then greatly lacking in business methods. In a few months he had made it one of the most powerful organizations in Irish history. Businesslike, helpful and just, but inexorable in suspending any branch that contravened the rules of the League, he was called and in fact was the real Chief Secretary for Ireland from 1882 to 1890. His organization of branches of the League in every parish in Ireland, ready on the instant to do the will of the central authority, was the strongest basis of Mr. Parnell's power. Imprisoned in 1883 for intimidation of the Westmeath farmers, he was elected to Parliament while in jail by Westmeath, the county he was accused of intimidating. Called to the Irish Bar in 1887, he was one of Mr. Parnell's counsel in the Times Commission trial and proved of valuable assistance to Sir Charles Russell. He was in America collecting funds at the time of the Parnell "split," and was the only one of the delegates to side with Mr. Parnell. He was later the first to plead for conciliation and was mainly instrumental in again uniting the party. He was a member of the Conference between the Landlord and Nationalist representatives which resulted in the Wyndham Land Act of 1903. Elected Lord Mayor of Dublin for three successive terms, a unique distinction, he declined, as a Nationalist and a Catholic, to attend the King's Coronation, which occurred during his tenure of office, though he was offered the inducements of high and lucrative position, as it was deemed desirable that the Lord Mayoralty of Dublin should grace the function. In public and private life his character was irreproachable. Though hundreds of thousands of Nationalist funds passed through his hands and his influence was powerful in Parliament and in the country, he died a poor man. The management of the national organization was subjected to severe analysis at the time of the Parnell split, but there was never even an accusation of "graft" or maladministration of funds. An able and trenchant speaker and writer, both in Gaelic and English, he never catered to popularity, preferring the effective service of silent work to public honors. An exemplary Catholic and a total abstainer all his life, he was temperate and tolerant of speech and the strongest influence for harmony among the Nationalist representatives. Men of all parties and creeds attended his funeral, which was the largest seen in Dublin since Parnell's and the most representative given to any public man since the days of O'Connell. His Solemn Requiem was chanted by the Dublin clergy in University Church and he was buried in Glasnevin Cemetery, March 15.

Edward Joseph Le Breton, of San Francisco, was born at Folsom, near Sacramento, of pious Breton parents in the old California pioneer days fifty-eight years ago. He spent some years at St. Ignatius College, and had, besides, the advantage of additional training in France and Germany. Going into business, he was in the employ of the National Gold Bank and Trust Company at its failure in the fatal year 1875, and for some time after was engaged in winding up its affairs. When the banking house of Lazard Frères, which became afterwards the London, Paris and American Bank, was opened a year later, he entered it as accountant, though only twenty-four years of age. His extraordinary business capacity and sterling integrity were his chief capital, but they ensured success. For a long time he was President of the French Savings Bank, and on the failure of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, some three years ago, he was chosen as Receiver on behalf of the depositors. He executed his office fearlessly, and had just filed his report showing that he would be able to pay depositors 42 per cent of their claims, when death overtook him.

Mr. Le Breton was known to the Catholic community as a fervent Catholic, worthy of his old Breton name and blood. Some years ago he built the Home for the Little Sisters of the Poor in San Francisco in memory of his parents, and some time afterwards another Home in Los Angeles. He did not speak of his benefactions; but it is commonly supposed that these two houses cost not much less than a million, and considerably more than half his fortune. On the Feast of St. Joseph he went to the Home in San Francisco to receive Holy Communion in honor of his patron. He had just turned from the altar when he was struck with a cerebral hemorrhage and died four hours later in the house he had built for God's Poor, amidst the prayers and tears of the Sisters and their wards, who looked on him as their father. When he recognized that the hand of death was upon him he said to the Sister Superior: "I am glad to die in the house I built to the memory of my father and mother."

Herbert Railton, whose spirited drawings will be remembered by all familiar with the English illustrated papers of the 'eighties, has just died in his fifty-third year. He was educated at Ampleforth and Mechlin, and soon became famous for his landscape and architectural drawings. His work in illustrated books is also greatly admired. "Coaching Days and Coaching Ways," "Westminster Abbey" and "Hampton Court" are well-known among the books that owe their popularity chiefly to his pencil.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS

M. O'B.—Information supplied by cheap magazines is to be suspected, especially in regard to Catholic matters. The Munsey series of liaisons is as worthless historically as it is morally indecent. It is not true that a Jesuit refused absolution to the actress Adrienne Lecouvreur because she declined to renounce her profession. No Jesuit attended at her deathbed; l'Abbé Languet, pastor of St. Sulpice, refused her ecclesiastical burial. There was no need to invoke the old canon law denying Christian rites to members of the histrionic profession; Lecouvreur's immoral life was notorious and to all appearances she died unrepentant. Voltaire had a personal interest in his protest against this denial.

B. F. Pittsburgh, Pa.—The Christ of the Andes is not a crucifix. It is a bronze figure of the triumphant Christ standing eight metres high holding a cross, not a crucifix, in His left hand, while His right is raised in benediction. The figure was cast from old cannon and was designed by an Argentine sculptor, Mateo Alonzo. It was inaugurated on March 13, 1904, to commemorate the pact of peace between Argentina and Chile, over a long boundary dispute. The idea was first suggested by Bishop Marcelino Benavente of Cuyo, and carried out for him through the efforts of the Christian Mothers' Association of Buenos Aires. The statue is mounted on a simple quadrangular pyramid six metres high, resting on a base twenty-five metres in diameter. It is in entire proportion with majestic grandeur of the landscape of the lofty Andean peaks it tops. On the pedestal above the square base is a bronze plaque representing Argentina and Chile in sisterly affection symbolized by two figures, those of Señora Costa, President of the Christian Mothers of Buenos Aires, and Señora Riesco, wife of the President of Chile. On either side are the principal memorial dates in the history of the two republics and at the top the words: "Ipse est pax nostra qui fecit ex utraque unum." Another plaque bears this inscription: "The Workingmen's Societies of the Republic of Argentina to Christ the Redeemer, for the Definition of Peace between the Argentines and Chileans, 1902-1904."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CRITICISING IMITATIVE ANGLICANS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am an Anglican who subscribed gladly to your paper at the instance of a friend, a Jesuit, whose spirit and temper are like his Master's. I looked to AMERICA as representative of what was best in Roman Catholic thought and expected pleasure and profit in keeping in touch, through its pages, with the great Mother of Western Christendom. Will you pardon me a word of criticism which may seem oddly unwelcome considering the lavish encomia which you publish week by week?

My criticism is this—that you spare no chance to write despitefully of us Anglicans. You excoriate the Literary Digest, for example, in one paragraph for being impolite and offensive, even threatening a sort of Papal boycott of it for defiling its pages with manifest falsehood about your good Roman brothers who live in the moral atmosphere of Latin America. Then you pitchfork the benighted and "imitative" Anglicans (imitation, let us say, being the sincerest flattery), giving no consideration whatsoever to the feelings of those of your readers who may perchance belong to the Anglican obedience.

Knowing intimately the Roman position, I cannot, of course, expect you to give us the kiss of peace, and doubtless it is altogether human for you to abominate us, while it is equally human for you to deal gently with anything which has upon it the Papal seal.

But I ask you, dear Father, "if you love them that love you, what reward shall you have? Do not even the publicans do this?"

With the fullness of that sacramental grace, of which she has ever been so zealous a guardian, is it too much to expect the Holy Roman Church to love them which despitefully use her and persecute her, or even to expect so little as that she be courteous to those Anglicans who are most of them very close to the spiritual side of the Apostolic See in their deep devotion to the sacramental life?

If you deem yourselves head and shoulders above the followers of the God-man who are non-Roman, might it not be because of your great advantages and spiritual riches, a case where the rule would be—noblesse oblige?

HENRY LEVERETT CHASE.

St. Louis, Mo.

Professor W. D. Lyman, of Whitman College, Walla Walla, Washington, writes to AMERICA in answer to the criticisms on his book, "The Columbia River," made by the Rev. E. V. O'Hara, in the issue of January 22. Most of the errors pointed out by Father O'Hara are, he says, due to the slips, so frequent in all publications, by typewriters and compositors, and unfortunately missed in the proof-reading. He regrets these. In regard to his use of Gray's "History of Oregon," Professor Lyman protests that he does not regard the book as infallible, and he disavows any endorsement of the writer's prejudices and biased opinions. "No one," he adds, "has ever questioned the substantial accuracy of Gray's statements of events in regard to his journey across the plains, and the establishment of the Provisional Government of Oregon. I use that part of his work, and it is worthy of use."

Concerning what Professor Lyman says of the visit of the Indians to St. Louis to ask for Jesuit missionaries, he contends that it is essentially the same as Father O'Hara's own account in the Quarterly of the Oregon Historical Society of September, 1909, and was the incident that started the Protestant mission among the Oregon Indians.

I have read AMERICA with the greatest interest, and afterwards forwarded it to some of my confrères and friends. I feel confident that they will experience the same pleasure in reading it as I did. Each number of AMERICA is an improvement on the preceding one. Besides the great variety of subjects it embraces, the clear, concise and terse manner in which they are treated, and the very literary feature given to its various articles by its able editors and collaborators renders it worthy of the widest circulation.—Rev. A. Languet, O.F.M., Pietermaritzburg, South Africa.

AMERICA is, without any doubt, the finest and most interesting journal of the two dozen to which I subscribe.—H. S. Dorval, County Judge, Langdon, N. Dak.

CHRONICLE

Roosevelt in Egypt.—Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, since his safe exit from the African jungles, has made himself the object of international interest. In an address to the students of the University of Cairo he bluntly told the Egyptian Nationalists that they were not yet fitted for self government. He denounced the assassination by a student last month of Butros Pasha Ghali, Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs, as a calamity to Egypt, and warned his hearers against grasping for power, reminding them of the Arab proverb, that "God is with the patient if they know how to wait." The address, while pleasing to the British residents in Egypt, aroused much resentment among the Nationalists. It was denounced as an unwarranted interference in political affairs by one who had no personal acquaintance with conditions in Egypt. English opinion of the speech is divided, the general view being that Mr. Roosevelt desired to help to solve the British problem in Egypt but succeeded in complicating it.

Roosevelt in Italy.—On Monday the world, that had been watching the details of Col. Roosevelt's homeward progress, was startled by the information, made public by himself through a message to the New York paper with which he has editorial connection, that he had refused to accept the condition on which an audience with the Pope would be granted to him. He had applied from Gondokoro early in February through the American Ambassador for the honor of a presentation to the Holy Father. Bishop Kennedy, Rector of the American College, acting for the Cardinal Secretary of State, in reply stated that the audience would be granted on April 5 and hoped "that nothing will arise to prevent it, such as the much-regretted incident which made the reception of Mr. Fairbanks impossible." In reply, Col. Roosevelt telegraphed the American Ambassador from Cairo: "I must decline to make any stipulations or submit to any conditions which in any way would limit my freedom of conduct." Bishop Kennedy replied that the audience could not take place except on the understanding expressed in his former message, upon which Col. Roosevelt sent another despatch to the American Ambassador saying: "The proposed presentation is of course now impossible."—On Tuesday Col. Roosevelt added another sensation by cancelling the reception arranged in his honor by the American Colony in Rome at the American Embassy for Wednesday evening. It had become known that the American Catholics, to show their respect for the Sovereign Pontiff, would not attend. The reception was declared off and the blame thrown on the head of the Methodist College in Rome, Rev. B. M. Tipple. After visiting Mr. Roosevelt on Monday, Mr. Tipple made public this statement: "Mr. Roosevelt has struck a blow for twentieth century Christianity. The representatives of two great republics have been the ones to put the Vatican where it belongs. The Vatican is incompatible with republican principles. This is a bitter dose for patriotic Catholics in America to swallow. I wonder how many doses of this sort they will take before they revolt. Is Catholicism in America to be American or Romish? If Romish, then every patriotic American should rise to crush it, for Roman Catholicism is the uncompromising foe of freedom. The world advances, but the Vatican, never."

Disfranchisement in Maryland.—The Digges bill for the disfranchisement of the negro in all State and municipal elections in Maryland passed both Houses of the State legislature and now awaits the signature of the Governor. The law will give the Democrats complete control in Maryland, if not declared unconstitutional by the courts. There is no attempt to prevent negroes voting at Federal elections, the restriction affecting only State and municipal balloting. An amendment to the original draft of the bill allows negroes owning property assessed at $500 to vote, provided they were possessed of property thus valued two years in advance of their registration.

Before the final passage of the bill, Mr. Pairo, the minority leader in the House, said in part: "We see before us the culmination of a plan whereby that sacred document, the Constitution of the United States, for the first time in forty years is wilfully, premeditatedly and deliberately to be ignored. I am sorry that the Democratic party in this State has taken a position that no other Southern State has taken since the Civil War, in that it openly defies the Constitution of the United States." In reply, Mr. Benson, Democrat, said: "The leaders of the Democratic party in this State and in the United States realize that a great mistake was made when the right of franchise was given to the colored people, and they realize that the blunder is just as great to-day as when it was forced upon the Southern States years ago. We are going to abide by the Constitution of Maryland, as distinguished from the Constitution of the United States. We are going to submit to the white people an amendment for the benefit of the white people and for those colored people who, by their thrift and industry, may earn the right to vote." The measure was passed on strict party lines by a vote of 69 to 31, a margin of one vote over the 68 required as the necessary two-thirds of the total membership.

Soft-Coal Miners on Strike.—Approximately 300,000 organized miners in the bituminous coal fields of the Middle West struck work April 1, and at the headquarters of the United Mine Workers of America in Indianapolis it was stated that they will stay out until the mine operators agree to a wage advance of five cents a ton. The strike follows a prolonged joint conference of operators and miners of the central competitive field, in which the terms proposed by the miners were finally rejected by the operators. The miners asked for two concessions: a wage increase of five cents a ton, and a provision that the new explosives ordered by the State mining departments be provided for the miners at the same cost as the black powder hitherto commonly used. Interested parties look for a lapse of thirty or sixty days before the details of the new agreement can be amicably arranged by owners and miners, and, as President Lewis of the United Mine Workers announces that agreements may be signed by States, districts or groups of districts, the continuance of the trouble will probably vary in different localities. The strike affects workmen in Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Michigan, Kansas and Iowa.

Canadian Tariff Aftermath.—An unpleasant aftermath of the Canadian tariff settlement is growing out of the way in which the difficulty has been left unsettled in one of its aspects. While the final agreement contains no specific mention of the pulpwood question, the situation at the close of the negotiations included two distinct points: (1) The United States withdrew its earlier demands that the Canadian provinces should cease prohibiting the exportation of pulpwood, and (2) unofficial assurances were given by Canada that the exportation of pulpwood would not be prohibited by the Dominion. One point about which there has been a good deal of soreness in Canada has been the practice of the United States in levying duty upon pulp made from pulpwood cut on Crown lands under the compensatory and retaliatory sections of last summer's Tariff Act. The agreement just concluded offers no relief from this practice. The acute phase of the situation is revealed in the fact that the paper consumers are representing to the Administration at Washington that it ought to remove the retaliatory and compensatory duties from wood-pulp and paper.

Montreal Harbor.—Montrealers are delighted over the shortness of the winter, especially as it affects their port. The closed season for the harbor of Montreal this year goes on record as the shortest in history. The record was reached on April 1, when the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company resumed the Longueuil ferry service, which was suspended on New Year's Day, just three months before—the latest closing and the earliest opening since the company began this ferry service. On April 2 the only barrier between Montreal and Quebec was near Lake St. Peter, where two ice-breakers, the Lady Grey and the Montcalm, were working to open up this part of the St. Lawrence River.

British Notes.—Considerable ill feeling has arisen between the Liberal and Labor parties over the election for Mid-Glamorganshire, vacant by the appointment of Sir Samuel Evans to the Presidency of the Admiralty, Probate and Divorce Division of the High Court. The Labor party claimed that the Liberals should leave the seat to them: the local Liberal Association, on the other hand, determined to contest it. The Labor party then appealed to the Government, which refused to interfere in the matter. The Unionists are presenting no candidate. Those that vote will support the Liberal candidate.—A number of influential cotton spinners and manufacturers of Manchester have organized the Cotton Trade Tariff Reform Association.—Lord Rosebery's third resolution affirming as a principle of the reform of the House of Lords that the possession of a peerage should no longer give a right to sit and vote, was carried by 175 to 17. The minority were led by the veteran Chancellor of Exchequer, Lord Salisbury, the Earl of Halsbury, and the aged Earl of Wemyss, who was in the 'sixties chief founder of the Volunteers. The Conservative Amendment in the House of Commons to the Veto Resolutions of the Government was defeated by a majority of 106.

Indian Paganism and England.—Certain relics said to be of Gautama were discovered lately at Peshawar. The Government brought them to Calcutta and put them in a golden box. On March 19 the Viceroy, Lord Minto, took his place with great ceremony on the throne in Government House, and the Lieutenant Governor of Burma introduced five Burmese nobles. Lord Minto handed them the box, expressing the great pleasure he took in the function, and said he was certain the priceless relics would be safely guarded. He hoped that pilgrims would flock from all parts of the world to Mandalay to see the relics of the great founder of their faith.—The petition of T. Chinnappa Moodelly and others asking leave to appeal from the judgment of the High Court of Madras in favor of K. Kandasamy Moodelly and others, was heard lately in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The matter in dispute was the exclusive right of the petitioners, who are administrators of a temple, to carry their idol over certain roads. The defendants, administrators of another temple, infringed this right by carrying their idol over the same roads. The local court had granted them an injunction against the defendants which the High Court of Madras had dissolved on the ground that the roads were public. Lord Macnaghten refused permission to appeal, saying the gods, as members of the public, had the right to go anywhere on the public roads, and that if trouble arose from their journeyings, the police would attend to it.

Irish Leadership.—Mr. Redmond and his party are still the centre of the British political situation. While the events of the last few weeks have damaged the reputation of Mr. Asquith and the Liberal leaders, with the possible exception of Lloyd-George, for strength of character and determination of purpose, it is conceded that Mr. Redmond has displayed true statesmanship and political sagacity. An article in the London Chronicle declares that in the last fifteen years the "Celtic fringe" represented by Campbell-Bannerman and Lloyd-George, has alone saved Liberalism, appealing to the spirit which at all costs will assert its liberties; and now Mr. Redmond has proved a finer guide to the true instincts of democracy because for thirty years he has been fighting a battle in which there was no thought of comfort, and he has a country behind him which understands the conditions of political warfare. The announcement that he would make a declaration in Tipperary has evoked anxious comments from the London papers for weeks. While he made it clear last Sunday that he had come to an understanding with the Cabinet, who had promised concessions on the Budget, Mr. Redmond insisted that there is and can be no compromise on the question of the veto, which must have priority over all other measures. Ministers must retain their grip on the Budget as a whip over the Lords, and if the veto resolutions are rejected they must demand guarantees or resign in accordance with their pre-election program. Mr. O'Brien's inauguration of his All-For-Ireland League, supported by Lords Dunraven, Erne, Castletown and other distinguished semi-Unionists, has not created enthusiasm in Cork. The statement cabled to America that he has the support of the Church authorities is negated by the fact that the Bishops of Ross and Cloyne, in which dioceses lies his main strength, have doubled their subscriptions to the party funds as a protest against his attitude, and that priests are noticeably absent from his meetings.—The prevalence of anti-Catholic discrimination in the Irish Boards is illustrated by a recent answer to a Parliamentary question showing that the chief officials of the Royal Irish Constabulary, an overwhelmingly Catholic force, are mainly Protestant.

France.—On April 1 the Chamber of Deputies authorized Admiral Boué de Lapeyrère, Minister of Marine, to begin immediately the construction of two of the seven battleships voted in the naval program of 1910. These Dreadnoughts of 23,000 tons will be built in the shipyards of Brest and Toulon, and will be the first of their class in France since 1906. The Chamber postponed till the next session the discussion of the great project of an organic naval law submitted to it last month by Admiral Boué de Lapeyrère.—With reference to the second recent announcement of the death of Menelik, Le Temps says: "Every now and then Menelik's death is announced. This time the news seems exact; it is at the very least likely. A curious figure thus disappears. The reign of Menelik has often taken an important place in the history of Europe." In definitively closing its flood subscription list, the same journal thanks the public for its generous sympathy. The Press Syndicate has received in all, four million four hundred thousand francs, of which almost a million and a half came through Le Temps.—In 1889 a law was passed excluding from the army all convicted criminals. In 1905 this law was practically abrogated, the result being that, from 1905 to 1908 the proportion of soldiers undergoing trials for crime increased 68 per cent., while in the same period the increase of non-military criminals was only 39 per cent. During the same time military crimes diminished in Germany by 5.9 per cent. These facts are being discussed by the Chamber of Deputies, which is also considering the too-frequent granting of amnesties—four in eight years, 1898-1906—which nullifies most punishments, and the general complaint of the police and war departments that crime is not properly repressed.

Notes from Germany.—In an official communication to the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg expresses his gratification over the incidents of his recent short visit to Rome. He makes cordial acknowledgement of the hearty reception tendered him and notes with particular thanks the friendliness with which he was received at the Vatican.—The open activity of the propaganda carried on by certain Mormon missionaries in Saxony of late has resulted in the banishment from the kingdom of three of their number. In other districts as well close attention is being given by officials of the empire to the efforts of the Mormon proselytists.—On Friday of last week the Kölnische Volkszeitung issued a magnificent jubilee number to mark the fiftieth anniversary of its first appearance. This daily newspaper holds a distinguished place in the newspaper field in Germany and since the foundation of the great Centrum party, it has, with Germania, been a sturdy upholder of that party's policies. Issued first on April 1, 1860, as the Kölnische Blätter, its influence as a loyal and courageous advocate of Catholic principle has grown with every year of its devoted service.—A butter-boycott was declared by labor organizations in Berlin. To fight the advance in price announced by butter-handlers, members of the unions pledge themselves to abstain from the use of butter for three months.—Richard Barth, editor of the Socialist organ, Vorwärts, was sentenced to a month's imprisonment for organizing the demonstrative "stroll" of March 6, when thousands paraded in the interest of suffrage reform. The mass-meetings planned by the party having been proscribed, Herr Barth urged the "stroll" in protest against the government's action.

The Week in Austria.—The preliminary details of the program of festivities to mark the celebration of the eightieth birthday of Emperor Francis Joseph were published last week. The Emperor will spend the day in Ischl in the Tyrol. There, it is now announced, King Edward and a number of royal personages will visit him to tender him their congratulations. Emperor William will probably anticipate the day and journey to Vienna to greet the aged monarch.—An immense gathering in Budapest expressed its disapproval of the scandalous conduct of the opportunists in the outbreak of March 21, which brought shame to the Hungarian parliament. A rousing vote of sympathy was offered to the Premier, and the speakers voicing the protest of the assembly against the disgraceful affair, united in enthusiastic praise of the conduct of Graf Khuen-Hedevary and his colleagues during the brutal attack made on them. Naturally enough the affair has restored confidence to the Premier's National Labor party. The reaction in their favor indicates that the approaching elections will give the Premier a substantial majority.—An improvised dance-hall in the village of Oekörto, in the province of Szatmar, Hungary, into which the villagers had gathered for an Easter merry-making was burned to the ground. Four hundred of the merry-makers met a terrible death in the flames, and more than one hundred others were seriously injured. It is reported that all the doors of the hall had been locked to keep unwelcome visitors out, and that the fire was started through resentment of this action by young hoodlums of the village.—In order to resist any oppressive competition of the Standard Oil Company, the Government announces its purpose to introduce governmental control of oil wells and refineries. This action, making the petroleum trade a government monopoly, will oblige all dealers in petroleum to obtain a license to buy or sell oil in the Empire.

Unlooked-for Return of Winter.—In many districts in Germany and Austria violent storms have threatened a renewal of the disastrous damages of mid-winter. Southern Austria appears to have been the worst sufferer, the heavy snowfall making all traffic dangerous if not impossible. Near Muggia, a town on the Gulf of Triest, a train was swept from the rails and carried down a declivity: four persons were killed and eighteen injured in the accident. All traffic in Triest harbor was stopped, the violent gale making it too hazardous for shipping to venture away from anchorage. Several of the Austrian Lloyds steamers, torn from their moorings, were saved from destruction only through the bravery and skill of their crews.

Change of Ambassadors.—Richard C. Kerens, it is announced, will present his credentials as Ambassador of the United States to Francis Joseph on April 9. His predecessor, Charles S. Francis, delivered his letter of recall last week in a notably cordial audience with the Emperor. In his conversation with Mr. Francis, the Emperor recalled that fifty years ago the ambassador's father had filled the same position. The case of father and son respectively holding the post of ambassador to the court of the same foreign sovereign is probably unique in the history of the United States.

Locusts in Mexico.—Campeche and neighboring States are suffering from a plague of locusts which is the severest ever known. Crops have been destroyed and even the plantations of henequen, or sisal hemp, have been eaten down to the ground. The central government has been appealed to for help in fighting the locusts. Any serious loss to the sisal crop would have an important bearing on American agricultural and other interests, as it would affect the price of the twine used by the reaping and binding machines and of rope in general.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Biblical Institute, Rome

II

On March 10, the hall in which Father Fonck, president of the Biblical Institute in Rome, rose to give his second public conference, was taxed to the extreme limit of its capacity with over a thousand hearers, and was closed against others. The Cardinal Secretary of State, other cardinals and many dignitaries were present. The subject was the errors alleged to be found in the Bible, as judged by natural science. The lecturer premised that even among Catholic scientists there were some who restricted their view of criteria in this question to only the first of the five principles, enunciated in the previous lecture; which was that the Bible did not undertake to teach natural science. They lost sight of the other principles; of phenomena as distinct from intrinsic causes; popular language diverging from scientific formulas; the individual character of the writers as men of their age; and the definite ambit of the function discharged by them as writers under inspiration. Such Catholic scientists, in presence of the dilemma created for them by Leo XIII's Encyclical, Providentissimus Deus, that they must either accept the Encyclical and deny errors in the Bible, or if they admit errors in the latter they must refuse the teaching of the Pope, have endeavored to find a means of escape from the difficulty by regarding the Encyclical as the utterance of a private doctor, not of the Pope speaking ex cathedra. But they have not observed what the said document contains and reports, the fixed rule of faith from the inception of the Church till now, that there are no errors in Holy Writ. Besides that, if they had applied all the scientific principles of interpretation, they would not have been reduced to the straits in which they find themselves. These principles will now be applied to all the cases, wherein error has been supposed to affect statements of natural science as appearing in the Sacred Books.

The cases in question are derived, first, from considerations of the universe at large; second, from the account of creation; third, from divers facts in the natural kingdom.

1. The general order of the universe. St. Augustine for the Fathers, St. Thomas for the Scholastics, and the Pope quoting both, teach that the sacred writers expressed what was matter of sensible perception—the phenomena, not notions on essences. If the sun is not the greatest of heavenly bodies, nor the moon next, nor the firmament as fixed as moulded bronze, still sun, moon and firmament are precisely all this to man's unaided sense, as he runs through his little cycle of existence, and with the simple perception of sense never apprehends larger or more stable phenomena than those which common language has classed as such. If all this implies the assumption of a geocentric system, instead of a solar one, mankind and human language are addicted to geocentric notions to-day as they were thousands of years ago.

2. Creation or cosmogony. Whatever the narration here was that of the Creator who alone knew, or was a vision of past creation displayed by Him to Adam, the phenomena as stated agree with the framework of popular language, and the order of facts in the seven days has not been disturbed by the data of geology and palaeontology. Amid theories which have been formed to verify what Genesis reports, we may take the Kant-Laplace system of a gaseous nebula in movement: detached pieces thrown from the mass; the earth so detached from the fiery mass; its void and dark waters receiving light from its original source; waters rolling over it, and upper waters falling through the atmosphere from clouds about it. Here we have the globe and its atmosphere. Then convulsions make dry land and sea; and plants begin to appear. The central luminous mass resolves into sun, moon and planets; and on the earth, animal life unfolds on land, in sea and air. All this is scriptural, and it is scientific. His house being prepared, man walks into it. As to the structure of man, the identical conditions of animal life for brute and man impose analogy of structure on both of them; but at the same time science shows that the difference between man and the most analogously constituted of brutes leaves the mere animal radically incompetent for the functions characteristic of the human species. The formation of "woman from the man," which is St. Paul's emphatic phrase, may have been provided for in Adam's original formation without any permanent effect on the frame of posterity; or such effect may have been provided against in any of the ways consonant with the divine operation.

3. Geology. The Dead Sea is the continuation of a geological depression belonging to the cretaceous era. Therefore some persons have contended that the Dead Sea is not owing to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha. That is true, and the Bible says nothing to the contrary.

Flora. On this the next lecture will enlarge in relation to our Lord's parables. At present, reference may be made to Jonas's bush, which grew in a day and perished in a night. It is alleged that this is unnatural. On the contrary, abstracting from a miraculous operation, we have the "miracle tree," ricinus communis of Linnaeus. It grows two or three metres in less than a day; and a branch taken off simply disappears in a few hours. Again it has been propounded that the fig-tree, under which our Lord said that he saw Nicodemus, breaks all the rules of figs; because the time was January; and at no time does any one sit under a fig-tree, since it does harm to the eyes, and it gives fevers. Verifying these precise assertions in the Holy Land, the lecturer had reduced them to the following proportions: at the season when figs are gathered, fever-bearing mus-quitoes infest the trees, and at the same time fresh sap of the fruit, if carried by the hands to the eyes, will do harm to the latter. As to the date, January, our Lord says nothing about the time when He had seen Nicodemus under the tree. Again, there is St. Paul's image of a wild olive being grafted on a fat one. However, this is good enough, if it conveys his idea, and that not inexactly from a scientific point of view.

Fauna. There was that incredible flight of quails, which were brought to feed the Israelites in the desert. Still, the incredible is true, and quails borne like a cloud from Egypt are often seen at Beyrout and elsewhere. Again the sluggard is referred to ants, who store granaries in summer against the winter, but it is said, there are none such. The answer is simple: perhaps not in Germany, but there are some such species in Italy, and many in America. The ostrich is described in the book of Job as leaving her eggs to be hatched in the sand. This is said not to be true. The answer is, that the original Hebrew speaks only of "causing them to be warmed," without further specification. Again, the hare and the rabbit are described as ruminant; the whale is taken for a fish and the bat for a bird. But these objections lose sight of popular classifications, which have ranked among ruminants such animals as move their lips after eating, among fish such as swim in the sea, and have put among birds such as move in the air. Again, the "winged serpent" is rightly called so because of its airy spring at the passing horse; and the serpent "which kills with its tongue" connotes the member which is conspicuous at the moment of the fatal bite with the teeth. Other objections to the Bible's inerrancy are more insignificant than the foregoing; and there was no time for the lecturer to consider them.

We have learnt that in one of Father Fonck's publications all this matter is treated in full.

THOMAS HUGHES, S.J.

Juvenile Delinquency

The newspaper is a mirror of the day's activity in word and deed. It does not deal in the past except to illustrate the present, nor does it attempt to prophesy, although it often indicates the probable or prospective results of causes already known and recognized. Many readers who do not comb gray hair yet can easily recall the first leaders that appeared on automobiles, telephones and typewriters. Some once familiar headlines have gone to the scrap pile while others have claimed their places. Who first used "juvenile delinquency" as a title? It, or its equivalent, has now become as common as "household hints" or "Washington gossip."

The prevalence of the headline in our own country and abroad is an ominous sign of the times which lawmakers would do well to heed. Only a quack would prescribe one and the same remedy for radically different ailments, yet there have not been wanting statesmen who have ready-made and at hand a precious nostrum that, as they fancy, must prove a panacea for every form of juvenile shortcomings. They actually look serious while they magisterially declare that "education" is the cure-all. This assertion must be viewed in the light of the meaning which they attach to their shibboleth. True, an education that reaches head and hand, mind and heart, of the child, is the nearest possible approach to successful preventive and remedial treatment; but as understood by only too many Solons, instruction in letters, politeness, civil government and manicuring is all that is required to keep the young within the paling of propriety or to blanch effectively the most begrimed little outcast.

Such seems to have been the thought in Italian government circles, if we are to judge by the lamentation of a recent Minister of Grace and Justice addressed to the President of the Supreme Court and the Attorney-General: "Contrary to what might have been expected, the spread of education has not produced its natural effects in Italy, and instead of diminishing as new schools were opened, delinquency, especially among children, has increased and is increasing at a frightful pace." This precious confession is wrung from an active Freemason who sees no good in religious instruction.

The best that he can offer in proposing new legislation for handling youthful objects of police attention is a law that "shall establish a guardianship over the transgressor and be a real protection to him," for it is iniquitous to load him with the blame of what results from the atmosphere in which he has been reared. He urges upon the judges that in administering the law they are not to cling too tenaciously to its letter, but are so to apply it that it "may be an educative measure, a healing of the character, a restoration, instead of a punishment, and that the office of punishing shall not be turned into a school of more deep-seated corruption and even of downright criminality." A praiseworthy body of wise suggestions, truly, but where are the wings to raise it from the earth? He would have specially appointed judges of minors, men selected for their qualifications for this particular duty such as we already have in some States; and he would rigorously exclude children and young people from court rooms during criminal trials, as from scenes that tend to debauch them.

This and similar precautions deserve the attention of the authorities in the United States, for we have all too frequent illustrations of that morbidity which draws throngs of the young and emotional of both sexes to trials which from the nature of the testimony ought to be conducted with the attendance of only the necessary officials, jury and witnesses. Again, the eyes of the young are sometimes opened to crime by the descriptions and pictures introduced into family newspapers. Such was the explanation of a young criminal who recently credited his knowledge and skill as a counterfeiter to an illustrated article in a popular magazine. Every little while, some precocious youngster, whose fancy has been fired by wild and unreal tales of cowboys, road agents and train robbers, steals away from his eastern home to seek glory, gold and gore in the uncivilized west; but by the time the policeman has picked him up and the matron has fed him, he is ready to return home from the mountains and eat more than his share of veal. Such boys, however, are hardly a drop in the bucket which is brimful of young lawbreakers. Rural districts and the smaller towns make few direct contributions to the wayward and undisciplined classes. Our great cities, in which thousands may be as effectually concealed as if they were buried in the earth, are the recruiting grounds for those who are to wear the striped uniform of the "regular" army of criminality. It is painfully evident that what used to be known as parental control has, of late years, steadily receded towards low water mark. False ideals have so developed that a child who should have a doll has an escort, and tatting is discarded for moving pictures. If money could secure effective prevention or correction, we should have had both long since, for there is not a great difference in the sums spent for education and for police protection; but the bitter truth remains that juvenile misdemeanors and even crimes, including murder and suicide, are increasing out of all proportion. There is no State without its reformatory legislation and correctional institutions, but "reformatories don't reform" has become trite and hackneyed. Colonel Vincent Myron Masten, whose experience in dealing with those who have been put under restraint entitles him to a respectful hearing, finds three causes for the increase of crime in our country which threatens the longevity of the nation. He puts indiscriminate immigration first. Until very recent years, our doors have swung wide open to all comers, with no inopportune or importunate questioning about their antecedents and their motives for coming to our shores. Even now the puny though expensive efforts of the Government to exclude objectionable characters is little more than a sign that the authorities realize the need of action. There is now a small property qualification, but if poverty had always been a reason for exclusion we doubt whether America would to-day have her canals and railroads. Some have urged illiteracy as an excluding cause, but they have yet to show that illiteracy and crime are necessarily dissociated. If criminal propensities are present they are developed by a mere book-learning that simply sharpens the wits and leaves the will without a well-founded standard of right and wrong. There must be somebody to say authoritatively, "This is really right and will be rewarded, that is really wrong and will be punished." A mere appeal to ethical standards may have an appreciable effect upon the very young and also upon those who have outlived the glow of youthful enthusiasm; but those who must strive if they are to reach those high ideals will not be spurred on to action by contemplating a sunrise at sea.

Our judicial system comes second in Col. Masten's indictment. "Our mode of criminal procedure is degenerating into a maze of technical, quibbling pettifoggery. Criminal law that effects but one full conviction of the spilling of human blood to the sixty indictments, places a premium on all kinds of violence and chicanery." A conscientious endeavor to secure every man in his rights until he shall have forfeited them has become, through perverse scheming or maudlin sentimentality, a powerful engine for glorifying vice and crime and crippling justice. The result is that in the mind of the evildoer who chances to receive the wages for which he has worked, the State is an oppressive tyrant, the officers of the law are hired persecutors and he is some kind of a martyr.

Thus, it would seem, we may account for the rapid increase of lawlessness up to the moment when the heavy hand of the State rests on the delinquent and he is subjected to correctional treatment. The results of the State's attempt at self-protection and self-preservation in reformatory institutions will be discussed on another occasion.

The Pope of the Comet

II.

The age of the Crusades had passed. Indifference and greed, jealousy, the canker that kills every noble instinct in the heart of individuals and nations alike, had succeeded to the enthusiasm of the Ages of Faith. In England the White and the Red Roses were already heavy with bloody dew. England had no more Lion-Hearts to fight for the Holy Rood. Great Warwick's sword was already drawn at St. Alban's in civil strife. What a glorious epic it might have written on the breastplate of the Turk, if, wielded side by side with Pierre d'Aubusson, the soldier monk of Rhodes, with John Hunyadi and Scanderbeg! Charles VII of France, the man who had abandoned the Warrior Maid of Orleans to dungeon and death, was not the king to take the Cross. Frederick the Third of Germany was too busy with the royal duty of planting buttercups and daisies and snaring birds. The contemptible Christian of Denmark stole from the cathedral of Roskilde the moneys stored for the defence of Christendom. The heart of the old Pope must have sunk within him at the sight of all this cowardice, and of the Turks masters, as they boasted, of every spot "where they tied their horses' heads."

But not all was gloom. Callistus knew that from the ramparts of Kroja and the bastions of his Albanian hills George Castriota, the terrible fighter whom the Moslem called Scanderbeg, kept hawk-like watch over the advancing hordes. The very year in which Hunyadi crushed the Turks at Belgrade, Scanderbeg rolled them back on the field of Tomorniza, piling the ground with 30,000 Moslem slain. In countless battles wherein once only he was defeated, Scanderbeg had nobly won the glorious surname, "Soldier of Christ." So high-strung and passionate that in the first heat of indignation or anger his under lip would split and bleed, he ever exercised supreme and heroic self-control. He was handsome, heroic in mind and mien, cool and daring before the foe, he had the gift of noble souls; he could forgive. He restored the repentant traitor Moses Golem to all his dignities; he spared on the Tomorniza the life of his nephew, the apostate Hamso.

Callistus could appreciate Scanderbeg. In December, 1457, he appointed him his Captain-General for the Turkish war. What might not united Christendom have accomplished with two such leaders? The ecclesiastical titles of Dalmatia were set aside to help the brave Albanian, and as the Pope's Nuncio, Juan Navar, failed to collect the taxes, the fiery Borgia threatened to excommunicate him. Unable as he was to help him materially, Callistus nobly encouraged "the Soldier of Christ."

"Beloved son," he wrote, "continue to defend the Catholic Faith; God, for whom you fight, will not abandon His Cause." (Pastor-Antrobus, vol. II, pp. 434, 435.) The Pope knew that Kroja's ruler was one of the bulwarks of Christendom.

The other was the mailed breast of John Hunyadi, the savior of Belgrade. Hunyadi was at last to have his revenge for Kossovo and for that ill-starred November day at Varna in 1444, when in spite of all that his heroic arm could do, he had seen the Cross go down before the rush of Amurath's troops, the Legate of Eugenius IV, Cardinal Cesarini, slain, and the gallant Boy-King of Poland, Vladislaus, bereft of life and crown on that red field of carnage.

In the summer of 1456, Mohammed, as Callistus had foreseen, was thundering at the gates of Belgrade with the imperious summons of three hundred guns. The indefatigable old Pope again appealed to the chivalry of Europe in vain. But Carvajal, never greater than now, did not fail him. He had been sent some time previously to Hungary, and though a strange indifference pervaded all ranks, he managed to raise a small force to gather munitions and supplies and effect a union with the troops of Hunyadi. The Christian army barely counted 60,000. It was made up of Germans, Hungarians, Poles, a handful of French, poorly disciplined, badly armed. Mohammed could muster from 160,000 to 200,000 men splendidly equipped and especially strong in artillery. The roar of his guns could be heard at Szegedin, more than twenty miles away.

But Hunyadi was a host in himself. Sailing down the Danube he broke through the Turkish flotilla and entered the beleaguered city. Hope and enthusiasm followed in his steps. Mohammed and Hunyadi were face to face in the lists. Would Belgrade be another Constantinople? Callistus trembled, prayed. The fate of Christendom hung on the point of the Hungarian's sword. Wherever Hunyadi bore it, that sword flashed like a devouring flame. In the path of its lightnings the Franciscan monk, John Capistran, crucifix in hand, like another Peter the Hermit, animated with fiery eloquence the soldiers of the Cross. Night and day the final battle raged. Still, Faith, Heroism, and Prayer conquered. The Janizaries broke and fled. Mohammed, wounded by an arrow, put spurs to his horse and turned in rage from the scene. Twenty thousand Moslem lay dead on the field.

Christendom breathed freely. Peter's Rock had once again saved it from Mohammed's Flood. "Whatever was achieved against the Turks," says the Protestant historian, K. A. Menzel, "was entirely the Pope's doings, and the great deliverance wrought at Belgrade is to be ascribed most properly to him." (Pastor-Antrobus, vol. II, p. 398.) Creighton truly says: "It must always be an honor to the Papacy, that in a great crisis of European affairs it asserted the importance of a policy which was for the benefit of Europe as a whole. Calixtus III and his successors deserve, as statesmen, credit which can be given to no other of the politicians of the age. The Papacy, by summoning Christendom to defend the ancient limits of Christian civilization against the assaults of heathenism, was worthily discharging the chief secular duty of its office." (Hist. of the Papacy, vol. II, p. 345.)

Callistus looked upon the victory at Belgrade as the happiest event in his life. Hunyadi, to him, was the greatest man the world had seen "for three hundred years." To perpetuate the memory of the triumph, the Pontiff decreed that the Feast of the Transfiguration, August 6, should henceforth be solemnized, throughout the Christian world. The victory at Belgrade is the culminating point in the life of Callistus. It showed the West that the Turks were not invincible. Hunyadi became a name of terror to the Osmanlis. Mohammed never heard that ominous word, Belgrade, without a paroxysm of frenzy. Could Callistus or Hunyadi ask for a more eloquent panegyric?

Christendom paid dear for its triumph. Worn out by years of fighting for the Cross, by anxiety and disease, Hunyadi died a few months after his victory. He had fought like a hero; he died like a saint in the arms of St. John Capistran. Paralyzed and helpless, he had himself carried to the church to receive His God for the last time, for, said he, the Master should not come to His servant, the servant should go to His Lord. Not long after John Capistran, one day to be raised to the honors of the altar, went to meet his soldier-friend. The ranks of the Soldiers of the Cross were thinning out. But Scanderbeg was still on guard on the Albanian hills. Callistus in Rome was still praying for the overthrow of the Crescent and the victory of the Cross.

Callistus III had his faults. He has been surpassed by some Popes in genius, in learning, in sanctity. But he was not the ignorant, benighted old man some have painted him. He was a far-seeing, high-minded, energetic statesman. He was not always successful, and his appeals too often fell on dull ears. Yet he and his successors aroused Europe at last to a consciousness of its danger from the Turkish hordes.

Even in practical and scientific attainments, the Age of Callistus, of his predecessor, Nicholas V, and of his successor, Pius II, was not without its men of renown. Gutenberg, Coster, Fust and Schöffer were at work upon the first printing presses in Europe. A Florentine goldsmith, Maso Finiguerra, was discovering (1440-1450?) the art of copper-plate engraving, while the Van Eycks, the creators of that marvellous picture, "The Adoration of the Immaculate Lamb," about a quarter of a century before, had rediscovered and perfected the art of painting in oil. It was the age of the famous teacher of mathematics, Peurbach, of his pupil, Regiomontanus, who introduced the tangent as an element in analytical geometry, and whose calendars later on were so useful to Columbus and the great navigators. (Cf. Dr. James J. Walsh, in The American Catholic Quarterly Review, October, 1909; Clergymen Mathematicians.) It was the age of Cardinal Nicholas de Cusa, who insisted long before Bacon that in science the experimental method was the only true and safe one, who first studied the cycloid and anticipated the heliocentric theories of Copernicus. It was the age of the good Archbishop of Florence, Antonino Pierozzo, who, amid the labors of a life consecrated to the poor and the outcast, could find time to write even of comets.

Callistus III, it is true, was above everything else a man of action, a combatant for Christ. With his faith, his enthusiasm, his zeal, it was quite natural for him to order the church bells to ring out their summons to prayer and to call the people before their altars to implore God's blessing on the Christian arms. But notwithstanding the innuendoes of Platina and Dr. A. D. White, the assertions of Draper and Arago, of Hoeffler and Babinet, of Smyth and J. Candee Dean and a host of others, he never attempted to ring a comet down.

IN LANDS AFAR

HOLY WEEK IN RUSSIAN POLAND.

Nature has not been lavish to Lithuanian Poland, nor has man been kind to her. The culture and administration of the visible world are not her portion. But to-day though the cold winds from the Carpathians are blowing over her bare and monotonous plains and through her many-windowed cities (for the winters are long in the Kroulestro), the hearts of the people are aglow and her exiled sons and daughters, in lands more favored, are filled with memories; the Vielka Noc, the great night of the Resurrection is at hand. Lent is just over within the Russian Empire, where all must conform to the Russian Calendar, and Easter, the great feast of the Catholic Poles, falls this year on April 9.

If ever you visit Poland pray that your visit fall not during Lent or Advent, for fasting is a serious matter in that land, and dispensations are almost unknown. "The Czar has bribed the Pope," they said once on the occasion of a dispensation, and they fasted more rigorously than ever. For the Czar is not loved even though he must be prayed for and though he has appointed ninety-four court feasts which must be kept as religious holidays throughout the Grand-Duchy. They tell you in Warsaw of a priest visiting the country for the first time and wishing to say a "Black Mass" on a day dedicated to one of these imperial holidays, whereas in his Ordo it was a semi-double. "Father," implored the bewildered sacristan, "if the police should see you," and the good priest said his Requiem Mass in white vestments. No, the Czar's government is not loved save by the school-boy, whose vacations these court feasts have doubled. You cannot make a people loyal by ukase or Act of Parliament and Russia has given little else to Poland. But it is Holy Week in Poland, and politics are forgotten.

If you would see faith becoming vision, if you would see a people whose eyes have almost seen and whose hands have almost handled the unseen world, then go to Russian Poland for Holy Week. The churches are thronged with penitents: they have come afoot and fasting from far away farms and hamlets. Before dawn they surround the church doors and many have spent the night there, awaiting entrance; they draw around the confessional so close that secrecy is impossible and secrecy is unsought: priest and penitent and waiting throng forming one family group seeking forgiveness from a Father who loves them. From the confessional they go straight to the Altar-rail, for in Poland the briefest interval between Absolution and Communion is all too short; and during Holy Week Communion is given hourly throughout the day and even into the night.

"Praised be Jesus Christ!" as they all say in Poland, it is Holy Thursday morning, and the Sacred Host is carried in triumph to the repository in front of which two Roman soldiers are on guard, and there it is enthroned and remains for adoration until Saturday evening, the Vielka Noc. Good Friday does not strike the note of sorrow that prevails throughout the rest of Christendom. The air is full of hope and subdued joy. The Christ is not conquered, the door of the tomb will burst open and the Roman soldiery will bow before the Glory revealed. And as they kneel in worship throughout the night, and sing their canticles, the figure of their own country rises before them, and the Resurrection is the symbol of their hope. Late on Saturday night a hush comes over the assembly as when dawn rolls away the dark mantle from the sky and the voices of the night are stilled, the priest solemnly announces the Feast of the Resurrection, a procession is formed, the monstrance is taken down from its throne and carried to the High Altar, the Te Deum is chanted and the "Vielka Noc" has begun.

The homes of rich and poor are filled with rejoicing; the Beni, the Paschal meal is eaten, and Christ is praised wherever two men meet.

Naturalists tell us of flowers that yield their sweetest odors only when crushed, and it would seem too that religion yields her rarest gifts to the afflicted. In the religion of Poland there is much that the Liturgist may disapprove of, but those "parfums sauvages" springing from a soil of sorrow are a sweet odor before the most High, and in her desolation Poland may exclaim: "My father and my mother have left, but the Lord hath taken me up."

IN MISSION FIELDS

A writer in the April number of Pearson's Magazine, in the course of an article entitled "Business vs. Christianity," draws a striking contrast between Catholic foreign missionary life and that led by Protestant evangelizers. Recently we had occasion to chronicle the death of Father William Stanton, S.J., after several years of solitary life spent in a distant part of British Honduras where whites are seldom seen. The sacrifices made by Catholic missionaries are matters of common knowledge to Catholics. The following paragraphs, to which we have referred, may possibly come as a shock and an enlightenment to a class of readers unacquainted with Catholic history and missionary affairs:

"Although I am not a Catholic and was raised in a Protestant church, I must confess that when I traveled down the Yang Tse Kiang my allegiance instinctively went out to three Jesuits who were traveling in the steerage, wearing Oriental garb, making themselves as inconspicuous as possible and acting, to all outward semblance, like Chinamen, holding faith with their triple vow to Silence (sic), Poverty and Obedience.

"At the same time there were at table with me, in the first saloon, three Protestant missionaries, of different denominations, each with his own Chinese servant, and each explaining to me, at different times, how he really ought to have more money to get along properly in that heathen country. Had it come to a spiritual show-down I fear I should have cast my lot with the Jesuits. Their conduct accorded more closely with my interpretation of the New Testament.

"The warrant for the missionary spirit lies in Christ's injunction to go forth into all lands and preach the Gospel. But, did He not also urge His disciples to forsake friends, relatives, home and all else in pursuit of their great mission? Does the missionary forsake anything? Nothing, except the insecurity of payment from an impoverished parish."

The Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny are in charge of a leper asylum on Mangarewa Island, in the South Pacific Ocean. The island is at a distance of forty days' sail from Tahiti, and being out of the track of ocean vessels, is regularly visited only twice a year. Although the island belongs to France, where religious have been robbed and persecuted, the government has not molested the heroic nuns.

CORRESPONDENCE

Progress in Denmark

COPENHAGEN, MARCH 20, 1910.

Denmark is a small country with a population of about three millions. Nearly all the inhabitants belong to the established Lutheran Church, which for more than three hundred years held uncontrolled supremacy. In 1849 freedom of worship was introduced and with it came the Catholic Faith, which had been suppressed by force three hundred years ago. Since then the growth of the Catholic Church has been slow but steady and she numbers eight thousand members, besides about an equal number of Polish workers, who come and go every summer.

Denmark forms an Apostolic Vicariate, the Vicar, Bishop Johannes von Eüch, having celebrated recently the golden jubilee of his priesthood. On that occasion there was edited an interesting volume commemorative of his apostolate, illustrated by many pictures of churches, hospitals and priests, in which the whole career of Church and bishop is set forth. Since he has lived the half century of his priesthood here his life has been one with the life of the Catholic Church in Denmark these fifty years. Though born in Hanover his life-work has made him more a Dane than a German. He has done good and permanent work in our country and God has blessed it. He is loved and honored by many outside as well as inside the fold.

In the year 1860 there were only two Catholic churches in all Denmark. There are now more than thirty, many of them beautiful edifices. In the later years many religious orders have been introduced: Jesuits, Redemptorists, Camillians, Premonstratensians, Lazarists, Marists, Franciscans, and also many sisterhoods, chiefly the Sisters of St. Joseph, who form a complete province in our country. We enjoy here the same freedom as in Holland, England and the United States. We have not to ask the government for permission to build churches, monasteries or hospitals except in so far as the regulations of the building committee bind the general public. In this we are far more advantageously situated than our German neighbors. There are now 71 priests, of whom 51 are regulars, working in Denmark; 440 members of female orders are laboring in the education of children and the nursing of the sick. Most of our clergy are necessarily of foreign origin; we have Germans, Dutchmen, Belgians, Frenchmen, Austrians, and one valiant Irishman among our Danish clergy.

Our Catholic literature is of good quality, if not very extensive. For nearly sixty years we have had a little Catholic weekly, and more recently an excellent fortnightly was established, mainly of a literary character. We have one Catholic author of national, if not international standing, Johannes Jørgensen. He has written many excellent books, his principal work being a very learned biography of St. Francis of Assisi. His works of travel have had a wide repute, having been translated into many languages, and some of the most beautiful poems in Danish of later years originate from his pen. Many of his books on a great variety of subjects have been translated into German, French and Dutch; I wonder why they have not yet found their way into English, because I think they would be found to harmonize with the Anglo-Saxon and still more with the Celtic mind. He has written recently a charming book on Lourdes, in which, however, he shows himself somewhat pessimistic regarding Catholic literature and art, plainly influenced by the eminent English writer, Robert Hugh Benson, whose "The Lord of the World" he has translated into Danish.

Naturalists tell us of flowers that yield their sweetest

Our hospitals have contributed greatly to our successful progress. Our Sisters are loved by all, Catholics and non-Catholics alike, and many thousands of all denominations are nursed every year by the good Sisters. Our schools have had also very satisfactory progress. The secondary schools in charge of the Sisters of St. Joseph are frequented for their thoroughness in French as well as in general elementary education. The Jesuits have a large college near Copenhagen, attended by three hundred pupils, and we have also in Copenhagen an excellent Catholic High School for boys. In Iceland our Catholic school has been a great success, being the largest private school in the metropolis of the island.

What will the future bring? Will the Catholic Church go ever onward, getting mightier and larger among us? The Protestant Established Church has kept much of the old Faith; the baptism of the Lutheran ministers is considered valid and converts to the Catholic Church are not rebaptized. But in recent years Rationalism from Germany has found its way into Denmark, and soon, perhaps, many will find out that supernatural faith is only firmly asserted in the Catholic Church and return to it in consequence. I do not foresee that the whole Danish people will be Catholic, as in the good old days, but I believe and hope that the development will go on as begun and that one day all who believe in Jesus as the Son of God shall have found the sole place where that Faith has its sound foundation.

NIELS HANSEN, M.A.

Some Features of the Religious Crisis in France

BOLLÈNE, MARCH 26, 1910.

Judgments on religious and social matters in France at the present moment are apt to be absolutely different, according to the atmosphere in which the writer moves. One thing is certain everywhere: Catholicism in France is going through a sharp crisis, but this crisis may be viewed from opposite standpoints. In Paris and other large centres, it requires no effort to see things under an inspiring aspect. There, the Catholics are numerous, they are often distinguished, energetic and devoted; their influence, if not dominant, is perceptible, and there is an encouraging sound, as of successful warfare, about their undertakings. Hence, letters on social and religious questions, the two being closely connected, written from Paris, are generally somewhat optimistic in tone. If there, more than elsewhere, evil is bold and ingenious in its devices, there also the opposite party, stimulated by incessant attacks, gives its very best; even the closeness and fierceness of the conflict have a bracing effect and it is comparatively easy to consider the religious question as on that may, in the long run, be happily solved through Catholic activities.

Very differently does the same question present itself in the provinces, even in those that, until the last few years, kept the Faith and were true to its practices. There the steady, crafty action of the anti-Clericals has done its work and, to all appearances, the Catholic Faith is, in many places quietly dying out. This little town whence these lines are written, lying off the main track, at some distance from the railway, was within the last few years a Catholic stronghold. It belonged to the Comtat, which, until the Revolution of 1789, was the property of the Holy See, and where the just, gentle and generous rule of the Popes was deservedly popular.

This fact doubtless contributed to the resistance which the Papists, as the Pope's subjects called themselves, opposed to the French Revolutionists who, after 1790, attempted to take possession of the Comtat; these quiet, believing people were sincerely attached to their distant sovereign, whose Legates, residing at Carpentras, governed them wisely and well. They had no desire to belong to the imperious Republic, their powerful neighbors; but their unwillingness and feeble protests were of no avail; the Comtat was finally annexed to France in 1792. Evil days followed, the horrors of the French Revolution were repeated in the quiet little cities, whose days of peace were now at an end. At Orange a bloody tribunal was instituted that in the space of six weeks condemned and executed three hundred and thirty persons, among whom were thirty-two nuns.

When the great storm was past, the people of the Comtat resumed their religious practices and until the last few years this corner of France seemed comparatively free from the sceptical spirit that was rife elsewhere. Now things have again changed and the accounts given to us by the priests of this remote spot are unfortunately typical of what is taking place throughout the provincial towns and country villages of France. It is a steady falling away; from year to year there are fewer communicants, fewer attendants at Mass, even on Sundays; fewer children to follow Catechism. Village churches that used to be too small to hold their congregations are now miserably too large for a handful of worshippers.

In certain parts of France, in Normandy, for instance, the depopulation of many villages in consequence of a general exodus towards Paris may, in a measure, account for these facts. In the district of which we are speaking, on the contrary, the population is rather on the increase, so the religious neglect of its inhabitants must be attributed to other causes. These causes are complex; chief among them are the general and most pernicious influence of atheistical and revolutionary newspapers, the considerable pressure exercised over the lower classes by the lay-teachers, who embody the hostility of the Government towards the Church; the loss of religious customs in families, where, fifty years ago, parents taught their children their catechism, whereas now they mock its teaching. To these causes the priests of the little town of which we are speaking add a certain indifference and reserve on the part of the upper classes. This is perceptible in the provinces rather than in Paris, where men and women bearing the greatest names in France are at the head of all good works. In the remote provinces those who might lead often keep aloof; they are hampered by old prejudices, distrustful of new methods; they give their money for a definite object, but are less willing to give their time, intelligence, sympathy and good will.

It is difficult for them to admit that the aspect of things has changed and that if they wish to save their country from drifting into paganism they must throw themselves resolutely into the fight and make use of weapons that are timely and up to date. Given the deadly peril of the cause of religion in France no one, having intelligence and good will at his disposal, is justified in keeping aloof under pretense that social questions are abstruse and uninteresting or that a silent example of obedience to the precepts of the Church is all that can be demanded from her children. In times of prosperity and peace it may be so; in times of war greater activity is required and becomes a positive duty.

The future of religion in provincial France is not encouraging and the dearth of priests, an inevitable consequence of the break with Rome, does not help to solve the problem. Yet it would be folly to despair, and the religious reaction that is perceptible in many large towns may, in time, spread to the provinces. But this will take years, and in the meantime a steady leakage is universal throughout the country and, in the Comtat as elsewhere, the discouraged priests sadly own to it.

Yet in the Comtat, more than elsewhere, they do not want for examples that should brace them to new endeavors. The silver lining of the dark cloud of the Revolution in the Pope's old dominions was the extraordinary courage with which many priests, nuns and laymen faced a hideous death. From the quiet old convent where I write these lines, seventeen Sacramentine nuns, some of whom were mere girls, went to the scaffold at Orange "laughing," and their memory clings, an inspiring reminiscence, to the ancient walls of the little town where they were trained to religious life. It was touching to note how the weary and harassed priests, in their present perplexities and disappointments, recall the remembrance of these brave women, their glorious fellow citizens, who, amidst difficulties more tragic, but perhaps more bracing from their very horror, "fought the good fight" and served God in gladness even unto death.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

A Catholic Scientific Society

'Twas the first of March, 1875. A little group of ten friends, all interested in scientific studies, sat chatting. Most of them had been at college together and all good Catholics. Among them was Father Carboneille, S.J., who had been their science professor during their college days and still took a lively interest in them. He liked to talk with them at their gatherings, and their projects were in great part due to his initiative. Their talk drifted to societies—someone proposed that they should form a Catholic Scientific Society. The idea took and each one agreed to hunt up some friends, who might become members. Several informal meetings followed. Then two provisional meetings were held on June 10 and 17, 1875, to draw up a set of constitutions. The next move was a letter addressed to those who might like to become members. This was in July, and on November 18, 1875, was held the first formal meeting of "La Société Scientifique de Bruxelles." At this meeting 453 members were present.

The first article of the constitutions, after stating the name of the society, gives its device which is taken from the Constitution IV of the Vatican Council, "Between faith and reason there can never be a real contradiction" (Nulla unquam inter fidem et rationem vera dissensio esse potest). The following article reads: "The end of the Society is the advancement and spread of science according to the spirit of its motto." While the tenth article adds: "The Society will never allow at its meetings any attack, however polite, against the Catholic religion, or against philosophy based on spiritual and religious truths." These three articles of its constitutions give a good idea of the aims of the Brussels Scientific Society. It is to be the champion of Faith against the so-called Rationalism of the age. It is to show the world that the Church is ever favoring Science; that true Science is not Faith's foe. Following this spirit the society is ever alert, whenever in the scientific world some new theory is advanced that attacks or casts a shadow on some truth of our Faith.

Having many of the foremost scientists of Europe among its members, the Brussels Scientific Society is ever able to afford a scientific answer to the objections that are put forward against the truth. Pasteur's researches, which led to the denial of Spontaneous Generation, are too well known to be quoted here; then there is another of its members, Wassmann, who has done so much lately for the cause of truth and science in showing up the fraud in the works of Haeckel. And quite lately the society gave a good part of one of its meetings to the now burning question of Neo-Malthusianism and Race Suicide. The articles there read have been reprinted from "La Revue des Questions Scientifiques" and are being spread broadcast over the land.

The society meets three times a year. The principal work is done at the meeting held during four days at Eastertide; the other two meetings are held during the months of October and January and last but a day. To give a wider scope to the work done, the society is divided into five branches, which sit simultaneously at the meetings. These five branches are respectively given to the study of Mathematics, Physics, Natural Sciences, Medicine and Economics. To further research the society awards from time to time medals to those of its members, who have specially distinguished themselves in scientific research. During the past thirty-five years of its existence eight medals have been awarded—a ninth is to be awarded at the meeting next Eastertide. The society also subsidizes financially those of her members who are hindered from carrying out researches through lack of funds. Hardly a year passes without one or more subsidies being voted. These subsidies have, for the most part, been granted to young men just beginning a scientific career, although, from time to time, a subsidy is voted to some member, whose work has been crowned by the society, when this work has put him to great expense.

Membership is made up of all those who are interested in the growth and spread of science, the only condition being that they must profess the Catholic Faith. Looking over the list of its members, one finds, side by side, the names of churchmen and laymen. There are cardinals, bishops and priests, professors, doctors, engineers; even the army and navy are represented. There, too, may be seen names famous in the world of science, such as Pasteur, de Lapparent, Duhem, Secchi, and our own distinguished engineer, General Newton.

The society has never been in the least exclusive, living on the most friendly terms with the other scientific bodies that profess no faith whatsoever, and by far the greater part of its members hold membership in one or more of the learned societies that flourish on the Continent. A glance at some of the scientific gatherings to which she has sent representatives is illuminating in this respect. She has been represented at celebrations given on the anniversaries of famous professors at the universities of Louvain, of Liège, and of the new Sorbonne at Paris. When "La Société centrale d'Agriculture de Belgique" celebrated, in 1893, its fortieth anniversary the Brussels Scientific Society sent an address of congratulation. In 1894 it was the Brussels Scientific Society that so successfully organized the "Third International Scientific Congress of Catholics." When later the Belgica returned from the Antarctic seas with the members of the Belgian Antarctic Expedition, the Brussels Scientific Society united with the Royal Belgian Academy, and the other learned societies of the land, to welcome home the explorers who had brought glory to their fatherland. One is surprised, as one looks over the documentary history of the society, at the number of communications that have passed between it and the Chair of Peter. And the name of the Papal Nuncio at Brussels is ever appearing on the pages of its history.

Like most learned bodies the society publishes all the papers that are read before the various sections, as well as all business done by the Board of Directors, in the "Annales de la Société Scientifique de Bruxelles," which appears four times a year. In addition to this it publishes La Revue des Questions Scientifiques, a scientific quarterly meant for the general public interested in the doings of the scientific world. This review contains the papers of general interest that have been read at meetings of the society, as well as many other original articles written expressly for it. There is also a complete criticism of the works on science appearing during the quarter, to which is added a summary of the chief articles of interest that have appeared in contemporary reviews. All this helps to swell the thickness of the number, so that each number with its 352 pages is almost a volume in itself.

The idea of the society has been more or less unique. It is true, there existed before it the "Görres Gesellschaft" of Munich, a Catholic body, but it deals only with history, while "Società cattolica Italiana per gli studi scientifici" took its idea from the Brussels Scientific Society, on which it is modeled. There remains only the "Leo Gesellschaft" of Vienna; it is of a later date than the Brussels Society; but what influence the latter had on its founding the writer is unable to say. J. E. T.

Recent Imperial Decrees in China

SHANGHAI, FEBRUARY 18, 1910.

The following decree has been addressed to all the Ministers of State, and is a true picture of how things stand in the Capital. It runs as follows: "The Throne hopes that all Ministers, both within and without the Capital, will observe harmony and banish private feelings, and that they will neither form factions to oppose different views, nor begin any measure in diligence and end it in idleness. It is only by such means that unity of mind can be established between Sovereign and Ministers, and good government be secured." (Issued Nov. 25, 1909.) In a speech delivered a little later before the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the Boards, the Regent dwelt more and more on the attitude of supineness already noticed above, and exhorted all "to discard their habitual inactivity and help forward reform measures in the Empire with all their might."

On January 14, of the present year, the same subject is broached anew, and we have another decree urging "all Officials to make straightforward and useful suggestions to the Throne. Those who do so will be rewarded and their suggestions carried out. Many memorials are of no value, and many officials have not suggested a single measure but live in blissful idleness." Comment is needless. The Regent is energetic and well-meaning but around him there is a lack of competent men, hence despite a plethora of decrees, the new program does not advance. Old China, with its natural stubbornness to change, its sluggish conservatism, is a deadweight on all national progress.

Two other decrees concern chiefly the Empress-Dowager, wife of the late Emperor Kuang-hsü; one of them confers on Her Majesty an honorary title and orders that on the auspicious occasion "Princes and High Ministers should perform obeisance to her." Another, dated January 11, informs the Empire that "the Emperor need not perform obeisance before Her Majesty on the next new year's day (the new year in China coincided with our 10th of February). Princess and ladies of rank are also dispensed from this ceremony." This was obviously to avoid all rivalry between the contending parties in the harem, of which mention was made in a previous letter. It discloses, however, the fact that the Regent is no longer the master, and that the real power which "sways the rod of Empire" is the new Dowager. If further evidence of this were needed, we have it from an incident which occurred on February 15. On this date, Prince Tsai-Hsun, brother of the Regent, and just returned from Europe, where he had been touring as Navy Commissioner, urged the Regent to reappoint Tuan-Fang as soon as possible to an official post, even proposing to create him a member of the new Naval Board. The Regent seemed to be willing to comply with the request, but added that he could reach no decision without the consent of the Empress-Dowager, who caused, in November last, the dismissal of Tuan-Fang. The matter rests, therefore, at present with the Dowager, who is unwilling to subordinate her personal animosity against Tuan-Fang to the interests of the Empire. It is generally anticipated in influential Peking circles that the time is not remote when Tuan-Fang will again play an important part in the public life of China.

COLONEL ROOSEVELT AND THE VATICAN

Colonel Roosevelt rejected the honor of an audience with the Holy Father during his visit to Rome. The details of the episode are best presented by the messages that passed between Colonel Roosevelt's spokesman and the Vatican officials, and the statements of the Cardinal Secretary of State and Bishop Kennedy, Rector of the American College.

While at Gondokoro in February last Mr. Roosevelt wrote to Ambassador Leishman, saying that he would be glad of the honor of an audience with King Victor Emmanuel and the Pope. The audience with the King was arranged promptly. Before an arrangement could be reached relative to an audience with the Pope several telegrams were passed between him and his spokesman in Rome.

Colonel Roosevelt received this cablegram from Mr. Leishman at Cairo, March 20 last:

"Mgr. Kennedy, Rector of the American Catholic College, in reply to an inquiry which I caused to be made, requests that the following communication be transmitted to you:

"The Holy Father will be delighted to grant an audience to Mr. Roosevelt on April 5, and hopes that nothing will arise to prevent it such as the much-regretted incident which made the reception of Mr. Fairbanks impossible."

Colonel Roosevelt, replying to Mr. Leishman, March 25, telegraphed:

"Please present the following to Mgr. Kennedy:

"It would be a real pleasure to me to be presented to the Holy Father, for whom I entertain high respect, both personally and as the head of a great Church. I fully recognize his entire right to receive or not receive whomsoever he chooses, for any reason that seems good to him, and if he does not receive me I shall not for a moment question the propriety of his action. On the other hand, I, in my turn, must decline to make any stipulations or submit to any conditions which in any way would limit my freedom of conduct. I trust that on April 5 he will find it convenient to receive me."

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

HOW BISHOP KENNEDY ACTED.

Mgr. Kennedy, the Rector of the American College, makes this statement in regard to the foregoing:

"On March 20 First Secretary of Embassy Garrett called on me to transmit a request and express Mr. Roosevelt's desire for an audience with the Holy Father on April 5. I informed Mr. Garrett that I would immediately present Mr. Roosevelt's request to the proper authorities of the Vatican, promising a response as soon as possible.

"The following day I was authorized to send the first message, which I did through the American Embassy. The reference to the Fairbanks incident in this message was intended by the Vatican only as a friendly intimation to Mr. Roosevelt to be on his guard.

"The message in reply from Mr. Roosevelt was communicated to the Vatican authorities on the same day. On Monday, the 28th, I was instructed to send the following:

"His Holiness would be much pleased to grant an audience to Mr. Roosevelt, for whom he entertains the highest esteem both personally and as a former President. His Holiness quite recognizes Mr. Roosevelt's entire right to full freedom of conduct. On the other hand, in view of circumstances for which neither His Holiness nor Mr. Roosevelt is responsible, an audience could not take place except on the understanding expressed in a former message."

"Nothing further from Mr. Roosevelt reached me."

On March 28 Mr. Roosevelt at Cairo received a cablegram from Ambassador Leishman giving this message from Mgr. Kennedy, and the following day Mr. Roosevelt sent another message to the American Ambassador, saying:

"The proposed presentation is of course now impossible."

CARDINAL MERRY DEL VAL'S STATEMENT.

The cable despatches from Rome to the New York Sun of Monday tell the reasons, as given out by Cardinal Merry del Val, Secretary of State, why the Pope did not see Colonel Roosevelt. At the opening the Cardinal said:

"This is the present situation: The Methodists here in Rome strive by every means to conduct a campaign of venomous hostility against the Holy Father by lies and slanders. Here at his very door, in this his own episcopal city, they harbor alien priests. Moreover, they openly sympathize with and aid his enemies. They also advocate and strive to put into effect the principle enunciated by Bovio at the foot of the statue of Giordano Bruno, the apostate priest, when he said: 'We have stripped the Pope of his temporal power and we will never rest till we strip him of his spiritual power as well.'

"When Mr. Roosevelt expressed a wish to see the Pope it was feared that he did not know that the situation was as I have described it. As a consequence he was advised in a friendly way and the hope was expressed that the audience would not be prevented by any incident similar to that which made impossible a meeting between His Holiness and Mr. Fairbanks. No condition was imposed, but the same procedure was adopted as when other audiences with the Pope are arranged."

Cardinal Merry del Val quoted as examples the audiences granted to the Emperor of Germany, King Edward of England and other sovereigns. The Cardinal then proceeded: "When audiences are arranged the Vatican authorities naturally suggest beforehand in a friendly way the things that are to be done. All this interchange of messages was preliminary and was naturally considered in the Vatican as confidential, not for the Vatican's sake but for that of Mr. Roosevelt himself, in order that he might be left free and unembarrassed on his arrival in Rome. Actually no application for an audience was made, but Mr. Roosevelt's wish to see the Pope was conveyed to the Vatican.

This and other communications, it was thought in the Vatican, were not intended for publication.

"I saw Mr. O'Laughlin, who presented a letter from Mgr. Falconio at Washington, who cabled the same day that it was his desire that I see Mr. O'Laughlin merely in the capacity of one of Mr. Roosevelt's traveling companions. Mr. O'Laughlin told me that he did not represent Mr. Roosevelt and then I asked what he was here for.

"Mr. O'Laughlin answered: 'To see if we cannot arrange the matter.' He assured me that if the telegrams that had passed were withdrawn Mr. Roosevelt would see the Pope and all the difficulties would be at an end. This, it seemed to me, showed that Mr. O'Laughlin was really in a position to arrange matters. Accordingly I replied: 'That is impossible.'

"Mr. O'Laughlin's contention was that Mr. Roosevelt was at liberty to go where he liked and to do what he pleased after the audience. My reply was:

"After or before makes no difference. It is not a question of religion. Mr. Roosevelt can go to his own or to any Protestant church in the city of Rome, and while there deliver an address if he chooses to do so. Then, if he pleases, he may drive direct from that church and be received by the Holy Father.' I added, however, that it would be more tactful if Mr. Roosevelt would first drive to his hotel and there wait a few minutes before starting out for the audience.

"But," I went on, 'he cannot go to the Methodists in this place. I do not know about the Methodists in other places and to them I do not refer—but those in this place are particularly offensive to His Holiness because they conduct a campaign of villainous calumny against the Holy See. Therefore, to go before or after the audience with the Pope and with the full knowledge that it would be offensive would be equally objectionable to the Holy Father.'

"Continuing, I said to Mr. O'Laughlin: 'All I ask is this: Can you assure me that Mr. Roosevelt will de facto not go to the Methodists, thus leaving entirely aside the question of what he may consider his rights in the matter?'

"Mr. O'Laughlin replied: 'I cannot give any such assurance. On the contrary, my opinion is that Mr. Roosevelt is just the kind of a man to go, although he has as yet made no engagement.'

"I replied: 'Mr. Roosevelt is entirely free to go where he pleases, but the Holy Father is certainly free to refuse to receive any one who reserves the right wittingly to offend him.'

The Cardinal then gave examples to illustrate the Vatican's point of view in the matter. Suppose, he suggested, that Mr. Roosevelt were to go to Berlin. He certainly would not go to Polish clubs if it were pointed out to him in a diplomatic way that such action would be offensive to the Kaiser. This before or after being received by his Majesty.

Another example he gave Mr. O'Laughlin, to quote his own words, was as follows: 'You are free to take off your coat when you visit me and you may sit in your shirt sleeves now if you desire, but if you were to do so I would certainly not receive you again.'

"Concluding my talk with Mr. O'Laughlin," the Cardinal said, "I remarked in substance: 'If I or any prelate from the Vatican went to America, we should consider ourselves obliged to conform to the laws and customs of that country. If I wished an audience at the White House I should feel obliged to inquire about the etiquette to be observed. I would naturally be anxious, if only as a matter of delicacy, to abstain from any act that might be interpreted as offensive. The Holy Father expects the same from all who desire to see him.'

INCOMPLETE STORY GIVEN OUT.

Although the negotiations were technically between Ambassador Leishman and Mgr. Kennedy, it is well understood in Rome that Mgr. Kennedy was acting under the instructions of Cardinal Merry del Val. The telegrams, therefore, were in reality between former President Roosevelt and the Papal Secretary of State, and surprise was expressed when it was learned that Colonel Roosevelt had given out the text of the messages exchanged by Mgr. Kennedy and the American Ambassador, as they were regarded by the Vatican in the light of diplomatic documents.

This surprise was increased when it was seen that the full text of Bishop Kennedy's last message was not given out but only the last sentence which, without what had preceded it, creates an erroneous impression of the affair.

To ensure the publicity of his own side of the incident, Colonel Roosevelt cabled the following statement to the Rev. Lyman Abbott, editor of The Outlook in New York, by whom it was given out at once to the daily press:

"Through The Outlook, I wish to make a statement to my fellow Americans regarding what has occurred in connection with the Vatican. I am sure that the great majority of my fellow citizens, Catholics quite as much as Protestants, will feel that I acted in the only way possible for an American to act, and because of this very fact I most earnestly hope that the incident will be treated in a matter-of-course way as merely personal, and, above all, as not warranting the slightest exhibition of rancor or bitterness. Among my best and closest friends are many Catholics. The respect and regard of those of my fellow Americans who are Catholics are as dear to me as the respect and regard of those who are Protestants. On my journey through Africa I visited many Catholic as well as many Protestant missions. As I look forward to telling the people at home all that has been done by Protestants and Catholics alike, as I saw it, in the field of missionary endeavor, it would cause me a real pang to have anything said or done that would hurt or give pain to my friends, whatever their religious belief. But any merely personal considerations are of no consequence in this matter. The important consideration is the avoidance of harsh and bitter comment such as may excite mistrust and anger between and among good men.

"The more an American sees of other countries the more profound must be his feelings of gratitude that in his own land there is not merely complete toleration but the heartiest good will and sympathy among sincere and honest men of different faiths—good will and sympathy so complete that in the innumerable daily relations of our American life Catholics and Protestants meet together and work together without thought of the difference of creed being even present in their minds.

"This is a condition so vital to our national wellbeing that nothing should be permitted to jeopardize it. Bitter comment and criticism, acrimonious attack and defense are not only profitless but harmful, and to seize upon such an incident as this as an occasion for controversy would be wholly indefensible and should be frowned upon by Catholics and Protestants alike, and all good Americans."

THE PAPAL DELEGATE SPEAKS.

His Excellency, Archbishop Diomedeo Falconio, the Papal Delegate, issued this statement at Washington on Monday:

"It is certain that the Pope has the highest esteem for Colonel Roosevelt, both as a private individual and as former President of the United States; also that he was looking forward with pleasure to meeting him. In the case of Colonel Roosevelt, as of Mr. Fairbanks, it was not at all a question of religion, but of the self-respect and dignity of the Apostolic See. Colonel Roosevelt could have gone to any other Protestant churches in Rome.

"After all that has been said it is unnecessary to insist that the Methodists' insulting agitation and offensive proselytism constitute a real warfare against the Holy Father and the Catholic religion, and that in the very heart of his ancient and venerable seat. It must be remembered that the Holy Father considers himself a sovereign ruler, and as such he is recognized by other nations. Besides, as the head of at least 250,000,000 Catholics, he has the right to special consideration and ought himself to be the very best judge of what that means. Every government has its etiquette or rules to protect the office and position of its ruler.

"The circumstance that in Rome the Methodists have organized themselves as an anti-Vatican party makes it impossible for the Holy Father to recognize them in any way, much less to strengthen them in the eyes of the Catholics of Italy. It is extremely unpleasant, to say the least, that this violent situation should have become public on the occasion of the visit to Rome of distinguished American citizens."

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND'S VIEW OF THE INCIDENT.

St. Paul, Minn., April 5.—Archbishop Ireland, after reading the report from Rome concerning the Roosevelt-Vatican incident, made the following statement:

Before passing judgment on the Roosevelt incident in Rome one should be thoroughly conversant with all attending circumstances, more so, indeed, than the statements appearing in the morning papers seemingly permit.

"Of one thing I am certain—the Methodist propaganda in Rome is so vile, so calumnious in its assaults upon the Catholic faith, so dishonest in its methods to win proselytes that the Holy Father, the supreme guardian of the faith, is compelled by the vital principles of his high office to avert, at all cost, the slightest movement on his part that might directly or indirectly, be interpreted as abetting the propaganda, or approving even by implication, its purposes and tactics.

"Since the Fairbanks incident I have received from Rome most reliable data, that more than justify any statement I have heretofore made or may at any other time be prepared to make, with regard to this Methodist propaganda. Indeed, the address of the Methodist minister in Rome, the Rev. Mr. Tipple, the Sunday after the Fairbanks incident, is an all-sufficient indication of its rancorous spirit and of the egregious calumnies to which it resorts.

"It is as clear as noonday to those who know the facts in connection with the Methodist Roman propaganda that any man, however otherwise worthy and illustrious, giving or likely to give, public recognition of any kind to its work, even to its existence, could not be received by the Holy Father.

"How far Cardinal Merry del Val had reason to suspect from the movements of the Methodists themselves, or otherwise, that there was peril lest Mr. Roosevelt even unwittingly, be entangled in their meshes, I am not in a position to say. The Cardinal is a wise, judicious statesman, and must have well weighed the whole situation before he acted. His words deserve consideration. 'It is not,' he said, 'a question of religion.'

"Mr. Roosevelt might have gone to an Episcopalian, Presbyterian or any other church, except the Methodist and delivered an address there and he could have been received by the Pope on the same day. But he could not be received when it was suspected that, after the audience with the Pope, he intended to go to the Methodist Church in Rome, which is carrying on a most offensive campaign against the Pontiff.

His Grace concludes that Cardinal Merry del Val, guided by his knowledge of local circumstances, would take no risk; the honor of the Holy See must be safeguarded.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Vatican Etiquette

The climax of sensations in Mr. Roosevelt's progress through Europe will be difficult to sustain after his failure to obtain unconditionally a special audience with Pope Pius X. Apparently his advance agents have bungled the affair. He surely would never have thought of seeking a reception at the Vatican without scrupulously complying with the etiquette of the papal court. His critics have blamed him for many faults; but they have never accused him of not knowing the proprieties. In Berlin he will not think of visiting Emperor William, and straightway addressing a Socialist gathering in favor of their suffrage programme; he will not meet Fallières, in Paris, and then seek an opportunity of telling the French people that, compared to ours, their republic is a despotic oligarchy. In London, he will not go to St. James, and next to the Home Rulers to tell them they are right in frustrating the measures of the government. What would we think of the distinguished foreigner who, after an audience with President Taft, would go to the nearest rendezvous to encourage his insurgent opponents to a more strenuous antagonism. No one can appreciate the impropriety of such tactics more than Mr. Roosevelt. He has no special sympathy with Methodism; and surely he must with all sober-minded observers know and deprecate their offensive proselytism in the name of their religion in Rome. Above all, if it be true that the outlook of his present course is bounded solely by the political horizon, he or his advisers should know since the Fairbanks incident, that public opinion appreciates too well the rule of the Vatican for special audiences to side too readily with anyone who will not respect its etiquette.

Lesson of the Fairbanks Incident

Regrettable as the Fairbanks incident was, it has had the happy result of disseminating through the press of the country some very useful information about the significance of an audience with the Pope and the character of the Methodist propaganda in Rome. The millions of our non-Catholic fellow-countrymen who have grown to believe that the power and influence of the papacy was a thing of the past have been surprised to learn that few persons of importance go to Rome without seeking as a distinguished favor an audience with the spiritual head of Christendom. They go to pay homage to his transcendent influence as a moral power even among men and peoples who do not accept his teachings, or comprehend the exalted character of his authority. They hear many utterances from his august lips, but one thing they never hear and that is the slightest painful or disturbing reference to their own religious sentiment, or, as it may be, to their lack of religious faith. In sharp contrast with his truly paternal, tolerant spirit is the offensive and intolerant proselytism of the Methodists in Rome, seizing every opportunity to insult the Vatican, as Mr. Tipple did so blatantly after interviewing Mr. Roosevelt this very week, and resorting to the altogether un-American system of the soup-house, to entice a few needy Italians to their meetings.

Press-Agent Diplomacy

Smarting under the rebuke they had received when Mr. Fairbanks was denied an audience at the Vatican, the Methodist proselytizers in Rome were very naturally determined to make it awkward for Mr. Roosevelt to obtain his audience. They have not concealed their purpose to put him on record as pro-papal in case he should meet the Holy Father and not honor them with a visit. This the Vatican knew very well, and no other course was left open to the Cardinal Secretary of State than to insist on an agreement that Mr. Roosevelt should not express his regard for the Pope one hour and for his declared enemies the next. In the light of information we have received from Rome, it is unjust to suggest that Mgr. Kennedy, of the American College, acting as intermediary, might have refrained from asking Mr. Roosevelt to say that he would not visit the Methodist body in Rome. The Methodists themselves had forced that issue on the Vatican, and it was imperative that Mr. Roosevelt should declare whether he intended to accept or decline their invitation. He, or to speak more correctly, his agents decided not to respect the etiquette of the Vatican with the result that his audience with the Pope became impossible. It appears that his advisers were of opinion that the Vatican authorities would relent, and make an exception in his case; for as soon as it became manifest that he must observe the proprieties or lose his audience, overtures were made by his private secretary to Cardinal Merry del Val, intimating that he would comply with requirements but that the conditions mentioned in Mgr. Kennedy's messages need not be expressly exacted. It was too late. The Vatican is above the press-agent diplomacy. Through their blundering the ex-President lost the supreme opportunity of his homeward progress.

Redeeming the Situation

The press agent had blundered; the press agent must redeem the situation. Forthwith a message must come to the world through the Outlook that Mr. Roosevelt is only a private citizen; that his inability to satisfy the Vatican authorities is only a personal matter; that he was actuated by a spirit of American independence; that he was championing religious toleration, and other similar sentiments available for such critical occasions. It is true that Mr. Roosevelt is only a private citizen, but the press of the United States is treating him as if he were the paramount personage of the country; his agents are using every means to constitute him our chief representative citizen as well as emeritus official; the twaddle about American independence and religious toleration is again the press agent playing to the gallery. How is it that the crowned heads of Europe can pay homage to Pius X without forfeiting their independence? Why do not the Methodists in Rome, Mr. Tipple, for instance, respect the principles of religious toleration? Mr. Roosevelt's cable message to the Outlook shows that he is ill-advised by a secretary and press agents who seem to be making use of him to play politics at too long a range.

Press Comments

The leading newspapers of this country have not only reported this matter fairly as the facts came out; they have also commented upon it editorially with an insight which leaves no question about the responsibility for the blunder. Tempting as Mr. Roosevelt's Monday morning cable was, they heroically refrained from comment until they had heard the other side from their own agents abroad. So illuminating and impartial are the views they express that we gladly devote an unusual space to extracts from the press in this issue. The interview with the Cardinal Secretary of State, as cabled to the New York Sun, is eminently satisfactory; the editorials from the World and the Evening Journal voice the sentiment of every reasonable American. The effort to blame the Rector of the American College in Rome for the blunder has failed lamentably, as appears very clearly in the interview of the Sun's correspondent with Cardinal Merry del Val, and in its own editorial.

Tipple Another Burchard

Mr. Tipple, the Methodist representative in Rome, has been playing the part of the famous Dr. Burchard. His denunciation of the Vatican, handed to the reporters after an interview with Mr. Roosevelt, recalls the fatal address to Blaine and accounts for the condition that no one who tolerates such fanaticism may expect an audience with the Pope.

Evangelism and Exports

The Laymen's Missionary Movement is the greatest undertaking of the kind that America has ever seen. The object is to transform the religious aspect of the world and to achieve the mighty feat within the compass of a single generation. Precisely what religious hue or shade is to be imparted to the millions that are still untainted with Christianity does not appear in the prospectus of the enterprise or in the addresses of its most ardent supporters nor can the information be gathered from a study of the church affiliations of the members. This particular feature of the proposed spiritual conquest, which seems vital to us onlookers and ought to be important to the heathen to be evangelized, is gracefully and effectively adorned with a wealth of neutral-tinted drapery. What the message is to be is a trivial question; what the cash returns will be is the one thing necessary.

Openly and frankly as beseems him who appeals for general support and contributions, the evangelistic spell-binder takes the public into his confidence and proves that he has an attractive proposition. As far as we have seen the reports of the meetings, the dominant note in the addresses is monotonously the same: "This is a paying proposition!" And mark you, the "paying" is not the antiquated reward of consciousness of duty done, nor is it the bizarre flummery of latter-day altruism, nor is it the treasure stored away where "no thief approacheth nor moth corrupteth," for such might be discouragingly out of reach; but the paying is in good and lawful money of the republic. The bid is for a cash investment with cash returns. The evangelist is a trade-puller, therefore it is good business to utilize his services. As samples of soap and salve are distributed gratis in view of the sales that they may effect, so missionaries are to be sent out and maintained in view of the demand for American manufactures which will arise from their presence and the influence of their example.

Protestant missions have always been very expensive and the expense has been enthusiastically met. And the upkeep of the system has not fallen exclusively nor even largely upon the wealthy members of the denomination. Children contribute their pennies and the poor contribute theirs. There is the "week of self-denial" during which some article of every-day use, such as sugar, is left off the table, and the amount thus saved goes to the mission fund; there is the "mission rally," there is the "mite society," and there is the oyster supper where the lone oyster is so sad. All these small sums swell into a handsome amount which goes towards supporting in style and state some indifferent apostle in China or Japan, who, had he remained in America, would depend on "donation parties" for his winter coal and cabbage. We recognize and admire this old-time Protestant mission spirit, for it speaks of self-sacrifice, earnestness and zeal on the part of the givers, how vain soever their efforts, how mistaken soever their zeal; but this modern propaganda, in which salt pork and spirituality, beef and the Beatitudes, manufactures and manuals of prayer are jumbled together cheek by jowl, is a campaign of commercialism with no extenuating circumstances.

Strong, able men have sallied forth as Protestant missionaries and they have toiled and suffered in the cause. They did not have town houses and country houses, carriages and servants, with every bodily want supplied from "home;" but such were never numerous nor are they conspicuous in the mission field to-day. It looks as if the greatest hardship nowadays is that they cannot vote for governor, though they may get back often enough to vote for President.

After all that has been said and done the sad truth remains that in Japan, for example, the non-Christian population is almost equal in number to the inhabitants of the United States who are without church membership! But the United States has no tea to speak of, no silk worth mentioning, little coal and timber land that has not already been "grabbed," while the unsophisticated Heathen Chinese has all these things and more.

This latest phase of the foreign missionary movement among our separated brethren will develop trade and make a market for Yankee notions, but nations cannot be Christianized as flocks of sheep are dipped. Fifty million dollars a year is the estimate for this religio-commercial onslaught. The immense sum may be gathered and gathered yearly, for it comes to the merest trifle apiece when collected from our generous people, but idols will remain in the temple of Baal.

Back to the Land

Drawn by the attractive glamor of city life, the young people of the rural districts have flocked to the great centres of population where each and every one arrives with vague expectations of great success. A few eventually win renown, some return sadder and wiser to the quiet round of farm duties, but many remain in the cities as recruits to the army under police surveillance. The number of children born and bred in a great metropolis who in some way come into unfriendly contact with the Department of Public Safety is in itself a good argument against city life as the best for boys and girls. There is something humanizing and civilizing in gardens, fields and meadows. They lack the bustle, the frenzy, we might say, of the crowded thoroughfare but they make for healthy minds in healthy bodies. If rural pursuits have the tendency to develop strong, manly boys, why should they not act as a wholesome corrective for city boys who have fallen into evil ways?

Bolton Hall in The Survey for March 19 gives us a most interesting glimpse of what has been accomplished by the introduction of farming and gardening into the lives of the inmates of industrial and correctional institutions. Only too few of these reformatories have given an extensive trial to this kind of work, but in every case the results have been highly gratifying. It is one thing to be cooped up at a bench all day long and locked in a cage at night; it is quite another thing to be out in God's sunlight and fresh air, even if one has to wield a hoe or a spade.

Forty schools for dependents and delinquents report farms for employing their charges, but we must believe that in many others gardens afford a simple, sensible and easily available means of busying even young and inexperienced boys. The beneficial effects of what might well be called the open-air treatment of delinquents are conspicuously present in the Report of the Ohio State Reformatory, where the extensive grounds permitted the successful employment of over two hundred youths in agricultural pursuits. The fruits of the system for the physical and moral well-being of those subjected to it make the superintendent its enthusiastic advocate. It is folly to think that any good can be done to a large number of boys who are kept indoors most of the time and for a small part of the day are herded outside like cattle.

Almost a Subject For Psychical Research

"The Dalai Lama has entered India followed by several Shapes." "The Dalai Lama called on the Viceroy yesterday. Three Shapes accompanied him. His Excellency, attended by two aides-de-camp, returned the call immediately." Such statements appearing in the newspapers, together with casual items about the cotton crop, stagger the reader. He has always known something of the occultism of the East, but these bring its mystery home to him and his blood runs cold. What are these Shapes? Are they astral bodies or materialized spirits? As they passed through the streets of Calcutta did they imitate the behavior of the "sheeted ghosts in the Roman streets"? And how did they conduct themselves in presence of the majesty of Britain? Are they the "grisly shapes" of Milton, or the milder ones of Lewis Carroll? How brave of Lord Minto, aspersions on whose courage, by the way, a Canadian paper has dared to publish, to return the call immediately; and when he was conversing with the Dalai Lama did the aides-de-camp entertain themselves with the Shapes? These and a thousand similar questions a paper more than usually correct brings to an abrupt end by putting an acute accent on the e; and books of reference hastily consulted destroy all the weird glamor of the word by telling that Shapé is Thibetan for a mere minister of state.

The Index of Volume II is enfolded in this number. A glance at it suffices to estimate the number and variety of the articles treated in the twenty-six numbers of the half-year that go to make a volume. This issue closes the first year of AMERICA'S existence. Renewal of subscriptions is in order now.

LITERATURE

The Catholic Encyclopedia. An International Work of Reference on the Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church. Edited by CHARLES G. HERBERMAN, Ph.D., LL.D., EDWARD A. PACE, Ph.D., D.D., THOMAS J. SHAHAN, D.D., CONDÉ B. PALLEN, Ph.D., LL.D., JOHN J. WYNNE, S.J., assisted by Numerous Collaborators. In Fifteen Volumes. Volume VII. New York: Robert Appleton Company.

To use a sporting phrase, the enterprise of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" has "got into its stride" and is going forward with a sureness and speed that are gratifying to the thousands who are watching its progress and waiting eagerly for the completion of each stage of its onward course. It is only a few months since we reviewed the sixth volume, and now another of the massive tomes is given to the public, filled like its predecessors with a well-ordered and stately array of interesting facts and accurate erudition, representing the best Catholic scholarship in all parts of the world. The publication of the seventh volume means in effect that half of the great work is finished. Indeed, it must mean that four-fifths of the labor and concern of the editors and publishers are past and gone. The material of several more volumes is determined and in preparation; the worry and strain and alert initiative necessarily incidental to the breaking of ground entirely new on such a vast scale have been replaced by experience and an easy familiarity with the sources of expert knowledge. On the other hand the wall of skepticism and doubt concerning the ultimate success of such a gigantic venture has been thoroughly demolished, and those who might have been inclined to scoff or to blow cold have become firm believers and warm supporters of the Encyclopedia. From now to the end there ought to be nothing but fair sailing and following breezes, and we congratulate those concerned, now their course is nearly done, on their courage, skill, energy and success.

The latest volume shares with those that have been already published that bewilderment of riches which fills the possessor with an exhilarating sense of anticipation and promises him hours of pleasure whenever leisure or research will lead him to enjoy its rich stores. With the reviewer it is otherwise. The very wealth tantalizes him. He does not know where to begin, and the length of his official visit of investigation is limited. He is apt to be like the youth in the fairy tale who, being introduced into a treasure house for five minutes, is told that he may carry away with him whatever he chooses, and whom the fear of a bad choice prevented from choosing at all until the last moment, when in desperation he seizes on an object of little value and flees. The only thing to do under the circumstances is to choose quickly and continuously, and according to what light happens to be at one's disposal.

The first impression that one receives on opening the seventh volume is that it abounds in interesting biographical sketches. That of St. Ignatius Loyola is written by Father Pollen and is illustrated with six likenesses of the Saint. Titian's portrait in the collection of Earl Spencer is reproduced among them. It is a comparatively unknown likeness and perhaps is superior to the commonly accepted portraits of St. Ignatius in its power to suggest those characteristics of force, energy and personal magnetism that are conspicuous in his history. Two distinguished Paulists, Fathers Hecker and Hewit, have their interesting careers written here by two of their spiritual sons. Archbishop Hughes has his remarkable record recounted in compendious paragraphs. A long list of notable names might be drawn up from the other biographical notices, János Hunyadi, James Hope Scott, Abbé Huc, Gresset, Eugénie and Maurice Guérin, Joseph Haydn, Hefele, Hergenröther, Joel Chandler Harris, General Guiney, Gury, John R. G. Hassard, J. V. Huntington, Abbé Hogan, the Herders, Francesco Guicciardini and Gerald Griffin.

Among the literary titles comprised in the present volume we must mention at least two, that on Humanism and another on Hymnody and Hymnology. The latter especially is, we believe, a real acquisition for English readers. The history of Christian Hymnody up to the vogue of humanism in the fifteenth century is full of unexplored territory for the poet and literary critic. The Romantic movement in our literature in the beginning of the last century owes much of its inspiration to this source, how much no critic has yet told us fully. The revolt usually described as a revolt against classicism was really one against humanism, and the return to Elizabethan freedom and directness was in reality a reversion to mediæval ideals and the early Christian manner in the art of verse. Clemens Blume, S.J., the writer of the article in the volume before us, is wonderfully well equipped with the information demanded by his theme, and his succinct history of the subject, together with the admirable essay on the meter of Christian Hymnody, supplies a distinct acquisition to a neglected branch of literary knowledge. Not the least valuable feature of the article is its exhaustive list of bibliography.

As one might expect in a colossal work of this kind the theological articles are, as usual, numerous and well written. We are inclined to think that the success of the work depends to a large extent upon the admirable way this field has been covered. It is on this topic, very likely, that the Encyclopedia will be consulted oftenest by Catholics as well as non-Catholics to obtain definite and authoritative information concerning Catholic teaching. The preparation of these papers has been guided by a desire for clear statement in order to meet the needs of the ordinary reader. On the other hand, the painstaking accuracy of the writers, masters in this particular domain, will make the Encyclopedia a theological book of reference in seminaries and ecclesiastical libraries. Among the important subjects that come up for treatment in the present volume are "Infallibility," "The Epistle to the Hebrews," "The Holy Ghost," "Immaculate Conception," "Incarnation," "Devotion to the Sacred Heart," "Heaven," "Hell," "Indulgences," and a pithy statement of the Catholic position as regards the creation of the world by Father Maas, under the heading, "Hexameron." The Scriptural subjects discussed in the present volume are not so important as in some of the preceding volumes. Father Driscoll has an interesting and illuminating article on the "Hebrew Language and Literature."

The articles on philosophical matters cover such subjects as "Induction," treated at some length by Dr. Coffey, of Maynooth; "Idea," "Individual," "Individuality," by Father Maher, S.J.; "Hegelianism," by Dr. Turner; "Idealism," by Dr. Willman, of Salzburg. "Individualism," in its peculiar sociological significance, is the occasion of a very suggestive and interesting paper by Dr. Ryan. A cognate subject in connection with philosophy is that of "Herbart" and "Herbartianism," concerning which Father Maher, S. J., gives a brief history and statement and a useful philosophical analysis. "Immanence," that new and sinister word in modern religious and philosophical discussion, is explained in all its various phases by Dr. Édouard Thamin, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Lille.

In the list of countries India receives elaborate notice, for the first time, perhaps, from a Catholic point of view. Father Hull's long article, descriptive and historical, on India and its swarming population is the scholarly performance of a writer well qualified by training, ability and a long and active experience in the country for the task he has here done so well. Hinduism is discussed in an article which is supplementary to that on Brahmanism in a preceding volume. Indo-China has a separate article, whilst another important Asiatic subject, "Hammurabi," is the title of a thorough paper by Dr. Souvay, illustrated with a photographic representation of the famous code. Holland and Hungary come under the letters covered in the present volume and, according to a plan which we deem an important feature of the Encyclopedia, have supplementary articles on Hollanders and Hungarians in the United States.

The Indians of North America furnish material for much important historical and ethnological writing. In this field Mr. James Mooney, United States Ethnologist, Rev. W. H. Ketcham, Director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, and Father Arthur Edward Jones, S.J., are among the notable contributors. The last-named writer has here a monograph on the Hurons which is of the highest value, inclusive, scientifically arranged, the fruit of life-long studies.

The historical side of the seventh volume is most interesting, if not most important. The masterly article, entitled "Ecclesiastical History," from the pen of Dr. Kirsch, fills sixteen columns, and is a veritable hand-book on a theme around which most of the religious controversies of the last fifty years have been waged. Other historical papers are "Huguenots," by the editor of La Revue de la Gascogne; "Hierarchy of the Early Christian Church," "Honorius I," in which the question of his supposed heresy is treated by John Chapman, O.S.B., with judicial calmness; "Heresy," "Henry IV of France," by Georges Goyau, of the Revue de Deux Mondes; "Henry VIII of England," by Herbert Thurston, S.J., who also contributes a very original historical paper on "Impostors," "Guilds," "Hospitals," "Hospitallers," and "The Gunpowder Plot."

Before we reach the limit of our space we must refer, as to samples of a miscellaneous class of most interesting information, to the Bollandist, Father Delahaye's "Hagiography," "Hypnotism," by Georges Surbled, M.D., Professor at the School of the Hospitaliers de San Salvador, Paris; and "Ecclesiastical Heraldry," an article, with two beautiful colored plates, by Mr. Arthur Charles Davies. The illustrations throughout the volume are numerous and there are two maps, one of Hungary, the other of India, with markings of the Ecclesiastical divisions.

Alexander Hamilton; AN ESSAY ON AMERICAN UNION. By F. S. OLIVER. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The history of our country, from the Stamp Act of 1765 to the election of the Republican President, Thomas Jefferson, by the Federalist House of Representatives in 1801, naturally falls into two chapters. In the first are recounted facts for general circulation, so to speak: the quarrel and breach with Great Britain, the self-sacrifice of the patriots during the Revolution, the valiant deeds on the field of battle, the statesmanlike fruit of the Constitutional Convention, and the adjustments and oiling which resulted in the smooth working of the complicated machinery of the new government. In the second chapter, intended for mature and reflective minds only, appear the strictly human elements, the pride, the jealousy, the distrust, which influenced the actors in the drama and affected the results. The difference between these two chapters is the difference between a group posed as a living picture when seen from the spectators' place and the same group when viewed from behind the scenes. Mr. Oliver has made a valuable contribution to the second chapter of our history. Although giving fuller details of the life and public services of Alexander Hamilton, he makes us feel acquainted with John Adams and Thomas Jefferson and throws no little light on other names less generally known.

There was little to presage future renown when that French Huguenot wife set aside her Danish husband and with little regard for certain trifling formalities, selected as the object of her conjugal affections a Scotch merchant named Hamilton. He gave his name to young Alexander when the child was born on the small West India island of Nevis, January 11, 1757. At the age of twelve the boy was an apprenticed clerk with aspirations; he was in New York looking for their realization before he had seen his sixteenth birthday. In the fall of 1773 we find the ambitious lad entered at King's College, with the express understanding that he should be promoted as fast as his attainments permitted. The pale, slight youth had hardly turned seventeen when he was haranguing a crowd in what is now City Hall Park. It speaks well for the stripling's progress that certain political pamphlets which he published anonymously at that time were commonly credited to John Jay, our first Chief Justice.

Hamilton was barely twenty years old when he became military secretary to General Washington with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Although active in the cause and of immense help to Washington in correcting and conducting his military correspondence, the young aide achieved no brilliant exploits during the war, if we except a feat at Yorktown which was highly praised by the Commander-in-Chief. His work in the Constitutional Convention was effective, but his energy and success in winning over a hostile majority in New York to the adoption of the Constitution was much more remarkable. His greatest claim, however, to the gratitude of the nation is founded on the part that he took in organizing the Treasury Department and placing the finances of the country on a solid basis.

Long association had made Washington and Hamilton intimate acquaintances, we could almost say friends, for Hamilton revered his chief and Washington put great trust in the younger man's counsels. As first Secretary of the Treasury, the young West Indian dominated the Cabinet. So accustomed did he become to giving advice that, much to the disgust and anger of President Adams, he continued the practice after retiring from his post.

If the States had held together during the Revolution, it was not so much from trust in one another as it was from fear of annihilation. Peace with Great Britain once secured, the old jealousies cropped out anew, the States began to drift apart, and two of them recalled their delegates in the Continental Congress. The foreign debt was unpaid, the clamors of the disbanded troops for their pay were unheeded, State began to vex State with vexatious customs dues, and the public credit had fallen below zero. Out of this chaos rose the Constitution, but it was only a bit of paper. Hamilton breathed life into its still form. By bringing about the assumption of the whole war debt by the Federal Government he aroused in every citizen an interest in its success, for financial considerations outweigh mere sentiment. His policy, which in much less than two years brought the public credit up from the mire and made it second only to that of Great Britain, was the rock of scandal upon which the friendship between Hamilton and Jefferson was dashed to pieces.

From that time they were enemies. Yet, when the choice for President lay between Jefferson and Burr, Hamilton used all his influence to exclude Burr, declaring that he could not belong to a party that should place such a man in the President's chair. Some of the Secretary's recommendations made in a report on manufactures to the second Congress have a very modern ring. He would have landways and waterways improved and extended at Government expense, he would have inspectors to watch over the purity of products, and he would have a commission with ample funds to encourage the arts, agriculture, manufactures and commerce.

On July 4, 1804, Hamilton and Burr attended the banquet of the exclusive Society of the Cincinnati, to which both belonged. A week later Hamilton fell mortally wounded in a duel with Burr. He was then in his forty-eighth year. His grave is in Trinity churchyard, where the daily throngs on Broadway cast not so much as a glance towards the sarcophagus of white stone which marks the spot. In bringing out the resourcefulness and splendid talent of Hamilton, Mr. Oliver shows the immense debt which the country owes him and implies how the debt might have been increased if that brilliant intellect had been permitted to reach the common limit of usefulness in the service of the young republic.

H. J. SWIFT, S.J.

So as by Fire, by JEAN O'CONNOR. New York: Benziger Brothers. Price $1.25. Seven Little Marshalls, by MARY F. NIXON-ROULET. New York: Benziger Brothers. Price 45 cents.

The author of "So as by Fire," having a story to tell, leaves aside everything else and goes about telling it. There is plenty of plot, of movement, and here and there a surprise. The heroine, by the way, happens to be the villain of the story too—and she performs both roles without violating ethics or unity. The tale is all the more touched with refinement that it is distinctly Catholic.

It is interesting beyond the average novel—and still is not wanting in modernity. The heroine, for instance, is a red-headed girl. She is thus introduced: "The hair that blew about her face was of the reddish gold the old masters loved to paint." The author plays the changes upon this "aureole of gold" throughout the book. Nowadays, if the heroine have red hair—the kind of red hair that has tints of gold in the sunlight, the rest of her really doesn't matter. In comparison of the red hair, all else is leather and prunella. We are glad that the red-haired girl is getting her day; and congratulate the author upon the strong and successful note which this book adds to the modern chorus which goes to the singing of her praise.

Mrs. Nixon-Roulet gives us a capital story for children. It is full of life—full of seven lives. There is a dash of humor which makes the book human, and a strain of religion—the sunny side of piety—which gives an added charm. The chapter entitled "Polly's Ortygraf" is one of the prettiest episodes in the pages of modern juvenile literature. May Polly and her brothers and sisters gladden a thousand Catholic homes.

Reviews and Magazines

Le Correspondant for March 10 registered, with sincere and deep grief, the death of Auguste Boucher, who had for many years written one of the most telling features of this review, the fortnightly chronicle of events, and who died on March 4, after an exemplary Catholic life, a true knight of the pen. The editor-in-chief, M. Etienne Lamy, wrote an eloquent biographical sketch of his departed friend, and this took the place of the usual "Chronique politique," which, as the editor puts it, "to-day remains empty like a house awaiting its master." In the issue of March 25 the chronicle reappears, signed "Interim." This modest pen-name hides one who evidently knows how to think and write. Of the Duez affair he says: "The scandal of the liquidations is not a fortuitous accident, but a natural fruit, which matured according to well-known laws. The radical republic must acknowledge it for its own, and our radical Parliament will not succeed in deceiving the people. How indignant soever it may be, it is an accomplice of the crime, for it voted a bad law and did nothing to prevent its execution from making it worse." Recalling how M. Barthou, Minister of Justice, deplored the appointment, without previous inquiry into their record, of judicial administrators who were to handle millions, he reminds the Minister that he is thereby attacking the very system which put him at the head of the judges of France. He goes on to show that when the work of liquidation was offered to honest and capable men they would have nothing to do with it, and that the only qualification required in the liquidators ultimately appointed was political sympathy with the robber government. Finally he points out how meagre is the compensation granted after long delay, during which death from hardship frequently supervened, to the despoiled religious. During the first five years of liquidation two thousand pauperized religious obtained only forty-six thousand francs of indemnity, while fifty lawyers received eleven hundred thousand francs. And yet the greatest part of the property of the religious orders was, as M. Briand himself expressed it, "volatilized" by the fraudulent liquidators.

The Rev. Arthur Pirovano, of the Foreign Missions of Milan, tells, in the April number of the Annals of the Propagation of the Faith, of the opening of a new mission station in East Burma. Riding on horseback as far as he could and then continuing his journey on foot along a mountain trail, he reached the native village whose chiefs and elders had invited him to send them a catechist. Their primitive way of living, their superstitious practices and their amulets are described as only the missionary on the spot can describe them. Incidentally we see why our extensive foreign missions can be conducted at such a modest outlay and how, if their pitifully small resources were increased, their influence could become far greater. Father Castel, S.J., writes of the edifying zeal and constancy of a small band of believers in a neglected part of Madagascar, and Father Laane, of the White Fathers, gives us further information about the victims of the dread sleeping sickness in Uganda. There is also a biographical sketch with portrait of the late Very Rev. Prosper B. Delpech, who, during his long connection with the Paris Seminary for Foreign Missions, helped in the ecclesiastical training of eighty-five bishops and two thousand five hundred missionary priests.

Mrs. Katharine Tynan Hinkson is becoming a regular contributor of verse to the Atlantic. A little Easter song appears in the April number over her name. It is pre-Chaucerian, pre-Raphaelitic and altogether pre-modern, simple to the very limit of sophistication. The cooing of the cuckoo never struck us as being a joyous Easter cry. But, if one carefully cultivates the archaic mood under the hypnotic spell of Mrs. Hinkson's song, he may detect a kind of muted rapture in the subdued and melancholy spring notes from the hilltops. An amusing literary contribution to the same number is that of E. V. Lucas on "The Theologians at the Mitre," which professes to be inspired by a German scholar's account of travels in England during the eighteenth century.

In Scribner's Mr. Clyde Fitch is proposed as a dramatist worthy of literary consideration, in an article by Richard Prichard Eaton on "The Dramatist as Man of Letters." It is hard to see how Mr. Eaton establishes his proposition. It is true, Mr. Fitch's plays may serve the historian of the future in a study of our social conditions; but, if the exigencies of his stage art required the sacrifice of literary form, he can never rest on the same shelf with Sheridan. A remarkable paper, remarkable in itself and remarkable in the fact that it appears in a popular monthly, is that "On Responsibility," in the same number of Scribner's. The sense of responsibility, like "the sense of sin," whose gradual disappearance Gladstone deplored, seems to be on the wane among us, and nowhere more so than in the world of letters. The little homily on the subject, by John Grier Hibben, is a well-timed and pleasantly written protest.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

WHAT THE PAPERS SAY OF COL. ROOSEVELT.

(The New York Sun, April 5.)

In the Roosevelt version of the correspondence which ended in the refusal of the Pope to receive the ex-President the first message of Monsignor Kennedy, Rector of the American Catholic College in Rome, is given in full in one of Ambassador Leishman's despatches. Mr. Roosevelt's answer to this is also given in full. Then, in natural order, comes the subjoined condensation of the second communication from Monsignor Kennedy.

"On March 28 Ambassador Leishman sent Mr. Roosevelt a cable despatch which ended by saying that 'the audience could not take place excepting on the understanding expressed in the former message.'"

The effect produced on the reader of this sentence is that a curt and not courteous ultimatum was served on Mr. Roosevelt by the Rector of the American College, acting officially for his Holiness the Pope. This impression is increased by the next paragraph of the Roosevelt statement:

"Mr. Roosevelt sent the following cable despatch to Ambassador Leishman on March 29: 'Proposed presentation is of course now impossible.'"

Thus the matter stands: The Pope with almost discourteous abruptness insists on the observance of certain conditions which are incompatible with the dignity and freedom of the applicant for a reception, and the applicant in just resentment properly and most pointedly refuses to submit. A laudable attitude and sure to provoke the applause of right feeling and liberal men of all religious faith.

But this is not the first time Mr. Roosevelt has given to the public correspondence revealing himself in an admirable position. What was the complete text of Monsignor Kennedy's second message? Was it abrupt, as the Roosevelt statement would lead us to believe? On this aspect of the case we have the statement of Monsignor Kennedy. It is prefaced by a significant remark:

"I notice that my second message is not fully given."

With this as an introduction the Rector of the American College discloses the text of his second message, which was:

"His Holiness will be much pleased to grant an audience to Mr. Roosevelt, for whom he entertains great esteem both personally and as President of the United States. His Holiness quite recognizes Mr. Roosevelt's entire right to freedom of conduct. On the other hand, in view of the circumstances, for which neither his Holiness nor Mr. Roosevelt is responsible, an audience could not occur except on the understanding expressed in the former message."

This puts a somewhat different face on the correspondence. There is no curtness, no discourtesy, no abruptness in this message. Instead, we find a compliment to Mr. Roosevelt personally, a pleasant allusion to the country from which he comes, a frank recognition of his complete freedom of action, and what without violence might be construed into a regret that circumstances beyond the power of the Pope or even of Theodore Roosevelt, to alter made it necessary for his Holiness not to recede from a position already taken. This, we repeat, is somewhat different from the idea conveyed by Mr. Roosevelt's condensed version of Monsignor Kennedy's note.

The Roosevelt version of this communication will be the more widely circulated of the two, a fact of which Mr. Roosevelt was well aware. The Kennedy correction will never overtake the mutilated statement. Suppression and evasion; they are among the most used and highly valued weapons in the arsenal of the Mighty Hunter. They have served him well in his own country. How will they answer his purpose in foreign lands?

(New York World, April 5.)

Mr. Roosevelt's megalomania never mounted to dizzier heights than when he implored the American people to treat the Vatican incident as "merely personal, and above all as not warranting the slightest exhibition of rancor or bitterness."

We can assure Mr. Roosevelt that the American people are still calm and are bearing up bravely. Not a single resolution has been introduced in Congress directing the President to send the battle-ship fleet up the Tiber to shell Rome. The general feeling is one of sympathy with the Vatican in having missed "a perfectly corking time" on account of the restrictions of Papal etiquette.

Even if Mr. Roosevelt had not sent that impassioned cablegram to Dr. Abbott pleading for "the avoidance of harsh and bitter comment," we think the American people would have restrained themselves and gone to work as usual yesterday morning when the whistle blew. Although they have been compelled to struggle along for a year without Mr. Roosevelt's personal counsel, guidance and attention, most Americans are still rather more than half-witted. They know that the Vatican has certain rules that visitors are expected to comply with, and that visitors who do not wish to comply with these rules are not obliged to seek an audience with the Pope. They know too that it was Mr. Roosevelt who invited himself to the Vatican, and that he was wholly within his rights in deciding later that he could not accept the restrictions the Vatican sought to impose.

Mr. Roosevelt's cablegram to Dr. Abbott reads less like a plea for religious toleration than like a formal notice of his resumption of political activity. The Roosevelt mark is branded indelibly upon the incident. We recognize all the familiar tricks of the most versatile of living press agents.

It was on March 29 that Mr. Roosevelt decided not to visit the Vatican and cabled to Ambassador Leishman, "Proposed presentation is, of course, now impossible." But no announcement was made. There was no hint of alleged arrangements. Mr. Roosevelt waited until he was in Rome and the centre of attention in the Eternal City. He waited until Sunday, knowing, as he knew when he was President, that Sunday night is the psychological time to make a sensational announcement, because the Monday newspapers are usually dull and "big news is played up for all it's worth." When all the stage-settings were in place the correspondents were called in, the cablegram was sent to the editor of the Outlook, and the civilized world knew that Theodore Roosevelt had resumed business at the old stand.

It was a highly dramatic method of notifying the country that the centre of the stage was again occupied by the only political actor worthy of the star part. But why drag in religion?

(The New York Globe, April 4.)

The trouble recently ruffling Egypt has moved over to Italy. As the weather man would put it, the disturbance a few days ago in the neighborhood of Cairo is now central over Rome. Last week it was necessary to instruct the Nationalists of Egypt concerning their duty; now it is the Pope who is the pupil and feels over his knuckles the rap of the ferule. Fallières of France, the Kaiser of Germany, and Edward of England may as well brace themselves to display their prettiest behavior. The universal schoolmaster is still on his travels, and other capitals are included in his itinerary.

The latest instance shows again that Mr. Roosevelt is still Mr. Roosevelt. We have excuse for the same line of comment that has followed his sensational career. The thing done is well enough, but, oh! the way in which it is done! The diplomacy of the Vatican, by a tradition established by centuries, is pussy-footed, but even it was not skilful enough to tread softly when the great row-maker got within striking distance. The first notification received by Merry del Val was the sound of breaking crockery. And when the sound is at its height Mr. Roosevelt despatches a characteristic message to America to the effect that he hopes that the incident will be regarded as purely a "personal" one, and that it will not warrant "the slightest exhibition of rancor or bitterness." At the same hour all the documents bearing on the case are given to the waiting newspaper corps.

That Mr. Roosevelt should decline to agree to conditions limiting his right to speak when and where he pleases may be readily understood. The idea of having it suggested to him that he should consent to the editing of his conduct! No wonder he was indignant. Moreover, Mr. Fairbanks was his colleague in office, and the name of Mr. Fairbanks having been mentioned in the notes, Mr. Roosevelt was compelled to line up with him. In this country the Catholic vote is important, but so is the Methodist, and it behooves a man who may again be in politics to be careful against raising religious prejudice himself. But granting all this, and that it was necessary for the ex-President to forego the pleasure of kissing the Pope's hand, why was it necessary to make such a noise about it all?

(The New York Evening Journal, April 5.)

There is much nonsense talked by clergymen who shall not be advertised here—to the effect that the Pope had no right to make any such request of Mr. Roosevelt.

But the Pope had a perfect right to make the request. The Pope does not distinguish between Protestant and Catholic. He puts nothing in the way of any visitor to the Vatican or to himself living up to his particular religious beliefs in Rome.

He believes himself to be insulted and discourteously treated by a certain religious organization which has chosen to establish itself outside the door of the Vatican—in which the Pope lives a prisoner.

And he certainly has a right to say that he does not care to receive as personal visitors those that by their presence countenance the intruders who have done so much to disturb his peace.

* * *

The Pope is an old man, who much against his will, with great detriment to his health and happiness and life, has taken on his shoulders the heavy burden of the Papacy, giving up sadly his home and work in Venice.

Mr. Roosevelt understands conditions well enough to know that the Pope is bound absolutely by his duty, bound to a great extent by traditions extending through centuries, bound to protect and respect in the most minute details, and regardless of the greatness or personal importance of any lion killer, the susceptibilities and the deep devotion of his followers throughout the world.

The Pope lives a prisoner, confined in the Vatican because of his convictions. He is now a recluse, shut within narrow walls in a city where his predecessors were rulers and temporal sovereigns.

Mr. Roosevelt, free to fly from continent to continent and from one excitement to another, might dwell with deep sympathy, with very great respect, upon the burdens and the position of that white-haired old man, a prisoner for life, striving earnestly and in a dignified way to protect the great trust laid upon him, and to uphold honorably the traditions and customs of one of the greatest offices that he world has known.

Mr. Roosevelt, it is true, is the former President of eighty millions of people. But he is a private citizen to-day.

The Pope, on the other hand, is the absolute spiritual director, and to a very great extent the temporal adviser and director of two hundred and fifty millions of Catholics.

It would not have been too much for Mr. Roosevelt to think over matters carefully before duplicating the unfortunate and unnecessary incident in which Mr. Fairbanks figured with so little credit to himself.

The people will follow Mr. Roosevelt's advice, they will not become excited about this matter, and we shall not have Americans, Protestant or Catholic, indulging in foolish religious disputes.

But it would have been just as well if Mr. Roosevelt had not sent that foolish message asking the people to take calmly what is of no importance whatever.

And it would have been better still if Mr. Roosevelt had shown to the Pope the respect and the courtesy that he himself so energetically demands from others.

(The New York Evening Post, April 4.)

We cannot feel too grateful to Theodore Roosevelt for his thoughtfulness in advising the American people how to think about this dreadful catastrophe in Rome. We are really inclined to believe that we should have had Orange riots in the streets of New York to-day and the burning of a Catholic church or two in Kansas if this calm manly, high-minded telegram from Rome had not appeared simultaneously with the shocking news that the Pope and Mr. Roosevelt will not meet. Well, we are sure it is the Pope who will lose. He cannot step out of the Vatican and stand on the street corner and watch this Yankee hero like any other Roman. And to miss the grasp of the mighty hunter's hand and hear his assurance that he did visit every Catholic mission within reach, just as he visited the Protestant missions; that on the one hand he loves his Catholic fellow citizens and on the other he loves the Protestant and Hebrew fellow citizens just as much. Later on, we are sure, when the Pope reads this magnificent telegram, he will repent in sackcloth and ashes. As for the American public, it will never forget that Mr. Roosevelt prevented an outraged Protestant country from rising in its wrath and inaugurating a religious warfare. Its citizens will to-day speak kindly to their Catholic friends, as he wishes, and put their revolvers back into their holsters.

ECCELESIASTICAL NEWS

Rev. John P. Chidwick, Rector of St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, has received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from the Pope. Dr. Chidwick, it will be remembered, was chaplain of the ill-fated battleship Maine, which was blown up in the harbor of Havana, February 15, 1898.

The cause of beatification has been introduced at Rome of several negro Christians who were martyred for the Faith in Uganda, British East Africa. They will be the first martyrs of their race to receive the honors of the altar.

Apropos of the visit of ex-President Roosevelt to Rome it is of interest to note that at present the diplomatic corps accredited to the Holy See comprises embassies from Austria-Hungary, Spain and Portugal; ministers plenipotentiary from Russia, Prussia, Belgium, Bavaria, Brazil, Chile, Bolivia, Colombia, Costa Rica, San Domingo, Haiti, Monaco, Nicaragua, Peru, Argentina, Uruguay, Venezuela, Honduras and Ecuador. In these countries the Holy See is represented in direct diplomatic relations by nuncios, internuncios or envoys extraordinary. There are, besides, apostolic delegations in the United States, Canada, Constantinople, Cuba and Porto Rico, Egypt and Arabia, Greece, East Indies, Mesopotamia, Kurdistan, Armenia Minor, Mexico, Persia, the Philippines and Syria.

About a thousand priests were ordained from the old St. Joseph's Seminary at Troy, N. Y., which was closed in 1896, when the institution at Dunwoodie was opened. The Alumni Association of the Seminary will hold its ninth annual reunion at Rochester, April 13 and 14. Among the prelates who are expected to be present will be Archbishop Farley, Bishops Gabriels, Colton, Cusack, Garrigan, Feehan and Nilan, the Bishop-elect of Hartford. To the latter his fellow members are to present a mitre and crozier. Bishop Nilan will be consecrated on April 28, and Mgr. Lavelle, of New York, will preach the sermon.

Archbishop Moeller has appointed the Right Rev. Mgr. J. B. Murray Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati and its Administrator during his absence in Europe this summer. Mgr. Murray is Pastor of St. Edward's parish and was formerly Rector of the diocesan seminary.

Bishop Shaw, coadjutor of San Antonio, will be consecrated at the Cathedral, Mobile, on April 14. He was present as a boy, on December 8, 1874, in the same church, when the first Bishop of San Antonio, Mgr. Anthony D. Pellicer, was consecrated.

Retreats for laymen, under the direction of the Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., are now being held at the Villa, on Keyser Island, South Norwalk, Conn. The dates have been arranged in the following order: April 8, 15, 22, 29, May 6, 13, 20, 27, and June 3. Then the place will be transferred to Fordham University, New York City, the exercises commencing as follows: June 17, 24, July 1, 8, 15, 22, 29, August 5, 12, 19, 26, September 2 and 9.

Keyser Island is easily accessible. It is only one hour's ride from Grand Central. The 3.32 P. M. is a convenient train. Bands of forty Retreatants will be hereafter accommodated. Applications should be made at least three days before the opening of the Retreat to Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., 801 West 181st street, New York, Spiritual Director.

Siberia, once supposed to be the dreary abode of Russian political exiles and criminals, under the magic influence of the great international railway, is opening up to Western civilization and commerce. There are a number of Catholics there, over whom Bishop Cieplak presides, his diocese extending over 225,000 square miles. He recently made a visitation of it which took him five months and a half. The government provided a railway carriage for himself and the six priests who accompanied him, and they were given a hearty reception everywhere.

A note from the Bishop of Cork, Ireland, was read in all the churches of that diocese recently, warning the people against Mormon elders who were holding meetings in the city to induce girls to emigrate to Canada.

The Tercentenary of the conversion of the Micmac Indians in 1610 is to be celebrated at Restigouche, N. B., on June 24 next.

The Congregation of Rites has approved the text of the Office and Mass in honor of Blessed Joan of Arc, whose feast day is set for the first Sunday after the Ascension.

His Excellency, Archbishop Falconio, Apostolic Delegate to the United States, Cardinal Gibbons, eight other archbishops and twenty-two bishops, members of the hierarchy in the United States, have already accepted the invitation cordially given them by Archbishop Bruchési, of Montreal, to take part in the Twenty-first International Eucharistic Congress, which will be held in Montreal in September. Bishop Montès de Oca, of St. Luis Potosi, and Bishop Ruiz, of Linarès, Mexico, will also be present. Many other archbishops and bishops have not yet signified their acceptance of the invitation, but it is confidently expected that a goodly number of them will do so later.

Two Fathers of the Benedictine Abbey at St. Ottilie, in Bavaria, are about to begin a foundation at Seoul, in Corea. A plot of land has been bought, upon which an agricultural school will be established for the training of young Coreans.

OBITUARY

The Right Rev. Maximiano Reynoso y del Corral, titular Bishop of Neocæsarea, and former ordinary of Tulancingo, died in Leon, Mexico, on March 21, 1910, in the seventieth year of his age. The deceased prelate had first adopted the law as a profession, and in 1876 held the chair of Roman Law in Guanajuato. While journeying from that city to Silao the stage was attacked by bandits and the professor was carried off for possible ransom. Believing at first that he had been seized by some revolutionists who took that way to replenish their treasury, he was placed on a horse and blindfolded. After a couple of hours in the saddle the horsemen quickened their pace, and by a chance word or two revealed that they were being pursued by a posse. At that most critical moment, when the helpless professor knew that he might be murdered offhand if his captors could not evade their pursuers, he commended himself to Our Lady and resigned his life into her keeping. After a half hour's hard ride he heard the barking of dogs and knew that some habitation was near. When the horsemen came to a halt and ordered the still blindfolded man to dismount, he felt that his last moment had come. Without a word the men rode off at full speed and left him to his own resources. Shortly after the rescuing party appeared and conducted him to Silao amid great rejoicing, for he was generally known and respected for his integrity. He then abandoned the law and took Holy Orders, being at the time of his ordination in his thirty-sixth year. In 1899 he was consecrated Bishop of Tulancingo by Mgr. Nicholas Averardi, the Visitor Apostolic of Mexico; but after an administration of only two years he retired to Leon and spent the remainder of his days in prayer and good works. In his native city of Silao he repaired the dilapidated Church of the Pardon and built a chapel to Our Lady of Lourdes, and in Leon another beautiful chapel under the same invocation testified his filial devotion to the Blessed Virgin. It was his daily practice to receive the Sacrament of Penance, and to pray before the Blessed Sacrament.

The death is announced from England of Dr. A. Edmonds Tozer, well known as a composer of church music. He had his bachelor's degree in music from Durham University and his doctor's degree from Oxford and Toronto. He was, moreover, an Associate of the Royal College of Musicians, a Fellow of the Royal College of Organists and a Licentiate of the Royal Academy of Music. Two volumes, "The Proper of the Mass" and "The Catholic Church Hymnal," besides several Masses, testify his zeal for the service of the Church, which was rewarded with a Knighthood in the Pontifical Order of St. Sylvester. Dr. Tozer was a convert, having been received into the Church in 1884.

Right Rev. Mgr. Pierre Hevey, P.A., died at Manchester, N. H., on March 25. He was born at St. Barnabé, P. Q., October 31, 1831, and ordained July 12, 1857. Until October 11, 1871, he did parish work in the Province of Quebec, and then was given charge at Lewiston, Maine, where he remained until 1882, when he was sent to Manchester to take charge of the new parish of Ste. Marie. One of the finest churches in the State, Ste. Marie's College for Boys, the Convent of the Holy Angels, St. Pierre's Orphanage and Notre Dame Hospital are among the material results of Mgr. Hevey's pastorate. In 1890 he was elevated to the dignity of Prothonotary Apostolic.

Right Rev. Dr. Boylan, Bishop of Kilmore, died at his residence, Cullies House, Cavan, March 25, after a short illness. Born in County Cavan, 1867, Dr. Boylan became a professor in Cavan Seminary after his ordination, and in 1876 was appointed Bursar of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, where he remained till 1887, when he joined the Redemptorist Order. For many years a noted missionary, he was made Rector at Limerick, 1897, and in 1898 he became first Provincial of the Irish Province of his Order. He established new foundations in Ireland at Belfast and Athenry, in Western Australia at Perth, in New Zealand at Wellington, and two in the Philippine Islands. On the death of Dr. Magennis in 1907 he was raised to the See of Kilmore, being the first Redemptorist to attain an Irish episcopate. His zeal, eloquence and holiness of life won Dr. Boylan the esteem of all classes. An ardent patriot, he issued an appeal only a week before his death for a more generous support of the Irish Parliamentary Fund. His Solemn Requiem was chanted in Cavan Cathedral March 29, and his remains were buried in the Cathedral grounds.

Charles J. O'Malley, editor of the New World, of Chicago, died on March 26, of paralysis after an illness of three weeks. Mr. O'Malley was a versatile and enterprising journalist, born in Kentucky, February 9, 1857. He was connected with a number of papers before going to Chicago, among them the Midland Review of Louisville, the Pittsburg Observer, the Catholic Telegraph of Cincinnati, and the Syracuse Catholic Sun. He was a vigorous and prolific writer of prose and of occasional verse; his poetry appearing not infrequently in the leading secular magazines.

The Rev. Patrick Gleason, S.J., the veteran Jesuit missionary, well known throughout the Eastern States, died at the Novitiate of St. Andrew-on-Hudson, near Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on April 2. He was born in Dunmore, County Galway, April 18, 1835, and entered the Jesuit novitiate in Canada, August 14, 1862. Later he taught at St. Mary's College, Montreal, and at St. Francis Xavier's, New York. He was ordained to the priesthood, December 21, 1872, and became Rector and Master of Novices at West Park in 1880. With the exception of five years at West Park and of temporary assignments in New York City, Troy and Brooklyn, the greater part of his ministry of thirty-five years was devoted to giving missions. He was an eloquent preacher and a tireless worker in the mission field. His quiet, unaffected ways, as well as the unction with which he spoke, added potency to his words and the fruits of his labors were everywhere abundant. He was a man of genial temperament, a religious faithful to his rule, a priest beloved by those so fortunate as to come under his influence and a missionary whose memory will be linked with the venerable names of Smarius, Damen, Garesché, Coughlin, Maguire and Augustus Langcake.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PRESENT AND FORMER FRENCH RÉGIMES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your Paris correspondent who signs his letter "Old St. Sulpice" says that he breakfasted with the Curé of Sainte Clothilde, where "I met the Count of Chambrun, a Catholic Deputy." He means the Marquis de Chambrun, one of the Deputies from the Department of Lozère. The Marquis de Chambrun is the head of his family. He grew up in Washington, D. C., where he was prepared for his First Communion at St. Patrick's Church by Archbishop (then Father) Keane.

He studied law and was admitted to the bar. As a lineal descendant of Lafayette he had the privilege of practicing law in America without ceasing to become a French citizen. While in Washington he looked after the legal business of the French Embassy. In 1896 he was requested by the Bishop of Mende to return to France and present himself as a Catholic candidate against the Radical then in office. He went back to Lozère, and was elected by an enthusiastic Catholic majority in 1897. He has been successful in his subsequent campaigns, in spite of the fact that the radical atheist tyrants who control the French Government grow more and more powerful. The Marquis de Chambrun understands perfectly well the Constitution and the laws and institutions of the United States, and also the apparent hopelessness of trying to reform the present French Republic. Where the foundations have been destroyed, it is hard to attempt to build.

In Europe any monarchy which becomes a republic takes a step toward anarchy. In the reign of Louis XIV, and under the second empire, the Church flourished in France and spread its roots and branches beyond her frontiers. It was under the monarchy that she received her baptism as filie aînée de l'Eglise, and under the Empire of Louis Napoleon that the wonderful work in Africa of Cardinal Lavigerie was made possible. The government paid the expenses of the first great expedition of the missionary, and French soldiers of the Empire guarded him. It is a mistake to confound together Nero and Louis XIV and Combes and Napoleon.

Thomas B. Reed, the great "Speaker of the House," once said: "There is no tyranny like the tyranny of patriots [so-disant] in a republic!" He said this apropos of the howl of the "fighting men" (not soldiers) which brought about our war with Spain—which might well have been avoided. Until the Republic of France shall have been reformed and renovated, and made into an exact imitation of our ideal Republic, it would be well not to throw stones at the former régimes in France, which may have had their faults, but all of which shine in comparison with the present despotism which masquerades as a republic.

If all the Catholics of France had come to her aid, following the example of the Marquis de Chambrun, there would have been a different kind of republic, and the policy of Leo XIII and Cardinal Rampolla would have been vindicated and the subsequent horrors prevented, but the Catholics hung back and the francmaçonnerie rushed in—and behold the result!

ORIGIN AND PRESERVATION IN DARWIN'S WORKS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Not to weary your readers with any further discussion of origin and preservation in Darwin's works, may I say that for his prime authority Father Graham at once turns to Huxley. There is the trouble. Popular Darwinism is really Huxleyism. Huxley put in lots of origins where Darwin had insisted on preservation. After a while Huxley even brought Darwin to talk more loosely in this matter, though in the one significant expression of that kind that Father Graham quotes the word used is production, not origin. Surely Father Graham, who likes distinctions, will see the force of this. Huxley is responsible for the ordinary idea of natural selection telling us anything about origins. It was good to see him wince in his later years when Bathybius, that mother of origins, to which he had devoted so much time earlier, was mentioned. If what Hæckel and Huxley embroidered on Darwinism were left out, there would be so little about origins that it would not be worth while talking about. If people generally recognized this tomorrow, Darwinism would soon be a thing of the past. It is because of the mistake that emphasizes origins, and does not recognize preservation, that Darwinism has maintained itself. But then, Father Graham, like Wordsworth's little girl, will have his way, doubtless, and insist that there are some origins in Darwinism, though natural selection supposes things already in existence, and selects them, and only incidentally and in contradistinction to his own theory did Darwin sometimes talk about production and use other synonyms for origin.

SLANDERING SOUTH AMERICAN PRIESTS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read lately, in the Literary Digest of February 5, some statements made by Rev. Robert Speer in regard to the immorality of the South American clergy. These statements have been widely read and are in strong contrast to my article on "Religious and Social Conditions in Chile," which appeared in your esteemed Review of January 22. Mr. Speer is a Protestant minister and I am a Catholic priest; he heard only bad things of South America, but I heard bad and good things, too, and, moreover, I saw many good things which were hidden from his eyes.

I left Santiago, Chile, two years and three months ago, and Trinidad, B. W. I., near, Venezuela, six months ago. Until I saw the Literary Digest yesterday, I had not heard of the Pope's letter to the Chilean clergy, nor of the excerpt from the pastoral letter of the good "Bishop of Caracas." If Dr. Speer will give names of Pope and "Bishop," or the dates of their letters, we shall, I am confident, promptly discover that both are spurious.

In the South American Republics the clergy, owing to the anti-Christian governments, as explained in my former letter, are exceedingly scarce. The bishops are often obliged to accept for the sacred ministry foreigners and Indians. When I consider the angelic life they are called upon to live, their recent emancipation from savagery only a few generations back, their constant exposure to temptations, I admire God's grace towards them in keeping them as faithful as they are.

Nineteen years ago I began my labors as a missionary priest in Trinidad, where we have two venerable Venezuelan priests, educated gentlemen and models of all priestly virtues; for nigh fifty years they have served the poor negroes and lepers and they will die in harness, leaving nothing behind them but unsullied characters and a mourning people; one of these is of Indian and African blood.

Thirteen years ago I made a visit of four months' duration of Caracas, where I became acquainted with several of the noble priests of that badly-governed country. What substantial, beautiful, well-kept and well-attended churches! How eloquently the present Archbishop, then Padre Juan Bautista Castro, preached to vast audiences of attentive men and women. How edified I used to be to see the thousands prostrating themselves, in turn, from early morning till late at night, in the large chapel of perpetual adoration, before the, "Living Christ," of whom Mr. Speer knows nothing whatever, for he says the South Americans only honor "the dead Christ." But those Indian and negro children know Him and, like the angels in heaven, their sweet, plaintive voices cry out all day long: "Santo, Santo, Santo Dios Señor de los ejércitos!" as they gaze upon Him on His throne, surrounded by the many wax lights and enveloped in clouds of fragrant incense.

Then, on that Easter Sunday morning, how I accompanied those poor devout people of San Francisco de Yare, before the sun was up, to the Sepulchre of our Risen Lord! How vivid is the recollection of that tableau to my mind to-day! I was fourteen leagues from Caracas, a long and painful journey over the steep mountain paths. I returned by night to avoid the scorching rays of the sun. About two o'clock in the morning I heard voices up the mountain side. I stopped and listened, and over the still, balmy air floated the words of the Archangel Gabriel: "Dios te salve Maria, llena eres de gracia, el Señor es contigo," followed by the words of St. Elizabeth, "bendita eres entre todas las mujeres i bendito es el fruto de tu vientre Jesus." Here they were again, up at two a. m., worshipping the Living Christ, while Mr. Speer was probably asleep in bed. Such was the custom in Spanish countries to arise very early to pray and meditate upon the mysteries of the Rosary, the Life Passion, Death, Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus Christ. The same was repeated at night before retiring.

One afternoon I took my walk out to "El Rincon del Valle" and, entering the church, saw an old Indian with a little boy, alone in the sacred edifice. The father was teaching his son to make the Way of the Cross—to meditate upon the Passion and Death of our Saviour. I drew nearer and beheld great tears falling from their eyes, as they accompanied their Redeemer on His Path of Sorrows.

He speaks of the high percentage of illegitimate children in South America. This is very likely to be misunderstood. There we have "civil marriage" and "religious marriage." The couple must first appear before the civil authority and, if they wish afterwards, before the parish priest and two witnesses. The masses often imagine that compliance with the civil law is all that is requisite, but of course, the priest always registers their offspring as illegitimate. If the same regulations were in force here eighty per cent. of his fellow-countrymen would be rated illegitimate.

There is a big field in the United States for Mr. Speer and his "Volunteers." Would to God they would teach husbands and wives to live in harmony and fidelity to do their duty and have children, instead of turning the courts into divorce mills and slaughtering the innocents! They might labor profitably to baptize the fifty millions of unregenerated Protestants of the United States.

CHARLES JOSEPH CREAMER.

AN ENGLISH CHURCH AT NAPLES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The church for English-speaking Catholics at Naples fills a long-felt want. There are several English Protestant churches, and that, with the activity of English Protestant missionaries, makes it look to the natives as if English people and Americans were all Protestants. Catholics who came to Naples from other countries went to different Italian churches, and consequently were not noticed as a body. Since this English church has been opened English-speaking Catholics have been brought together, especially when, as frequently occurs, men-of-war come, and hundreds of Catholic sailors accompanied by their officers and led by the resident priest, march in a body through the principal streets to this church, where they hear Mass. This has produced a very different feeling, and now people see that their religion is not, as Protestant missionaries assert, only confined to Italy and Spain. Numbers of Protestants attend this Mass, hear the sermon and afterwards ask questions about Catholic customs. Different races are represented in the congregation: Americans, Canadians, Australians, some from India, and many of the Italian nobility, with their children and English governesses.

I write with the object of urging Catholics to attend this church when they are in Naples. A feature of the music is the remarkable voice of a Chinese priest, Father Simon Wang, who is organist and soloist combined, and who has a most marvellous voice, which unites the four registers. The transition from one to the other and his enunciation are correct and artistic. Altogether he is considered a vocal phenomenon, and numbers of people go to hear him sing at the eleven o'clock Mass at St. Ursula's a Chiara (the English church), which is situated in the very centre of the city, within easy access to the hotels.

Naples, March 13, 1910.

As an old subscriber of The Messenger I commenced to receive AMERICA from its first number, and I have read it constantly with increasing interest. All I could say in its praise would be weak, but I take every opportunity of recommending it to my friends, and I hope that a few, at least, will have become subscribers. The number of February 5 is an excellent sample, and I would like to bring it before people of standing and influence in Mexico.—Sres. T. Robinson Bours y Hermanos, Alamos, Sonora, Mexico.

The more I read it the better I like it. It is a jewel and has the principles the world needs. May AMERICA find its way into a million of homes in 1910.—Rev. Michael Nicholl, Nevada, Iowa.
